9 Ceterum tanta strages[1] hominum armorumque locum in quo steterant paulo ante auxiliares compleverat ut prope difficilior transitus esset quam per 10 confertos[2] hostes fuerat. Itaque qui primi erant, hastati, per cumulos corporum armorumque et tabem[3] sanguinis, qua quisque poterat, sequentes hostem et signa et ordines confuderunt. Principum quoque signa fluctuari coeperant vagam ante se 11 cernendo aciem. Quod Scipio ubi vidit, receptui propere canere hastatis iussit et sauciis in postremam aciem subductis principes triariosque in cornua inducit, quo tutior firmiorque media hastatorum acies 12 esset. Ita novum de integro proelium ortum est; quippe ad veros hostes perventum erat, et armorum genere et usu militiae et fama rerum gestarum et 13 magnitudine vel spei vel periculi pares. Sed et numero superior Romanus erat et animo, quod iam equites, iam elephantos fuderat, iam prima acie pulsa in secundam pugnabat.

XXXV. In tempore Laelius ac Masinissa pulsos[4] per aliquantum spatii secuti equites, revertentes in aversam hostium aciem incurrere. Is demum equi- 2 tum impetus perculit[5] hostem. Multi circumventi

[1] strages N^2 or N^1 alt.) VJK Froben 2 : strage CBDAN Aldus.

[2] confertos CBD[1]VJK Froben 2 : -tissimos AN Aldus.

[3] tabem Aldus, Eds. : tabe C : tabes BDAN : labem A^1JK Froben 2 : luem V.

[4] pulsos CBDAN Aldus, Froben : fusos A^1N^1VJK.

[5] perculit A^1N^1JK Froben 2 : pertulit V : fudit CBDAN Aldus.

---

[1] After a pause, while Hannibal also was reforming his lines, in what manner we are not told. For Scipio's reorganization of his front—a notable feat—see Polybius xiv. 3 ff.

[2] I.e. the Carthaginians in the second line, together with the Libyan and Macedonian mercenaries; xxxiii. 5. In Polybius

But such heaps of bodies and arms had covered the B.C. 202 place where the auxiliaries had stood shortly before that to make their way across was almost more difficult than it had been through the dense mass of the enemy. Accordingly the men of the front line, the hastati, pursuing the enemy wherever they could over heaps of bodies and arms and through pools of blood, broke up both their own maniples and their ranks. The maniples of the principes also began to waver, as they saw the unsteady line in front of them. When Scipio saw this he ordered the recall to be sounded at once for the hastati, and after withdrawing the wounded to the rear line, he led the principes and triarii to the wings, in order that the centre, composed of hastati, might be safer and steadier. Thus began an entirely new battle.[1] For they had reached the real enemy,[2] their equals in the character of their weapons and their experience in war and the celebrity of their deeds and the greatness whether of their hopes or of their danger. But the Roman was superior both in numbers and in spirit, because he had already routed the cavalry, had already routed the elephants, and was already fighting against the second line, having repulsed the first.

XXXV. At the right moment Laelius and Masinissa, who had pursued the routed cavalry for a considerable distance, returned and dashed into the rear of the enemy's line. That charge of the cavalry finally worsted the enemy. Many were overpowered

xiv. 6 the new battle begins when Hannibal's third line (Italians so far held in reserve) is at last engaged. Of these troops as veterans Polybius had a much higher opinion than Livy and Frontinus l.c.; cf. xxxiii. 6 and xxxv. 9 fin.

A.U.C. 552

in acie caesi; multi[1] per patentem circa campum fuga sparsi tenente omnia equitatu passim interie-3 runt. Carthaginiensium sociorumque caesa eo die supra viginti milia; par ferme numerus captus cum signis militaribus centum triginta duobus,[2] elephantis undecim; victores ad mille et quingenti[3] cecidere.
4 Hannibal cum paucis equitibus inter tumultum elapsus Hadrumetum perfugit, omnia et ante aciem et in proelio,[4] priusquam excederet pugna, expertus,
5 et confessione etiam Scipionis omniumque peritorum militiae illam laudem adeptus, singulari arte aciem eo
6 die instruxisse: elephantos in prima fronte, quorum fortuitus impetus atque intolerabilis vis signa sequi et servare ordines, in quo plurimum spei ponerent,
7 Romanos prohiberent; deinde auxiliares ante Carthaginiensium aciem, ne homines mixti ex[5] conluvione omnium gentium, quos non fides teneret,
8 sed merces, liberum receptum fugae haberent, simul primum ardorem atque impetum[6] hostium excipientes fatigarent ac, si nihil aliud, volneribus suis ferrum

[1] multi Froben 2: om. CBDANVJK Aldus.

[2] CXXXII CBDAN: CXXXIII Aldus, Froben: XXXII (or in full) VJK.

[3] mille et quingenti C (cc et d), cf. Polyb. XV. xiv. 9: mille et c V: x et BD: x B^{1}AN: decem milia JK Aldus, Froben.

[4] et ante aciem et in proelio conj. Duker, Drakenborch, Eds.: phrases are reversed in CBDANVJK: et in proelio et labante acie Madvig, Emend.: et ante proelium et in acie Weidner: et integro proelio et inclinante acie M. Müller.

[5] ex A^{1}N^{1}VJK Aldus: et CBDAN: om. Froben 2.

[6] atque impetum CBDAN Aldus: om. VJK Froben 2.

---

[1] His base (Sousse), xxix. 1. His ships were there. The distance from Zama is greatly exaggerated by Nepos Hann. 6. 3 (300 miles, he says), while Appian Pun. 47 makes it even 375. Both claim that he covered the distance in two days and slain in the battle-line, many were scattered in flight over the open plain all around, and as the cavalry were in complete possession, they perished everywhere. Over twenty thousand of the Carthaginians and their allies were slain on that day. About the same number were captured, together with one hundred and thirty-two military standards and eleven elephants. Of the victors about fifteen hundred fell. B.C. 202

Hannibal, escaping with a few horsemen in the midst of the confusion, fled to Hadrumetum,[1] having tried every expedient both before the battle and during the engagement before he withdrew from the fray. And even by Scipio's admission and that of all the military experts he had achieved this distinction, that he had drawn up his line that day with extraordinary skill: the elephants in the very front, that their haphazard charge and irresistible strength might prevent the Romans from following their standards and keeping their ranks, upon which tactics they based most of their hopes; then the auxiliaries in front of the line of Carthaginians, that men who were brought together from the offscouring of all nations and held not by loyalty but by their pay might have no way of escape open to them; that at the same time, as they met the first fiery attack of the enemy, they might exhaust them, and if they could do no more, might blunt the enemy's swords and two nights. In reality Zama Regia is about 90 miles due west of Hadrumetum. Naraggara would be ca. 170 Roman miles from that seaport, if the shorter and less rugged southerly route was taken. Every probability, however, favours the supposition that the battle was fought much nearer to Sicca Veneria, and not more than 120 miles from Hadrumetum; cf. p. 547 ff.

A.U.C. 552

9 hostile[1] hebetarent; tum, ubi omnis spes esset,[2] milites Carthaginienses Afrosque, ut, omnibus rebus aliis pares, eo quod integri cum fessis ac sauciis pugnarent superiores essent; Italicos intervallo quoque diremptos,[3] incertos socii an hostes essent, in postre-
10 mam aciem summotos. Hoc edito velut ultimo virtutis opere, Hannibal cum Hadrumetum refugisset,[4] accitusque inde Carthaginem sexto ac tricesimo post 11 anno quam puer inde profectus erat redisset, fassus in curia est non proelio modo se sed [5] bello victum, nec spem salutis alibi quam in pace impetranda [6] esse.

XXXVI. Scipio confestim a proelio expugnatis hostium castris direptisque cum ingenti praeda ad
2 mare ac naves rediit, nuntio allato P. Lentulum cum quinquaginta rostratis, centum onerariis cum omni
3 genere commeatus ad Uticam accessisse. Admovendum igitur undique terrorem perculsae Carthagini ratus, misso Laelio Romam cum victoriae nuntio, Cn. Octavium terrestri itinere ducere legiones Carthaginem iubet; ipse, ad suam veterem nova Lentuli classe adiuncta, profectus ab Utica portum
4 Carthaginis petit. Haud procul aberat cum velata infulis ramisque oleae Carthaginiensium occurrit navis. Decem legati erant, principes civitatis,

[1] hostile VJK Froben 2: hostium CBDAN Aldus.

[2] esset A[1]JK Aldus, Froben: essent N[1]: erat V: om. CBDAN.

[3] intervallo quoque diremptos A[1]N[1]VJK, Aldus, Froben, most Eds.: transposed to fellow summotos Conway; to follow hostes essent Harant, Riemann: om. CBDAN Alschefski, Madvig 1872.

[4] refugisset CBDAN Froben 2: fugisset VJK: per- Aldus.

[5] se sed VK Froben 2: si sed J: sese .d. C: ×se ×se B: (modo s esse D: se esse sed (set N) AN Aldus.

[6] impetranda CBA[1]N[1]V Aldus: -trande B[2]DAN: -trata JK Froben 2.

by their own wounds; next in order the soldiers in whom lay all his hopes, the Carthaginians and Africans, that being equal to the Romans in everything else, they might have the advantage in fighting with strength undiminished against the weary and the wounded; then, removed to the last line and separated by an open space as well, the Italic troops, of whom it was uncertain whether they were allies or enemies. Having produced this as his last masterpiece Hannibal after his flight to Hadrumetum was called away, returning to Carthage in the thirty-sixth year after he had left it as a boy. Thereupon in the Senate House he admitted that he had been defeated not only in a battle but also in the war, and that there was no hope of safety except in successfully suing for peace. B.C. 202

XXXVI. Scipio immediately after the battle stormed and plundered the enemy's camp and with immense booty returned to the sea and his ships, having received word that Publius Lentulus,[1] in command of fifty war-ships and a hundred transports with supplies of every kind, had arrived near Utica. Thinking therefore that he must bring terror to bear from every side against disheartened Carthage, after sending Laelius to Rome with a report of the victory, he ordered Gnaeus Octavius to bring the legions to Carthage by land. He himself went to his old fleet, now enlarged by the new fleet of Lentulus, and then sailed from Utica towards the harbour of Carthage. He was not far away when a Carthaginian ship bedecked with fillets and olive branches met him. There were ten envoys, leading [1] Cf. ii. 4; xxiv. 5; xxvii. 9. The same passages apply to Octavius, § 3, commanding a fleet.

A.U.C. 552

auctore Hannibale missi ad petendam pacem. 5 Qui cum ad puppim praetoriae navis accessissent velamenta supplicum porrigentes, orantes implo- 6 rantesque fidem ac misericordiam Scipionis, nullum iis aliud responsum datum quam ut Tynetem venirent; eo se moturum castra. Ipse ad contemplandum Carthaginis situm [1] non tam noscendi in praesentia quam deprimendi [2] hostis causa provectus [3] Uticam, eodem et Octavio revocato, rediit.

7 Inde procedentibus ad Tynetem nuntius allatus Verminam Syphacis filium cum equitibus pluribus quam peditibus venire Carthaginiensibus auxilio. 8 Pars exercitus cum omni equitatu [4] Saturnalibus [5] primis agmen adgressa Numidarum [6] levi certamine fudit. Exitu quoque fugae intercluso ab omni parte circumdatis equitibus quindecim milia hominum caesa, mille et ducenti vivi capti, et equi Numidici mille et quingenti, signa militaria duo et septuaginta; regulus ipse inter tumultum cum paucis effugit. 9 Tum ad Tynetem eodem quo antea [7] loco castra posita, legatique triginta ab Carthagine ad Scipionem venerunt.

[1] situm, after this Johnson, Conway insert provectus in portum as omitted line. Froben emended ad contemplandum . . . situm to ab contemplato . . . situ (-ando Gronovius); Alschefski to contemplatus . . . situm.

[2] deprimendi (varied spellings) CBDAN: terrendi A^{1}(alt.)VJK Froben: deterrendi x.

[3] provectus Alschefski, most Eds.: om. all MSS., Conway.

[4] equitatu, after this $A^{1}N^{1}VJK$ Aldus, Froben, Conway have missa: om. CBDAN Eds.

[5] Saturnalibus CBDANVJK Eds.: turmalibus Aldus, Froben: maturantibus Madvig: om. (primis also) Riemann.

[6] Numidarum CBDAN Aldus, Eds.: numidas $A^{1}JK$ Conway: with in agmine V Froben 2.

[7] antea VJK Aldus, Froben: ante CBDAN.

citizens, sent at the instance of Hannibal to sue for peace. When they approached the stern of the flagship, holding out the symbols of suppliants, begging and beseeching the help and pity of Scipio, no other answer was given them than that they should come to Tynes;[1] that thither he would move his camp. Scipio sailed near in order to view the situation of Carthage, not so much for the purpose of an immediate reconnaissance as to humiliate the enemy, and returned to Utica, recalling Octavius also to the same place. B.C. 202

While proceeding from there to Tynes they received news that Vermina,[2] the son of Syphax, commanding more cavalry than infantry was coming to the help of the Carthaginians. Part of the infantry and all the cavalry attacked the column of the Numidians on the first day[3] of the Saturnalia, and routed it after a slight engagement. As even the way of escape was cut off, with the cavalry surrounding them on all sides, fifteen thousand men were slain, twelve hundred captured alive, fifteen hundred Numidian horses taken and seventy-two military standards. The prince himself in the midst of the confusion escaped with a few men. Then camp was pitched near Tynes on the same site as before, and thirty envoys from Carthage came to Scipio.

[1] Cf. ix. 10; xvi. 1.

[2] Cf. XXIX. xxxiii. 1 f., 8. Still ruling a large part of his father's kingdom; Appian Pun. 33.

[3] I.e. a.d. XIV Kal. Ian., or 17th December. Uncommon is so exact a date for a minor event. It suggests one of the annalists as a source; hence rejected by those who place the greater battle in spring or summer. Other examples, however, are: XLI. xxii. 1; XLIV. xx. 1; XLV. ii. 3. See Macrobius Sat. I. x. 1 ff. Cf. Appendix, p. 552 f.

A.U.C. 552

Et illi quidem multo miserabilius quam antea, quo magis cogebat fortuna, egerunt; sed aliquanto minore cum misericordia ab recenti memoria perfidiae auditi sunt. In consilio quamquam iusta ira omnes ad delendam stimulabat Carthaginem, tamen cum et quanta res esset et [1] quam longi temporis obsidio tam munitae et tam [2] validae urbis reputarent, et ipsum Scipionem exspectatio successoris venturi ad paratam [3] alterius labore ac periculo finiti belli famam sollicitaret, ad pacem omnium animi versi sunt.

XXXVII. Postero die revocatis legatis et cum multa castigatione perfidiae monitis ut tot cladibus edocti tandem deos et ius iurandum esse crederent, condiciones pacis dictae, ut liberi legibus suis viverent; quas urbes quosque agros quibusque finibus ante bellum tenuissent tenerent, populandique finem eo die Romanus faceret; perfugas fugitivosque et captivos omnes redderent Romanis,[4] et naves rostratas praeter decem triremes traderent elephantosque quos haberent domitos, neque domarent [5] alios;

[1] et N²VJK Aldus, Froben : om. CBDAN.

[2] tam A Aldus : iam CBDN : om. VJK Froben 2.

[3] paratam CBDAJK Aldus, Froben, Eds. : paratum NN²V Conway, adding victoriae fructum, which he thinks made a line omitted by P and hence by the rest, except that VN⁴?x have movere fructum.

[4] redderent Romanis CBDAN Aldus : om. VJK Froben 2.

[5] neque domarent, here P resumes (cf. xxx. 14 and xxxviii. 2.

[1] But the consul (Claudius Nero) who aspired to succeed Scipio never reached Africa. Cf. xxvii. 1 f.; xxxviii ff.; xxxix. 1–3; xliv. 3.

[2] Condensing Polybius xvii. 3. The following peace terms (with minor differences) are taken from his ch. xviii. Cf. above xvi. 10 ff. for terms previously proposed. See Appian

Their pleading was, to be sure, much more piteous B.C. 202 than before, in proportion as misfortune was more compelling; but they were heard with much less pity owing to the memory, still fresh, of their treachery. In the council, although righteous indignation spurred them all to the destruction of Carthage, nevertheless they reflected how serious a matter and how protracted also was the siege of a city so well fortified and so strong. Scipio himself was also troubled as he looked forward to a successor [1] who would come into what had been won by the hardship and danger of another—the glory of finishing the war. Consequently they all were inclined to peace.

XXXVII. On the following day the envoys were recalled and with repeated upbraiding for their treachery [2] were advised that, being taught at last by so many disasters, they should believe that the gods and an oath mean something. Whereupon the peace terms were stated to them: they were to live as free men under their own laws; to hold the cities and territories [3] which they had held before the war, with the same boundaries; and the Roman was on that day to make an end of devastation. They were to deliver all deserters and runaway slaves and captives to the Romans, and to surrender their war-ships except ten triremes, and the trained elephants [4] in their possession, and not to train

Pun. 54; Dio Cass. frag. 57. 82; De Sanctis 616 ff.; Scullard 254 ff.

[3] In Africa, that is, as Livy's source (xviii. 1) takes care to make clear.

[4] The most were sent to Rome, the rest given to Masinissa; Zonaras IX. xiv. 11. Some of them were used by the Romans (first instance) in Macedonia, 200 B.C.; XXXI. xxxvi. 4.

A.U.C. 552

4 bellum neve in Africa neve extra Africam iniussu populi Romani gererent; Masinissae res redde-
5 rent foedusque cum eo facerent; frumentum stipendiumque auxiliis, donec ab Roma[1] legati redissent, praestarent; decem milia talentum argenti, discripta pensionibus aequis in annos quinquaginta,
6 solverent; obsides centum arbitratu Scipionis darent, ne minores quattuordecim annis neu triginta maiores. Indutias ita se[2] daturum, si per priores indutias naves onerariae captae quaeque fuissent in navibus restituerentur; aliter nec indutias nec spem pacis ullam esse.

7 Has condiciones legati cum domum referre[3] iussi in contione ederent et Gisgo ad dissuadendam pacem processisset audireturque a multitudine inquieta
8 eadem[4] et inbelli, indignatus Hannibal dici ea in tali tempore audirique, arreptum Gisgonem manu sua ex superiore loco detraxit. Quae insueta liberae civitati species cum fremitum populi movisset, 9 perturbatus militaris vir urbana libertate "Novem" inquit "annorum a vobis profectus post sextum et tricesimum annum redii. Militares artes, quas me a puero fortuna nunc privata nunc publica docuit, probe videor scire; urbis ac fori iura, leges, mores 10 vos me oportet doceatis." Excusata inprudentia de

[1] ab Roma A^2N^2VJK: ab romanis $P(3)N$.
[2] se $P.3)NVJK$ Aldus, Froben, Eds.: om. Conway.
[3] referre, here VJK Froben 2 have ferre.
[4] eadem om. AN Aldus.

---

[1] In Polybius xviii. 6 grain for the entire army for three months and pay until a reply from Rome came.
[2] Pliny N.H. XXXIII. 51 (16,000 lbs. of silver a year for 50 years).

others; to wage war neither in Africa nor outside of Africa without consent of the Roman people. They were to make restitution to Masinissa and frame a treaty with him; to furnish grain and pay to the auxiliaries [1] until the envoys should return from Rome; to pay ten thousand silver talents,[2] divided into equal payments for fifty years; to give a hundred hostages selected by Scipio, not younger than fourteen nor older than thirty years. He would grant an armistice, he said, provided the transports captured during the previous armistice and whatever was on board the ships should be returned; otherwise there would be no armistice nor any hope of a peace. B.C. 202

Such terms the envoys were bidden to carry home, and as they announced them in the assembly Gisgo[3] came forward to oppose the peace. While the multitude was listening, equally incapable of keeping a peace and of carrying on a war, Hannibal, indignant that such things should be said and heard at so critical a moment, seized Gisgo and with his own hand dragged him down from the platform. When this novelty for a free state called forth protests from the people, the man of arms, confounded by freedom in the city, said "At nine years of age I left you, and after thirty-six years I have returned. With the soldier's arts, in which from boyhood first my own lot, and then a public exigency gave me training, I may pass as well acquainted. In the rights, laws, usages of the city and the marketplace it is you who should train me." Having apologized for his ignorance, he discoursed at length

[3] Unknown. Polybius is here the main source, but he mentions no name; xix. 2 ff.

A.U.C. 552

pace multis verbis[1] disseruit, quam nec iniqua et 11 necessaria esset. Id omnium maxime difficile erat, quod ex navibus per indutias captis nihil praeter ipsas comparebat naves; nec inquisitio erat facilis, 12 adversantibus paci qui[2] arguerentur. Placuit naves reddi et homines utique inquiri; cetera quae abessent aestimanda Scipioni permitti atque ita pecunia luere
13 Carthaginienses.—Sunt qui Hannibalem ex acie ad mare pervenisse, inde praeparata nave ad regem Antiochum extemplo profectum tradant, postulantique ante omnia Scipioni ut Hannibal sibi traderetur responsum esse Hannibalem in Africa non esse.

XXXVIII. Postquam redierunt ad Scipionem legati, quae publica in navibus fuerant ex publicis descripta rationibus quaestores,[3] quae privata profiteri
2 domini iussi; pro ea summa pecuniae viginti quinque[4] milia pondo argenti praesentia exacta; indutiaeque Carthaginiensibus[5] datae in tres menses.
3 Additum ne per indutiarum tempus alio usquam quam Romam mitterent legatos, et quicumque legati Carthaginem venissent, ne ante dimitterent eos quam Romanum imperatorem qui et quae[6] petentes

[1] de pace multis verbis A[1]N1VJK Eds.: om. P(3)N, one line.

[2] adversantibus paci qui P(3)N (om. qui DAN): cum adversantes paci A[1]VJK Aldus, Froben: adversantes paci qui N1.

[3] quaestores P(3)NVJK Eds.: quaestor Forchhammer.

[4] XXV P(3)N Eds.: XV VJK.

[5] Carthaginiensibus, in this word P comes to an end.

[6] qui et quae A[1]N[1]VJK Eds.: qui ita CBDAN.

---

[1] Livy condenses Hannibal's plea for a treaty of peace; Polyb. xix. 5–7.

upon the peace, showing how far from unjust it was B.C. 202 and how inevitable.[1] The most troublesome point of all was that of the ships captured during the armistice nothing was to be seen except the ships themselves, and investigation was not easy since the accused were opponents of the peace. It was decided that the ships should be returned and the men at all costs traced; that appraisal of whatever else was lacking be committed to Scipio, and that thus the Carthaginians should pay the amount in cash.—There are some historians[2] who relate that Hannibal leaving the battle made his way to the sea and then on a ship prepared for him at once sailed to King Antiochus; and that when Scipio demanded above all things that Hannibal be surrendered to him, the answer was that Hannibal was not in Africa.

XXXVIII. After his envoys had returned to Scipio the quaestors were ordered from entries in the public accounts to make a declaration of what public property had been on the ships, and owners were to do the same for private property. In place of that sum total twenty-five thousand pounds of silver were exacted in immediate payment.[3] And an armistice for three months was granted the Carthaginians. In addition they were not to send envoys during the period of the armistice to any other place than to Rome, and in case any envoys should come to Carthage they were not to let them go until they informed the Roman commander who they were and

[2] Unknown. For his escape, 195 B.C., to Tyre, and so to Antiochus at Ephesus cf. XXXIII. xlviii f.

[3] It must have been quite impossible to complete a list of individual claims.

A.U.C. 552

4 venissent certiorem facerent. Cum legatis Carthaginiensibus Romam missi L. Veturius Philo et M. Marcius Ralla et L. Scipio imperatoris frater.
5 Per eos dies commeatus ex Sicilia Sardiniaque tantam vilitatem annonae effecerunt [1] ut pro vectura frumentum nautis mercator relinqueret.
6 Romae ad nuntium primum rebellionis Carthaginiensium trepidatum fuerat, iussusque erat Ti. Claudius mature classem in Siciliam ducere atque inde in Africam traicere, et alter consul M. Servilius ad urbem morari, donec quo statu res in Africa
7 essent sciretur. Segniter omnia in comparanda deducendaque classe ab Ti. Claudio consule facta erant, quod patres de pace P.[2] Scipionis potius arbitrium esse quibus legibus daretur quam consulis
8 censuerant. Prodigia quoque nuntiata sub ipsam famam [3] rebellionis terrorem [4] adtulerant: Cumis solis orbis minui visus et pluit lapideo imbri, et in Veliterno agro terra ingentibus cavernis consedit, 9 arboresque in profundum haustae; Ariciae forum et circa tabernae, Frusinone murus aliquot locis et porta de caelo tacta; et in Palatio lapidibus pluit. Id prodigium more patrio novemdiali sacro, cetera

[1] effecerunt VJK Froben 2, Luchs: fecerunt CBDAN Aldus, Eds., Conway.

[2] P. A¹VJK Luchs: om. CBDAN many Eds., Conway.

[3] famam CN² Aldus, Froben: om. BDAN: fama (with ipsa) A³VJK.

[4] terrorem, before the verb DANV Aldus, Froben, Eds., but after, CBJK Conway.

---

[1] Veturius had been consul in 206 B.C. (XXVIII. x.); Marcius, city praetor in 204 B.C. (XXIX. xiii. 2). Lucius Scipio reached the consulship with Laelius in 190 B.C. (XXXVII. i.).

for what purpose they had come. With the Carthaginian envoys Lucius Veturius Philo and Marcus Marcius Ralla and Lucius Scipio, brother of the general-in-command, were sent to Rome.[1] About that time supplies from Sicily and Sardinia lowered the price of grain so much that the merchant would leave his grain to the mariners to cover the freight. B.C. 202

At Rome upon the first news of the Carthaginians' renewed hostilities there had been alarm, and Tiberius Claudius had been ordered to take his fleet promptly to Sicily and then to cross to Africa, and the other consul, Marcus Servilius, to remain near the city until it should be known what was the state of affairs in Africa. Everything in the assembling and launching of his fleet had been carried on without spirit by Tiberius Claudius, the consul, because the senate had voted that authority over the terms on which peace should be granted belonged to Scipio rather than to the consul.[2] Reports of prodigies also at the very time when there were rumours of fresh hostilities had inspired alarm. At Cumae the sun was partially eclipsed and it rained stones, and in the district of Velitrae[3] the ground settled in huge cavities and trees were swallowed in the depths. At Aricia the forum and shops round it, at Frusino[4] the city wall at a number of places and a gate were struck by lightning; and on the Palatine there was a shower of stones. That portent was atoned for by nine days of rites according to ancestral custom,[5]

[2] Cf. xxiii. 3 f.; xxvii. 1–4.

[3] Now Velletri, just beyond the Alban Hills and 8 miles from Aricia.

[4] Now Frosinone; on the Via Latina, while Aricia lay on the Appia, 16 m.p. from Rome.

[5] Cf. Vol. VII. p. 90, note.

A.U.C. 552

10 hostiis maioribus expiata. Inter quae etiam aquarum insolita magnitudo in religionem versa; nam ita abundavit Tiberis ut ludi Apollinares circo inundato extra portam Collinam ad aedem Erycinae Veneris
11 parati sint. Ceterum ludorum ipso die subita serenitate orta pompa duci coepta ad portam Collinam revocata deductaque [1] in circum est cum decessisse [2] 12 inde aquam nuntiatum esset; laetitiamque populo et ludis celebritatem addidit sedes sua sollemni spectaculo reddita.

XXXIX. Claudium consulem, profectum tandem ab urbe, inter portus Cosanum Loretanumque atrox vis tempestatis adorta in metum ingentem adduxit.
2 Populonium inde cum pervenisset stetissetque ibi, dum reliquum tempestatis exsaeviret, Ilvam insulam et ab Ilva Corsicam, a Corsica in Sardiniam traiecit. Ibi superantem Insanos montes multo et [3] saevior et infestioribus locis tempestas adorta disiecit classem.
3 Multae quassatae armamentisque spoliatae naves, quaedam fractae. Ita vexata ac lacerata classis Carales tenuit. Ubi dum subductae reficiuntur naves, hiems oppressit circumactumque anni tempus, et nullo prorogante imperium privatus Ti. Claudius
4 classem Romam reduxit. M. Servilius, ne comitiorum

[1] deductaque A¹VJK Aldus, Froben : ductaque CBDAN.
[2] decessisse A¹N²VJK Aldus, Froben, Eds. : cessisse CDAN : re- Alschefski, Madvig.
[3] et CBDA¹VJK Froben 2 : om. AN Aldus.

---

[1] On the Via Salaria outside (but near) the Porta Collina. Not built until 181 B.C. Livy uses it here merely as a landmark; XL. xxxiv. 4; Strabo VI. ii. 6.
[2] Mentioned in XXII. xi. 6; cf. XXVII. x. 8. Portus Loretanus is unknown.
[3] Now Piombino; cf. XXVIII. xlv. 15.

the rest by full-grown victims. Meanwhile the unusual height of rivers was also interpreted as a portent. For the Tiber so far overflowed that, as the Circus was flooded, preparations for the Games of Apollo were made outside the Porta Collina, near the Temple of Venus of Eryx.[1] On the very day of the games, however, after a sudden clearing the procession, already on its way to Porta Collina, was recalled and directed into the Circus when word was received that the water had retired from it. Restoration of its normal scene to the customary spectacle also added to the delight of the people and to the throngs who attended the games. B.C. 202

XXXIX. Claudius, the consul, had at last left the city when a very violent storm, which he encountered between the harbour of Cosa[2] and the Portus Loretanus, caused him great alarm. Then after reaching Populonium[3] and lying at anchor there until the rest of the storm should abate, he crossed over to the Island of Elba and from Elba to Corsica, from Corsica to Sardinia. There as he was passing the Raving Mountains, a much more savage storm, descending upon him in a much more dangerous situation, scattered the fleet. Many of the ships were leaking and had lost their rigging, some were wrecked. In this storm-tossed, damaged condition the fleet reached Carales.[4] There, while the beached ships were undergoing repairs, winter overtook him, and as the turn of the year came while no one sought to prolong his command, it was as a private citizen that Tiberius Claudius brought the fleet back to Rome. Marcus Servilius, to avoid being recalled to [4] Cagliari; several times in XXIII. xl. f.; cf. Vol. VII. p. 226, note.

A.U.C. 552

causa ad urbem revocaretur, dictatore dicto C. Servilio Gemino, in provinciam est profectus. Dictator magistrum equitum P. Aelium Paetum dixit. Saepe comitia indicta perfici tempestates prohibuerunt; itaque cum pridie idus Martias veteres magistratus abissent,[1] novi suffecti non essent, res publica sine curulibus magistratibus erat.

6 T. Manlius Torquatus pontifex eo anno mortuus; in locum eius suffectus C.[2] Sulpicius Galba. Ab L. Licinio Lucullo et Q. Fulvio aedilibus curulibus ludi 7 Romani ter toti[3] instaurati. Pecuniam ex aerario scribae viatoresque aedilicii clam egessisse per indicem[4] damnati sunt, non sine infamia Luculli 8 aedilis. P. Aelius Tubero et L. Laetorius aediles plebis vitio creati magistratu se abdicaverunt, cum ludos ludorumque causa epulum Iovi fecissent et signa tria[5] ex multaticio argento facta in Capitolio posuissent. Cerialia ludos dictator et magister equitum ex senatus consulto fecerunt.

XL. Legati ex Africa Romani simul Carthaginiensesque cum venissent Romam, senatus ad aedem 2 Bellonae habitus est. Ubi[6] cum L. Veturius Philo pugnatum cum Hannibale esse suprema Carthaginien-

[1] abissent CBDANJK Aldus, Froben: -essent N^2V.
[2] C. CA^1JK Froben 2: Cn. N^1V: om. BDAN Aldus.
[3] ter toti CBDAN Aldus: tertio A^1N^2VJK Froben 2.
[4] indicem, after this z Aldus, Froben, Eds. add comperti; om. by CBDANVJK Alschefski, Conway.
[5] tria A^6 Aldus, Froben: aerea C: (signa)ria BDAN: militaria A^1JK.
[6] Ubi CBDAN Aldus, Froben: ibi VJK.

[1] Consul in 203 B.C.; xix. 6 ff.; XXIX. xxxviii. 3.
[2] The stern defender of every ancient custom; cf. especially XXII. lx ff., after Cannae, 19 years after his first consulship; XXIII. xxii. 7; above, ii. 8.

the city to hold the elections, named Gaius Servilius B.C. 202
Geminus [1] dictator and went to his province. The dictator named Publius Aelius Paetus master of the horse. Repeatedly a date for the elections was announced, but storms prevented them from taking place. Consequently, since the old magistrates had left office on the eve of the Ides of March and new men had not been elected in their places, the state had no curule magistrates.

Titus Manlius Torquatus,[2] the pontiff, died that year and Gaius Sulpicius Galba was named in his place. The Roman Games were repeated three times throughout by Lucius Licinius Lucullus and Quintus Fulvius, the curule aediles. For having secretly abstracted money from the Treasury, clerks and messengers of the aediles were condemned on evidence of an informer, not without disgrace for Lucullus as aedile. Publius Aelius Tubero and Lucius Laetorius, owing to a defect in their election as plebeian aediles, abdicated their office after they had conducted the games and in connexion with them a banquet for Jupiter, and had placed on the Capitol three statues of which the cost was met by money paid in fines. The festival of Ceres was under the direction of the dictator and master of the horse by decree of the senate.

XL. Upon the arrival at Rome of the envoys from Africa, the Roman and the Carthaginian at the same time, the senate sat in the Temple of Bellona.[3] There Lucius Veturius Philo [4] to the great joy of the senators set forth how they had fought with Hannibal in a battle that was for the Carthaginians their last,

[3] Cf. xxi. 12 and note.

[4] Cf. xxxviii. 4.

A.U.C. 552 sibus pugna finemque tandem lugubri bello inpositum
3 ingenti laetitia patrum exposuisset, adiecit Verminam etiam Syphacis filium, quae parva bene gestae rei accessio erat, devictum. In contionem inde [1] prodire
4 iussus gaudiumque id populo inpertire. Tum patefacta [2] gratulationi [3] omnia in urbe templa supplicationesque in triduum decretae. Legatis Carthaginiensium et Philippi regis—nam hi [4] quoque venerant—petentibus ut senatus sibi daretur responsum iussu patrum ab dictatore est consules novos iis senatum daturos esse.

5 Comitia inde habita. Creati consules Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Aelius Paetus; praetores M. Iunius Pennus, cui sors urbana evenit, M. Valerius Falto Bruttios, M. Fabius Buteo Sardiniam, P. Aelius
6 Tubero Siciliam est sortitus. De provinciis consulum nihil ante placebat agi quam legati Philippi regis et Carthaginiensium auditi essent; belli finem alterius, alterius principium prospiciebant animis.

A.U.C. 552 7 Cn. Lentulus consul cupiditate flagrabat provinciae Africae, seu bellum foret, facilem [5] victoriam,[6] seu iam finiretur, finiti tanti belli se [7] consule gloriam
8 petens. Negare itaque prius quicquam agi passurum quam sibi provincia [8] Africa decreta esset, concedente

[1] inde A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben : om. CBDAN.

[2] patefacta C[7]B[1]A[1]N[1]VJK Froben 2 : paterfacta CBD : patuere facta AN Aldus (faciendae Gronovius).

[3] gratulationi Gronovius : -ne CBDANVJK.

[4] hi BANV : hii CDA[1]J : ii K Aldus, Froben.

[5] facilem CBDN[1]VJK : facile AN.

[6] victoriam N[1]VJK Froben 2 : victoriam fore CBDAN Aldus.

[7] se CBDANVJK Aldus, Froben, Alschefski, Conway : a se J. Perizonius, Eds.

[8] provincia A[1]N[1]VJK : -iam C : om. BDAN Aldus, Froben.

and that at length an end had been made of a war of grievous losses. He then added that Vermina also, the son of Syphax, had been defeated—a small supplement to a victorious campaign. Upon that he was bidden to go out into the assembly and share the joyful news with the people. Then all the temples in the city were opened for the offering of thanks, and three days of thanksgiving were ordered. When the Carthaginian envoys and those of King Philip—for these also had arrived—requested that a hearing in the senate be granted them, by order of the senate the dictator replied that the new consuls would grant them a hearing in the senate.[1] B.C. 202

Thereupon the elections were held. As consuls Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus and Publius Aelius Paetus were elected, as praetors Marcus Iunius Pennus, to whom fell the city praetorship, Marcus Valerius Falto, to whom the land of the Bruttii, Marcus Fabius Buteo, to whom Sardinia, Publius Aelius Tubero, to whom Sicily was allotted. As for the consuls' provinces, the senators were not disposed to take up the matter until the envoys of King Philip and those of the Carthaginians had been heard. They foresaw the end of one war, the beginning of another.

Gnaeus Lentulus, the consul, was fired with the desire to have Africa as his province, aspiring to an easy victory if the war continued, or if it were already ending, to the glory of having so great a war end in his consulship. Accordingly he declared that he would allow nothing to be taken up before Africa had been assigned him by decree as his province. B.C. 201

[1] An embassy had been sent to Philip the year before; xxvi. 4. Cf. xlii. 1 ff.

A.U.C. 553

conlega, moderato viro et prudenti, qui gloriae eius certamen cum Scipione, praeterquam quod iniquum 9 esset, etiam inpar futurum cernebat. Q. Minucius Thermus et M'. Acilius Glabrio tribuni plebis rem priore anno[1] nequiquam temptatam ab Ti. Claudio
10 consule Cn. Cornelium temptare aiebant; ex auctoritate patrum latum ad populum esse cuius vellent imperium in Africa esse; omnes quinque et triginta
11 tribus P. Scipioni id imperium decrevisse.[2] Multis contentionibus et in senatu et ad populum acta res postremo eo deducta est ut senatui permitterent.
12 Patres igitur iurati—ita enim convenerat—censuerunt uti consules provincias inter se conpararent sortirenturve uter Italiam, uter classem navium quinquaginta haberet; cui classis obvenisset in Siciliam
13 navigaret; si pax cum Carthaginiensibus componi nequisset, in Africam traiceret; consul mari, Scipio eo-
14 dem quo adhuc iure imperii terra rem gereret; si condiciones convenirent pacis, tribuni plebis populum rogarent utrum consulem an P. Scipionem iuberent pacem dare, et quem, si deportandus exercitus victor 15 ex Africa esset, deportare; si pacem per P. Scipionem dari atque ab eodem exercitum deportari iussissent, 16 ne consul ex Sicilia in Africam traiceret. Alter con-

[1] priore anno $A^{1}N^{1}VJKx$ Aldus, Froben: anno C: om. BDAN.

[2] decrevisse $CB^{1}?DA^{5}$: -cresse BANJK: -cretum N^{s}.

---

[1] Cf. xxvii. 2 ff.

He had the consent of his colleague, a moderate man and wise who saw that a contest with Scipio for that glory not only was unfair but also would prove unequal. Quintus Minucius Thermus and Manius Acilius Glabrio, tribunes of the plebs, declared that Gnaeus Cornelius was attempting what had been vainly attempted in the preceding year by Tiberius Claudius, the consul;[1] that by authority of the senators the question whom they wished to have the high command in Africa had been brought before the people; that all thirty-five tribes had awarded that command to Scipio. After many disputes, while the matter was before the senate and the people as well, the decision was ultimately left to the senate. The senators therefore under oath[2]—for such had been the agreement—decided that the consuls should determine their provinces by mutual agreement or by lot, which of them was to have Italy and which the fleet of fifty ships; that he to whom the fleet fell should sail to Sicily, and if peace could not be arranged with the Carthaginians, he should cross over to Africa; that the consul should conduct operations on the sea and Scipio on the land, with the same authority to command as heretofore; that if the peace terms should be agreed upon, the tribunes of the plebs should bring before the people the question whether to order the consul or Publius Scipio to grant peace, and, if the victorious army was to be brought back from Africa, who was to bring it back. If the people should order that peace be granted through Publius Scipio, and that the army should be brought back by him as well, the consul should not cross over from Sicily to Africa. The other B.C. 201

[2] An exceptional practice; XXVI. xxxiii. 14; XLII. xxi. 5.

A.U.C. 553

sul, cui Italia evenisset, duas legiones a M. Sextio praetore acciperet.

XLI. P. Scipioni cum exercitibus quos haberet in provincia Africa prorogatum imperium. Praetoribus [1] M. Valerio Faltoni duae legiones in Bruttiis quibus C. Livius priore anno praefuerat decretae; P. Aelius [2] duas legiones in Sicilia ab Cn. Tremelio acciperet; legio una M. Fabio in Sardiniam quam P. Lentulus pro praetore habuisset decernitur. M. Servilio prioris anni consuli cum suis duabus item legionibus in Etruria [3] prorogatum imperium est. Quod ad Hispanias attineret, aliquot annos iam ibi [4] L. Cornelium Lentulum et L. Manlium Acidinum esse; uti [5] consules cum tribunis agerent ut,[6] si iis videretur, plebem rogarent cui iuberent in Hispania imperium esse; is ex duobus exercitibus [7] in unam legionem conscriberet Romanos milites et in quindecim cohortes socios Latini nominis, quibus provinciam obtineret; veteres milites L. Cornelius et L. Manlius in Italiam deportarent. Consuli quinquaginta navium classis ex duabus classibus,[8] Cn. Octavi quae in Africa esset,

[1] Praetoribus BDANV: -torio C: -tori A[1]JK Aldus, Froben.

[2] Aelius, after this praetor (or $\overline{\text{pr}}$) CBDANVJK Aldus, Froben, Eds.: rejected by Conway as probably a gloss.

[3] Etruria, with this D comes to an end.

[4] annos iam ibi CA[1]VJK: iam annos ibi x Aldus, Froben: om. BAN.

[5] uti C: ut K: ut hii A[1]N[1]V(hi J: ut ii x Aldus, Froben.

[6] ut CBAN: after videretur A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben.

[7] ex duobus exercitibus CA[1]N[1]VJK Eds.: om. BA.

[8] classibus, here AN desert us, but missing text is supplied by A[1]N[1].

consul, to whom Italy should fall, was to receive two legions from Marcus Sextius, the praetor.[1] B.C. 201

XLI. Publius Scipio's command in his province of Africa was continued with the armies which he already had. Of the praetors Marcus Valerius Falto was assigned in the land of the Bruttians two legions which Gaius Livius had commanded in the preceding year; Publius Aelius was to receive two legions in Sicily from Gnaeus Tremelius; Marcus Fabius was assigned for Sardinia the one legion which Publius Lentulus had held as propraetor. For Marcus Servilius, consul in the previous year, his command in Etruria was continued, likewise with his own two legions. As for the Spanish provinces, they said that for some years already Lucius Cornelius Lentulus and Lucius Manlius Acidinus had been there;[2] that the consuls should urge the tribunes, if it met with their approval, to bring before the people the question who by their decree should be commander in Spain. Out of the two armies the general was to enrol Roman soldiers in a single legion and Latin allies in fifteen cohorts, in order that with these he might hold the province. As for the veterans, Lucius Cornelius and Lucius Manlius were to bring them back to Italy.[3] The consul[4] was assigned a fleet of fifty ships, made up from two fleets, that of Gnaeus Octavius, which was in African waters, and

[1] Cf. xxvii. 7.

[2] I.e. since 206 B.C. (late in the year); XXVIII. xxxviii. 1; XXIX. xiii. 7; above, ii. 7.

[3] Lentulus returned to Rome in 200 B.C., Manlius in 199; XXXI. xx. 1 and XXXII. vii. 4.

[4] Cf. xl. 12 ff.; here also the same absence of a name, since the allotment of provinces was still to be made; see xliii. 1.

A.U.C. 553

et [1] P. Villi quae Siciliae oram tuebatur, decreta, ut
7 quas vellet naves deligeret. P. Scipio quadraginta [2] naves longas quas habuisset haberet; [3] quibus si Cn. Octavium, sicut praefuisset, praeesse vellet, Octavio pro praetore in eum annum imperium
8 esset; si Laelium praeficeret, Octavius Romam decederet reduceretque naves quibus consuli [4] usus non esset. Et M. Fabio in Sardiniam decem longae naves
9 decretae. Et consules duas urbanas legiones scribere iussi, ut quattuordecim legionibus eo anno, centum navibus longis res publica administraretur.

XLII. Tum de legatis Philippi et Carthaginien-
2 sium actum. Priores Macedonas introduci placuit; quorum varia oratio fuit, partim purgantium quae questi erant missi ad regem ab Roma legati de populatione sociorum, partim ultro accusantium quidem et
3 socios populi Romani, sed multo infestius M. Aurelium, quem ex tribus ad se missis legatis dilectu habito substitisse et se bello lacessisse contra foedus et saepe cum praefectis suis signis conlatis pugnasse, 4 partim [5] postulantium ut Macedones duxque eorum Sopater, qui apud Hannibalem mercede militassent,

[1] et Cx: om. BA'N'VJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] quadraginta (or numerals) BA'N'VJK: XXX C: L Aldus, Froben.
[3] haberet, here CB: before quas habuisset A'N'VJK Aldus, Froben.
[4] consuli z Eds.: cons̄ C: cos B: consulibus A'N'VJK: proconsuli Aldus, Froben.
[5] partim Froben, Eds.: om. CBA'N'VJK Aldus.

that of Publius Villius, which was defending the coast of Sicily, the consul being free to select such ships as he pleased. Publius Scipio was to have the forty war-ships which he had before,[1] and if he desired that Gnaeus Octavius should command them, as he had done, Octavius was to have military authority as propraetor for that year. If he should name Laelius commander, Octavius was to leave the province for Rome and to bring back such ships as the consul did not need. Ten war-ships also were assigned to Marcus Fabius for Sardinia. And the consuls were ordered to enrol two city legions, so that in that year the state was carried on with fourteen legions [2] and a hundred war-ships. B.C. 201

XLII. Then the senate deliberated concerning the embassies of Philip and the Carthaginians. It was decided that the Macedonians should be brought in first. Their speeches were in different veins, as some of them tried to excuse acts of which envoys who were sent from Rome to the king in regard to the ravaging of allied territory had complained. Others actually turned accuser, attacking allies of the Roman people, to be sure, but Marcus Aurelius with much more violence, alleging that, being one of three envoys [3] sent to them, he had conducted a levy, had remained and made war upon them in violation of the treaty, and had repeatedly engaged in regular battles with their commanders. Still others demanded that the Macedonians and their general, Sopater, who as mercenaries had

[1] For Scipio's original fleet (30 ships) cf. XXVIII. xlv. 21; then 40, XXIX. xxvi. 3. Fifty more from Sardinia (above, xxxvi. 2 f.), now under the command of Octavius.

[2] Including the two in Gaul; xl. 16; xxvii. 7.

[3] Cf. xxvi. 4.

A.U.C. 553

tum capti[1] in vinclis essent, sibi restituerentur.
5 Adversus ea M. Furius, missus ad id ipsum ab Aurelio ex Macedonia, disseruit Aurelium relictum, ne socii populi Romani fessi populationibus vi atque iniuria ad regem deficerent; finibus sociorum non excessisse;
6 dedisse operam ne impune in agros eorum populatores transcenderent. Sopatrum ex purpuratis et propinquis regis esse; eum cum quattuor milibus Macedonum et pecunia missum nuper in Africam esse
7 Hannibali et Carthaginiensibus auxilio. De his rebus interrogati Macedones cum perplexe responderent, nequaquam ipsi simile[2] responsum tulerunt: bellum quaerere regem et, si pergat, propediem inventurum.
8 Dupliciter ab eo foedus violatum, et quod sociis populi Romani iniurias fecerit ac[3] bello armisque lacessiverit, et quod hostes auxiliis et pecunia iuverit.
9 Et P. Scipionem recte atque ordine fecisse videri et facere, quod eos qui arma contra populum Romanum ferentes capti sint hostium numero in vinclis habeat, 10 et M. Aurelium e re publica facere, gratumque id senatui esse quod socios populi Romani, quando iure foederis non possit,[4] armis tueatur.
11 Cum hoc tam tristi responso dimissis Macedonibus,

[1] tum capti CB: capti A[1]N[1]VJ: captique K Aldus, Froben.

[2] nequaquam ipsi simile Novák, most recent Eds.: nequaquam ipsi mite Conway: neq. ipsi mite C Alschefski (neque): om. B (lacuna): ipsi ante A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben: ipsi non anceps Madvig: ipsi apertum Weissenborn.

[3] ac CB Eds.: om. A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben.

[4] possit CB[1]K: posset A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] As being mercenaries, not really belligerents.

[2] No doubt still disputed, so that ex Macedonia just above is only an apparent conflict.

served with Hannibal and at the time were captives B.C. 201 in chains, be restored to them.[1] In reply Marcus Furius, who had been sent for the very purpose from Macedonia by Aurelius, maintained that Aurelius had been left behind in order to prevent allies of the Roman people from being exhausted by raids and forced by acts of violence to go over to the king's side; that he had not gone beyond the boundaries[2] of the allies; that he had exerted himself that raiders should not come over into the allies' lands with impunity. He said that Sopater was one of the king's high officials and of his kin; that he had been sent recently to Africa with four thousand Macedonians[3] and money to bring aid to Hannibal and the Carthaginians. Inasmuch as the Macedonians, when questioned in regard to these matters, gave ambiguous answers, they in turn received an answer of a very different sort: that the king was looking for war and if he kept on would soon find it; that he had twice violated the treaty, in that he wronged allies of the Roman people and harried them with war and arms, and in that he aided the enemy by reinforcements and money; that not only had Scipio acted and was now acting in their opinion with perfect propriety in keeping in chains as enemies men who had been captured while bearing arms against the Roman people, but also that Marcus Aurelius was acting in conformity with the interest of the state, and that the senate was grateful that he was defending allies of the Roman people by arms, since he was unable to do so by the obligations of a treaty.

With so stern an answer as this the Macedonians

[3] Cf. xxxiii. 5.

A.U.C. 553

legati Carthaginienses vocati. Quorum aetatibus dignitatibusque conspectis—nam longe primi civitatis erant—tum pro se quisque dicere vere de 12 pace agi. Insignis tamen inter ceteros Hasdrubal erat —Haedum populares cognomine appellabant—, pacis
13 semper auctor adversusque factioni Barcinae. Eo tum plus illi auctoritatis fuit belli culpam in paucorum
14 cupiditatem ab re publica transferenti. Qui cum varia oratione usus esset, nunc purgando crimina, nunc quaedam fatendo, ne impudenter certa negantibus difficilior[1] venia esset, nunc monendo etiam patres conscriptos ut rebus secundis modeste ac moderate 15 uterentur—si se atque Hannonem audissent Carthaginienses et tempore uti voluissent, daturos fuisse pacis condiciones quas tunc peterent. Raro simul hominibus bonam fortunam bonamque mentem dari;
16 populum Romanum eo invictum esse quod in secundis rebus sapere et consulere meminerit. Et hercule
17 mirandum fuisse, si aliter faceret.[2] Ex insolentia quibus nova bona[3] fortuna sit inpotentes laetitiae insanire; populo Romano usitata ac prope iam obsoleta ex victoria gaudia esse, ac plus paene parcendo
18 victis quam vincendo imperium auxisse. Ceterorum miserabilior oratio fuit, commemorantium[4] ex quantis opibus quo reccidissent Carthaginiensium res:

[1] difficilior CB Froben 2 : difficilis A^1N^1VJK Aldus.
[2] faceret CB Aldus : -rent A^1N^1VJK Froben.
[3] bona CBA^6JK Eds. : om. A^1N^1V(nova also).
[4] commemorantium A^1N^1VJK Eds. : -ratio CB.

---

[1] Cf. xliv. 5; Appian Pun. 49 fin., 53, but the occasion is different.
[2] See p. 440, n. 1.

were dismissed and the Carthaginian ambassadors summoned. When the senators observed the age and high station of each—for these were the very first of the citizens—thereupon all agreed that they were really treating for peace. Most conspicuous among them, however, was Hasdrubal surnamed Haedus [1] among his people, always a supporter of peace and an opponent of the Barcine party. Hence he had all the more weight then, as he shifted the blame for the war from the state to the greed of the few. His speech was in different keys, now excusing what was charged, now making some admissions, lest pardon should be harder to obtain if they shamelessly denied known facts, and now even admonishing the conscript fathers to make a moderate and restrained use of their good fortune. He said that if the Carthaginians had listened to him and to Hanno [2] and had been minded to take advantage of the right moment, the Romans would have given the terms of peace which they were at that time seeking; that seldom were men given good fortune and good judgment at the same time; that the Roman people was invincible for the reason that in its good fortune it remembered to be wise and to take counsel. And certainly, he said, it would have been wonderful if its practice were different. Men whose good fortune was new because of its strangeness went wild, unable to control their rejoicing; for the Roman people the joys of victory were familiar and now all but threadbare, and they had enlarged their empire almost more by sparing the vanquished than by conquest. The rest of the speakers employed more pathos as they stated from what wealth the Carthaginians' situation had fallen to what depths; that men who B.C. 201

A.U.C. 553

nihil iis qui modo orbem prope terrarum obtinuerint [1] armis superesse praeter Carthaginis moenia;
19 his inclusos non terra, non mari quicquam sui iuris cernere; urbem quoque ipsam ac penates ita habituros,[2] si non in ea [3] quoque, quo nihil ulterius sit,
20 saevire populus Romanus velit.[4] Cum flecti misericordia patres appareret, senatorum [5] unum infestum perfidiae Carthaginiensium succlamasse ferunt
21 per quos deos foedus icturi essent, cum eos per quos ante ictum esset fefellissent. "Per eosdem" inquit Hasdrubal, "quoniam tam infesti sunt foedera violantibus".

XLIII. Inclinatis omnium ad pacem animis Cn. Lentulus consul, cui classis provincia erat, senatus
2 consulto intercessit. Tum M'. Acilius et Q. Minucius tribuni plebis ad populum tulerunt vellent iuberentne senatum decernere ut cum Carthaginiensibus pax fieret; et quem eam pacem dare, quemque ex
3 Africa exercitum deportare iuberent. De pace 'Uti rogas' [6] omnes tribus iusserunt; pacem dare
4 P. Scipionem, eundem exercitum deportare. Ex hac rogatione senatus decrevit ut P. Scipio ex decem legatorum sententia pacem cum populo Cartha-

[1] obtinuerint CB(-runt): -uissent A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] habituros CBK Aldus, Froben: -taturos A[1]N[1]VJ.
[3] ea, CA[6]? add moenia: Aldus, reads ea quoque moenia.
[4] velit A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben: vellet CB.
[5] senatorum CBA[6] Aldus, Froben: -rem A[1]N[1]VJK.
[6] rogas C Sigonius: rogatae erant B Froben 2: -asset A[5]: -assent Aldus: rogant C[5]?: the entire sentence is om. by A[1]N[1]VJK.

[1] A relative of Lentulus the consul according to Appian Pun. 62.

recently held almost the whole world by their arms had nothing left but the walls of Carthage. Shut up within these walls, they said, they saw nothing on land or sea subject to their rule. Even the city itself and their homes they would hold only in case the Roman people did not choose to vent its animosity upon those possessions also, the last possible step. When it was clear that the senators were inclining to pity, one of their number,[1] outraged by the perfidy of the Carthaginians, is said to have called out to them, asking who were the gods in whose name they were to make the treaty, inasmuch as they had proved false to the gods in whose name the former treaty had been made. "The same" said Hasdrubal, "since they are so hostile to treaty-breakers." B.C. 201

XLIII. When all were now disposed to make peace the consul Gnaeus Lentulus, to whom the fleet had been assigned,[2] vetoed a decree of the senate. Thereupon Manius Acilius and Quintus Minucius, tribunes of the plebs,[3] brought before the people the question whether it was their will and command that the senate should decree that peace be made with the Carthaginians; and whom they should command to grant that peace, and whom to bring the army back from Africa. In regard to the peace all the tribes voted affirmatively: that Publius Scipio should grant the peace, that he also should bring back the army. In accordance with this enactment the senate decreed that Publius Scipio on the advice of ten envoys should make peace with the Carthaginian

[2] Cf. xl. 12 f.; xli. 6. Consuls rarely exercised their right of veto. They could not veto a plebiscite.

[3] Supporting Scipio, as in xl. 9 ff.

A.U.C. 553

giniensi quibus legibus ei videretur faceret. Gratias deinde patribus egere Carthaginienses et petierunt ut sibi in urbem introire et colloqui cum civibus suis liceret qui capti in publica custodia essent; esse in iis partim propinquos amicosque suos, nobiles homines, partim ad quos mandata a propinquis haberent. Quibus conventis cum rursus peterent ut sibi quos vellent ex iis redimendi potestas fieret, iussi nomina edere; et cum ducenta[1] ferme ederent, senatus consultum factum est ut legati Romani ducentos ex captivis, quos Carthaginienses vellent, ad P. Cornelium[2] in Africam deportarent, nuntiarentque ei ut, si pax convenisset, sine pretio eos Carthaginiensibus redderet. Fetiales cum in Africam ad foedus feriundum ire iuberentur, ipsis postulantibus senatus consultum in haec verba factum est, ut privos[3] lapides silices privasque[4] verbenas secum ferrent, ut, ubi[5] praetor Romanus iis imperaret ut foedus ferirent, illi praetorem sagmina poscerent. Herbae id genus ex arce sumptum fetialibus dari solet.

Ita dimissi ab Roma Carthaginienses cum in Africam venissent ad Scipionem, quibus ante dictum

[1] ducenta Hertz: -tos JK Aldus: in numerals CBA¹N¹V Froben 2.

[2] Cornelium, to this A¹JK Aldus, Froben add Scipionem.

[3] privos A¹J Eds.: primos $A^{6}N^{1}VJK$ (alt.): prius $C^{1?}B$.

[4] privasque x Aldus, Froben: -masque CBA¹N¹JK: -mas V.

[5] ut, ubi Madvig: et uti C: et, ubi Riemann: uti A¹N¹BV Aldus, Froben: ubi JK apparently.

people upon such terms as he saw fit. The Carthaginians thereupon thanked the senators and begged permission to enter the city and to converse with fellow-citizens who as captives were in prison, saying that among them some were their own relatives and friends, men of rank, and others men for whom they had messages from their relatives. When this was arranged and they made a further request that they might have the opportunity of ransoming such of them as they desired, they were bidden to furnish the names. And when they furnished some two hundred names a decree of the senate was passed that the Roman envoys should carry to Publius Cornelius in Africa two hundred selected by the Carthaginians from the number of the captives, and should report to him that, if the peace should be agreed to, he was to deliver the captives to the Carthaginians without ransom. When orders were being given to the fetial priests[1] to go to Africa in order to make the treaty, at their own request a decree of the senate was passed in these terms: that they should each take one flint knife and one tuft of foliage with them, in order that when the Roman general[2] ordered them to make the treaty they should demand of the general the sacred tufts. It is customary to gather foliage of this kind from the Citadel and give it to the fetials. B.C. 20.

Under these circumstances the Carthaginians were sent away from Rome, and having presented themselves to Scipio in Africa, they made peace upon the

[1] For the fetials and their ceremonial see I. xxiv. 4 ff.; xxxii. 5 ff.; Servius on Aen. IX. 52; X. 14; Varro L.L V. 86; Festus 424 ff. L.; Polybius III. 25.

[2] Conservative religious usage retained this older meaning of praetor.

A.U.C. 553

11 est legibus pacem fecerunt. Naves longas, elephantos, perfugas, fugitivos, captivorum quattuor milia tradiderunt, inter quos Q. Terentius Culleo senator 12 fuit. Naves provectas in altum incendi iussit. Quingentas fuisse omnis generis quae remis agerentur quidam tradunt; quarum conspectum repente incendium tam lugubre fuisse Poenis quam si [1] ipsa 13 Carthago arderet. De perfugis gravius quam de fugitivis [2] consultum; nominis Latini qui erant securi percussi, Romani in crucem sublati.

XLIV. Annis ante quadraginta pax cum Carthaginiensibus postremo facta erat, Q. Lutatio, A. Man-
2 lio consulibus. Bellum initum annis post tribus et viginti, P. Cornelio, Ti. Sempronio consulibus, finitum est septimo decimo anno, Cn. Cornelio, P. Aelio
3 consulibus.[3] Saepe postea ferunt Scipionem dixisse Ti. Claudi primum cupiditatem, deinde Cn. Corneli fuisse in mora, quo minus id bellum exitio Carthaginis finiret.[4]

[1] si $C^1?C^5BA^sN^sVJK$ Froben 2 : si tum Cx Aldus.

[2] quam de fugitivis CBA^sN^sVJK Aldus, Froben, Eds. : corrupt according to Koehler, Conway, comparing Val. Max. II. vii. 12, who imitated Livy, perhaps from a text already corrupted (since captured slaves could hardly fail to be mentioned here) : follows a lacuna, Weissenborn : tamquam de fugitivis coni. Johnson.

[3] consulibus, preceded by a cognomen Paeto (peto) BA^sN^sJV Froben 2, Eds. : om. by CK Aldus, Conway.

[4] finiret CA^sN^sVJ Froben 2, Eds. : -retur $BN^{s2}K$ Aldus.

---

[1] With all the traditional formalities, these (and nothing else) being in the hands of the fetials.

[2] He had been captured in Africa. Cf. xlv. 5. In 195 B.C. he returned to Carthage on an embassy; XXXIII. xlvii. 7; again in 171 B.C.; XLII. xxxv. 7.

terms above mentioned.[1] They surrendered war- B.C. 201.
ships, elephants, deserters, runaway slaves, and four thousand captives, among whom was Quintus Terentius Culleo,[2] a senator. The ships Scipio ordered to be put to sea and to be burned. Some historians[3] relate that there were five hundred of them—every type of vessel propelled by oars;[4] and that when the Carthaginians suddenly caught sight of the fire it was as doleful for them as if Carthage itself were in flames. The deserters were more severely treated than the runaway slaves, Latin citizens being beheaded, Romans crucified.

XLIV. Forty years before, in the consulship of Quintus Lutatius[5] and Aulus Manlius, peace had last been made with the Carthaginians. The war which began twenty-three years later, in the consulship of Publius Cornelius and Tiberius Sempronius, was brought to an end in the seventeenth year, the consulship of Gnaeus Cornelius and Publius Aelius. Later Scipio often stated, so they say, that first Tiberius Claudius' thirst for fame,[6] and then that of Gnaeus Cornelius had hindered him from ending that war with the destruction of Carthage.[7]

[3] Chiefly Valerius, as we may infer from the large figures. Livy expressly condemns his exaggerations, e.g. at XXVI. xlix. 3. Cf. above, xix. 11 and XXXIII. x. 8.

[4] The annalists wished to include not only rostratae or longae of our extant sources, but also smaller vessels such as pentekontors (cargo vessels with 50 oars) and lesser craft.

[5] Not to be confused with his brother Gaius, victor off the Aegates Islands shortly before. See p. 446 and n. 1.

[6] Cf. xxvii. 4 f.; and for Cornelius Lentulus xl. 7 ff.

[7] Cf. xxxvi. 10. According to Appian Pun. 65 Cato in his speech for the Rhodians declared that Scipio wished Carthage to remain as a stimulus to Roman discipline. So Nasica in St. Augustine C.D. I. 30.

A.U.C. 553

4 Carthagini[1] cum prima conlatio pecuniae diutino bello exhaustis difficilis videretur, maestitiaque et fletus in curia esset, ridentem Hannibalem ferunt con-
5 spectum. Cuius cum Hasdrubal Haedus risum increparet in publico fletu, cum ipse lacrimarum causa
6 esset, "Si, quem ad modum oris habitus cernitur oculis," inquit, "sic et animus intus cerni posset,[2] facile vobis appareret non laeti, sed prope amentis malis cordis hunc quem increpatis risum esse; qui tamen nequaquam adeo est intempestivus quam vestrae istae absurdae atque abhorrentes lacrimae sunt.
7 Tunc flesse decuit cum adempta sunt nobis arma, incensae naves, interdictum externis bellis; illo enim volnere concidimus. Nec est cur[3] vos otio[4]
8 vestro consultum ab Romanis credatis. Nulla magna civitas diu[5] quiescere potest; si foris hostem non habet, domi invenit, ut praevalida corpora ab externis causis tuta videntur, sed[6] suis ipsa viribus 9 onerantur. Tantum nimirum ex publicis malis sentimus quantum ad privatas res pertinet, nec in iis quicquam acrius quam pecuniae damnum stimulat.
10 Itaque cum spolia victae Carthagini detrahebantur, cum inermem iam ac nudam destitui inter tot armatas 11 gentes Africae cerneretis,[7] nemo ingemuit; nunc,

[1] Carthagini BA¹N¹ Eds.: -ne C: -niensibus A⁶VJK (-nens-) Aldus, Froben.

[2] posset CBV Froben 2: potuisset A¹N¹JK Aldus.

[3] Nec est cur Madvig, recent Eds.: nec est causa cur Weissenborn: necesse est ne CB: necesse in B¹?A¹N¹VJK: nec esse in Aldus, Froben.

[4] otio C Eds.: odio BA¹N¹VJK Aldus, Froben.

[5] diu Cx Aldus, Froben: om. BA¹N¹VJK.

[6] sed BA¹N¹VJK Eds.: Johnson would delete: Conway placed Sed at beginning of next sentence, following C, which however om. suis . . . onerantur.

At Carthage when raising money for the first B.C. 201
payment seemed difficult to men whose resources were drained by the long war, and in the Senate House there was mourning and weeping, they say that Hannibal was seen laughing. When Hasdrubal Haedus [1] upbraided him for laughing while the people wept, he being himself the cause of their tears, he said: "If the mind within us could be seen, just as expression of face is seen by our eyes, it would readily be clear to you that this laughter which you upbraid is not that of a happy spirit but of one almost beside itself through misfortunes. Nevertheless it is by no means so untimely as are those senseless, misplaced tears of yours. The time for us to weep was when our arms were taken from us, our ships burned, foreign wars forbidden; for that wound was fatal to us. And you have no reason to believe that the Romans had regard for your domestic peace. No great state can long be in peace. If it lacks an enemy abroad it finds one at home, just as powerful bodies seem protected against infection from without, but are of themselves weighed down by their very strength. Of course we feel only so much of the public misfortunes as bears upon our private concerns, and in these nothing has so painful a sting as the loss of money. Hence when the spoils were being stripped from vanquished Carthage, although you saw her placed, now unarmed and naked, in the midst of so many armed tribes of Africa, no one moaned,

[1] Cf. xliii. 12.

---

[7] cerneretis $BA^{s}N^{s}VJK$: -netis A^{s}: -natis C: -nebatis Schenkl.

A.U.C. 553

quia tributum ex privato conferendum est, tamquam in publico funere comploratis. Quam vereor ne propediem sentiatis levissimo in malo vos hodie lacrimasse." Haec Hannibal apud Carthaginienses.

12 Scipio contione advocata Masinissam ad regnum paternum Cirta oppido et ceteris urbibus agrisque quae ex regno Syphacis in populi Romani potestatem 13 venissent adiectis donavit. Cn. Octavium classem in Siciliam ductam Cn. Cornelio consuli tradere iussit, legatos Carthaginiensium Romam proficisci, ut quae ab se ex decem legatorum sententia acta essent, ea patrum auctoritate populique iussu confirmarentur.

XLV. Pace terra marique parta, exercitu in naves in-
2 posito, in Siciliam Lilybaeum traiecit. Inde magna parte militum navibus [1] missa ipse per [2] laetam pace non minus quam victoria Italiam, effusis non urbibus modo ad habendos honores, sed agrestium etiam turba obsidente vias, Romam pervenit triumphoque omnium
3 clarissimo urbem est invectus. Argenti tulit in aerarium pondo centum viginti tria milia.[3] Militibus

[1] navibus B: in navibus A[c]N[c]VJ Aldus, Froben: in naves K.

[2] militum . . . per om. C.

[3] centum viginti tria milia (or in numerals) BA[c]N[c]VJK Aldus, Froben, Madvig, Conway: CXXXIII milia C Luchs, H.J. and M. Müller, Luterbacher.

---

[1] See p. 334, n. 1.

[2] He may have landed at Puteoli. The time is probably the autumn of 201 B.C.

while now because tribute must be raised from private property you are mourners, as it were, at a public funeral. How much I fear you will very soon be aware that today you have wept over a very slight misfortune!" So spoke Hannibal to the Carthaginians. B.C. 201

Scipio summoned an assembly and assigning to him his father's kingdom, presented Masinissa with the city of Cirta[1] in addition and the rest of the cities and lands which, he said, had passed from the kingdom of Syphax into the power of the Roman people. He ordered Gnaeus Octavius to take the fleet to Sicily and turn it over to Gnaeus Cornelius, the consul; also the Carthaginian envoys to go to Rome, in order that all his acts on the advice of his ten legati might be confirmed by the authority of the senate and command of the people.

XLV. When peace had been secured by land and sea, Scipio embarked his army and crossed over to Lilybaeum in Sicily. Then after sending a large part of the army by sea, he himself, making his way through Italy,[2] which was exulting in peace no less than in the victory, while not cities only poured out to do him honour, but crowds of rustics also were blocking the roads, reached Rome and rode into the city in the most distinguished of all triumphs.[3] He brought into the treasury one hundred and twenty-three thousand pounds weight of silver. To [3] No details are furnished by Polybius either; XVI. xxiii (one exception below, § 5). For picturesque descriptions see Appian Pun. 66; Silius Ital. XVII. 625–654, at the very end of the poem. So dramatic an arrangement had not commended itself to Livy as he wrote the final paragraph of his ten books on the Hannibalic War.

A.U.C. 553

4 ex praeda quadringenos aeris divisit. Morte subtractus spectaculo magis hominum quam triumphantis gloriae Syphax est, Tiburi haud ita multo ante mortuus, quo ab Alba traductus fuerat. Conspecta tamen mors eius fuit, quia publico funere est
5 elatus. Hunc regem in triumpho ductum Polybius, haudquaquam spernendus auctor, tradit. Secutus Scipionem triumphantem est pilleo capiti inposito Q. Terentius Culleo, omnique deinde vita, ut dignum
6 erat, libertatis auctorem coluit. Africani cognomen militaris prius favor an popularis aura celebraverit an, sicuti Felicis Sullae Magnique Pompei patrum memoria, coeptum ab adsentatione familiari sit
7 parum compertum habeo. Primus certe hic imperator nomine victae ab se gentis est nobilitatus; exemplo deinde huius nequaquam victoria pares insignes imaginum titulos claraque cognomina familiarum [1] fecerunt.[2]

[1] familiarum CA[1]? Eds.: familiae (or -ie) BA[a1]?N[a]VJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] fecerunt C Conway: -cere A[a1]JK Aldus, Froben: liquerunt B Alschefski, Weissenborn: sunt V: ceperunt Madvig, Emend., most recent Eds.: asciverunt Leo, M. Müller: om. A[a]N[a].

---

[1] Alba Fucens; xvii. 2 and note.

[2] So Val. Max. V. i. 16.

[3] And so (from a different source) Val. Max. VI. ii. 3; Polybius l.c. § 6; Tacitus Ann. XII. 38; Silius Ital. l.c. 629 f. Officially the triumph was over Hannibal, the Poeni and Syphax; XXXVIII. xlvi. 10. Here for the very first time his soldiers he distributed four hundred asses apiece B.C. 201 out of the booty. The death of Syphax withdrew him rather from the eyes of spectators than from the glory of the triumphing general. He had died not long before at Tibur, to which he had been transferred from Alba.[1] Nevertheless his death attracted attention because he was given a state funeral.[2] Polybius, an authority by no means to be despised, relates that this king was led in the triumphal procession.[3] Following Scipio as he triumphed was Quintus Terentius Culleo[4] wearing the liberty cap; and for all the rest of his life, as was fitting, he honoured in Scipio the giver of his freedom. As for the surname Africanus, whether his popularity among the soldiers, or fickle favour of the people first gave it currency I am unable to state, or whether it began with the flattery of his intimates, as did the surname Felix for Sulla and Magnus for Pompey in the time of our fathers. What is certain is that he was the first general to be distinguished by the name of a nation conquered by him. Later, following his example men who were by no means his equals in their victories gained outstanding inscriptions for their masks[5] and glorious surnames for their families.

Livy mentions Polybius. Cf. XXXIII. x. 10 (non incertum auctorem), where a statement of his is preferred.

[4] Cf. p. 533 and n. 2.

[5] In wall-cases (armaria) usually, each mask provided with its own titulus.

LIBRI XXX PERIOCHA

Scipio in Africa Carthaginienses et eundem Syphacem Numidiae regem Hasdrubalemque pluribus proeliis vicit adiuvante Masinissa; bina hostium castra expugnavit, in quibus quadraginta milia hominum ferro ignique consumpta sunt. Syphacem per C. Laelium et Masinissam cepit. Masinissa Sophonibam, uxorem Syphacis, filiam Hasdrubalis, captam statim adamavit et nuptiis factis uxorem habuit. Castigatus a Scipione venenum ei misit, quo illa hausto decessit. Effectumque multis Scipionis victoriis ut Carthaginienses in desperationem acti in auxilium publicae salutis Hannibalem revocarent. Isque anno sexto decimo Italia decedens in Africam traiecit temptavitque per conloquium pacem cum Scipione conponere, et cum de condicionibus pacis non convenisset, acie victus est. Pax Carthaginiensibus petentibus data est. Hannibal Gisgonem pacem dissuadentem manu sua detraxit: excusata deinde temeritate facti ipse pacem suasit. Masinissae regnum restitutum est. Reversus in urbem Scipio amplissimum nobilissimumque egit triumphum, quem Q. Terentius Culleo senator pilleatus secutus est. Scipio Africanus incertum militari prius favore an populari aura ita cognominatus sit; primus certe hic imperator victae a se nomine gentis nobilitatus est. Mago bello quo in agro Insubrium cum Romanis conflixerat volneratus, dum in Africam per legatos revocatus revertitur, ex volnere mortuus est.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXX

Scipio in Africa defeated the Carthaginians and the same Syphax, King of Numidia, and Hasdrubal in a number of battles with the aid of Masinissa. He took by assault two camps of the enemy, in which forty thousand men were wiped out by sword and fire. He captured Syphax by the help of Gaius Laelius and Masinissa. Masinissa, having captured Sophoniba, wife of Syphax and daughter of Hasdrubal, at once fell in love and after marrying her had her to wife. When rebuked by Scipio he sent her poison, and upon drinking it she died. The consequence of Scipio's many victories was that the Carthaginians, driven to despair, recalled Hannibal to the defence of the state. And he, withdrawing from Italy in the sixteenth year, crossed over to Africa and endeavoured by a conference to make peace with Scipio; and as there was no agreement on the peace terms, he was vanquished in battle. The Carthaginians sued for peace and it was granted them. When Gisgo argued against a peace, Hannibal with his own hand dragged him down. Then after apologizing for the rashness of his act, he himself argued in favour of peace. Masinissa's kingdom was restored to him. Returning to the city Scipio celebrated a most splendid and distinguished triumph, followed by Quintus Terentius Culleo, a senator, wearing a liberty cap. Whether Scipio Africanus received that cognomen first from his popularity with the soldiers or from fickle favour of the people is not known. Certainly he was the first commander-in-chief to be distinguished by the name of a nation he had conquered. Mago was wounded in a war in which he had come in conflict with Romans in the land of the Insubrians, and while returning to Africa, having been recalled by envoys, he died of his wound.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

IN FOURTEEN VOLUMES

IX

BOOKS XXXI–XXXIV

TRANSLATED BY

EVAN T. SAGE, PH.D.

PROFESSOR OF LATIN AND HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF CLASSICS IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PITTSBURGH

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

LONDON

WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD

MCMLXXXV

GRAD
31122243
REPL
5/28/98
ADD

CONTENTS

PAGE

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE viii

BIBLIOGRAPHY xiv

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ADDENDUM (1985) xvi

INTRODUCTORY NOTE xvii

BOOK XXXI 1

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXI 151

BOOK XXXII 153

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXII 275

BOOK XXXIII 277

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXIII 409

BOOK XXXIV 411

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXIV 581

INDEX OF NAMES 583

MAPS AND PLANS—

1. NORTHERN ITALY . . . . . At end

2. GREECE AND MACEDONIA . . . . . ,,

2a. (INSET) BATTLE OF CYNOSCEPHALAE. . . . . ,,

3. SPAIN . . . . . ,,

T. LIVI

AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XXXI

A.U.C. 553

I. Me quoque iuvat, velut ipse in parte laboris ac periculi fuerim, ad finem belli Punici pervenisse. Nam etsi profiteri ausum perscripturum res omnes Romanas in partibus singulis tanti operis fatigari minime conveniat, tamen, cum in mentem venit tres et sexaginta annos—tot enim sunt a primo Punico ad secundum bellum finitum—aeque multa volumina occupasse mihi quam occupaverint quadringenti octoginta septem [1] anni a condita urbe ad Ap. Claudium consulem, qui primum bellum Carthaginiensibus intulit, iam provideo animo, velut qui proximis [2] litori vadis inducti mare pedibus ingrediuntur, quidquid progredior, in vastiorem me altitudinem ac velut profundum [3] invehi, et crescere

[1] Accepting Weissenborn's correction of the numeral LXXVIII of B; Livy's chronology is three years behind the ordinary reckoning by which dates A.U.C. are calculated from 754 B.C.

[2] proximis ed. Moguntina 1518 : proximi B.

[3] profundum Ascensius : profundam B.

---

[1] The dates of the events referred to are, respectively, 267 B.C. and 204 B.C., by Livy's reckoning, or, according to

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XXXI

I. I ALSO am relieved, just as if I myself had shared B.C. 201 the labour and the peril, that I have come to the end of the Punic War. For while it is not at all fitting that one who has ventured to promise to write the whole history of Rome should grow wearied in dealing with the single portions of so great a task, nevertheless, when I reflect that sixty-three years—the space between the outbreak of the First and the end of the Second Punic War [1]—have filled as many books [2] for me as were required for the four hundred and eighty-seven years from the founding of the city to the consulship of Appius Claudius (who began the first war with the Carthaginians), already I see in my mind's eye that, like men who, attracted by the shallow water near the shore, wade out into the sea, I am being carried on, whatever progress I make, into depths more vast and, as it were, into the abyss, and that the task almost waxes greater

[1] the usual chronology (which is retained in the marginal dates), 264 B.C. and 201 B.C.

[2] Books I–XV contained the narrative of the earlier period; Books XVI–XXX covered the First and Second Punic Wars.

A.U.C. 553

paene opus, quod prima quaeque perficiendo minui videbatur.

6 Pacem Punicam bellum Macedonicum excepit, periculo haudquaquam comparandum aut virtute
7 ducis aut militum robore, claritate regum antiquorum vetustaque fama gentis et magnitudine imperii, quo multa quondam Europae, maiorem partem Asiae obtinuerant armis, prope nobilius.
8 Ceterum coeptum bellum adversus Philippum decem ferme ante annis triennio prius depositum erat, cum
9 Aetoli et belli et pacis fuissent causa.[1] Vacuos deinde pace Punica iam Romanos et infensos Philippo cum ob infidam adversus Aetolos aliosque regionis

[1] causa Heinsius: causai B: causae ς.

---

[1] Philip V, king of the Macedonians, was not to be compared with the Carthaginian Hannibal.

[2] Livy thinks especially of Philip II, founder of Macedonian power, and of Alexander the Great, who had conquered an empire greater than that of Carthage.

[3] Philip V had come to the Macedonian throne in 217 B.C. at the age of 17, and had continued the aggressive policy of his regent, Antigonus. As an ally of the Achaean League, the Macedonians had fought a successful war against the Aetolian League (see Introductory Note), and in 216 B.C. concluded an alliance with Hannibal by a treaty of which Polybius (VII. xix) preserves some clauses. Meanwhile Philip was pursuing an ambitious policy towards Athens and other Greek states. By 214 B.C., Rome seems to have recognized that something like a "state of war" existed (XXIV. xl. 1), but in this passage Livy dates the actual hostilities from 211 B.C., when Rome made a treaty with Philip's old enemies, the Aetolians (XXVI. xxiv. 10). Philip's treaty of peace with the Aetolians is dated 205 B.C. by Livy (XXIX. xii. 1), but we may perhaps explain his "three years" on the assumption that it was not ratified until the next year.

which, as I finished each of the earlier portions, B.C. 201 seemed to be growing smaller.

The Punic peace was followed by the Macedonian war, which, although in no wise comparable as regards its danger, or the prowess of the leader,[1] or the strength of the military forces employed, yet, because of the fame of Macedonia's ancient kings[2] and the ancient glory of the nation and the vast extent of its empire, in which it had at one time gained by its arms dominion over large portions of Europe and the greater part of Asia, was almost more celebrated. Now the war with Philip,[3] begun about ten years before this time, had some time before been laid aside for a period of three years, the Aetolians being the cause of the truce as they had been of the beginning of hostilities. Then later the Romans, being at last unoccupied by any war, as a result of the peace with Carthage, and being indignant with Philip both because of the treacherous peace which he had concluded with the Aetolians[4] and the other allies in that region, and because of Livy's chronology is often confused, as a result of unskilful handling of annalistic sources.

The so-called Second Macedonian War, the account of which begins here, was practically ended by the battle of Cynoscephalae in 197 B.C. (XXXIII. vi–x; Polyb. XVIII. xx–xxvii), but lasted diplomatically until 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxxii). Thereafter Philip pursued a policy of alternating friendship and hostility towards Rome until his death in 179 B.C.

[4] See the preceding note for the peace of 205 B.C., which might seem due to the treachery of the Aetolians rather than of Philip. Rome was so occupied by the war against Hannibal that the Aetolians had to bear all the burden of keeping up the war against Philip. The failure of the Romans to aid them is frequently mentioned in the diplomatic conferences of the next years.

A.U.C. 553

10 eiusdem socios pacem, tum ob auxilia cum pecunia nuper in Africam missa Hannibali Poenisque, preces Atheniensium, quos agro pervastato in urbem compulerat, excitaverunt ad renovandum bellum.

II. Sub idem fere tempus et ab Attalo rege et Rhodiis legati venerunt nuntiantes Asiae quoque
2 civitates sollicitari. His legationibus responsum est curae eam rem senatui fore; consultatio de Macedonico bello integra ad consules, qui tunc in pro-
3 vinciis erant, reiecta est. Interim ad Ptolomaeum Aegypti regem legati tres missi, C. Claudius Nero, M. Aemilius Lepidus, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, ut nuntiarent victum Hannibalem Poenosque et gratias
4 agerent regi, quod in rebus dubiis, cum finitimi etiam socii Romanos desererent, in fide mansisset, et peterent ut, si coacti iniuriis bellum adversus Philippum suscepissent, pristinum animum erga populum Romanum conservaret.
5 Eodem fere tempore P. Aelius consul in Gallia, cum audisset a Bois ante suum adventum incursiones
6 in agros sociorum factas, duabus legionibus subitariis tumultus eius causa scriptis additisque ad eas quattuor cohortibus de exercitu suo C. Ampium,[1] prae-

[1] appium, the reading of B, is corrected from sect. 7 below.

---

[1] Livy (XXX. xxvi. 3) reports the rumour that troops had been sent to Hannibal, and in XXX. xxxiii. 5 lists Macedonians among his allies. See also XXX. xlii. 4 and XLV. xxii. 6. Polybius does not mention them.

[2] They were Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus and Publius Aelius Paetus.

[3] Ptolemy Epiphanes, now nine years old and on the throne for the past four years. His father and the regents, the military assistance and money which he had B.C. 201 recently [1] sent to Hannibal and the Carthaginians in Africa, were aroused by the prayers of the Athenians, whom Philip had driven into the city by the ravaging of their fields, into renewing the war.

II. At about the same time, ambassadors both from King Attalus of Pergamum and from the Rhodians arrived in Rome and brought word that the cities of Asia also were being stirred up to discontent. To these embassies the senate replied that they would look into the matter, and the whole question of the Macedonian war was referred to the consuls [2] who were then in the provinces. Meanwhile three ambassadors, Gaius Claudius Nero, Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus, were sent to King Ptolemy [3] of Egypt, to announce the defeat of Hannibal and the Carthaginians, to thank the king because, in a critical time, when even allies nearer home had revolted, he had remained loyal, and to ask that if the Romans, compelled by their wrongs, should declare war on Philip, he should preserve his ancient attitude toward the Roman people.

At about the same time the consul, Publius Aelius, who was in Gaul, having learned that before his arrival the Boi had been raiding the fields of the allies,[4] enrolled an emergency force of two legions, to deal with this uprising, and adding to them four cohorts from his own army, he ordered Gaius Ampius, rather than the boy-king himself, were obviously responsible for Egypt's fidelity to Rome.

[4] Many of the tribes of Cisalpine Gaul had joined Hannibal (XXI. xxv. 2, etc.), and the subjugation of the region had begun anew.

A.U.C. 553

fectum socium, hac tumultuaria manu per Umbriam, qua tribum Sapiniam vocant, agrum Boiorum invadere iussit; ipse eodem aperto itinere per montes
7 duxit. Ampius ingressus hostium fines primo populationes satis prospere ac tuto fecit; delecto deinde ad castrum Mutilum [1] satis idoneo loco ad demetenda frumenta—iam enim maturae erant segetes—profectus neque explorato circa nec stationibus satis
8 firmis, quae armatae inermes atque operi intentos tutarentur, positis improviso impetu Gallorum cum frumentatoribus est circumventus. Inde pavor fuga-
9 que etiam armatos cepit. Ad septem milia hominum palata per segetes sunt caesa, inter quos ipse C. Ampius praefectus; ceteri in castra metu compulsi.
10 Inde sine certo duce consensu militari proxima nocte relicta magna parte rerum suarum ad consulem per 11 saltus prope invios pervenere. Qui, nisi quod populatus est Boiorum finis et cum Ingaunis Liguribus foedus icit, nihil quod esset memorabile aliud in provincia cum gessisset, Romam rediit.

III. Cum primum senatum habuit, universis postulantibus ne quam prius rem quam de Philippo ac sociorum querellis ageret, relatum extemplo est;

[1] Mutilum edd.: militum B: mutillum ς.

---

[1] A local name for a district south of Ravenna. Sapinia is not the name of one of the Roman political divisions known as tribes.

[2] The Ingauni seem to have been a Ligurian tribe living to the south-west of the modern Genoa.

the commander of the allied forces, to take this B.C. 201 improvised force and with it to invade the territory of the Boi, marching by way of Umbria, through the district known as the tribus Sapinia.[1] Aelius himself led his forces thither by the open road over the mountains. Ampius, after entering the enemy's country, at first conducted raids with considerable success and without losses; then, choosing, near the fortified town of Mutilum, a camp-site suitable for reaping the crops—for the grain was now ripe—he set out without reconnoitring the neighbourhood or establishing sufficiently strong posts of armed men to protect the unarmed parties who were intent upon the work, and, when the Gauls made an unexpected attack, he and his foragers were surrounded. Thereupon terror and panic laid hold even of those who were under arms. About seven thousand men, scattered through the grain-fields, were killed, among them Gaius Ampius himself, the officer in command; the rest were driven by terror into the camp. Thence, on the next night, there being no one definitely in command, the soldiers by general consent abandoned most of their possessions, and travelling through well-nigh impassable forests rejoined the consul. He, having in his province accomplished nothing worth mentioning, except that he had ravaged the fields of the Boi and had made a treaty with the Ingauni Ligures,[2] returned to Rome.

III. At the first meeting of the senate, when all the members insisted that no business should have precedence over the question of Philip and the allies' complaints, the matter was at once taken up for consideration and a motion passed in a full

A.U.C. 553

2 decrevitque frequens senatus ut P. Aelius consul quem videretur ei cum imperio mitteret, qui classe accepta quam ex Sicilia Cn. Octavius reduceret, in 3 Macedoniam traiceret. M. Valerius Laevinus propraetor missus circa Vibonem duodequadraginta navibus ab Cn. Octavio acceptis in Macedoniam 4 transmisit. Ad quem cum M. Aurelius legatus venisset edocuissetque eum quantos exercitus, quan- 5 tum navium numerum comparasset rex, quem ad modum circa omnes non continentis modo urbes sed etiam insulas partim ipse adeundo, partim per 6 legatos conciret homines ad arma: maiore conatu Romanis id capessendum bellum esse, ne cunctantibus iis auderet Philippus quod Pyrrhus prius ausus ex aliquanto minore regno esset, haec scribere eadem Aurelium consulibus senatuique placuit.

IV. Exitu huius anni cum de agris veterum militum relatum esset, qui ductu atque auspicio P. Scipionis

---

[1] The imperium was that aspect of official authority which conferred the right of life and death and the right of exercising military command. At this period ordinary magistrates within the city of Rome could not possess imperium, and so their attendants carried the fasces without the axe which symbolized this power.

[2] This fleet had been on guard in Sicilian waters during the war with Hannibal (XXX. xli. 7).

[3] Laevinus had served in Greece for a long time during the recent war (XXIII. xxiv. 4, etc.), but was at this time a private citizen.

[4] Marcus Aurelius Cotta had been sent on an embassy to Philip in 203 B.C. (XXX. xxvi. 4). Macedonian ambassadors at the peace conference in 201 B.C. complained of his conduct, alleging that he had attacked Philip in contravention of the treaty (XXX. xlii. 3).

[5] Legati were either commissioners sent out by the senate to conduct diplomatic negotiations, to deliver messages to session, that Publius Aelius the consul should send B.C. 201

a suitable person of his own selection, vested with military authority,[1] to take over the fleet which Gnaeus Octavius was bringing from Sicily, and then cross over to Macedonia.[2] Marcus Valerius Laevinus[3] was sent with the rank of propraetor, and receiving thirty-eight ships from Gnaeus Octavius in the neighbourhood of Vibo, he took them across to Macedonia. There Marcus Aurelius[4] the commissioner[5] met him and informed him what mighty armies, what a great number of ships the king had assembled, and in what fashion he was rousing men to armed revolt, not only in all the cities of the mainland but in the islands as well, partly by visiting them in person, partly through his agents; and the two agreed that the Romans must undertake the war with greater vigour, lest while they delayed Philip should venture to do what Pyrrhus[6] before him had done, with a considerably less powerful empire, and that Aurelius should forward this information in writing to the consuls and senate.

IV. At the end of this year, when a proposal was made for a distribution of land[7] to the veterans independent states, to determine the form of government of a new province, etc., or military assistants to commanders in the field. Aurelius belonged to the former class, but had either assumed or been assigned military duties as well.

[6] King Pyrrhus of Epirus had been summoned to aid Tarentum during the war between that city and Rome (281–272 B.C.) and had invaded Italy.

[7] At this time only landowners served in the army, but some of these soldiers had been under arms for sixteen years and had lost all their property. This is, according to Livy, the first such measure to aid veterans, but in the later Republic such distributions were common. See also xlix. 5 below.

A.U.C. 553

in Africa bellum perfecissent, decreverunt patres 2 ut M. Iunius praetor urbanus, si ei videretur, decemviros agro Samniti Apuloque quod eius publicum populi Romani esset, metiendo dividendoque crearet.
3 Creati P. Servilius, Q. Caecilius Metellus, C. et M. Servilii—Geminis ambobus cognomen erat—L. et A. Hostilii Catones, P. Villius Tappulus,[1] M. Fulvius Flaccus, P. Aelius Paetus, T. Quinctius Flamininus.
4 Per eos dies P. Aelio consule comitia habente creati consules P. Sulpicius Galba, C. Aurelius Cotta. Praetores exinde facti Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furius
5 Purpurio, Q. Fulvius Gillo,[2] C. Sergius Plautus. Ludi Romani scaenici eo anno magnifice apparateque facti ab aedilibus curulibus L. Valerio Flacco et

[1] Tappulus Gelenius: t. apuleius B.
[2] cilo, the reading of B, is corrected from chap. vi, sect. 2 below.

---

[1] Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, who had brought the war to a successful conclusion.
[2] One of the four praetors was at this time assigned by lot as praetor urbanus, in charge of judicial administration. He ranked next after the consuls and administered affairs in the city in their absence.
[3] Such boards usually consisted of three members only. This task seemed especially difficult or important.
[4] These districts had revolted to Hannibal, and part of their land was taken from them in punishment.
[5] Apparently a fragmentary quotation from the law itself.
[6] The ludi Romani, of great antiquity, and the ludi plebeii, dating from the period of the Second Punic War, were celebrated in September and November respectively. In the later Republic each festival lasted two weeks. The object who had brought to an end the war in Africa under B.C. 201

the leadership and auspices of Publius Scipio,[1] the Fathers voted that Marcus Junius, the praetor of the city,[2] should, if it seemed advisable to him, appoint a board of ten [3] to survey and assign such lands in Samnium and Apulia [4] as were the public property of this the Roman people.[5] The board selected consisted of Publius Servilius, Quintus Caecilius Metellus, Gaius and Marcus Servilius (both having the surname Geminus), Lucius and Aulus Hostilius Cato, Publius Villius Tappulus, Marcus Fulvius Flaccus, Publius Aelius Paetus, and Titus Quinctius Flamininus.

At this time, the consul Publius Aelius holding the elections, Publius Sulpicius Galba and Gaius Aurelius Cotta were chosen consuls, and later Quintus Minucius Rufus, Lucius Furius Purpurio, Quintus Fulvius Gillo, and Gaius Sergius Plautus were elected praetors. Dramatic performances at the Roman Games [6] in that year were given with splendour and magnificence by the curule aediles,[7] Lucius Valerius of each was the worship of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, and in his especial honour a banquet was held on the thirteenth of the month. Performances were supervised by the curule and plebeian aediles respectively, the cost being paid by the state, though private funds were contributed in addition, and lavish expenditures of this sort were considered necessary for an aspirant to political distinction. As early as the middle of the fourth century B.C., dramatic performances were added to the other spectacles, at least in the ludi Romani. Since these were religious ceremonies, admission was free.

[7] The office of plebeian aedile was created with the tribunate in 494 B.C., and that of curule aedile, reserved to patricians, in 366 B.C. By this time both were open to patricians and plebeians alike. The supervision of the games was one of their chief functions.

A.U.C. 553

6 L. Quinctio Flaminino; biduum instauratum est; frumentique vim ingentem, quod ex Africa P. Scipio miserat, quaternis aeris populo cum summa fide et 7 gratia diviserunt. Et plebeii ludi ter toti instaurati ab aedilibus plebi L. Apustio Fullone et Q. Minucio Rufo, qui ex aedilitate praetor creatus erat. Et Iovis epulum fuit ludorum causa.

A.U.C. 554

V. Anno quingentesimo quinquagesimo[1] primo[2] ab urbe condita, P. Sulpicio Galba C. Aurelio consulibus, bellum cum rege Philippo initum est, paucis mensibus post pacem Carthaginiensibus datam.
2 Omnium primum eam rem idibus Martiis, quo die
3 tum consulatus inibatur, P. Sulpicius consul rettulit senatusque decrevit, uti consules maioribus hostiis rem divinam facerent quibus diis ipsis[3] videretur
4 cum precatione ea: "Quod senatus populusque Romanus de re publica deque ineundo novo bello in animo haberet, ea res uti populo Romano sociisque ac nomini Latino bene ac feliciter eveniret;" secundum rem divinam precationemque ut de re publica
5 deque provinciis senatum consulerent. Per eos dies

[1] quinquagesimo Glareanus: q̄dragensimo B.
[2] primo edd.: uno B.
[3] diis ipsis edd.: ipsis diis B.

---

[1] Religious flaws in the performance, unfavourable omens, and similar occurrences might cause the partial or total repetition of the games. The aediles might also desire to gain increased prestige by expenditures on a grand scale, and so find or manufacture causes for their renewal: this may have been the case on this occasion.

[2] See note on "Roman Games" above.

[3] i.e. March 15, on which date, after 217 B.C., the new magistrates assumed office. Beginning with 153 B.C., inauguration day was January 1.

Flaccus and Lucius Quinctius Flamininus; the performance of two days was renewed;[1] a huge quantity of grain, sent from Africa by Publius Scipio, they sold to the populace at four asses a measure, with the most scrupulous fairness and to the great satisfaction of the people. Also the Plebeian Games, entire, were thrice repeated by the plebeian aediles, Lucius Apustius Fullo and Quintus Minucius Rufus; the latter was chosen praetor at the close of his term as aedile. A banquet to Jupiter[2] was likewise held in connection with the games. B.C. 201

V. In the five hundred and fifty-first year from the founding of the city, in the consulship of Publius Sulpicius Galba and Gaius Aurelius, war was declared against King Philip, a few months after peace had been granted to the Carthaginians. On the Ides[3] of March, the day on which the new magistrates were inaugurated at that period, the consul Publius Sulpicius first of all offered a motion, which the senate passed, that the consuls should perform a sacrifice of full-grown victims to whatever gods should seem best to them, and should at the same time make this prayer: "Whatever the senate and the Roman people shall resolve for the common good and with reference to beginning a new war, may this decision turn out well and happily for the Roman people, the allies, and the Latin name;"[4] that after the sacrifice and prayer they should lay before the senate the question of the public weal and of the provinces. In these days two things B.C. 200

[4] Used collectively for the Latin colonies, privileged self-governing communities, which furnished complete military units to Rome.

A.U.C. 554

opportune irritandis ad bellum animis et litterae ab M. Aurelio legato et M. Valerio Laevino propraetore
6 adlatae et Atheniensium nova legatio venit, quae regem appropinquare finibus suis nuntiaret, brevique non agros modo sed urbem etiam in dicione eius
7 futuram nisi quid in Romanis auxilii foret. Cum renuntiassent consules rem divinam rite peractam esse et precationi annuisse deos haruspices respondere laetaque exta fuisse et prolationem finium victoriamque et triumphum portendi, tum litterae Valerii Aureliique lectae et legati Atheniensium
8 auditi. Senatus inde consultum factum est, ut sociis gratiae agerentur, quod diu sollicitati ne obsidionis
9 quidem metu fide decessissent; de auxilio mittendo tum responderi placere cum consules provincias sortiti essent atque is consul cui Macedonia provincia evenisset ad populum tulisset, ut Philippo, regi Macedonum, indiceretur bellum.

VI. P. Sulpicio provincia Macedonia sorti evenit, isque rogationem promulgavit, vellent iuberent Philippo regi Macedonibusque qui sub regno eius essent, ob iniurias armaque illata sociis populi Romani bellum indici. Alteri consulum Aurelio Italia pro-

---

[1] While the senate at this time practically controlled the government at Rome, the formal act of declaring war required affirmative action by the comitia centuriata, the ancient assembly organized along military lines by Servius Tullius. The senate's selection of Macedonia as a consular province, although Rome had no jurisdiction over that territory, indicated clearly its intention to aid the Athenians against Philip, but it lacked the authority to begin the war on its own initiative. The details of the procedure in the assembly are given in the following sections.

occurred opportunely for arousing popular sentiment in favour of the war: the arrival of the dispatches from the commissioner Marcus Aurelius and Marcus Laevinus the propraetor, and the coming of a new embassy from the Athenians, which brought word that the king was approaching their borders and that in a short time not only their farms but Athens itself would be in his power unless there should be some assistance from the Romans. When the consuls had reported that the sacrifices had been duly performed and that the gods had given approval to their prayers, that the soothsayers had given answer that the entrails were propitious and portended an extension of territory, victory, and a triumph, then the letters of Valerius and Aurelius were read and the Athenian embassy given audience. The senate next decreed that the allies should be thanked because, though long harassed, they had not been led even by fear of siege to break their faith; with regard to sending aid, it was the senate's intention to answer their appeal when the consuls had been allotted their provinces and that consul to whom the province of Macedonia had fallen had proposed to the people a declaration of war upon Philip, King of the Macedonians.[1] B.C. 200

VI. Macedonia was assigned by lot to Publius Sulpicius as his province, and he submitted to the popular assembly the question whether they wished and ordered that war be declared upon King Philip and the Macedonians over whom he ruled, on account of the injuries he had inflicted and the war he had made on the allies of the Roman people. To the other consul, Aurelius, the province of Italy

A.U.C. 554

2 vineia obtigit. Praetores exinde sortiti sunt C. Sergius Plautus [1] urbanam, Q. Fulvius Gillo Siciliam, Q. Minucius Rufus Bruttios, L. Furius Purpurio
3 Galliam. Rogatio de bello Macedonico primis comitiis ab omnibus ferme centuriis antiquata est. Id cum fessi diurnitate et gravitate belli sua sponte homines taedio periculorum laborumque fecerant,
4 tum Q. Baebius tribunus plebis, viam antiquam criminandi patres ingressus, incusaverat bella ex
5 bellis seri, ne pace umquam frui plebs posset. Aegre eam rem passi patres, laceratusque probris in senatu tribunus plebis, et consulem pro se quisque hortari ut de integro comitia rogationi ferendae ediceret 6 castigaretque segnitiam populi atque edoceret quanto damno dedecorique dilatio ea belli futura esset.

VII. Consul in campo Martio comitiis, priusquam

[1] plancus, the reading of B, is corrected from chap. iv, sect. 4 above.

---

[1] The praetorship had been established in 366 B.C.; a second praetor was added in 242 B.C. (Per. XIX), and two more in 227 B.C. (XXII. xxxv. 5). One of them, the praetor urbanus (see note to iv. 1 above), tried cases in which only Roman citizens were involved; a second was frequently assigned to to preside over cases between citizens and aliens (praetor peregrinus); the rest were given the less important territorial provinces.

[2] The comitia centuriata consisted of units of (theoretically) one hundred men each, each century having one vote.

[3] The tribunate was originally created to provide protection for the plebeians against aristocratic injustice. The tribunes, however, had gradually been converted into agents of the aristocracy, since the senate learned that their power could be used against, as well as for, the commons. Baebius has resumed the original policy of opposition to and obstruction of senatorial measures.

was assigned. Next the praetors[1] received their B.C. 200 assignments, Gaius Sergius Plautus the praetorship of the city, Quintus Fulvius Gillo the governorship of Sicily, while Bruttium fell to Quintus Minucius Rufus and Gaul to Lucius Furius Purpurio. The motion regarding the Macedonian war was defeated at the first meeting of the assembly by the votes of almost all the centuries.[2] This action was taken spontaneously by men who were worn out by a war of long duration and great severity, so weary were they of hardships and perils; furthermore, Quintus Baebius, the tribune of the plebs, pursuing the once-usual course[3] of attacking the Fathers, had taunted them with sowing the seeds of war upon war, that the common people might never enjoy peace. The senate was annoyed at this; the tribune was assailed with abuse in the senate, and each member independently urged the consul to summon the assembly again to consider the motion, to upbraid the people for its supineness, and to make clear what danger and disgrace such postponement of the war would cause.

VII. The consul therefore, at the meeting in the Campus Martius,[4] calling an informal meeting[5]

[4] The comitia centuriata had once been practically identical with the army, and since the holding of the imperium (cf. the note on iii. 2) was forbidden within the pomerium, or religious limits of the city, this assembly met outside those limits, in the plain formed by the swing of the Tiber river to the right.

[5] The comitia voted, but did not debate. If there was to be discussion—in any case only those spoke who were invited to do so by the presiding officer—it took place in an informal contio held prior to the meeting of the formal comitia. The membership and place of meeting of a contio were identical with those of the comitia which it preceded.

A.U.C. 554

centurias in suffragium mitteret, contione advocata
2 "ignorare" inquit "mihi videmini, Quirites, non utrum bellum an pacem habeatis vos consuli—neque enim liberum id vobis Philippus permittet, qui terra marique ingens bellum molitur—sed utrum in Macedoniam legiones transportetis an hostes in 3 Italiam accipiatis. Hoc quantum intersit, si numquam alias, Punico proximo certe bello experti estis. Quis enim dubitat, quin, si Saguntinis obsessis fidemque nostram implorantibus impigre tulissemus opem, sicut patres nostri Mamertinis tulerant, totum in Hispaniam aversuri bellum fuerimus, quod cunctando cum summa clade nostra in Italiam
4 accepimus? Ne illud quidem dubium est, quin hunc ipsum Philippum, pactum iam per legatos litterasque cum Hannibale, ut in Italiam traiceret, misso cum classse Laevino qui ultro ei bellum
5 inferret, in Macedonia continuerimus. Et quod tunc fecimus, cum hostem Hannibalem in Italia haberemus, id nunc pulso Italia Hannibale, devictis
6 Carthaginiensibus, cunctamur facere? Patiamur expugnandis Athenis, sicut Sagunto expugnando Hannibalem passi sumus, segnitiam nostram experiri
7 regem: non quinto inde mense, quem ad modum ab Sagunto Hannibal, sed quinto inde die[1] quam ab
8 Corintho solverit naves, in Italiam perveniet. Ne aequaveritis Hannibali Philippum nec Carthaginiensibus Macedonas; Pyrrho certe aequabitis. Aequabitis[2] dico? Quantum vel vir viro vel gens genti

[1] inde die B^2: die inde B. [2] Aequabitis Jacobs: om. B.

[1] These Italian mercenaries in Sicily appealed for aid to Rome against Syracuse and her Carthaginian supporters. The First Punic War was the result of Rome's decision to assist them (Per. XVI; Polyb. I. vii. ff.).

before he put the question to the centuries, spoke B.C. 200
thus: "It seems to me, citizens, that you do not realize that the question before you is not whether you will have peace or war—for Philip will not leave that matter open for your decision, seeing that he is preparing a mighty war on land and sea—but whether you are to send your legions across to Macedonia or meet the enemy in Italy. What a difference that makes, if you never knew before, you found out at least in the recent Punic war. For who doubts that if, when the Saguntines were besieged and were invoking our protection, we had promptly sent aid to them, as our fathers did to the Mamertines,[1] we should have diverted the whole war to Spain, whereas by our delay we admitted it to Italy, with infinite losses to ourselves? Nor is there any doubt in the case of this same Philip, when he had already bargained with Hannibal, through ambassadors and by means of letters, to invade Italy, that when we sent Laevinus with a fleet to begin an offensive campaign against him, we kept him in Macedonia. And that which we did then, when we had Hannibal fighting in Italy, do we hesitate to do now, when Hannibal has been driven out and the Carthaginians conquered? Let us permit the king by the capture of Athens, as we permitted Hannibal by the capture of Saguntum, to see how slow we are to act: not in five months, as when Hannibal came from Saguntum, but in five days after he sets sail from Corinth, Philip will arrive in Italy! You need not compare Philip with Hannibal nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; you will compare him at least with Pyrrhus.[2] Compare, did I say? How great is the superiority, [1] Cf. the notes on i. 6 and iii. 6 above.

A.U.C. 554

9 praestat! Minima accessio semper Epirus regno Macedoniae fuit et hodie est. Peloponnesum totam in dicione Philippus habet Argosque ipsos, non vetere fama magis quam morte Pyrrhi nobilitatos. 10 Nostra nunc compara. Quanto magis florentem Italiam, quanto magis integras res, salvis ducibus, salvis tot exercitibus quos Punicum postea bellum absumpsit, adgressus Pyrrhus tamen concussit et 11 victor prope ad ipsam urbem Romanam venit! Nec Tarentini modo oraque illa Italiae quam maiorem Graeciam vocant, ut linguam, ut nomen secutos crederes, sed Lucanus et Bruttius et Samnis ab nobis 12 defecerunt. Haec vos, si Philippus in Italiam transmiserit, quietura aut mansura in fide creditis? Manserunt enim Punico postea bello. Numquam isti populi, nisi cum deerit ad quem desciscant, ab 13 nobis non deficient. Si piguisset vos in Africam traicere, hodie in Italia Hannibalem et Carthaginienses hostes haberetis. Macedonia potius quam Italia bellum habeat; hostium urbes agrique ferro 14 atque igni vastentur; experti iam sumus foris nobis quam domi feliciora potentioraque arma esse. Ite in suffragium bene iuvantibus divis et quae patres 15 censuerunt vos iubete. Huius vobis sententiae non consul modo auctor est sed etiam dii immortales, qui mihi sacrificanti precantique ut hoc bellum mihi,

---

[1] Epirus, in north-western Greece and adjacent to Macedonia, was the home of Pyrrhus.

[2] The ancient city of Argos is less important, to Sulpicius, for the traditions that gathered around it than for the reason that Pyrrhus met his death in a street-fight there about 272 B.C.

[3] For rhetorical effect Sulpicius magnifies somewhat the importance of Pyrrhus's early victories and neglects to mention the final Roman victory. Pyrrhus did defeat the Romans in man to man or nation to nation! Epirus[1] has always been and is to-day a mere appendage to the Macedonian empire. Philip has under his control the whole of the Peloponnesus and Argos itself, famed not so much in ancient story as for the death of Pyrrhus.[2] Now compare our situation: How much more prosperous was Italy, how much greater her resources; her leaders alive, so many armies intact, which the Punic war later destroyed. Yet when Pyrrhus attacked he shattered her at a blow and came a conqueror almost to the gates of Rome![3] Not only the Tarentines and that part of the Italian coast which men call 'Greater Greece,' so that one would expect them to have followed the Greek language and name, but the Lucanian, the Bruttian, the Samnite revolted from us. Do you think that these peoples will remain quiet and steadfast if Philip invades Italy? 'Yes,' you say, 'for they did in the later Punic war.' Never will these peoples fail to revolt unless there is no enemy at hand for them to join. If you had been reluctant to invade Africa, you would have Hannibal and the Carthaginians fighting in Italy to-day. Let Macedonia, not Italy, have war; let it be the enemy's farms and cities that are laid waste with fire and sword. We have already learned from experience that our arms are more fortunate and powerful abroad than at home. Go to vote, then, with the blessing of the gods, and ratify what the senate has proposed. It is not the consul alone who supports this opinion before you: the immortal gods themselves favour it, for when I offered sacrifice and prayer that this war should turn out successfully for B.C. 200 several battles and did win the support of the Greek south of Italy.

A.U.C. 554 senatui vobisque, sociis ac nomini Latino, classibus exercitibusque nostris bene ac feliciter eveniret, laeta omnia prosperaque portendere."

VIII. Ab hac oratione in suffragium missi uti 2 rogarent, bellum iusserunt. Supplicatio inde a consulibus in triduum ex senatus consulto indicta est, obsecratique circa omnia pulvinaria dii ut, quod bellum cum Philippo populus iussisset, id bene ac 3 feliciter eveniret, consultique fetiales ab consule Sulpicio, bellum quod indiceretur regi Philippo, utrum ipsi utique nuntiari iuberent, an satis esset in finibus regni quod proximum praesidium esset, eo nuntiari. Fetiales decreverunt, utrum eorum fecisset, 4 recte facturum. Consuli a patribus permissum ut quem videretur ex iis qui extra senatum essent, 5 legatum mitteret ad bellum regi indicendum. Tum de exercitibus[1] consulum praetorumque actum. Consules binas legiones scribere iussi, veteres dimit- 6 tere exercitus. Sulpicio, cui novum ac magni nominis bellum decretum erat, permissum ut de exercitu quem P. Scipio ex Africa deportasset, voluntarios quos posset duceret; invitum ne quem 7 militem veterem ducendi ius esset. Praetoribus L. Furio Purpurioni et Q. Minucio Rufo quina milia socium Latini nominis consules darent, quibus praesidiis alter Galliam alter Bruttios provinciam 8 obtineret. Q. Fulvius Gillo ipse iussus ex eo exercitu

[1] exercitibus edd.: exercitu B.

[1] At the lectisternium, or feast of the gods, the images of the divinities were placed upon gaily-decorated couches (pulvinaria) and served with food: cf. XXII. i. 15, etc.

[2] Members of a college of priests whose especial concern was the proper performance of the prescribed formalities involved in a declaration of war or the conclusion of a treaty.

me, the senate and for you, for the allies and the Latin confederacy, and for our fleets and armies, they gave all favourable and propitious signs." B.C. 200

VIII. After this speech they were dismissed to vote and ordered the war. A three-day period of supplication was then declared by the consuls on the authorization of the senate, and the gods were implored at all their seats,[1] that this war which the people had declared upon Philip might succeed and prosper. The fetials[2] were consulted by the consul whether they would direct that the declaration of war against King Philip be delivered to him in person, or whether it was sufficient to announce it at the first fortified post in his territory. The fetials replied that in whichever way he acted he would act correctly. The consul was permitted by the Fathers to send anyone he chose, other than a senator, to declare war upon the king. They then took up the question of armies for the consuls and praetors. The consuls were authorized to enrol two legions each and to discharge the veterans. Sulpicius, to whom had been assigned the command in a new and important war, was allowed to enlist volunteers, as he could, from the army brought back from Africa by Publius Scipio, but was permitted to enrol no veteran against his will.[3] To each of the praetors, Lucius Furius Purpurio and Quintus Minucius Rufus, the consuls were to give five thousand allies of the Latin confederacy, and with these garrisons they were to guard their provinces of Gaul and Bruttium respectively. Quintus Fulvius Gillo likewise was authorized to draft soldiers from [3] This restriction was apparently disregarded; cf. XXXII. iii. 4.

A.U.C. 554

quem P. Aelius consul habuisset, ut quisque minime multa stipendia haberet, legere, donec et ipse quinque milia socium ac nominis Latini effecisset: 9 id praesidii Siciliae provinciae esset. M. Valerio Faltoni, qui praetor priore anno Campaniam provinciam habuerat, prorogatum in annum imperium est, 10 uti propraetor in Sardiniam traiceret: is quoque de exercitu qui ibi esset, quinque milia socium nominis Latini, qui eorum minime multa stipendia haberent,[1] 11 legeret. Et consules duas urbanas legiones scribere iussi, quae, si quo res posceret, multis in Italia contactis gentibus Punici belli societate iraque inde tumentibus, mitterentur. Sex legionibus Romanis eo anno usura res publica erat.

IX. In ipso adparatu belli legati a rege Ptolomaeo venerunt, qui nuntiarent Athenienses adversus 2 Philippum petisse ab rege auxilium; ceterum, etsi communes socii sint, tamen nisi ex auctoritate populi Romani neque classem neque exercitum defendendi aut oppugnandi cuiusquam causa regem 3 in Graeciam missurum esse; vel quieturum eum in regno, si populo Romano socios defendere libeat, vel Romanos quiescere, si malint, passurum atque ipsum auxilia quae facile adversus Philippum tueri Athenas 4 possent missurum. Gratiae regi ab senatu actae responsumque tutari socios populo Romano in animo esse; si qua re ad id bellum opus sit, indicaturos regi regnique eius opes scire subsidia firma ac fidelia suae 5 rei publicae esse. Munera deinde legatis in singulos quinum milium aeris ex senatus consulto missa.

[1] haberent Muretus: haberet B.

the army which Publius Aelius had commanded as consul, choosing those who had been in the ranks for the shortest periods, until he too had made up the number of five thousand of the allies and the Latin confederacy; this force was to garrison the province of Sicily. The command of Marcus Valerius Falto, who, as praetor, had held the province of Campania the year before, was extended for a year, so that, as propraetor, he should cross to Sardinia; he too was to enlist, from the army there, five thousand of the allies and the Latin confederacy, choosing those who had served for the shortest periods. The consuls were authorized to enrol two city legions as well, to be sent wherever need arose, since many tribes of Italy had been affected by the contagion of the Punic war and were in a restless state. Thus Rome proposed to use six legions that year. B.C. 200

IX. In the midst of the preparations for the war, ambassadors arrived from King Ptolemy, to say that the Athenians had asked the king's aid against Philip, but that, although they were allies in common, the king would send no fleet or army to Greece to defend or attack anyone without the authorization of the Roman people; he would either remain quiet at home, if the Romans planned to defend their allies, or permit the Romans to stay at home, if they preferred, and himself send such forces as could easily defend Athens against Philip. The senate thanked the king, saying that it was the intention of the Roman people to defend its allies; if need of anything for this war arose, they would inform the king, knowing that the resources of his kingdom were firm and trustworthy supports of the republic. Gifts of five thousand asses each were then presented to the ambassadors by order of the senate.

A.U.C. 554

Cum dilectum consules haberent pararentque quae ad bellum opus essent, civitas religiosa, in principiis 6 maxime novorum bellorum, supplicationibus habitis iam et obsecratione circa omnia pulvinaria facta, ne quid praetermitteretur quod aliquando factum esset, ludos Iovi donumque vovere consulem, cui provincia 7 Macedonia evenisset, iussit. Moram voto publico Licinius pontifex maximus attulit, qui negavit ex incerta pecunia vovere licere; ex certa voveri debere, quia ea pecunia [1] non posset in bellum usui esse seponique statim deberet nec cum alia pecunia misceri; quod si factum esset, votum rite solvi non posse. 8 Quamquam et res et auctor movebat, tamen ad collegium pontificum referre consul iussus, si posset recte votum incertae pecuniae suscipi. Posse recti- 9 usque etiam esse pontifices decreverunt. Vovit in eadem verba consul praeeunte maximo pontifice quibus antea quinquennalia vota suscipi solita erant, 10 praeterquam quod tanta pecunia quantam [2] tum cum solveretur senatus censuisset, ludos donaque facturum vovit. Octiens ante ludi magni de certa pecunia voti erant; hi primi de incerta.

[1] licere; ex certa voveri add. Madvig: ea add. Bekker: uouere debere quia pecunia B (ex ras.).
[2] quantam B^2: qua tamen B.

[1] The point which Licinius makes becomes clear when we recall the scrupulous exactness with which the Romans satisfied all their obligations to the gods. Licinius is responsible for the precision and propriety of the language used in the vow, and he fears that if the Romans make a vague and indefinite promise the gods will make a vague and indefinite response. Whatever the intention may have been, a vow of this sort inevitably assumes, to the outsider, the aspect of a bargain.

[2] The pontiffs as a body had final jurisdiction as interpreters of the ius divinum, or body of ordinances controlling the relations of men to gods.

While the consuls were levying troops and preparing what was needful for the war, the state, ever concerned with religion, especially at the outset of new wars, having held thanksgivings and offered prayers at all the seats of the gods, that nothing might be left undone which had ever been done before, ordered the consul to whom the province of Macedonia had been assigned to vow games and a gift to Jupiter. A delay in the matter of this public vow was caused by Licinius the pontifex maximus, who said that a vow for an indefinite sum was not allowable; that a specific sum[1] should be vowed, because this money could not be used for war, but should be set aside at once and not mixed with other moneys; if this happened, he said, the vow could not be fulfilled in strict conformity to its terms. Although the consul was moved both by the argument and its author, he was nevertheless directed to appeal to the college[2] of priests, to learn whether a vow for an indeterminate sum could properly be undertaken. The pontiffs replied that it was possible and even more correct. The consul, at the dictation of the pontifex maximus, recited his vow in the language formerly used in connection with the quinquennial games,[3] with the exception that he promised games and a gift of an amount to be determined by the senate at the time the vow was paid.[4] The great games had been vowed eight times before for definite sums; this was the first vow for an indefinite amount.[5] B.C. 200

[3] When the ludi Romani (cf. the note on iv. 5 above) became annual, special attention was devoted to those occurring every fifth year.

[4] These games were held in 194 B.C.: cf. XXXIV. xliv. 6.

[5] These statements cannot be verified.

A.U.C. 554

X. Omnium animis in bellum Macedonicum versis repente, nihil minus eo tempore timentibus, Gallici
2 tumultus fama exorta. Insubres Cenomanique et Boi excitis Celinibus Ilvatibusque et ceteris Ligustinis populis Hamilcare Poeno duce, qui in iis locis de Hasdrubalis exercitu substiterat, Placentiam invase-
3 rant; et direpta urbe ac per iram magna ex parte incensa, vix duobus milibus hominum inter incendia ruinasque relictis, traiecto Pado ad Cremonam diripi-
4 endam pergunt. Vicinae urbis audita clades spatium colonis dedit ad claudendas portas praesidiaque per muros disponenda, ut obsiderentur tamen prius quam expugnarentur nuntiosque mitterent ad praetorem
5 Romanum. L. Furius Purpurio tum provinciae praeerat cetero ex senatus consulto exercitu dimisso praeter quinque milia socium ac Latini nominis; cum iis copiis in proxima regione provinciae circa Ariminum substiterat. Is tum senatui scripsit quo
6 in tumultu provincia esset: duarum coloniarum, quae ingentem illam tempestatem Punici belli subterfugissent, alteram captam ac direptam ab hostibus, 7 alteram oppugnari; nec in exercitu suo satis praesidii colonis laborantibus fore, nisi quinque milia socium quadraginta milibus hostium—tot enim in armis esse—trucidanda obicere velit,[1] et tanta sua clade iam inflatos excidio coloniae Romanae augeri hostium animos.

[1] uelit B^2: uenit B.

[1] The Latin colonies of Placentia and Cremona, in the valley of the Po, had been established in 218 B.C. to aid in subjugating and holding Cisalpine Gaul.

X. While the thoughts of all were concentrated B.C. 200 on the Macedonian war and fearful of nothing less at the moment, news came of an uprising in Gaul. The Insubres, the Cenomani, and the Boi had roused the Celines, the Ilvates and the other Ligustini, and these tribes, under the leadership of Hamilcar the Carthaginian, who had remained in that region, a survivor of Hasdrubal's army, had attacked Placentia.[1] After plundering the city and burning most of it in their fury, they had left barely two thousand men alive among the flames and ruins, and then had crossed the Po and gone to destroy Cremona. The news of the disaster to the neighbouring city gave the colonists time to close the gates and man the walls, so that, in spite of these measures, a siege began before the town was assaulted and before they could send messengers to the Roman praetor. Lucius Furius Purpurio was then governor of the province, and had discharged the rest of his army by order of the senate, retaining only five thousand of the allies and the Latin confederacy; with these troops he was encamped in the vicinity of Ariminum, in the part of the province nearest Rome. He thereupon sent a message to the senate, telling in what confusion the province was: one of the two colonies which had escaped the mighty storm of the Punic war had been captured and sacked by the enemy, the other was besieged; his own army would be too weak to assist the colonists in their need, unless the senate wishes to deliver five thousand allies to be butchered by forty thousand enemies—for so many were in arms—and the minds of the enemy, already puffed up by the destruction of a Roman colony, to be further encouraged by the slaughter of so many of his own men.

A.U.C. 554

XI. His litters recitatis decreverunt ut C. Aurelius consul exercitum, cui in Etruriam ad conveniendum 2 diem edixerat, Arimini eadem die adesse iuberet et aut ipse, si per commodum rei publicae posset, ad opprimendum Gallicum tumultum proficisceretur aut 3 praetori [1] scriberet ut, cum ad eum legiones ex Etruria venissent, missis in vicem earum quinque milibus sociorum, quae interim Etruriae praesidio essent, proficisceretur ipse ad coloniam liberandam 4 obsidione. Legatos item mittendos in Africam censuerunt, eosdem Carthaginem, eosdem in Numi- 5 diam ad Masinissam: Carthaginem, ut nuntiarent civem eorum Hamilcarem relictum in Gallia—haud satis scire ex Hasdrubalis prius an ex Magonis postea 6 exercitu—bellum contra foedus facere, exercitus Gallorum Ligurumque excivisse ad arma contra populum Romanum; eum, si pax placeret, revocandum illis et dedendum populo Romano esse. 7 Simul nuntiare iussi perfugas sibi non omnes redditos esse, ac magnam partem eorum palam Carthagini obversari dici; quos comprehendi conquirique debere ut sibi ex foedere restituantur. Haec ad 8 Carthaginienses mandata. Masinissae gratulari iussi, quod non patrium modo recuperasset regnum,

[1] B reads q. minucio praetori, but Minucius was in Bruttium.

[1] Masinissa, king of the Massylii, had fought against the Romans in Spain, but had been won over by Africanus and had served effectively in the last campaigns of the war. His dominions were enlarged by the peace treaty (XXX. xliv. 12).

XI. When this news came, the senate voted that B.C. 200
Gaius Aurelius the consul should order that the army, for which he had designated a date on which to assemble in Etruria, should come together the same day at Ariminum, and that either Aurelius himself, if the interests of the state permitted, should set out to suppress the Gallic revolt, or else he should notify the praetor that when the legions from Etruria joined him he should send in their stead five thousand of the allies, to serve as a temporary garrison for Etruria, and that he himself should march to raise the siege of the colony. The senate also voted that ambassadors be sent to Africa on a mission to Carthage and likewise to Masinissa in Numidia.[1] Their message to the Carthaginians was that their fellow-citizen Hamilcar, left in Gaul—it was not certainly known whether he was from Hasdrubal's earlier army or the later expedition of Mago [2]—was making war contrary to the treaty and had raised armies of Gauls and Ligures against the Roman people; if they wanted peace they should recall him and surrender him to the Roman people. At the same time they were ordered to give notice that the Roman deserters had not all been restored to them, but that, according to report, many of them were openly living at Carthage; these were to be sought out and arrested, for return to Rome according to the treaty. Such was their mission to Carthage. As to Masinissa, they were ordered to congratulate him because he had not only recovered his ancestral possessions but had also en-

[1] His friendship with the Scipios and his vigour in extreme old age made him a familiar figure in Latin literature.

[2] The two brothers of Hannibal, Hasdrubal and Mago, had invaded Italy in 207 B.C. and 205 B.C. (XXVII. xxxix. 2 ff.; XXVIII. xlvi. 7 ff.). Cf. x. 2 above.

A.U.C. 551

sed parte florentissima Syphacis finium adiecta etiam
9 auxisset. Nuntiare praeterea iussi bellum cum rege Philippo susceptum, quod Carthaginienses auxiliis 10 iuvisset iniuriasque inferendo sociis populi Romani flagrante bello Italia coegisset classes exercitusque in Graeciam mitti et distinendo copias causa in primis fuisset serius in Africam traiciendi; peterentque ut ad id bellum mitteret auxilia Numidarum equitum.
11 Dona ampla data quae ferrent regi, vasa aurea 12 argenteaque, toga purpurea et palmata tunica cum eburneo scipione et toga praetexta cum curuli sella; iussique polliceri, si quid sibi ad firmandum augendumque regnum opus esse indicasset, enixe id populum Romanum merito eius praestaturum.
13 Verminae quoque, Syphacis filii, legati per eos dies senatum adierunt excusantes errorem adulescentiamque et culpam omnem in fraudem Carthaginiensium 14 avertentes: et Masinissam Romanis ex hoste amicum factum; Verminam quoque adnisurum ne officiis in populum Romanum aut a Masinissa aut ab ullo alio vincatur; petere ut rex sociusque et amicus ab 15 senatu appellaretur. Responsum legatis est, et patrem eius Syphacem sine causa ex socio et amico hostem repente populi Romani factum, et eum ipsum rudimentum adulescentiae bello lacessentem Romanos
16 posuisse. Itaque pacem illi prius petendam ab

[1] Syphax, king of Numidia, had been a Roman ally but had gone over to Carthage and expelled Masinissa from his own kingdom. He died a prisoner in Italy, just before or just after Scipio's triumph (XXX. xlv. 4–5), leaving the remnants of his kingdom to Vermina.

larged them by the addition of the most prosperous B.C. 200 part of the territory of Syphax.[1] They were also to say that war with King Philip had been begun, because he had sent aid to Carthage; because he had, by attacking the allies of the Roman people when Italy was being consumed by the flames of war, compelled the dispatch of fleets and armies to Greece, and, by dividing their forces, had been a chief cause of postponing the invasion of Africa. They were to ask that Masinissa send assistance in the form of Numidian cavalry. Ample gifts—vases of gold and silver, a purple toga, a tunic adorned with palms, an ivory sceptre, a robe of state and a curule chair—were given them to be presented to the king. The ambassadors were directed to promise him that if he pointed out anything he needed to strengthen and enlarge his kingdom, the Roman people would make every effort to secure it for him, in recognition of his services to them. At this time ambassadors to the senate came also from Vermina, the son of Syphax, who sought to make excuses for his mistakes, which were due to his youth, and placing all the blame for them on the bad faith of the Carthaginians: Masinissa, they said, had become a friend to the Roman people after having been their enemy; so Vermina too would strive earnestly not to be outdone by Masinissa or anyone else in services to the Roman people; they asked that he be named king and ally and friend by the senate. The senators replied to the ambassadors that his father Syphax, once an ally and friend, had suddenly and without cause become an enemy of the Roman people; that Vermina himself had spent the beginnings of his youth in harassing the Romans in war. Therefore he should seek peace from the populo Romano esse, quam ut rex sociusque et amicus appelletur; nominis eius honorem pro magnis erga se regum meritis dare populum Romanum consuesse.

a.u.c. 554

17 Legatos Romanos in Africa fore, quibus mandaturum senatum ut Verminae pacis dent leges, liberum arbitrium eius populo Romano permittenti;[1] si quid ad eas addi, demi mutarive[2] vellet, rursus ab senatu 18 ei postulandum fore. Legati cum iis mandatis in Africam missi C. Terentius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, Cn. Octavius. Quinqueremes singulis datae.

XII. Litterae deinde in senatu recitatae sunt Q. Minucii praetoris, cui Bruttii provincia erat: pecuniam Locris ex Proserpinae thensauris nocte clam sublatam, nec ad quos pertineat facinus vestigia
2 ulla extare. Indigne passus senatus non cessari ab sacrilegiis, et ne Pleminium quidem, tam clarum recensque noxae simul ac poenae exemplum, homines
3 deterrere. C. Aurelio consuli negotium datum ut ad praetorem in Bruttios scriberet senatui placere, quaestionem de expilatis thensauris eodem exemplo haberi quo M. Pomponius praetor triennio ante
4 habuisset; quae inventa pecunia esset, reponi; si quo minus inventum foret, expleri, ac piacularia, si videretur, sicut ante pontifices censuissent, fieri.
5 Curam expiandae violationis eius templi prodigia

[1] permittenti Ruben: permittente B.
[2] mutarive edd.: mutari B.

---

[1] Pleminius, while in command of the garrison at Locri in 204 B.C., had plundered this same temple, and had been severely punished. The story of his sacrilege and its penalty was related in XXIX. xviii–xxii incl.

[2] Pomponius, as governor of Sicily, had investigated the charges against Pleminius: cf. the preceding note.

Roman people before asking for recognition as king and ally and friend, the honour of which titles the Roman people usually conferred in return for conspicuous services towards themselves on the part of kings. Roman ambassadors, they said, would soon be in Africa, whom the senate would instruct to offer terms of peace to Vermina, who was to leave full discretion thereon to the Roman people; if he wished anything added to, taken from, or modified in, these terms, he should make a new request to the senate. The ambassadors sent to Africa with these instructions were Gaius Terentius Varro, Spurius Lucretius and Gnaeus Octavius. One quinquereme was assigned to each. B.C. 200

XII. A letter from Quintus Minucius, the praetor in charge of the province of Bruttium, was then read in the senate: money had been stealthily removed at night from the treasure-house of Persephone at Locri, nor were there any clues as to the perpetrators of the crime. The senate was indignant that such sacrileges should continue to be committed, and that even the case of Pleminius,[1] so recent an example of crime and its punishment, did not deter criminals. The consul Gaius Aurelius was directed to communicate to the praetor in Bruttium the senate's desire that the plundering of the treasury should be investigated in the manner adopted by the praetor Marcus Pomponius[2] three years before; that any money discovered be restored; that if there was any shortage, it should be made up, and that, if he saw fit, expiatory sacrifices should be performed as the priests had prescribed in the previous case. The concern to atone for the violation of this temple was increased by the prodigies which were reported in etiam sub idem tempus pluribus locis nuntiata accenderunt. In Lucanis caelum arsisse adferebant, Priverni sereno per diem totum rubrum solem fuisse, 6 Lanuvi in [1] templo Sospitae Iunonis nocte strepitum ingentem exortum. Iam animalium obsceni fetus pluribus locis nuntiabantur: in Sabinis incertus infans natus, masculus an femina esset, alter sedecim 7 iam annorum item ambiguo sexu inventus; Frusinone agnus cum suillo capite, Sinuessae porcus cum capite humano natus, in Lucanis in agro publico eculeus cum 8 quinque pedibus. Foeda omnia et deformia errantisque in alienos fetus naturae visa; ante omnia abominati semimares iussique in mare extemplo deportari, sicut proxime C. Claudio M. Livio con- 9 sulibus deportatus similis prodigii fetus erat. Nihilo minus decemviros adire libros de portento eo iusserunt. Decemviri ex libris res divinas easdem quae proxime secundum id prodigium factae essent imperarunt. Carmen praeterea ab ter novenis virginibus cani per urbem iusserunt donumque Iunoni reginae ferri. 10 Ea uti fierent, C. Aurelius consul ex decemvirorum responso curavit. Carmen, sicut patrum memoria Livius, ita tum condidit P. Licinius Tegula.

a.u.c. 554

[1] Lanuvi in Weissenborn: lanuuii B.

---

[1] Consuls in 207 B.C. (XXVII. xxxvii. 6).

[2] A special college of priests entrusted with the guardianship and consultation of the ancient Sibylline Books, which were frequently appealed to for advice under circumstances like these.

[3] The number three has, as often, a ritualistic significance. Juno is propitiated as a goddess concerned with birth.

[4] Livius Andronicus, whose name stands at the head of the chronological list of Latin writers, wrote the earlier hymn referred to here (cf. XXVII. xxxvii. 7, 13, where Livy names numerous parts of the country at the same time. In B.C. 200 Lucania, flames in the sky were reported; at Privernum, the sun shone red throughout the day in clear weather; at Lanuvium, in the temple of Juno Sospita, a mighty noise was heard during the night. Further, dread forms of animals were reported in several places: among the Sabines, a child of uncertain sex was born, while another was found whose sex, at the age of sixteen, could not be determined. At Frusino there was born a lamb with a pig's head, at Sinuessa a pig with a man's head, on the public land in Lucania, a colt with five feet. All these disgusting and monstrous creatures seemed to be signs that nature was confusing species; but beyond all else the hermaphrodites caused terror, and they were ordered to be carried out to sea, as had been done with a similar monstrosity not long before in the consulship of Gaius Claudius and Marcus Livius.[1] Nevertheless, the decemvirs[2] were ordered to consult the Books regarding the portent. They, as a result of the investigation, ordered the same rites that had been performed when such a prodigy had appeared before. In addition, they directed that a hymn be sung throughout the city by thrice nine maidens, and that an offering be made to Queen Juno.[3] Gaius Aurelius the consul saw to the performance of these rites in accordance with the answer of the decemvirs. The hymn, composed in the memory of our fathers by Livius, was on this occasion written by Publius Licinius Tegula.[4] the poet and criticizes his style). The Licinius here named may be the same as the Licinius Imbrex who is said by Gellius (XIII. xxiii (xxii). 16) to have been a writer of comedies.

A.U.C. 554

XIII. Expiatis omnibus religionibus—nam etiam Locris sacrilegium pervestigatum ab Q. Minucio erat, pecuniaque ex bonis noxiorum in thensauros reposita—cum consules in provincias proficisci vellent, 2 privati frequentes, quibus ex pecunia quam M. Valerio M. Claudio consulibus mutuam dederant, tertia pensio debebatur eo anno, adierunt senatum, 3 quia consules, cum ad novum bellum, quod magna classe magnisque exercitibus gerendum esset, vix aerarium sufficeret, negaverant esse unde iis in 4 praesentia solveretur. Senatus querentes eos non sustinuit: si in Punicum bellum pecunia data in Macedonicum quoque bellum uti res publica vellet, aliis ex aliis orientibus bellis, quid aliud quam publicatam pro beneficio tamquam noxia [1] suam pecu- 5 niam fore? Cum et privati aequum postularent, nec tamen solvendo aere alieno res publica esset, 6 quod medium inter aequum et utile erat decreverunt, ut, quoniam magna pars eorum agros volgo venales esse diceret et sibimet emptis opus esse, agri publici qui intra quinquagesimum lapidem esset, copia iis 7 fieret: consules agrum aestimaturos et in iugera asses vectigal testandi causa publicum agrum esse imposi- 8 turos, ut si quis, cum solvere posset populus, pecuniam

[1] noxia Weissenborn: noxiam B.

[1] These citizens, in 210 B.C. (XXVI. xxxvi. 8), loaned money to the state for the prosecution of the war with Hannibal, although from Livy's account they gave rather than loaned the money. In 204 B.C. (XXIX. xvi. 1) an arrangement was made for repayment in three biennial instalments, the third of which would be due in 200 B.C. Nevertheless, a final payment (perhaps to those who did not accept the arrangement described in sects. 6–9 below) was made in 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xlii. 2).

[2] Since the value of the as was about two cents, or one penny, and the iugerum was about three-fifths of an acre, the

XIII. When all these scruples had been allayed— B.C. 200
for the sacrilege at Locri had been investigated by Quintus Minucius and the money replaced in the treasury out of the property of the guilty—and the consuls were on the point of leaving for their provinces, many private citizens, to whom was due this year the third payment on the loans made in the consulship of Marcus Valerius and Marcus Claudius,[1] appealed to the senate because the consuls had declared that, since the treasury hardly sufficed for the new war, which was to be waged with a great fleet and large armies, there was no money at their command with which to make the payment. The senate could not resist their complaints: If the state wished to use for the Macedonian war, the petitioners argued, the money loaned for the Punic war, since one conflict followed hard upon another, what else would be the result than the confiscation of their property in return for an act of generosity, as if it had been a crime? Since the request of these citizens was reasonable, and since nevertheless the state could not repay the loan, the senate took an action which was midway between justice and expediency, namely, that, since many of the creditors said that there was much land for sale, to purchase which cash was needed, the opportunity should be given them to receive public land lying within the fiftieth milestone; the consuls were to appraise this land and to impose an annual rental of one as per iugerum [2] by way of attesting that this was public land; consequently, if anyone, when the state should be in funds, rental was purely nominal and was imposed to prevent the transfer of the title to this land to the individual; this permitted the later optional settlement described below.

A.U.C. 554

habere quam agrum mallet, restitueret agrum populo.
9 Laeti eam condicionem privati accepere; trientabulumque is ager, quia pro tertia parte pecuniae datus erat, appellatus.

XIV. Tum P. Sulpicius secundum vota in Capitolio nuncupata paludatis lictoribus profectus ab urbe
2 Brundisium venit et veteribus militibus voluntariis ex Africano exercitu in legiones discriptis navibusque ex classe Cn. Cornelii electis altero die quam a
3 Brundisio solvit in Macedoniam traiecit. Ibi ei praesto fuere Atheniensium legati orantes ut se obsidione eximeret. Missus extemplo Athenas est C. Claudius Cento cum viginti longis navibus et mille
4 militum. Neque enim ipse rex Athenas obsidebat; eo maxime tempore Abydum oppugnabat, iam cum Rhodiis et Attalo navalibus certaminibus, neutro
5 feliciter proelio, vires expertus; sed animos ei faciebat praeter ferociam insitam foedus ictum cum Antiocho, Syriae rege, divisaeque iam cum eo Aegypti opes, cui morte audita Ptolomaei regis ambo imminebant.

---

[1] One might expect paludatus cum lictoribus; I have however retained the reading of the MSS.: cf. XLI. x. 5; 7; 13; XLV. xxxix. 11 (in the first of these Gronovius conjectured paludatus sine lictoribus), in which the same phrase occurs.

[2] Livy's elliptical neque enim suggests that if Philip had been before Athens a larger relief expedition would have been necessary.

[3] Livy here summarizes the activities of Philip during the campaign of 200 B.C. before the arrival of Sulpicius in the late summer or early autumn of that year. He resumes the narrative dealing with Sulpicius in xxii. 4 below.

[4] Philip's attack upon this famous city on the Hellespont was part of the aggressive campaign against the Greek cities on should prefer money to the land, he could restore the land to the people. The creditors gladly accepted this offer, and the land was called "trientabulum" because it was allotted in discharge of one-third of the debts. B.C. 200

XIV. Thereupon Publius Sulpicius, after the announcement of the vows on the Capitoline, left the city with his lictors in uniform,[1] arrived at Brundisium and there, enrolling in the legions veteran volunteers from the African army and selecting ships from the fleet of Gnaeus Cornelius, he arrived in Macedonia the second day after he set sail from Brundisium. There Athenian ambassadors met him, begging that he release them from siege. He at once sent to Athens Gaius Claudius Cento with twenty warships and a thousand soldiers. For [2] the king [3] himself was not conducting the siege of Athens, but was principally occupied with the attack on Abydus,[4] and was now trying his strength in naval battles with the Rhodians and Attalus, in neither case with conspicuous success; however, his spirits were kept up, partly by his naturally impetuous disposition, partly by a treaty [5] which he had concluded with Antiochus, king of Syria, according to which the wealth of Egypt, which both coveted when they heard of the death of King Ptolemy, was soon to be divided between them.

the islands and in Asia Minor, some of which were free, while others belonged to the Ptolemies, whose empire he had agreed with Antiochus (see below) to dismember. His policy threatened both Pergamum and Rhodes (cf. the Introductory Note) and brought them into the war.

[5] Cf. Polyb. III. ii. 8. The death of Ptolemy Philopator (cf. the note on ii. 3 above) gave Philip and Antiochus their apparent opportunity to expand at the expense of the boy Epiphanes. The treaty was probably made in 203 B.C.

A.U.C. 554

6 Contraxerant autem sibi cum Philippo bellum Athenienses haudquaquam digna causa, dum ex
7 vetere fortuna nihil praeter animos servant. Acarnanes duo iuvenes per initiorum dies non initiati templum Cereris imprudentes religionis cum cetera
8 turba ingressi sunt. Facile eos sermo prodidit absurde quaedam percunctantes,[1] deductique ad antistites templi, cum palam esset per errorem ingressos,
9 tamquam ob infandum scelus interfecti sunt. Id tam foede atque hostiliter factum gens Acarnanum ad Philippum detulit impetravitque ab eo ut datis Macedonum auxiliis bellum se inferre Atheniensibus
10 pateretur. Hic exercitus primo terram Atticam ferro ignique depopulatus cum omnis generis praeda in Acarnaniam rediit. Et irritatio quidem animorum ea prima fuit; postea iustum bellum decretis civitatis 11 ultro indicendo factum. Attalus enim rex Rhodiique persecuti cedentem in Macedoniam Philippum cum Aeginam venissent, rex Piraeum renovandae confirmandaeque cum Atheniensibus societatis causa
12 traiecit. Civitas omnis obviam effusa cum coniugibus

[1] percunctantes ς: percontatis B: percontatos B^2.

[1] Livy here summarizes briefly and somewhat inaccurately the events leading up to Roman intervention in the east. In 201 B.C., in consequence of the treaty mentioned in sect. 5 above, Philip had begun operations against the Egyptian possessions in Thrace, northern Asia Minor, and the Cyclades. This brought him into conflict with Pergamum, already allied with Athens, and with Rhodes. At the approach of winter he had withdrawn to Europe, after a campaign somewhat more successful than Livy's account intimates. Athens was not immediately involved in this war, but was embroiled with

Now the Athenians[1] had undertaken the war against Philip for no sufficient reason, since they retained nothing of their ancient greatness except their spirit. Two young men from Acarnania,[2] during the celebration of the mysteries at Eleusis, though not initiated, had entered the temple of Ceres, ignorant that they were committing a sacrilege, and merely following the crowd. Their words easily betrayed them, since they asked foolish questions, and though it was clear that they had come in openly and by mistake they were put to death as if they had committed some heinous crime. The Acarnanians reported this revolting and unfriendly act to Philip, and prevailed upon him to send them Macedonian aid and permit them to attack Athens. This army at first laid waste Attica with fire and sword and returned to Acarnania laden with every kind of booty. This was the original provocation; later regular war was declared and waged by decree of the state after formal notification. Now when King Attalus and the Rhodians had arrived at Aegina in pursuit of Philip, who was retiring to Macedonia, Attalus crossed to Piraeus to renew and confirm his alliance with the Athenians.[3] The whole body of citizens,[4] with their wives and B.C. 200

Philip in the manner described in the following sections. The alignment is then: Philip and the Aetolian League vs. Athens, Pergamum, Rhodes, Rome. Antiochus, allied with both Rome and Philip, was not involved directly, nor was Ptolemy, allied with Rome, although Philip's attack on his possessions precipitated the war.

[2] Acarnania, in the north-west, was a part of the Aetolian League.

[3] See, for this alliance, XXIX. xii. 14.

[4] Polybius (XVI. xxv. 5) similarly describes this scene.

A.U.C. 554

ac liberis, sacerdotes cum insignibus suis intrantem urbem ac di prope ipsi exciti sedibus suis acceperunt.

XV. In contionem extemplo populus vocatus, ut rex quae vellet coram ageret; deinde ex dignitate magis visum scribere eum de quibus videretur, quam praesentem aut referendis suis in civitatem beneficiis erubescere aut significationibus adclamationibusque multitudinis adsentatione immodica pudorem onerantis. In litteris autem, quae missae in contionem recitataeque sunt, commemoratio erat beneficiorum primum in civitatem suorum, deinde rerum quas adversus Philippum gessisset, ad postremum adhortatio capessendi belli, dum se, dum Rhodios, tum quidem dum etiam Romanos haberent: nequiquam postea, si tum cessassent, praetermissam occasionem quaesituros. Rhodii deinde legati auditi sunt; quorum recens erat beneficium, quod naves longas quattuor Atheniensium, captas nuper ab Macedonibus recuperatasque, remiserant. Itaque ingenti consensu bellum adversus Philippum decretum. Honores regi primum Attalo immodici, deinde et Rhodiis habiti. Tum primum mentio inlata de tribu quam Attalida appellarent, ad decem veteres tribus

---

[1] This is not confirmed by other testimony.

[2] Livy's statement, if properly understood, is correct so far as it goes, but might be misleading unless supplemented by the facts which have been ascertained in recent years from the evidence furnished by the Attic inscriptions. The original ten tribes of Clisthenes were increased to twelve in 307/6 by the creation of Antigonas and Demetrias and to thirteen by the creation of Ptolemais between 229/8 and 222/1 (probably in 224/3 or 226/5). But in the early part of 201/0 Antigonis and Demetrias had been abolished, leaving eleven tribes. This number was therefore increased to twelve when Attalis was added in the latter part of 201/0. I owe children, poured out to meet him; the priests in their B.C. 200 vestments and the very gods, so to speak, starting up from their thrones, welcomed him as he entered the city.

XV. The citizens were at once summoned to an assembly, that the king might declare publicly what he desired; then it seemed more consonant with his dignity that he should write his message, on whatever matters he pleased, than deliver it in person and be embarrassed by his own recital of his services to the state or by the extravagant applause and eulogies of the crowd, which would overwhelm his modesty with its uncontrolled adulation. The letter which was sent and read to the assembly contained, first, a review of his acts of generosity towards Athens; second, an account of the campaigns he had carried on against Philip, and, lastly, an exhortation to undertake the war against Philip while they had him, the Rhodians, and now particularly the Romans also as allies; in vain, later on, if they now hesitated, would they seek to grasp the opportunity they had let slip. The Rhodian envoys were next heard, whose recent display of good-will had consisted in sending back four Athenian war-vessels which had, not long before, been captured by the Macedonians and recovered.[1] So by a roar of voices war was declared on Philip. Extravagant honours were conferred first upon Attalus and then upon the Rhodians as well. At this time occurs the first mention of the tribe which they called "Attalis," to be added to the ten old tribes.[2] The people of this exact statement to the kindness of Mr. Sterling Dow, who refers to W. S. Ferguson, Hellenistic Athens and W. B. Dinsmoor, The Archons of Athens.

A.U.C. 554

addenda, et Rhodiorum populus corona aurea virtutis
7 ergo donatus, civitasque Rhodiis data, quem ad modum
8 Rhodii prius Atheniensibus dederant. Secundum haec rex Attalus Aeginam ad classem se recipit; Rhodii Ciam ab Aegina, inde per insulas Rhodum navigarunt omnibus praeter Andrum Parumque et Cythnum, quae praesidiis Macedonum tenebantur, 9 in societatem acceptis. Attalum Aeginae missi in Aetoliam nuntii expectatique inde legati aliquamdiu
10 nihil agentem tenuere. Sed neque illos excire ad arma potuit, gaudentes utcumque composita cum Philippo pace, et ipse Rhodiique, cum, si institissent Philippo, egregium liberatae per se Graeciae titulum 11 habere potuissent, patiendo rursus eum in Hellespontum traicere occupantemque Thraeciae[1] opportuna loca vires colligere bellum aluere gloriamque eius gesti perfectique Romanis concesserunt.

XVI. Philippus magis regio animo est usus; qui
2 cum Attalum Rhodiosque hostes non sustinuisset, ne Romano quidem quod imminebat bello territus Philocle quodam ex praefectis suis cum duobus milibus peditum equitibus ducentis ad populandos
3 Atheniensium agros misso, classe tradita Heraclidi, ut Maroneam peteret, ipse terra eodem cum expeditis

[1] Thraeciae Weissenborn: graeciae B.

[1] There was an alliance between Pergamum and the Aetolians: cf. XXVII. xxix. 10.

[2] See note on i. 8 above.

[3] At this point Livy begins the narrative of Philip's campaign of 200 B.C. against the possessions of Ptolemy in Thrace

Rhodes, moreover, was presented with a golden crown, B.C. 200
the symbol of valour, and the Athenian citizenship was given the Rhodians, just as they had previously granted the same distinction to the Athenians. After this Attalus rejoined his fleet at Aegina; the Rhodians went back from Aegina to Cia, thence to Rhodes by way of the islands, receiving into their alliance all of them but Andros, Paros and Cythnos, which were held by Macedonian garrisons. Attalus was kept idle for some time in Aegina, by sending messengers to Aetolia[1] and waiting for ambassadors from there. But he could not induce them to declare war, since they felt satisfaction at the composition—however accomplished—of their difficulties with Philip;[2] and Attalus and the Rhodians, although, if they had pressed their campaign against Philip, they might have won the fair fame of having liberated Greece, by permitting him to cross again to the Hellespont and to increase his army by the occupation of strongholds in Thrace, protracted the war and left to the Romans the glory of conducting and finishing it.

XVI. Philip displayed a spirit that more befitted a king.[3] Though he had not withstood Attalus and the Rhodians, he was unterrified even by the threatening war with Rome. Sending Philocles, one of his prefects, with two thousand infantry and two hundred horse to harry the Athenian country, and entrusting a fleet to Heraclides, that he might proceed to Maronea, he himself set out by land to that place with two thousand light-armed infantry (sects. 3–4) and the Thracian Chersonesus, to the north-west of the Hellespont (sects. 5 ff.). These events precede the arrival of the Romans in Greece (xiv. 2 above).

A.U.C. 554

duobus milibus peditum equitibus ducentis pergit. 4 Et Maroneam quidem primo impetu expugnavit; Aenum inde cum magno labore obsedit, postremo per proditionem Callimedis, praefecti Ptolomaei, cepit. Deinceps alia castella, Cypsela et Doriscon 5 et Serrheum, occupat. Inde progressus ad Chersonesum Elaeunta et Alopeconnesum tradentibus ipsis recipit; Callipolis quoque et Madytus dedita et 6 castella quaedam ignobilia; Abydeni ne legatis quidem admissis regi portas clauserunt. Ea oppugnatio diu Philippum tenuit, eripique ex obsidione, ni cessatum ab Attalo et Rhodiis foret, potuerunt. 7 Attalus trecentos tantum milites in praesidium, Rhodii quadriremem unam ex classe, cum ad Tenedum 8 staret, miserunt. Eodem postea, cum iam vix sustinerent obsidionem, et ipse Attalus cum traiecisset, spem tantum auxilii ex propinquo ostendit neque terra neque mari adiutis sociis.

XVII. Abydeni primo tormentis per muros dispositis non terra modo adeuntes aditu arcebant, sed navium quoque stationem infestam hosti faciebant; 2 postea, cum et muri pars strata ruinis et ad interiorem raptim oppositum murum cuniculis iam perventum esset, legatos ad regem de condicionibus tradendae 3 urbis miserunt. Paciscebantur autem ut Rhodiam quadriremem cum sociis navalibus Attalique praesidium emitti liceret atque ipsis urbe excedere cum

---

[1] See xiv. 4 above and the note.

[2] Livy seems to have borrowed the following account from Polybius (XVI. xxx–xxxiv).

and two hundred cavalry. And Maronea, indeed, B.C. 200
he took at the first assault; Aenus then, after great labour in besieging it, he finally captured through the treachery of Callimedes, the prefect of Ptolemy. Next he occupied other fortresses, Cypsela, Doriscus, and Serrheum. Proceeding thence toward the Chersonesus, he received in voluntary submission Elaeus and Alopeconnesus. Callipolis too and Madytus were surrendered, and some unimportant strongholds. The people of Abydus,[1] not even admitting his ambassadors, closed their gates against the king. This siege delayed Philip a long time, and the people could have been quickly relieved of the siege if Attalus and the Rhodians had not delayed. Attalus sent only three hundred soldiers for the garrison, the Rhodians one quadrireme from the fleet, although it was lying off Tenedos. Later, the city being by that time scarce able to resist the siege, when Attalus in person arrived there, he gave only the hope of aid from near by, but did not help the allies by either land or sea.

XVII. The citizens of Abydus[2] at first, placing their artillery along the walls, not only on land denied approach to the assaulting parties, but rendered the anchorage of the fleet dangerous to the enemy; later, when part of the rampart had been laid in ruins, and, in addition, mines had been driven almost to the inner wall which had been hastily constructed, they sent ambassadors to the king regarding terms of surrender for the city. They proposed, however, that they be allowed to send away the Rhodian quadrireme with the naval allies, and the garrison of Attalus, and that they be permitted to leave the city with one garment each.

A.U.C. 554

4 singulis vestimentis. Quibus cum Philippus nihil pacati nisi omnia permittentibus respondisset, adeo renuntiata haec legatio ab indignatione simul ac
5 desperatione iram accendit, ut ad Saguntinam rabiem versi matronas omnes in templo Dianae, pueros ingenuos virginesque, infantes etiam cum suis
6 nutricibus in gymnasium includi iuberent, aurum et argentum in forum deferri, vestem pretiosam in naves Rhodiam Cyzicenamque quae in portu erant coici, sacerdotes victimasque adduci et altaria in 7 medio poni. Ibi delecti primum qui, ubi caesam aciem suorum pro diruto muro pugnantem vidissent, extemplo coniuges liberosque interficerent, aurum argentum vestemque quae in navibus esset in mare
8 deicerent, tectis publicis privatisque, quam plurimis
9 locis possent, ignes subicerent; id se facinus perpetraturos praeeuntibus execrabile carmen sacerdotibus iureiurando adacti; tum militaris aetas iurat
10 neminem vivum nisi victorem acie excessurum. Hi memores deorum adeo pertinaciter pugnaverunt ut, cum proelium nox diremptura esset, rex prior,
11 territus rabie eorum, pugna abstiterit. Principes, quibus atrocior pars facinoris delegata erat, cum paucos et confectos vulneribus ac lassitudine superesse proelio cernerent, luce prima sacerdotes cum infulis ad urbem dedendam Philippo mittunt.

XVIII. Ante deditionem ex iis legatis qui Alexandream missi erant, M. Aemilius trium consensu, [1] Such a formula invoked a curse upon anyone who failed to carry out whatever order had been given.

[2] See ii. 3 above.

When Philip answered them that there would be no peace without their unconditional surrender, the message when reported kindled such passion, arising from anger and despair together, that, imitating the madness of the Saguntines, they ordered all the matrons to be shut up in the temple of Diana, the free-born boys and maidens and even the young babes with their nurses in the gymnasium, the gold and silver to be collected in the market-place and the valuable garments to be placed on the Rhodian and Cyzicene ships which were in the harbour, the priests and victims to be brought and the altars erected for sacrifice. Then they chose certain men who, when they saw their soldiers slaughtered as they fought before the ruined wall, were forthwith to slay their wives and children, throw into the sea all the gold, silver and garments which were in the ships, and set fire to the public and private buildings in every possible place. This crime they bound themselves by oath to commit, while the priests dictated to them the formula of execration.[1] The soldiers then swore that no one would leave the battle-line alive except as victor, and they, mindful of the gods, fought so courageously that, when night was about to end the battle, the king was the first to retire from the field, in fear of their madness. The chiefs, to whom the more cruel part in the crime had been assigned, when they saw only a few surviving the battle, and these exhausted by wounds and weariness, at daybreak sent the priests, wearing their fillets, to surrender the city to Philip. B.C. 200

XVIII. Before the surrender, Marcus Aemilius, the youngest of the three ambassadors[2] who had been sent to Alexandria, hearing of the siege of minimus natu, audita obsidione Abydenorum ad Philippum venit. Qui questus Attalo Rhodiisque

A.U.C. 554

2 arma inlata, et quod tum maxime Abydum oppugnaret, cum rex ab Attalo et Rhodiis ultro se bello lacessitum diceret, " num Abydeni quoque " inquit
3 " ultro tibi intulerunt arma? " Insueto vera audire ferocior oratio visa est quam quae habenda apud regem esset. " Aetas " inquit " et forma et super
4 omnia Romanum nomen te ferociorem facit. Ego autem primum velim vos foederum memores servare mecum pacem; sin bello lacessitis, mihi quoque animos [1] facere et regnum et Macedonum nomen
5 haud minus quam Romanum nobile sentietis." Ita dimisso legato Philippus auro argento quaeque coacervata alia erant accepto [2] hominum praedam
6 omnem amisit. Tanta enim rabies multitudinem invasit ut repente, proditos rati, qui pugnantes mortem occubuissent periuriumque alius alii exprobantes et sacerdotibus maxime, qui, quos ad mortem devovissent, eorum deditionem vivorum hosti fecis-
7 sent, repente omnes ad caedem coniugum liberorumque discurrerent seque ipsi per omnes vias leti interficerent. Obstupefactus eo furore rex suppressit impetum militum et triduum se ad moriendum

[1] animos Madvig: animo est B.

[2] The reading of B, accepto, is retained, although the inserted clause quaeque . . . erant makes the construction harsh.

---

[1] See the similar dialogue quoted by Polybius (XVI. xxxiv. 5); Polybius adds that Aemilius was the handsomest man of his time.

[2] According to Justin (XXX. iii. 3–4), the ambassadors carried instructions to Antiochus and Philip to keep their hands off Egypt, and Aemilius was designated to act as a quasi-

Abydus, came to Philip with the consent of his B.C. 200 colleagues. He protested against the attack on Attalus and the Rhodians, and because Philip was at that very moment besieging Abydus, and when the king replied that Attalus and the Rhodians had made an unprovoked attack upon him, Aemilius asked, "Did the people of Abydus also take up arms against you, unprovoked?" This speech seemed to the king, who was unused to hearing the truth, too arrogant for delivery in the royal presence. "Your age," he replied, "your good looks,[1] and, above all, the Roman name, make you too arrogant. I should myself prefer first that you remember the treaties and keep the peace with me; but if you attack me in war, you will find that I too have the resolution to make both the kingdom and the name of Macedonia no less renowned than those of Rome." Thus dismissing the envoy,[2] Philip took possession of all the gold, silver, and other accumulated treasure, but lost all the human booty. For such madness laid hold of the people that all at once, thinking that those who had fallen in the fight had met death from treachery, each reproaching another's perjury, and especially that of the priests, who had delivered alive to the enemy those whom they had consecrated to death, they hastily ran to kill their wives and children and then themselves sought death by every path. The king, astounded by this frenzy, checked the assaults of his soldiers and announced that he would give the guardian to the young Ptolemy. For the alliance between Egypt and Rome see XXVII. iv. 10. Livy has abridged his account of the embassy's activities, but it should be remembered that the embassy left Rome before the declaration of war upon Philip.

A.U.C. 554

8 Abydenis dare dixit. Quo spatio plura facinora in se victi ediderunt quam infesti edidissent victores, nec, nisi quem vincula aut alia necessitas mori prohibuit, quisquam vivus in potestatem venit. Philip-
9 pus imposito Abydi praesidio in regnum rediit. Cum velut Sagunti excidium Hannibali, sic Philippo Abydenorum clades ad Romanum bellum animos fecisset, nuntii occurrerunt consulem iam in Epiro esse et Apolloniam terrestres copias, navales Corcyram in hiberna deduxisse.

XIX. Inter haec legatis, qui in Africam missi erant, de Hamilcare, Gallici exercitus duce,[1] responsum a Carthaginiensibus est nihil ultra se facere posse quam ut exilio eum multarent, bona eius publi-
2 carent; perfugas et fugitivos, quos inquirendo vestigare potuerint, reddidisse et de ea re missuros legatos Romam qui senatui satisfacerent. Ducenta milia modium tritici Romam, ducenta ad exercitum
3 in Macedoniam miserunt. Inde in Numidiam ad reges profecti legati. Dona data Masinissae mandataque edita. Equites mille Numidae, cum duo
4 milia daret, accepti. Ipse in naves imponendos curavit et cum ducentis milibus modium tritici,

[1] duce edd.: rege B.

[1] Livy here abandons Polybius and returns to his usual sources, the works of one or more annalists. Since the military year, which began when conditions permitted active operations, the civil year, which began on March 15, and the calendar year did not coincide, Livy has a good deal of difficulty in adjusting his material to his plan of composition. The events related in chaps. xv–xviii preceded Sulpicius' arrival in the east (xiv.

Abydenians three days in which to die. In this time B.C. 200 the conquered did themselves more violence than they would have suffered from their enraged conquerors, and no living man fell into Philip's hands save those whom chains or some other constraint forbade to die. Philip, leaving a garrison at Abydus, returned to his kingdom. When, as Hannibal's destruction of Saguntum had aroused the Romans to war against him, so now the slaughter of the people of Abydus had roused them against Philip, word came that the Roman consul was already in Epirus and had sent his army to Apollonia and his fleet to Corcyra to winter.[1]

XIX. In the meantime, the ambassadors who had been sent to Africa had been informed by the Carthaginians that, regarding Hamilcar, the leader of the Gallic army, they could do nothing but declare him an outlaw and confiscate his property; as to the deserters and fugitives, they had already sent back all they could find after search, and would send an embassy to Rome to give satisfaction to the senate on that point. They sent two hundred thousand modii[2] of wheat to Rome and the same quantity to the army in Macedonia. The embassy then proceeded to Numidia, where they delivered their gifts and messages to Masinissa. When the king offered them two thousand Numidian cavalry, they accepted one thousand. The king himself supervised their embarkation and sent them to Macedonia with two

2 above), and we are now ready for his campaign. But since he reached Greece only in time to go into winter quarters, Livy turns aside to narrate events in Rome in the later months of 200 B.C.

[2] The modius was the practical equivalent of the peck, and equalled one-sixth of the Greek medimnus.

a.u.c. 554 ducentis hordei in Macedoniam misit. Tertia legatio 5 ad Verminam erat. Is ad primos fines regni legatis obviam progressus, ut scriberent ipsi quas vellent 6 pacis condiciones permisit: omnem pacem bonam iustamque fore sibi cum populo Romano. Datae leges pacis, iussusque ad eam confirmandam mittere legatos Romam.

XX. Per idem tempus L. Cornelius Lentulus pro
2 consule ex Hispania rediit. Qui cum in senatu res ab se per multos annos fortiter feliciterque gestas exposuisset postulassetque ut triumphanti sibi invehi 3 liceret in urbem, res triumpho dignas esse censebat senatus, sed exemplum a maioribus non accepisse ut qui neque dictator neque consul neque praetor res 4 gessisset triumpharet: pro consule illum Hispaniam provinciam, non consulem aut praetorem obtinuisse.
5 Decurrebatur tamen eo, ut ovans urbem iniret, intercedente Ti. Sempronio Longo tribuno plebis, qui nihilo magis id more maiorum aut ullo exemplo 6 futurum diceret. Postremo victus consensu patrum tribunus cessit, et ex senatus consulto L. Lentulus

---

[1] Since 206 B.C. (XXVIII. xxxviii. 1).

[2] An anachronism is involved in the use of the word proconsul to translate the phrase pro consule. After the time of Sulla consuls and praetors served in administrative and judicial capacities in Rome during their terms of office, but without exercising imperium (cf. the note on iii. 2 above), and were then sent out as proconsuls and propraetors, with the imperium, to govern the territorial provinces. They were thus eligible for triumphs. In the third century, even private citizens, in cases of emergency, could be commissioned to act pro consule, pro praetore, i.e. as substitutes for magistrates. Not being a regularly elected magistrate, exercising command under hundred thousand modii of wheat and as much B.C. 200

barley. The third errand was to Vermina, who met the ambassadors at the frontier and left it to them to lay down terms of peace satisfactory to Rome, while for his own part he promised to maintain a just and lawful peace with the Roman people. The conditions of peace were imposed, and he was instructed to send an embassy to Rome to ratify them.

XX. At the same time Lucius Cornelius Lentulus the proconsul returned from Spain. When he had given the senate an account of his vigorous and successful administration, extending over many years,[1] and had asked that he be permitted to enter Rome in triumph, the senate decreed that his achievements deserved the honour, but that there was no precedent handed down from antiquity that one who had not been in command as dictator or consul or praetor should celebrate a triumph. He had held the province of Spain as proconsul [2] and not as consul or praetor. Nevertheless, it was proposed that he enter the city in ovation,[3] though the tribune Tiberius Sempronius Longus objected that this would be no more in accordance with ancestral custom or any precedent. Finally, prevailed upon by the general agreement of the senators, the tribune withdrew his veto, and Lucius Cornelius, by authority of the auspices which he had himself taken, such a person could not be granted a triumph. Scipio had had the same experience in 206 B.C. (XXVIII. xxxviii. 4), although he had cleared Spain of Carthaginian troops.

[3] An ovation was a minor dignity conferred on commanders who were adjudged undeserving of triumphs. The conditions of eligibility were probably identical with those for a triumph, and the tribune's position seems to have been technically correct.

A.U.C. 554

7 ovans urbem est ingressus. Argenti tulit ex praeda quadraginta tria milia pondo, auri duo milia quadringenta quinquaginta. Militibus ex praeda centenos vicenos asses divisit.

XXI. Iam exercitus consularis ab Arretio Ariminum transductus erat et quinque milia socium Latini
2 nominis ex Gallia in Etruriam transierant. Itaque L. Furius, magnis itineribus ab Arimino adversus Gallos Cremonam etiam tum obsidentes profectus, castra mille quingentorum passuum intervallo ab
3 hoste posuit. Occasio egregie rei gerendae fuit, si protinus de via ad castra oppugnanda duxisset;
4 palati passim vagabantur per agros nullo satis firmo relicto praesidio. Lassitudini militum pepercit,
5 quod raptim ductum agmen erat. Galli clamore suorum ex agris revocati, omissa praeda quae in manibus erat, castra repetivere, et postero die in aciem progressi; nec Romanus moram pugnandi
6 fecit. Sed vix spatium instruendi fuit; eo cursu
7 hostes in proelium venerunt. Dextra ala—in alas divisum socialem exercitum habebat—in prima acie locata est, in subsidiis duae Romanae legiones.
8 M. Furius dextrae alae, legionibus M. Caecilius, equitibus L. Valerius Flaccus—legati omnes erant—praepositi. Praetor secum duos legatos, C. Laetori-
9 um et P. Titinium, habebat, cum quibus circumspicere et obire ad omnes hostium subitos conatus
10 posset. Primo Galli omni multitudine in unum locum

[1] The ala was a normal unit of organization among the allied troops. Perhaps because the allies were often posted on the flanks, with the Roman infantry in the centre, such units were sometimes designated "right" and "left." But the meaning here is uncertain.

[2] See the note on iii. 4 above.

senate, was allowed to enter the city in ovation. He B.C. 200 brought home forty-three thousand pounds of silver and two thousand four hundred and fifty pounds of gold from the booty, and presented to each of his soldiers a sum amounting to one hundred and twenty asses.

XXI. The consular army had now moved from Arretium to Ariminum, and five thousand allies of the Latin confederacy from Gaul to Etruria. Therefore Lucius Furius proceeded by forced marches from Ariminum against the Gauls who were still besieging Cremona, and bivouacked about a mile and a half from the enemy. There was an excellent chance for a victory if he had attacked their camp immediately after his march; the Gauls had scattered through the neighbourhood without leaving a strong guard on duty. But Furius spared his weary troops because he had made a strenuous march. The Gauls, called back by the shouts of their comrades, dropped the booty which they had in hand and hurried back to their camp. The next day they moved out in battle-array, nor did the Roman refuse the engagement. But the Romans had barely time to form in line, with such speed did the enemy advance to the attack. The right squadron[1]—he had the allied army divided into squadrons—occupied the front line, with two Roman legions in reserve. Commanders were designated: Marcus Furius of the right squadron, Marcus Caecilius of the legions, Lucius Valerius Flaccus of the cavalry—all were lieutenants.[2] The praetor kept with him two lieutenants, Gaius Laetorius and Publius Titinius, by whose aid he planned to watch the whole engagement and meet all sudden attacks of the enemy. At first the Gauls hoped, concentrating the mass of their conixi obruere atque obterere sese dextram alam, 11 quae prima erat, sperarunt posse. Ubi id parum procedebat, circuire a cornibus et amplecti hostium aciem, quod multitudine adversus paucos facile

A.U.C. 554

12 videbatur, conati sunt. Id ubi vidit praetor, ut et ipse dilataret aciem, duas legiones ex subsidiis dextra laevaque alae, quae in prima acie pugnabat, circumdat aedemque Diiovi [1] vovit, si eo die hostes fudisset.
13 L. Valerio imperat ut parte una duarum legionum equites, altera sociorum equitatum in cornua hostium
14 emittat nec circuire eos aciem patiatur; simul et ipse, ut extenuatam mediam diductis cornibus aciem Gallorum vidit, signa inferre confertos milites et 15 perrumpere ordines iubet. Et cornua ab equitibus et medii a pedite pulsi. Ac repente, cum in omni parte caede ingenti sternerentur, Galli terga verte-16 runt fugaque effusa repetunt castra. Fugientes persecutus eques; mox et legiones insecutae in 17 castra impetum fecerunt. Minus sex milia hominum inde effugerunt; caesa aut capta supra quinque et triginta milia cum signis militaribus septuaginta, carpentis Gallicis multa praeda oneratis plus ducentis.
18 Hamilcar, dux Poenus, eo proelio cecidit et tres imperatores nobiles Gallorum. Placentini captivi, ad duo milia liberorum capitum, redditi colonis.

XXII. Magna victoria laetaque Romae fuit.
2 Litteris adlatis supplicatio in triduum decreta est. Romanorum sociorumque ad duo milia eo proelio

[1] Diiovi Valesius: deoioui B.

[1] Livy (XXXIV. liii. 7) records the dedication of a temple to Jupiter vowed by Furius. The name of the divinity here reported may be corrupt.

[2] Another version of the fate of Hamilcar is related at XXXII. xxx. 12 and XXXIII. xxiii. 5.

force on one place, to be able to overwhelm and B.C. 200 destroy the right squadron which was in the van. When this did not succeed, they tried to outflank and envelop the enemy's line, a plan which seemed easy on account of their great numbers arrayed against a few. When the praetor saw this, that he too might extend his front, he threw in two legions from his reserves on the right and left flanks of the front-line force and vowed a temple to Diiovis if he routed the enemy on that day.[1] He ordered Lucius Valerius to send the cavalry of two legions to one side against the flank of the enemy and to the other the allied cavalry, and not to allow the enemy to envelop his lines. Seeing too that the Gallic centre was weakened by the extension of the line, at the same time he gave his men the order to charge in mass formation and to break through, and the flanks were thrown back by the cavalry, the centre by the infantry. The Gauls, suffering heavy losses in every quarter, suddenly broke and in complete rout fled to their camp. The cavalry pursued them in their flight, and presently the legions too followed and stormed the camp. Less than six thousand Gauls escaped; more than thirty-five thousand were killed or captured, along with seventy standards and more than two hundred Gallic wagons laden with abundant spoils. Hamilcar[2] the Carthaginian general and three noble Gallic commanders fell in the battle. About two thousand of the captives from Placentia were recovered and restored to the colonists.

XXII. This great victory brought joy to Rome, and when the news came a thanksgiving of three days was proclaimed. About two thousand of the Romans and allies perished in that battle, most of them from ceciderunt, plurimi dextrae alae, in quam primo

A.U.C. 554

3 impetu vis hostium ingens inlata est. Quamquam per praetorem prope debellatum erat, consul quoque C. Aurelius, perfectis quae Romae agenda fuerant, profectus in Galliam victorem exercitum a praetore accepit.

4 Consul alter cum autumno ferme exacto in pro-
5 vinciam venisset, circa Apolloniam hibernabat. Ab classe quae Corcyrae subducta erat, C. Claudius triremesque Romanae, sicut ante dictum est, Athenas missae cum Piraeum pervenissent, despondentibus
6 iam animos sociis spem ingentem attulerant. Nam et terrestres ab Corintho quae per Megara incursiones in agros fieri solitae erant non fiebant, et praedonum a Chalcide naves, quae non mare solum
7 infestum, sed etiam omnes maritimos agros Atheniensibus fecerant, non modo Sunium superare sed ne extra fretum Euripum committere aperto mari se 8 audebant. Supervenerunt his tres Rhodiae quadriremes, et erant Atticae tres apertae naves, ad tuendos maritimos agros comparatae. Hac classe si urbs agrique Atheniensium defenderentur, satis in praesentia existimanti Claudio esse maioris etiam rei fortuna oblata est.

XXIII. Exules ab Chalcide, regiorum iniuriis pulsi, attulerunt occupari Chalcidem sine certamine 2 ullo posse; nam et Macedonas, quia nullus in propinquo sit hostium metus, vagari passim, et oppidanos,

---

[1] We return to Greece and continue the narrative of the end of the year 200 B.C. and the following spring, interrupted at chap. xix; cf. the note on xviii. 9 above.

[2] Chalcis in Euboea, Demetrias in Thessaly, and Corinth in Achaea were the three "fetters" of Greece XXXII. xxxvii.

the right squadron, against which at the first attack B.C. 200
the enemy's main effort had been directed. Although the war had been practically ended by the praetor, the consul Gaius Aurelius, having transacted the necessary business in Rome, also set out for Gaul and took over the victorious army from the praetor.

The other consul,[1] having arrived in his province near the end of autumn, was wintering around Apollonia. From the fleet which was moored at Corcyra, Gaius Claudius and the Roman triremes, as has been related, had been sent to Athens, and when they arrived at Piraeus they had inspired great hopes in the allies who were now in despair. For the customary raids on the fields which were made by land from Corinth by way of Megara were stopped, and the ships of the pirates from Chalcis,[2] which had made both the sea and the farm-lands on the coast dangerous for the Athenians, not only would not venture past Sunium, but did not dare to enter the open sea beyond the strait of Euripus. In addition to these, three Rhodian quadriremes arrived, and there were three Athenian vessels without protecting decks, assembled to defend the lands on the coast. Just as Claudius had made up his mind that it was sufficient for the present if the city and fields of the Athenians could be guarded with this fleet, an opportunity for a greater feat was presented to him.

XXIII. Exiles from Chalcis, driven out by the violence of Philip's garrison, brought the news that Chalcis could be captured without any opposition: for the Macedonians, because there was no fear of an enemy near by, were straggling about the country,

3–4). This campaign and Philip's retaliation well illustrate the vague strategy of both sides in this war.

a.u.c. 554 praesidio Macedonum fretos, custodiam urbis
3 neglegere. His auctoribus profectus, quamquam Sunium ita mature pervenerat ut inde provehi ad primas angustias Euboeae posset, ne superato promuntorio conspiceretur, classem in statione usque 4 ad noctem tenuit; primis tenebris movit et tranquillo pervectus Chalcidem paulo ante lucem, qua infrequentissima urbis sunt, paucis militibus turrim proximam murumque circa scalis cepit alibi sopitis 5 custodibus, alibi nullo custodiente. Progressi inde ad frequentia aedificiis loca custodibus interfectis refractaque porta ceteram multitudinem armatorum 6 acceperunt. Inde in totam urbem discursum est aucto etiam tumultu quod circa forum ignis tectis 7 iniectus erat. Conflagrarunt et horrea regia et armamentarium cum ingenti apparatu machinarum tormentorumque. Caedes inde passim fugientium 8 pariter ac repugnantium fieri coepta est. Nec ullo iam, qui militaris aetatis esset, non aut caeso aut fugato, Sopatro etiam Acarnane, praefecto praesidii, interfecto, praeda omnis primo in forum conlata, 9 deinde in naves imposita. Carcer etiam ab Rhodiis refractus emissique captivi, quos Philippus tamquam 10 in tutissimam custodiam condiderat. Statuis inde regis deiectis truncatisque, signo receptui dato conscenderunt naves et Piraeum, unde profecti 11 erant, redierunt. Quod si tantum militum Romanorum fuisset ut et Chalcis teneri et non deseri praeand the citizens likewise, trusting in their Macedonian B.C. 200 garrison, were careless in their guarding of the city. Acting on this information, Claudius started out, and although he reached Sunium so early that he could have made the opening of the Euboean straits, he held his fleet at anchor until night-fall, lest he be seen after rounding the promontory; at dusk he moved, and after a calm voyage reached Chalcis a little before daybreak. With a few soldiers using scaling ladders, he captured the nearest tower and the adjoining wall in a thinly-populated section of the city, the sentinels being found in some places asleep, in others absent from their posts. The Romans then advanced to the centre of the city, and killing the guards and breaking down the gates they admitted the rest of their forces. Thence they scattered throughout the town, the confusion being further increased by a fire which broke out in the buildings around the forum. Both the royal granaries and the arsenal were burned, with a great store of munitions and artillery. Indiscriminate slaughter of fugitives and fighting men followed. When there was no longer anyone of military age who had not perished or fled, Sopater the Acarnanian, commander of the garrison, having fallen, all the booty was first collected in the forum and then loaded on the ships. The prison also was broken open by the Rhodians, who released the captives whom Philip had confined there, thinking they would be in safest custody. The king's statues were then thrown down and broken up, and when the recall was sounded the Romans embarked and returned to Piraeus, whence they had set out. But if the Roman force had been large enough, so that they could have held Chalcis without a.u.c. 554 sidium Athenarum potuisset, magna res principio statim belli, Chalcis et Euripus adempta regi forent; 12 nam ut terra Thermopylarum angustiae Graeciam, ita mari fretum Euripi claudit.

XXIV. Demetriade tum Philippus erat. Quo cum esset nuntiata clades sociae urbis, quamquam serum auxilium perditis rebus [1] erat, tamen, quae 2 proxima auxilio est, ultionem petens, cum expeditis quinque milibus et trecentis equitibus extemplo profectus cursu prope Chalcidem contendit, haudqua- 3 quam dubius opprimi Romanos posse. A qua destitutus spe nec quicquam aliud quam ad deforme spectaculum semirutae ac fumantis sociae urbis cum venisset, paucis vix qui sepelirent bello absumptos relictis, aeque raptim ac venerat transgressus ponte Euripum per Boeotiam Athenas ducit, pari incepto 4 haud disparem eventum ratus responsurum. Et respondisset, ni speculator—hemerodromos vocant Graeci, ingens die uno cursu emetientes spatium—contemplatus regium agmen ex specula quadam, 5 praegressus nocte media Athenas pervenisset. Idem ibi somnus eademque neglegentia erat, quae Chalci- 6 dem dies ante paucos prodiderat. Excitati nuntio trepido et praetor Atheniensium et Dioxippus, praefectus cohortis mercede militantium auxiliorum, convocatis in forum militibus tuba signum ex arce 7 dari iubent, ut hostes adesse omnes scirent. Ita undique ad portas, ad muros discurrunt. Paucas post horas Philippus, aliquanto tamen ante lucem,

[1] perditis rebus Luchs: perditis B.

[1] Philip hoped to take Athens by surprise as the Romans had taken Chalcis.

[2] Livy frequently applies the Latin term to the commanders of foreign military forces. The usual title in Greece was "strategus."

abandoning the defence of Athens, this event would B.C. 200 have been an auspicious beginning of hostilities: Chalcis and the Euripus would have been lost to the king, for as on the land the pass of Thermopylae is the gateway to Greece, so by sea is the strait of Euripus.

XXIV. Philip was then at Demetrias. When the news of the destruction of Chalcis reached him there, although it was too late to send aid, the city having been lost, nevertheless, seeking revenge, as the next best thing after assistance, he at once set out with five thousand light infantry and three hundred cavalry and made all speed for Chalcis, not doubting that the Romans could be destroyed. Disappointed in this hope, and finding only the ugly spectacle of the friendly town lying half-ruined, with its embers still smoking, and only a few left to bury those who were slain in the battle, he recrossed the strait by the bridge as rapidly as he had come and hurried through Boeotia toward Athens, thinking that a not dissimilar result would follow a similar course of action.[1] And this would have happened, had not a scout—the Greeks call them "all-day runners," and they cover great distances in a day's run—seen the king's army from a watch-tower, set out at midnight and reached Athens before him. There was the same sleep and the same carelessness that had betrayed Chalcis a few days earlier. The Athenian praetor[2] and Dioxippus, who commanded an auxiliary force of mercenaries, aroused by the alarming message, assembling the soldiers in the forum, ordered the trumpet sounded from the citadel, to inform all that the enemy was coming. So there was a rush from all sides to the walls and gates. Some hours later, but still before daybreak, Philip approached the city, appropinquans urbi, conspectis luminibus crebris et fremitu hominum trepidantium, ut in tali tumultu, 8 exaudito, sustinuit signa et considere ac conquiescere agmen iussit, vi aperta propalam usurus, quando 9 parum dolus profuerat. Ab Dipylo accessit. Porta ea, velut in ore urbis posita, maior aliquanto patentiorque quam ceterae est, et intra eam extraque latae viae sunt, ut et oppidani derigere aciem a foro ad portam possent, et extra limes mille ferme passus longus, in Academiae gymnasium ferens, pediti 10 equitique hostium liberum spatium praeberet. Eo limite Athenienses cum Attali praesidio et cohorte Dioxippi acie intra portam instructa signa extulerunt. 11 Quod ubi Philippus vidit, habere se hostes in potestate ratus et diu optata caede—neque enim ulli Graecarum civitatium infestior erat—iram expleturum,[1] cohortatus milites ut se intuentes pugnarent 12 scirentque ibi signa, ibi aciem esse debere, ubi rex esset, concitat equum non ira tantum, sed etiam 13 gloria elatus, quod ingenti turba completis etiam ad spectaculum muris conspici se pugnantem egregium 14 ducebat. Aliquantum ante aciem cum equitibus paucis evectus in medios hostes ingentem cum suis 15 ardorem tum pavorem hostibus iniecit. Plurimos

A.U.C. 554

[1] iram expleturum seems the easiest correction of expletum iri of B.

[1] The gate, which, as its name implies, accommodated two-way traffic, lay on the north-west side of the city and was the principal exit towards the west. The gate was double in depth also; cf. in angustiis in sect. 15 below, where Philip was caught in the court between the two parts.

Livy's weakness in detailed topography and the aimlessness of the campaign make it difficult to determine Philip's route of approach. The easy route from Boeotia was by way of Eleusis, and seeing the numerous lights and hearing the B.C. 200 shouts of frightened men, usual in such a crisis, halted and ordered his men to pitch camp and rest, intending to employ open force, since stratagem had failed. He attacked on the side of the Dipylon Gate.[1] This gate, placed, so to speak, at the forefront of the city, was somewhat wider and more extensive than the rest, and inside and outside there were wide avenues, so that the citizens could form their line from the market-place to the gate, and so that the road, about a mile long, outside the city and leading to the gymnasium of the Academy, offered ample space for infantry and cavalry. The Athenians, with the garrison of Attalus and the mercenaries of Dioxippus, formed their array within the gate and marched out by this road. Philip, seeing this, thought that he had the Athenians in his hands and that he was about to sate his rage with long-desired slaughter—for he hated no other Greek city so much as Athens—and urged his soldiers to take him as their example in the fight and to remember that the standards and the battle-line should be where their king was, and put spurs to his horse, inspired by rage and by the hope of glory alike, because he thought that his fighting would be a glorious sight, since the walls were lined with a great crowd, as for a show. Riding with a few companions far in front of the line, and even into the press of the enemy, he inspired both enthusiasm in his own troops and terror in his foes. Pursuing the Sacred Way, and the pass of Daphne to the Dipylon Gate; the road past the Academy led over the difficult pass of Phyle. The question seems to be avoided by modern historians and the mobility of Philip would have enabled him to come by one road and attack by another.

a.u.c. 554

manu sua comminus eminusque vulneratos compulsosque in portam consecutus et ipse, cum maiorem in angustiis trepidantium edidisset caedem, in temerario incepto tutum tamen receptum habuit, 16 quia qui in turribus portae erant sustinebant tela,
17 ne in permixtos suos conicerent. Intra muros deinde tenentibus milites Atheniensibus Philippus signo receptui dato castra ad Cynosarges—templum Herculis gymnasiumque et lucus erat circumiectus—
18 posuit. Sed et Cynosarges et Lycium et quidquid sancti amoenive circa urbem erat incensum est, dirutaque non tecta solum sed etiam sepulcra, nec divini humanive [1] iuris quicquam prae impotenti ira est servatum.

XXV. Postero die cum primo clausae fuissent portae, deinde subito apertae, quia praesidium Attali ab Aegina Romanique ab Piraeo intraverant urbem, castra ab urbe rettulit rex tria ferme milia
2 passuum. Inde Eleusinem profectus spe improviso templi castellique, quod et imminet et circumdatum est templo, capiendi, cum haudquaquam neglectas custodias animadvertisset et classem a Piraeo subsidio venire, omisso incepto Megara ac protinus Corinthum ducit et, cum Argis Achaeorum concilium esse audisset, inopinantibus Achaeis contioni ipsi
3 supervenit. Consultabant de bello adversus Nabim,

[1] humanive edd. vett.: humanique B.

[1] This suburb lay to the eastward, at the foot of Mount Lycabettus.

many soldiers whom he had wounded, either at long B.C. 200 range or hand to hand, and driving them inside the gate, when he had done greater damage to the Athenians as they crowded together in the narrow space, yet he escaped safely after his rash venture, since the troops who manned the towers on the walls withheld their weapons, from fear of harming their own men mingled with the enemy. Afterwards when the Athenians held their men within the walls, Philip, giving the signal for a retirement, pitched camp at Cynosarges,[1] where there was a temple to Hercules and a gymnasium with a grove around it. But Cynosarges, the Lyceum, and all the sacred and pleasant sites around the city were burned; the buildings and even the tombs were destroyed, and nothing consecrated to divine or human use escaped his uncontrollable passion.

XXV. Next day, when the gates had been closed and then suddenly thrown open, because troops of Attalus from Aegina and Romans from Piraeus had entered the city, the king moved his camp about three miles from the city. Thence, making for Eleusis, in the hope of capturing, by an unexpected attack, the temple and the citadel which commands and surrounds the temple, when he found that vigilance was not in the least relaxed and that reinforcements were coming from the fleet at Piraeus, he gave up that plan and marched toward Megara and straight on to Corinth, and hearing that the Achaean council[2] was in session at Argos, he suddenly appeared at the meeting itself, to the surprise of the Achaeans. They were deliberating about a

[1] See the Introductory Note.

A.U.C. 554

tyrannum Lacedaemoniorum, qui tralato imperio a Philopoemene ad Cycliadem, nequaquam parem illi ducem, dilapsa cernens Achaeorum auxilia, redintegraverat bellum agrosque finitimorum vastabat et 4 iam urbibus quoque erat terribilis. Adversus hunc hostem cum, quantum ex quaque civitate militum scriberetur, consultarent, Philippus dempturum se eis curam, quod ad Nabim et Lacedaemonios attineret
5 pollicitus nec tantum agros sociorum populationibus prohibiturum sed terrorem omnem belli in ipsam Laconicam ducto eo extemplo exercitu tralaturum.
6 Haec oratio cum ingenti adsensu hominum acciperetur, "ita tamen aequum est" inquit "me vestra meis armis tutari, ne mea interim nudentur
7 praesidiis. Itaque, si vobis videtur, tantum parate militum quantum ad Oreum et Chalcidem et Corinthum tuenda satis sit, ut meis ab tergo tutis securus bellum Nabidi inferam et Lacedaemoniis."
8 Non fefellit Achaeos quo spectasset tam benigna pollicitatio auxiliumque oblatum adversus Lacedaemonios: id quaeri, ut obsidem Achaeorum iuventutem educeret ex Peloponneso ad inligandam Romano
9 bello gentem. Et id quidem coarguere Cycliadas, praetor Achaeorum, nihil attinere ratus, id modo cum dixisset, non licere legibus Achaeorum de aliis rebus referre quam propter quas convocati essent,

---

[1] Nabis had seized authority at Sparta (see the Introductory Note). The war against him conducted by the Romans and their allies is described in XXXIV. xxii. 5 ff.

[2] The Achaean League elected a strategus annually, and frequent changes occurred, both in the military efficiency and in the political sympathies of the administration. Philopoemen had been a vigorous and independent magistrate: see war against Nabis,[1] the tyrant of Sparta, who, B.C. 200 seeing that the military power of the Achaeans had declined with the transfer of command from Philopoemen to Cycliadas,[2] by no means his equal as a general, had renewed the war and was ravaging their territories and was now even threatening their towns. While they were debating how many men should be enlisted from each city for the war against this enemy, Philip promised that, so far as Nabis and the Spartans were concerned, he would free them from that responsibility, and by the immediate despatch of an army would not only prevent Nabis from ravaging the lands of the allies, but would transfer the whole terror of the war into Laconia itself. When this offer was received with great applause, "nevertheless," he said, "it is proper that your possessions be defended by my arms in such a way that meantime mine shall not be deprived of protection. Prepare, then, if it seems wise, a force of soldiers sufficient to hold Oreus and Chalcis and Corinth, that, with my rear protected, I may safely make war upon Nabis and the Spartans." The Achaeans were not deceived as to the real meaning of so generous an offer and promise of aid against the Lacedaemonians: the purpose was to lead the Achaean youth as hostages from the Peloponnesus in order to commit the people to war with Rome. So Cycliadas, praetor of the Achaeans, thinking it not at all to the point to argue about that, when he had simply replied that it was not allowable under the laws of the Achaeans to vote upon other subjects than those for which the meeting was called, after Plutarch's biography of him. Cycliadas was an inferior soldier and was suspected of pro-Macedonian tendencies.

A.U.C. 554
10 decreto de exercitu parando adversus Nabim facto consilium fortiter ac libere habitum dimisit, inter
11 adsentatores regios ante eam diem habitus. Philippus, magna spe depulsus, voluntariis paucis militibus conscriptis Corinthum atque in Atticam terram rediit.

XXVI. Per eos ipsos dies, quibus Philippus in Achaia fuit, Philocles, praefectus regius, ex Euboea profectus cum duobus milibus Thracum Macedonumque ad depopulandos Atheniensium fines regione Eleusinis saltum Cithaeronis transcendit;
2 inde dimidia parte militum ad praedandum passim per agros dimissa cum parte ipse occultus loco ad
3 insidias opportuno consedit, ut, si ex castello ab Eleusine in praedantes suos impetus fieret, repente
4 hostes effusos ex improviso adoriretur. Non fefellere insidiae. Itaque revocatis qui discurrerant ad praedandum militibus instructisque, ad oppugnandum castellum Eleusinem profectus cum multis inde vulneribus recessit Philippoque se venienti ex Achaia
5 coniunxit. Temptata et ab ipso rege oppugnatio eiusdem castelli est; sed naves Romanae a Piraeo venientes intromissumque praesidium absistere in-
6 cepto coegerunt. Diviso deinde exercitu rex cum parte Philoclem Athenas mittit, cum parte Piraeum pergit ut, dum Philocles subeundo muros et comminanda oppugnatione contineret urbe Athenienses, ipsi Piraeum levi cum praesidio relictum expugnandi
7 facultas esset. Ceterum nihilo ei Piraei quam Eleu-passing a decree regarding raising an army against Nabis, adjourned the congress that was held fearlessly and spiritedly, although up to that time he had been counted among the king's partisans. Philip, disappointed in this great hope, enlisted a few volunteer soldiers and returned to Corinth and to the land of Attica. B.C. 200

XXVI. During this same period while Philip was in Achaea, his prefect Philocles left Euboea with two thousand Thracians and Macedonians to plunder the territory of the Athenians in the region of Eleusis, and crossed the pass of Cithaeron. Sending half his force to plunder far and wide through the country, he with the rest made camp secretly in a suitable place for an ambuscade, that, if an attack were made by the Eleusinians from the citadel upon his foragers, he might fall upon the enemy suddenly and unexpectedly as they were dispersed. His ambush did not go undetected. So recalling the troops that had gone forth to forage and forming them for battle, he set out for Eleusis to assault the citadel, but was repulsed from there with many casualties and joined Philip on his return from Achaea. An attack on the same fortress was attempted by the king as well; but Roman ships arriving from the Piraeus and the garrison admitted into the city compelled him to abandon his undertaking. The king then divided his army and sent Philocles to Athens with half of them and himself proceeding to Piraeus, in the hope that while Philocles was keeping the Athenians within the city by approaching the walls and threatening an attack, the opportunity might be offered himself of taking Piraeus, left with a small guard. But, with practically the same defenders, the capture

A.U.C. 584

sinis facilior iisdem fere defendentibus oppugnatio
8 fuit. A Piraeo Athenas repente duxit. Inde eruptione subita peditum equitumque inter angustias semiruti muri, qui bracchiis duobus Piraeum Athenis
9 iungit, repulsus, omissa oppugnatione urbis, diviso cum Philocle rursus exercitu ad agros vastandos profectus, cum priorem populationem sepulcris circa urbem
10 diruendis exercuisset, ne quid inviolatum relinqueret, templa deum, quae pagatim sacrata habebant, dirui 11 atque incendi iussit; et ornata eo genere operum eximie terra Attica et copia domestici marmoris et ingeniis artificum praebuit huic furori materiam.
12 Neque enim diruere modo ipsa templa ac simulacra evertere satis habuit, sed lapides quoque, ne integri
13 cumularent ruinas, frangi iussit. Et postquam non tam ira erat satiata [1] quam irae exercendae materia deerat, agro hostium in Boeotiam excessit nec aliud quicquam dignum memoria in Graecia egit.

XXVII. Consul Sulpicius eo tempore inter Apolloniam ac Dyrrachium ad Apsum flumen habebat castra, quo arcessitum L. Apustium legatum cum parte copiarum ad depopulandos hostium fines
2 mittit. Apustius, extrema Macedoniae populatus,

[1] erat satiata Siesbye: satiata B.

[1] Themistocles had built a double wall from Athens to the harbour, but this had been partially destroyed during the Peloponnesian War and had not been maintained.

of Piraeus was in no wise easier for him than that B.C. 200 of Eleusis. Suddenly he marched from Piraeus to Athens. Driven thence by a sudden sally of cavalry and infantry in the narrow space between the half-ruined walls [1] which with their two arms join Piraeus and Athens, he gave up the attempt on the city and, again dividing his force with Philocles and setting out to plunder the country districts, while he had devoted his former raid to destroying the tombs around the city, that he might leave nothing inviolate, he ordered the temples of the gods which the Athenians had consecrated in all the demes to be torn down and burned; and the land of Attica, with its wonderful adornment of works of art and its abundance of native marble and the skill of its artists offered material for his rage. For he was not satisfied merely to destroy the temples and statues themselves, but even ordered the separate stones to be broken up, lest they be left whole upon the piles of ruins. And after his wrath, or rather objects on which to expend his wrath, had been exhausted, he retired from the enemy's country to Boeotia, and did nothing else worth mentioning in Greece.

XXVII. The consul Sulpicius [2] was at that time encamped along the Apsus river between Apollonia and Dyrrachium, and summoning to him there his lieutenant Lucius Apustius he sent him with part of the troops to ravage the enemy's country. Apustius, having plundered the frontiers of Macedonia and having captured at the first assault the towns of a.u.c. 554 Corrhago et Gerrunio et Orgesso castellis primo impetu captis ad Antipatream, in faucibus angustis 3 sitam urbem, venit. Ac primo evocatos principes ad colloquium, ut fidei Romanorum se committerent, perlicere est conatus; deinde, ubi magnitudine ac moenibus situque urbis freti dicta aspernabantur, 4 vi atque armis adortus expugnavit puberibusque interfectis, praeda omni militibus concessa diruit 5 muros atque urbem incendit. Hic metus Codrione, satis validum et munitum oppidum, sine certamine 6 ut dederetur Romanis, effecit. Praesidio ibi relicto Cnidus—nomen propter alteram in Asia urbem quam oppidum notius—vi capitur. Revertentem legatum ad consulem cum satis magna praeda Athenagoras quidam, regius praefectus, in transitu fluminis a 7 novissimo agmine adortus postremos turbavit. Ad quorum clamorem et trepidationem cum revectus equo propere legatus signa convertisset et coniectis in medium sarcinis aciem derexisset, non tulere impetum Romanorum militum regii. Multi ex iis 8 occisi, plures capti. Legatus incolumi exercitu reducto ad consulem remittitur inde extemplo ad classem.

[2] The arrival of Sulpicius was recorded in xviii. 9, on which see the note. The events now described may belong to the end of the year 200 B.C. or, more probably, to the following spring.

XXVIII. Hac satis felici expeditione bello commisso reguli ac principes accolae Macedonum in castra Romana veniunt, Pleuratus Scerdilaedi filius et Amynander Athamanum rex et ex Dardanis Bato 2 Longari filius. Bellum suo nomine Longarus cum Demetrio, Philippi patre, gesserat. Pollicentibus

Corrhagum, Gerronius and Orgessum, arrived at B.C. 200
Antipatrea, a city situated in a narrow pass. There he first summoned the leading men to a conference and tried to induce them to put themselves under Roman protection; then, when they scorned his suggestions, relying on the size and walls and site of the city, he stormed and captured it by force of arms and killing all the men of military age and giving the booty to the soldiers he tore down the walls and burned the city. Fear of a similar fate caused Codrio, a strong and well-fortified town, to be surrendered to the Romans without resistance. Leaving a garrison there, he took by storm Cnidus—a name better known than the town because of the other Cnidus in Asia. As the lieutenant was returning to the consul with a satisfactory amount of booty, Athenagoras, one of the king's prefects, attacked his rear while it was crossing a river and caused some confusion to his rearguard. The lieutenant, hastily riding back when he heard their shouts and uproar, faced the troops about and formed line of battle, placing the baggage in the centre, whereupon the king's soldiers did not withstand the Romans' charge. Many of them were killed and more captured. The lieutenant returned to the consul with his army intact and thence was at once sent back to the fleet.

XXVIII. The war having been begun with this sufficiently successful expedition, the petty kings and princes, neighbours to the Macedonians, came to the Roman camp; Pleuratus, son of Scerdilaedus, and Amynander, king of the Athamanes, and from the Dardani Bato, son of Longarus. Longarus on his own account had waged war with Demetrius, father of Philip. To their proffers of assistance, the consul

A.U.C. 554

auxilia respondit consul Dardanorum et Pleurati opera, cum exercitum in Macedoniam induceret, se 3 usurum; Amynandro Aetolos concitandos ad bellum attribuit. Attali legatis—nam ii quoque per id tempus venerant—mandat ut Aeginae rex, ubi hibernabat, classem Romanam opperiretur, qua adiuncta bello maritimo, sicut ante, Philippum
4 urgeret. Ad Rhodios quoque missi legati ut capesserent partem belli. Nec Philippus segnius—iam enim in Macedoniam pervenerat—adparabat bellum.
5 Filium Persea, puerum admodum, datis ex amicorum numero qui aetatem eius regerent, cum parte copiarum ad obsidendas angustias quae ad Pela-
6 goniam sunt mittit. Sciathum et Peparethum, haud ignobiles urbes, ne classi hostium praedae ac praemio essent, diruit. Ad Aetolos mittit legatos, ne gens inquieta adventu Romanorum fidem mutaret.

XXIX. Concilium Aetolorum stata die, quod Panaetolium vocant, futurum erat. Huic ut occurrerent, et regis legati iter adcelerarunt, et a consule
2 missus L. Furius Purpurio legatus venit; Atheniensium quoque legati ad id concilium occurrerunt. Primi Macedones, cum quibus recentissimum foedus
3 erat, auditi sunt. Qui in[1] nulla nova re nihil se

[1] Qui in Madvig: qui B.

---

[1] The Aetolian League (see the Introductory Note) was in alliance with Philip, but its assistance was sought by both sides: see section 6 below. Its general policy is well presented in xxxii. 5 below.

[2] This council, attended by delegates from all the Aetolian cities, was regularly held in the autumn at Naupactus or Thermum.

replied that he would accept the aid of the Dardani B.C. 200 and Pleuratus when he led the army into Macedonia; to Amynander he assigned the task of winning the Aetolians[1] over for the war. To the ambassadors of Attalus—for they too had arrived at this time—he gave instructions that the king should await the Roman fleet at Aegina, where he was wintering, and uniting with it should continue as before the naval warfare on Philip. Ambassadors were sent to the Rhodians also, that they should take up their share in the war. Nor did Philip—for he had by now reached Macedonia—carry on less vigorously his preparations for the war. He sent his son Perseus, who was still a boy, with guardians from among his friends to guide his youth, with part of the troops to hold the passes which lead to Pelagonia. He destroyed Sciathus and Peparethus, cities not unknown to fame, to prevent their becoming prize and prey to the fleet of the enemy. He sent ambassadors to the Aetolians, lest that restless people should, on the arrival of the Romans, change its allegiance.

XXIX. The council of the Aetolians, which they call Panaetolian,[2] was to be held on the appointed day. To be present at it, both the king's representatives hastened their journey and Lucius Furius Purpurio[3] the lieutenant, arrived, sent by the consul; ambassadors of the Athenians also came to this council. The Macedonians, with whom the latest treaty[4] had been made, were first heard. They said that they had nothing new to say since

[2] If the name is correct, this is probably not the same Purpurio who is mentioned in chap. xxi.

[4] The Macedonian alliance in 205 B.C. (XXIX. xii. 2) superseded the treaty with Rome of 211 B.C. (XXVI. xxv. 1).

A.U.C. 554

novi habere quod adferrent dixerunt; quibus enim de causis experta inutili societate Romana pacem cum Philippo fecissent, compositam semel pacem servare 4 eos debere. "An imitari" inquit unus ex legatis "Romanorum licentiam, an levitatem dicam, mavultis? Qui cum legatis vestris Romae responderi ita iussissent, 'Quid ad nos venitis, Aetoli, sine quorum auctoritate pacem cum Philippo fecistis?', 5 iidem nunc ut bellum secum adversus Philippum geratis postulant; et antea propter vos et pro vobis arma sumpta adversus eum simulabant, nunc vos in 6 pace esse cum Philippo prohibent. Messanae ut auxilio essent, primo in Siciliam transcenderunt; iterum, ut Syracusas oppressas ab Carthaginiensibus
7 in libertatem eximerent; et Messanam et Syracusas et totam Siciliam ipsi habent vectigalemque pro-
8 vinciam securibus et fascibus subiecerunt. Scilicet sicut vos Naupacti legibus vestris per magistratus a vobis creatos concilium habetis, socium hostemque libere quem velitis lecturi, pacem ac bellum arbitrio habituri vestro, sic Siculorum civitatibus Syracusas aut Messanam aut Lilybaeum indicitur concilium:
9 praetor Romanus conventus agit; eo imperio evocati conveniunt; excelso in suggestu superba iura reddentem, stipatum lictoribus vident; virgae tergo, secures cervicibus imminent; et quotannis alium
10 atque alium dominum sortiuntur. Nec id mirari debent aut possunt, cum Italiae urbes, Regium,

[1] The aid rendered to Messina brought on the First Punic War, as a result of which part of Sicily became a province, governed by magistrates whose servants carried the rods and axes as symbols of the imperium. The implication is that the assistance was merely the beginning of conquest. For Syracuse cf. xxxi. 8 and note.

nothing new had happened; inasmuch as, for the same reasons for which they had made peace with Philip after trying the useless Roman alliance, they should wish to keep a peace once for all established. "Or do you prefer," said one of the ambassadors, "to imitate Roman presumption, or shall I call it fickleness? After ordering that your ambassadors at Rome should receive the answer, 'Why do you come to us, Aetolians, when without our authority you made peace with Philip?', these same Romans now demand that you make war on Philip along with them; as they formerly pretended that they had taken arms against him on your account and for your sakes, now they forbid you to be at peace with Philip. They crossed to Sicily first to assist Messina; the second time, to rescue and restore to liberty Syracuse, besieged by the Carthaginians; now they themselves hold both Messina and Syracuse and all Sicily and they have made it a province, tributary and subject to their rods and axes.[1] No doubt, just as you hold your council at Naupactus, under your own laws, with magistrates elected by yourselves, able to choose freely whomsoever you wish as friend and enemy, able to have peace or war at your own discretion, so a council of the Sicilian cities is called at Syracuse or Messina or Lilybaeum: the Roman praetor presides at the council; the men whom he has summoned by his authority assemble; they see him seated on his lofty platform, rendering haughty justice, with a throng of lictors around him; their rods threaten their backs, the axes their throats; and year by year the lots grant them one master after another. At that they should not marvel, nor can they, when they see the B.C. 200

A.U.C. 554 Tarentum, Capuam, ne finitimas quarum ruinis crevit urbs Roma nominem, eidem subiectas videant
11 imperio. Capua quidem, sepulcrum ac monumentum Campani populi, elato et extorri eiecto ipso populo, superest, urbs trunca, sine senatu, sine plebe, sine magistratibus, prodigium, relicta crudelius 12 habitanda quam si deiecta foret. Furor est si alienigenae homines, plus lingua et moribus et legibus quam maris terrarumque spatio discreti, haec tenuerint, sperare quicquam eodem statu mansurum.
13 Philippi regnum officere aliquid videtur libertati vestrae; qui, cum merito vestro vobis infensus esset, nihil a vobis ultra quam pacem petiit fidemque hodie
14 pacis pactae desiderat. Adsuefacite his terris legiones externas et iugum accipite; sero ac nequiquam, cum dominum Romanum habebitis, socium 15 Philippum quaeretis. Aetolos, Acarnanas, Macedonas, eiusdem linguae homines, leves ad tempus ortae causae diiungunt coniunguntque; cum alienigenis, cum barbaris aeternum omnibus Graecis bellum est eritque; natura enim, quae perpetua est, 16 non mutabilibus in diem causis hostes sunt. Sed unde coepit oratio mea, ibi desinet: hoc eodem loco iidem homines de eiusdem Philippi pace triennio ante decrevistis iisdem improbantibus eam pacem Romanis, qui nunc pactam et compositam turbare volunt. In qua consultatione nihil fortuna mutavit; cur vos mutetis non video."

XXX. Secundum Macedonas ipsis Romanis ita

---

[1] Probably the orator minimizes the time for rhetorical effect: the most recent known treaty was that of 205 B.C. (see note to sect. 2).

Italian cities, Rhegium, Tarentum, Capua, subject to B.C. 200
the same rule, not to mention the nearer cities on whose ruins Rome rose to power. Capua indeed, tomb and monument of the Campanian race, survives, its people buried, exiled, driven away, a city despoiled, without senate, without people, without magistrates, a monstrosity, more cruelly left habitable than if it had been destroyed. It is madness to hope that anything will remain in the same condition if foreigners, separated from us more by language, manners and laws than by the space of land and sea, shall gain control. The rule of Philip seems to interfere somewhat with your liberty; but he, though he would justly be angry with you, has asked nothing from you except peace and to-day desires nothing but your loyalty to your pledge of peace. Make foreign armies at home in this land and wear their yoke: too late and all in vain will you call upon Philip to aid you when you have the Roman as master. The Aetolians, the Acarnanians, the Macedonians, men of the same speech, are united or disunited by trivial causes that arise from time to time; with aliens, with barbarians, all Greeks wage and will wage eternal war; for they are enemies by the will of nature, which is eternal, and not from reasons that change from day to day. But my speech shall end just where it began: in this same place you, the same men, decided three years[1] ago on peace with this same Philip, with the disapproval of these same Romans who are now trying to break the peace we pledged and signed. In this situation fortune has made no change; why you should change, I do not see."

XXX. After the Macedonians, with the permission

A.U.C. 554

concedentibus iubentibusque Athenienses, qui foeda passi iustius in crudelitatem saevitiamque regis
2 invehi poterant, introducti sunt. Deploraverunt vastationem populationemque miserabilem agrorum: neque id se queri, quod hostilia ab hoste passi forent; esse enim quaedam belli iura, quae ut facere, ita
3 pati sit fas: sata exuri, dirui tecta, praedas hominum pecorumque agi misera magis quam indigna patienti
4 esse; verum enim vero id se queri, quod is qui Romanos alienigenas et barbaros vocet adeo omnia simul divina humanaque iura polluerit, ut priore populatione cum infernis deis, secunda cum superis
5 bellum nefarium gesserit. Omnia sepulcra monumentaque diruta esse in finibus suis, omnium nudatos
6 manes, nullius ossa terra tegi. Delubra sibi fuisse, quae quondam pagatim habitantes in parvis illis castellis vicisque consecrata ne in unam urbem qui-
7 dem contributi maiores sui deserta reliquerint. Circa ea omnia templa Philippum infestos circumtulisse ignes; semusta, truncata simulacra deum inter
8 prostratos iacere postes templorum. Qualem terram Atticam fecerit, exornatam quondam opulentamque, talem eum si liceat Aetoliam Graeciamque omnem
9 facturum. Urbis quoque suae similem deformitatem futuram fuisse, nisi Romani subvenissent. Eodem enim scelere urbem colentes deos praesidemque arcis Minervam petitam, eodem Eleusine Cereris
10 templum, eodem Piraei Iovem Minervamque; sed

---

[1] The unification (συνοικισμός) of the Attic demes into the city (ἄστυ) of Athens was traditionally ascribed to Theseus (Thucydides II. xv. 2) and assigned to the year 1259 B.C.

and indeed at the bidding of the Romans themselves, B.C. 200
the Athenians were brought in, who were able, having suffered dreadfully, to assail with greater reason the savageness and cruelty of the king. They lamented the devastation and miserable ruin of their land: they did not complain because they suffered the treatment of an enemy from an enemy, for there are certain laws of war which are legitimately to be experienced as well as practised: it is sad, rather than unjust to the sufferer, that crops be burned, homes be destroyed, men and animals driven off as booty; but they did, however, complain that he who calls the Romans aliens and barbarians had so polluted human and divine law alike that on his first raid he had waged impious war on the gods of the world below, on his second, with the gods above. All the tombs and monuments in their land had been destroyed, the shades of all the dead left naked, no man's bones left with their covering of earth. They had had shrines, which their ancestors dwelling in the country demes had once consecrated in their little villages and towns and which, even when united in one city,[1] they had not left deserted. About all these temples Philip had built his destroying fires; half-burned, mutilated images of gods lay amid the fallen portals of their shrines. The sort of land he had made of Attica, once so rich in art and treasure, such, if he were permitted, he would make of Aetolia and all Greece. Their city too would have suffered the same despoliation if the Romans had not come to its aid. For in the same criminal fashion the gods that keep the city and Athena, guardian of its citadel, had been attacked, so too the temple of Demeter at Eleusis, so Zeus and Athena at Piraeus; but, repulsed not only ab eorum non templis modo sed etiam moenibus vi atque armis repulsum in ea delubra, quae sola religione tuta fuerint, saevisse. Itaque se orare atque obsecrare Aetolos ut miseriti Atheniensium ducibus diis immortalibus, deinde Romanis, qui secundum deos plurimum possent, bellum susciperent.

A.U.C. 554

XXXI. Tum Romanus legatus: "Totam orationis meae formam Macedones primum, deinde Atheni-
2 enses mutarunt. Nam et Macedones, cum ad conquerendas Philippi iniurias in tot socias nobis urbes venissem, ultro accusando Romanos, defensionem ut accusatione potiorem haberem effecerunt,
3 et Athenienses in deos inferos superosque nefanda atque inhumana scelera eius referendo quid mihi aut cuiquam reliquerunt, quod obicere ultra possim?
4 Eadem haec Cianos, Abydenos, Aenios, Maronitas, Thasios, Parios, Samios, Larisenses, Messenios hinc ex Achaia existimate queri, graviora acerbioraque eos quibus nocendi maiorem facultatem habuit.
5 Nam quod ad ea attinet quae nobis obiecit, nisi gloria digna sunt, fateor ea defendi non posse. Regium et Capuam et Syracusas nobis obiecit.
6 Regium Pyrrhi bello legio a nobis Reginis ipsis ut mitteremus orantibus in praesidium missa urbem, ad quam defendendam missa erat, per scelus possedit.
7 Comprobavimus ergo id facinus? An bello persecuti sceleratam legionem, in potestatem nostram re-

---

[1] The towns named in this list had all at one time or another suffered at Philip's hands. Furius maintains that Rome's treatment of Capua and other towns was kind and generous in comparison.

from their temples but also from the walls by force of arms, he had spent his wrath on those shrines which were protected by a sense of reverence alone. They therefore begged and besought the Aetolians to pity the Athenians and under the leadership, first of the immortal gods, second of the Romans, who were next to the gods in power, to undertake the war. B.C. 200

XXXI. Then the Roman delegate spoke: "First the Macedonians, then the Athenians, have changed the whole tenor of my argument. For the Macedonians, when I had come to complain of the injuries inflicted by Philip upon so many states allied with us, by taking the lead in accusing the Romans, have caused me to prefer a defence of ourselves to an accusation of them, and when the Athenians have described his cruel and inhuman crimes against the gods above and below, what have they left for me or anyone else with which to reproach him further? Consider that these same complaints are made by the people of Cius,[1] Abydus, Aenus, Maronea, Thasos, Paros, Samos, Larisa, Messene here from Achaea, and that those complaints are of more grievous and cruel treatment wherever he had greater power to do harm. For as to those matters with which he has charged us, unless they merit glory, I confess that they cannot be defended. He has reproached us with Rhegium and Capua and Syracuse. Take Rhegium: in the war with Pyrrhus a legion sent by us when the townspeople of Rhegium themselves begged us to send troops for their protection, criminally seized the city it was sent to guard. Did we, then, approve this crime? Or did we, making war upon the guilty legion and reducing it to submission, when we dactam, tergo et cervicibus poenas sociis pendere cum coegissemus, urbem agros suaque omnia cum 8 libertate legibusque Reginis reddidimus? Syracusanis oppressis ab externis tyrannis, quo indignius esset, cum tulissemus opem et fatigati prope per triennium terra marique urbe munitissima oppugnanda essemus, cum iam ipsi Syracusani servire tyrannis quam capi a nobis mallent, captam iisdem

A.U.C. 554

9 armis et liberatam urbem reddidimus. Neque infitias imus Siciliam provinciam nostram esse et civitates, quae in parte Carthaginiensium fuerunt et uno animo cum illis adversus nos bellum gesserunt, stipendiarias nobis ac vectigales esse; quin contra hoc et vos et omnes gentes scire volumus, pro merito
10 cuique erga nos fortunam esse. An Campanorum poenae, de qua ne ipsi quidem queri possunt, nos paeniteat? Hi homines, cum pro iis bellum adversus Samnites per annos prope septuaginta cum magnis
11 nostris cladibus gessissemus, ipsos foedere primum, deinde conubio atque cognationibus, postremo
12 civitate nobis coniunxissemus, tempore nostro adverso primi omnium Italiae populorum, praesidio nostro foede interfecto, ad Hannibalem defecerunt, deinde indignati se obsideri a nobis Hannibalem ad oppug-13 nandam Romam miserunt. Horum si neque urbs ipsa neque homo quisquam superesset, quis id durius

---

[1] After the death of Hieronymus, tyrant of Syracuse, Hippocrates and Epicydes, born in Carthage but descended on their father's side from a Syracusan exile, persuaded the Syracusans to join Carthage. After a three years' siege had made it pay to the allies the penalty, with scourg- B.C. 200

ings and beheadings, did we restore to the people of Rhegium their city, their lands and all their possessions along with their liberty and laws? When we had given aid to the Syracusans, oppressed by foreign tyrants, a thing which made their fate more pitiable, and when we had been worn out by besieging, for nearly three years, the city strongly fortified by land and sea, since now the Syracusans themselves preferred to be ruled by tyrants to being captured by us, we delivered to them a city taken and liberated by these same arms.[1] We do not deny that Sicily is our province and that the cities which were on the side of Carthage and in agreement with her made war on us are our vassals and tributaries; nay, on the contrary, we wish both you and all nations to know this, that each one's fortune is proportioned to his services to us. Or should we be ashamed of the punishment of the Campanians, of which not even they can complain? These people, when we had warred with the Samnites on their behalf for almost seventy years, with great losses to ourselves, and when after that we had bound them to us, first by treaty, then by intermarriages and personal ties, finally by the gift of citizenship, were the first of all the states of Italy who in our time of stress foully murdered our garrison and went over to Hannibal, and then, enraged because they were besieged by us, sent Hannibal to attack Rome. If neither their city nor any man of them survived, who could say (214–212 B.C.) the city was taken by Marcellus. The Roman victory meant both the capture (captam) by the Romans and the liberation (liberatam) of the city from its "foreign tyrants" Hippocrates and Epicydes. See XXIV–XXV, passim.

A.U.C. 554

quam pro merito ipsorum statutum indignari posset? 14 Plures sibimet ipsi conscientia scelerum mortem consciverunt, quam ab nobis supplicio adfecti sunt. 15 Ceteris ita oppidum, ita agros ademimus ut agrum locumque ad habitandum daremus, urbem innoxiam stare incolumem pateremur, ut qui hodie videat eam nullum oppugnatae captaeve ibi vestigium inveniat. Sed quid ego Capuam dico, cum Carthagini victae 16 pacem ac libertatem dederimus? Magis illud est periculum ne nimis facile victis ignoscendo plures ob id ipsum ad experiendam adversus nos fortunam belli 17 incitemus. Haec pro nobis dicta sint,[1] haec adversus Philippum, cuius domestica parricidia et cognatorum amicorumque caedes et libidinem inhumaniorem prope quam crudelitatem vos, quo propiores Mace- 18 doniae estis, melius nostis. Quod ad vos attinet, Aetoli, nos pro vobis bellum suscepimus adversus Philippum, vos sine nobis cum eo pacem fecistis. 19 Et forsitan dicatis bello Punico occupatis nobis coactos metu vos leges pacis ab eo, qui tum plus poterat, accepisse; et nos, cum alia maiora urgerent, 20 depositum a vobis bellum et ipsi omisimus. Nunc et nos deum benignitate Punico perfecto bello totis viribus nostris in Macedoniam incubuimus, et vobis restituendi vos in amicitiam societatemque nostram fortuna oblata est, nisi perire cum Philippo quam vincere cum Romanis mavultis."

XXXII. Haec dicta ab Romano cum essent, in-that they had been punished more severely than they B.C. 200 themselves deserved? More of them, from consciousness of their guilt, committed suicide than were punished by us. From the rest we did indeed take away their town and their fields, but in such a way that we left them enough land and room to dwell in, and we permitted the city itself to stand safe and uninjured, so that he who sees it to-day finds no sign of its assault and capture. But why do I mention Capua, when we gave peace and liberty to conquered Carthage? This is the greater danger, that by treating the vanquished too generously we may thereby incite more peoples to try the fortune of war against us. Let this be our defence of ourselves and our answer to Philip, whose murders within his family, whose slaughterings of friends and relatives, whose passions, more unnatural almost than his cruelty, you know better than I, as you are nearer neighbours to Macedonia. So far as you are concerned, men of Aetolia, we undertook the war with Philip for you and you made peace with him without us. And perhaps you will argue that when we were busy with the Punic war, you, compelled by fear, received terms of peace from him who was at that time more powerful; and that we, in the press of greater matters, ourselves neglected the war which you abandoned. But now, by the grace of the gods, having finished the Punic war, we have addressed ourselves with all our energy to Macedonia, and to you, accordingly, is offered the opportunity of reinstating yourselves in our alliance and friendship, unless you prefer perishing with Philip to conquering with the Romans."

[1] sint Ascensius: sunt B.

XXXII. After this had been said by the Roman

A.U.C. 554

clinatis omnium animis ad Romanos, Damocritus, praetor Aetolorum, pecunia ut fama est ab rege
2 accepta, nihil aut huic aut illi parti adsensus, rem magni discriminis consiliis nullam esse tam inimicam quam celeritatem dixit; celerem enim paenitentiam, sed eandem[1] seram atque inutilem sequi, cum praecipitata raptim consilia neque revocari neque
3 in integrum restitui possint. Deliberationis eius, cuius ipse maturitatem expectandam putaret, tempus ita iam nunc statui posse: cum legibus cautum esset nec de pace belloque nisi in Panaetolico et Pylaico[2]
4 concilio ageretur, decernerent extemplo ut praetor sine fraude, cum de bello et pace agere velit, advocet concilium, et quod tum referatur decernaturque ut perinde ius ratumque sit[3] ac si in Panaetolico aut
5 Pylaico concilio actum esset. Dimissis ita suspensa re legatis egregie consultum genti aiebat: nam utrius partis melior fortuna belli esset, ad eius societatem inclinaturos. Haec in concilio Aetolorum acta.

XXXIII. Philippus impigre terra marique parabat bellum. Navales copias Demetriadem in Thessaliam
2 contrahebat; Attalum Romanamque classem principio veris ab Aegina ratus moturos, navibus mariti-

[1] sed eandem ed. Frobeniana 1531 : setandem B.
[2] Pylaico Gelenius : pyraea B : pyraeo B^2.
[3] ratumque sit ed. Mediolanensis 1505 : ratumque B.

[1] This is probably the other stated meeting of the League, but this name is not used elsewhere in this connection. Possibly, as Professor Capps suggests to me, the Pylaic meeting was that of the Amphictyonic Council, now commissioner, and the opinions of all were turning B.C. 200 toward the Romans, Damocritus, chief of the Aetolians, bribed—so men say—by the king, argued, not agreeing in any way with either side, that nothing was so inconsistent with wisdom in a great crisis as haste; for repentance, swift yet none the less late and unavailing, followed, when hastily-formed plans could not be recalled or annulled. The time for making the decision, the ripe moment for which should, in his judgment, be awaited, could be fixed even now: since it was provided by the laws that questions concerning peace or war should not be debated except at the Panaetolian and Pylaic[1] council, they should at once decree that the praetor should call a council, in good faith, when he wished to discuss the question of peace or war, and that whatever was then proposed and decreed should be valid and legal just as if determined at a Panaetolian or Pylaic session.[2] The ambassadors being thus dismissed with the decision hanging in the balance, he said that this was wise conduct for the League: for whichever side enjoyed the better fortune of war, to an alliance with that side they would turn. Such were the proceedings of the Aetolian council.

XXXIII. Philip was energetically preparing for war on land and sea. He assembled his navy at Demetrias in Thessaly; expecting that Attalus and the Roman fleet would move from Aegina in the dominated by Aetolia, at Thermopylae; one expects, however, action by an Aetolian and not by an Amphictyonic agency. Cf. XXXIII. XXXV. 8.

[1] Damocritus seems to propose that the council adjourn to meet on call, and that this adjourned meeting be regarded as a continuation of the regular meeting, and that the "laws" of the League be stretched to this extent.

A.U.C. 554

maeque orae praefecit Heraclidam, quem et ante
3 praefecerat; ipse terrestres copias comparabat, magna se duo auxilia Romanis detraxisse credens, ex una parte Aetolos, ex altera Dardanos, faucibus ad
4 Pelagoniam a filio Perseo interclusis. Ab consule non parabatur sed gerebatur iam bellum. Per Dassaretiorum fines exercitum ducebat, frumentum, quod ex hibernis extulerat, integrum vehens, quod
5 in usum militi satis esset praebentibus agris. Oppida vicique partim voluntate, partim metu se tradebant; quaedam vi expugnata, quaedam deserta in montes propinquos refugientibus barbaris inveniebantur.
6 Ad Lyncum stativa posuit prope flumen Bevum; inde frumentatum circa horrea Dassaretiorum mittebat. Philippus consternata quidem omnia circa pavoremque ingentem hominum cernebat, sed parum gnarus quam partem petisset consul, alam equitum ad explorandum quonam hostes iter intendissent misit.
7 Idem error apud consulem erat; movisse ex hibernis regem sciebat, quam regionem petisset ignorans.
8 Is quoque speculatum miserat equites. Hae duae alae ex diverso, cum diu incertis itineribus vagatae per Dassaretios essent, tandem in unum iter convenerunt. Neutros fefellit, ut fremitus procul hominum equorumque exauditus est, hostes appropinquare. Itaque priusquam in conspectum venirent, equos armaque expedierant; nec mora, ubi beginning of spring, he placed Heraclides, to whom B.C. 200 he had previously given the same post, in command of the fleet and the coast; he himself collected the land forces, thinking that he had detached from the Romans two powerful allies, the Aetolians on one side, the Dardani on the other, since the passes to Pelagonia were held by his son Perseus. The consul was not preparing, but actually waging, war.[1] He was leading the army through the territory of the Dassaretii, carrying with him untouched the grain he had brought from winter quarters, since the country supplied adequately the needs of the soldiers. The forts and towns surrendered, some voluntarily, others through fear; some were carried by assault, some were found abandoned as the barbarians fled to the neighbouring mountains. He established a base near Lyncus on the river Bevus; from there he sent troops to forage among the granaries of the Dassaretii. Philip, it is true, saw that everything round about was in confusion and that the people were greatly terrified, but not knowing in which direction the consul had marched, he sent a squadron of cavalry to ascertain where the enemy had gone. The consul was equally at a loss; he knew that the king had left his winter quarters, though ignorant of the region to which he had marched. He too sent out cavalry to scout. These two cavalry forces, coming from different directions, after they had wandered long and aimlessly over the roads in the land of the Dassaretii, finally met on the same highway. Neither was unaware, since they heard the sound of men and horses from far off, that the enemy was approaching. So, before they came in sight of one another, they had prepared horses and arms for 9 primum hostem videre, concurrendi facta est. Forte et numero et virtute, utpote lecti utrimque, haud impares, aequis viribus per aliquot horas pugnarunt. Fatigatio ipsorum equorumque incerta victoria 10 diremit proelium. Macedonum quadraginta equites, Romanorum quinque et triginta ceciderunt. Neque eo magis explorati quicquam, in qua regione castra hostium essent, aut illi ad regem aut hi ad consulem 11 rettulerunt; per transfugas cognitum est, quos levitas ingeniorum ad cognoscendas hostium res in omnibus bellis praebet.

[1] Livy here resumes the narrative interrupted at xxviii. 6 above.

A.U.C. 554

XXXIV. Philippus aliquid et ad caritatem suorum et ut promptius pro eo periculum adirent ratus 2 profecturum se, si equitum qui ceciderant in expeditione sepeliendorum curam habuisset, adferri eos in castra iussit, ut conspiceretur ab omnibus funeris 3 honos. Nihil tam incertum nec tam inaestimabile est quam animi multitudinis. Quod promptiores ad subeundam omnem dimicationem videbatur facturum, 4 id metum pigritiamque incussit; nam qui hastis sagittisque et rara lanceis facta vulnera vidissent, cum Graecis Illyriisque pugnare adsueti, postquam gladio Hispaniensi detruncata corpora, bracchiis cum humero abscisis, aut tota cervice desecta divisa a corpore capita patentiaque viscera et foeditatem 5 aliam vulnerum viderunt, adversus quae tela quosque viros pugnandum foret, pavidi vulgo cernebant. Ipsum quoque regem terror cepit nondum iusto 6 proelio cum Romanis congressum. Itaque revocato battle, nor was there any delay in charging as soon as the enemy came in sight. Not unequal, as it chanced, in either numbers or courage, since both consisted of picked men, they fought on equal terms for some hours. The weariness of men and horses ended the struggle without a decision in favour of either party. Of the Macedonians, forty troopers fell; of the Romans, thirty-five. Nor did either side, the king's or the consul's, have to report any more definite information as to where the enemy's camp lay; but this information was secured through deserters, whom in every war their fickleness causes to furnish information to the enemy. B.C. 200

---

[1] The long and heavy sabre, adapted to slashing blows, carried by Roman cavalry: cf. Dion. Hal. VIII. 67. The short infantry weapon, used for both cutting and thrusting, was called gladius Hispanus in XXII. xlvi. 5.

XXXIV. Philip, thinking that he would do something to secure the affection of his people and increase their readiness to encounter danger on his behalf if he undertook the burial of the cavalrymen who had fallen on the expedition, ordered their bodies brought into camp, that the funeral honour might be seen by all. Nothing is so uncertain or so unpredictable as the mental reaction of a crowd. What he thought would make them more ready to enter any conflict caused, instead, reluctance and fear; for men who had seen the wounds dealt by javelins and arrows and occasionally by lances, since they were used to fighting with the Greeks and Illyrians, when they had seen bodies chopped to pieces by the Spanish sword,[1] arms torn away, shoulders and all, or heads separated from bodies, with the necks completely severed, or vitals laid open, and the other fearful wounds, realized in a general panic with what weapons and what men they had to fight. Fear seized the king as well, who had never met the Romans in ordered combat. So, recalling his son

A.U.C. 554

filio praesidioque, quod in faucibus Pelagoniae erat, ut iis copiis suas augeret, Pleurato Dardanisque iter
7 in Macedoniam patefecit. Ipse cum viginti milibus peditum, duobus milibus equitum, ducibus transfugis ad hostem profectus paulo plus mille passus a castris Romanis tumulum propinquum Athaco[1] fossa ac
8 valle communivit; ac subiecta cernens Romana castra, admiratus esse dicitur et universam speciem castrorum et discripta suis quaeque partibus cum tendentium ordine tum itinerum intervallis et negasse barbarorum ea castra ulli videri posse.
9 Biduum consul et rex, alter alterius conatus expectantes, continuere suos intra vallum; tertio die Romanus omnes in aciem copias eduxit.

XXXV. Rex[2] tam celerem aleam universi certaminis timens, quadringentos Tralles—Illyriorum id, sicut alio diximus loco, est genus—et Cretenses trecentos, addito his peditibus pari numero equitum, cum duce Athenagora, uno ex purpuratis, ad laces-
2 sendos hostium equites misit. Ab Romanis autem—aberat acies eorum paulo plus quingentos passus—velites et equitum duae ferme alae emissae, ut numero quoque eques pedesque hostem aequarent.
3 Credere regii genus pugnae quo adsueverant fore, ut equites in vicem insequentes refugientesque nunc telis uterentur, nunc terga darent, Illyriorum velocitas ad excursiones et impetus subitos usui

[1] Athaco edd.: Achaco (Achaeo) ς: om. B.
[2] rex edd. vett.: rex non B: rex uero ς.

[1] Cf. XXVII. xxxii. 4.

and the guard which was at the passes to Pelagonia, B.C. 200 that he might increase his own strength with these forces, he opened to Pleuratus and the Dardani the road into Macedonia. Using deserters as guides, he himself marched towards the enemy with twenty thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry, and fortified with a wall and ditch a hill near Athacus, a little more than a mile from the Roman camp, and seeing the Roman camp which lay at his feet, it is said that he admired its whole arrangement and each section allotted its own place, with the rows of tents and also the well-spaced streets between, and that he remarked that no one could believe that that camp belonged to barbarians. For two days the consul and the king remained in camp, each waiting for the other to assume the offensive; on the third day the Roman led out all his forces to the battle-ground.

XXXV. The king, fearing the gamble of a decisive battle at this early moment, sent four hundred Tralles—a people of Illyria, as I have elsewhere[1] said—and three hundred Cretans, adding to the infantry an equal number of cavalry under command of Athenagoras, one of his nobles, to harass the Roman cavalry. The Romans, on the other hand—their battle-line was a little more than half a mile away—sent out skirmishers and about two squadrons of cavalry, that the infantry and cavalry might equal the enemy in number also. The king's forces assumed that the type of fighting would be that to which they were accustomed, that the cavalry, alternately advancing and retreating, would now discharge their weapons and now retire, that the swift movements of the Illyrians would be useful for sallies and sudden

A.U.C. 554

esset, Cretenses in invehentem se effuse hostem
4 sagittas conicerent. Turbavit hunc ordinem pugnandi non acrior quam pertinacior impetus Roman-
5 orum; nam haud secus quam si tota acie dimicarent, et velites emissis hastis comminus gladiis rem gerebant, et equites, ut semel in hostem evecti sunt, stantibus equis, partim ex ipsis equis, partim desilientes
6 immiscentesque se peditibus pugnabant. Ita nec eques regius equiti par erat, insuetus ad stabilem pugnam, nec pedes concursator et vagus et prope seminudus genere armorum veliti Romano parmam gladiumque habenti pariterque et ad se tuendum et 7 ad hostem petendum armato. Non tulere itaque dimicationem nec alia re quam velocitate tutantes se in castra refugerunt.

XXXVI. Uno deinde intermisso die, cum omnibus copiis equitum levisque armaturae pugnaturus rex esset, nocte caetratos quos peltastas vocant loco opportuno inter bina castra in insidiis abdiderat
2 praeceperatque Athenagorae et equitibus ut, si aperto proelio procederet res, uterentur fortuna, si minus, cedendo sensim ad insidiarum locum hostem
3 pertraherent. Et equitatus quidem cessit, duces caetratae cohortis non satis expectato signo ante tempus excitatis suis occasionem bene gerendae rei amisere. Romanus et aperto proelio victor et tutus a fraude insidiarum in castra sese recepit.

4 Postero die consul omnibus copiis in aciem descendit

[1] The caetra was a small, light shield (cf. πέλτη).

charges, and that the Cretans would shower arrows upon the enemy advancing in disorder. The Roman attack, no more vigorous than stubborn, prevented the carrying out of this plan; for just as if they were in regular line of battle, both the skirmishers, after hurling their spears, came to a hand-to-hand combat with their swords, and the cavalry, as soon as they had charged the enemy, stopping their horses either fought from horseback or leaped from their saddles and fought mingled with the footmen. So neither the king's cavalry, unused to a stationary battle, could stand against the Romans, nor his infantry, running to and fro and almost unprotected by armour, against the light-armed Romans, equipped with shield and sword and prepared alike for defence or offence. So they did not sustain the struggle, but relying on nothing else than their swiftness of foot they fled to the camp. B.C. 200

XXXVI. Then, after an interval of a day, when the king was determined to engage with all his cavalry and light infantry, he had concealed his targeteers,[1] those whom they call "peltasts," in ambush in a suitable place between the two camps, and had instructed Athenagoras and the cavalry that if things went well in the open battle they should exploit their advantage, but if not, they should by retiring gradually draw the enemy towards the place of ambush. And the cavalry did in fact retire, but the commanders of the peltasts, not waiting long enough for the signal and disclosing their forces prematurely, lost the opportunity for a victory. The Roman, both successful in the open battle and safe from the ambuscade, returned to camp.

Next day the consul led out all his army in battle-

A.U.C. 554

ante prima signa locatis elephantis, quo auxilio tum primum Romani, quia captos aliquot bello Punico habebant, usi sunt. Ubi latentem intra vallum hostem vidit, in tumulos quoque ac sub ipsum vallum exprobrans metum successit. Postquam ne tum quidem potestas pugnandi dabatur, quia ex tam propinquis stativis parum tuta frumentatio erat, dispersos milites per agros equitibus extemplo invasuris, octo fere inde milia, intervallo tutiorem frumentationem habiturus, castra ad Ottolobum—id est loco nomen—movit. Cum in propinquo agro frumentarentur Romani, primo rex intra vallum suos tenuit, ut cresceret simul neglegentia [1] cum audacia hosti. Ubi effusos vidit, cum omni equitatu et Cretensium auxiliaribus, quantum equitem velocissimi pedites cursu aequare poterant, citato profectus agmine inter castra Romana et frumentatores constituit signa. Inde copiis divisis partem ad consectandos vagos frumentatores emisit dato signo ne quem vivum relinquerent, cum parte ipse substitit itineraque quibus ad castra recursuri videbantur hostes, obsedit. Iam passim caedes ac fuga erat, necdum quisquam in castra Romana nuntius cladis pervenerat, quia refugientes in regiam stationem incidebant, et plures ab obsidentibus vias quam ab emissis ad caedem interficiebantur. Tandem inter medias

[1] neglegentia Ussing: et neglegentia B.

[1] The sites described in these chapters cannot be positively identified.

line, placing in front of the ranks his elephants, an auxiliary which the Romans then used for the first time, because they had some which they had taken in the Punic war. When he saw the enemy lurking behind his ramparts, he advanced to the hills and even against the wall itself, taunting him with being afraid. When he could not even then gain the opportunity to fight, since foraging was unsafe because his base was so close to that of the enemy, the cavalry being ready at any moment to attack the soldiers scattered through the fields, he moved his camp about eight miles from there to Ottolobum—so they call the place—that he might provision himself more safely because of the distance.[1] While the Romans were gathering grain in the neighbouring fields, the king at first kept his men within the camp, that carelessness might increase in the enemy along with boldness. When he saw them well scattered, he set out with all his cavalry and the Cretan auxiliaries, in so far as these fast-moving infantrymen could keep up with the cavalry, and marching at full speed set up his standards between the Roman camp and the foragers. Then, dividing his forces, he sent part to pursue the scattered foragers, giving the word to leave no man alive, and himself with the remainder stood and blocked the roads by which the enemy seemed likely to return to camp. Now there was slaughter and flight everywhere, nor had any news of the disaster yet reached the Roman camp, because the fugitives fell in with the king's patrols, and more were killed by the men who blocked the roads than by those who were sent out to destroy them. Finally, however, some of them slipped through the line of enemy B.C. 200

A.U.C. 554 hostium stationes elapsi quidam trepidi tumultum magis quam certum nuntium intulerunt castris.

XXXVII. Consul equitibus iussis, qua quisque posset, opem ferre laborantibus ipse legiones e castris educit et agmine quadrato ad hostem ducit. 2 Dispersi equites per agros quidam aberrarunt decepti clamoribus aliis ex alio existentibus loco, pars obvios 3 habuerunt hostes. Pluribus locis simul pugna coepit. Regia statio atrocissimum proelium edebat; nam et ipsa multitudine equitum peditumque prope iusta acies erat, et Romanorum, quia medium obsederat 4 iter, plurimi in eam inferebantur. Eo quoque superiores Macedones erant, quod et rex ipse hortator aderat, et Cretensium auxiliares multos ex improviso vulnerabant, conferti praeparatique in dispersos et 5 effusos pugnantes. Quod si modum in insequendo habuissent, non in praesentis modo certaminis gloriam sed in summam etiam belli profectum foret; 6 nunc aviditate caedis intemperantius secuti in praegressas cum tribunis militum cohortes Romanas 7 incidere, et fugiens eques, ut primo signa suorum vidit, convertit in effusum hostem equos, versaque momento temporis fortuna pugnae est terga dantibus 8 qui modo secuti erant. Multi comminus congressi, multi fugientes interfecti; nec ferro tantum periere, sed in paludes quidam coniecti profundo limo cum 9 ipsis equis hausti sunt. Rex quoque in periculo fuit; nam ruente saucio equo praeceps ad terram datus, guards and in their panic brought confused rumours B.C. 200 rather than definite news to the camp.

XXXVII. The consul sent the cavalry to aid the harassed in any way they could, and himself led out the legions from the camp and forming a hollow square marched towards the enemy. Some of the cavalry wandered aimlessly about the country, misled by the shouts that rose from this place and that, others met the enemy face to face. The battle began in several places at once. The royal guard put up the stiffest fight, for by reason of the number of infantry and cavalry it was practically a regular battle and most of the Romans encountered them, since they blocked the central road. In this too the Macedonians had the advantage, because the king himself was there to urge them on, and the Cretan auxiliaries dealt many unexpected wounds, fighting in close array and according to plan against men who were scattered and not in formation. But if they had observed discretion in the pursuit, it would have meant not only success in the present engagement, but final victory in the war as well; as it was, in their greed for slaughter, following too incautiously, they met the Roman cohorts advancing under command of the tribunes, and the fleeing cavalry, as soon as they saw the standards of their friends, faced about and attacked the disordered enemy, and in a moment, the tide of battle turning, the pursuers became the pursued. Many were struck down in hand-to-hand fight, many killed in flight; and they died not by the sword alone, but some of them were swallowed up, horses and all, when they became entangled in the swamps. Even the king was in danger; for, thrown headlong to the ground when haud multum afuit quin iacens opprimeretur. Saluti fuit eques, qui raptim ipse desiluit pavidumque regem in equum subiecit; ipse, cum pedes aequare cursu fugientes non posset equites, ab hostibus ad casum regis concitatis confossus perit. Rex circumvectus paludes per vias inviaque[1] trepida fuga in castra tandem, iam desperantibus plerisque incolumem evasurum, pervenit. Ducenti Macedonum equites eo proelio periere, centum ferme capti; octoginta admodum ornati equi spoliis simul armorum relatis abducti.

A.U.C. 554

XXXVIII. Fuere qui hoc die regem temeritatis, consulem segnitiae accusarent: nam et Philippo quiescendum fuisse, cum paucis diebus hostes exhausto circa omni agro ad ultimum inopiae venturos sciret, et consulem, cum equitatum hostium levemque armaturam fudisset ac prope regem ipsum cepisset, protinus ad castra hostium ducere debuisse; nec enim mansuros ita perculsos hostes fuisse, debellarique momento temporis potuisse. Id dictu quam re, ut pleraque, facilius erat. Nam si omnibus peditum quoque copiis congressus rex fuisset, forsitan inter tumultum, cum omnes victi metuque perculsi ex proelio intra vallum, protinus inde supervadentem munimenta victorem hostem fugerent, exui castris potuerit rex; cum vero integrae copiae peditum in castris mansissent, stationes ante portas praesidiaque his wounded horse fell, he narrowly escaped being B.C. 200 trampled to death. A trooper saved him, who quickly leaped down and lifted the terrified king to the back of his own horse; he himself, since on foot he could not equal the speed of the fleeing cavalry, perished, struck down by the cavalry who rushed up at the fall of the king. The king, riding about the marshes over roads and blind paths in full flight, came at length to his camp, when nearly all had given up hope of his safe return. Two hundred of the Macedonian cavalry fell in this battle, and about one hundred were captured; about eighty horses, with their trappings, some spoils of weapons being also recovered among the booty, were driven off.

[1] per vias inviaque Drakenborch: peruias inuiasque B.

XXXVIII. There have been some who accused the king of rashness and others the consul of lack of energy on that day: Philip, they said, should have remained quiet, knowing that in a few days the enemy would be reduced to extreme need by the consumption of all the grain in the adjacent country, while the consul, after routing the enemy's cavalry and light infantry and almost capturing the king himself, should have immediately attacked the enemy's camp; for the enemy, dismayed as they were, would not have awaited his onslaught, and the war could have been finished at one stroke. This, as usual, was easier to say than to do. For if the king had made his attack with all his infantry in addition, perhaps in the confusion, when they were all rushing, beaten and panic-stricken, from the battle-field into the camp, if they had at once fled before a conquering foe that was overrunning the defences, the king might have been driven from his camp; but since his entire infantry had remained in camp, with outposts disposita essent, quid, nisi ut temeritatem regis,[1] effuse paulo ante secuti perculsos equites, imitaretur, profecisset? Neque enim ne regis quidem primum consilium, quo impetum in frumentatores palatos per agros fecit, reprehendendum foret, si modum prosperae pugnae imposuisset. Eo quoque minus est mirum temptasse eum fortunam, quod fama erat Pleuratum Dardanosque ingentibus copiis profectos domo iam in Macedoniam transcendisse; quibus si undique circumventus copiis foret, sedentem Romanum debellaturum credi poterat. Itaque secundum duas adversas equestres pugnas multo minus tutam moram in iisdem stativis fore Philippus ratus, cum abire inde et fallere abiens hostem vellet, caduceatore sub occasum solis misso ad consulem, qui indutias ad sepeliendos equites peteret, frustratus hostem secunda vigilia multis ignibus per tota castra relictis silenti agmine abit.

A.U.C. 554

XXXIX. Corpus iam curabat consul cum venisse caduceatorem et quid venisset nuntiatum est. Responso tantum dato mane postero die fore copiam conveniendi, id quod quaesitum erat, nox dieique insequentis pars ad praecipiendum iter Philippo data est. Montes, quam viam non ingressurum gravi agmine Romanum sciebat, petit. Consul prima luce caduceatore datis indutiis dimisso haud ita multo post abisse hostem cum sensisset, ignarus qua sequeretur, iisdem stativis frumentando dies aliquot consumpsit. Stuberram deinde petit atque ex and patrols stationed before the gates, what could B.C. 200

[1] regis edd.: om. B.

he have accomplished, except to imitate the rashness of the king, who had a little before pursued the scattered and fleeing cavalry? Nor would there be any criticism even of the king's original plan, of attacking the foragers scattered over the fields, had he limited his objective to success in this attack. It is less strange, too, that he tempted fortune in this way, because there was a report that Pleuratus and the Dardani had already left home with great forces and had invaded Macedonia; and if he were surrounded by these encircling forces, it might well be believed that the Roman could end the war by sitting still. So Philip, thinking it far less safe to remain in the same camp after two cavalry defeats, wanting to withdraw from there and to escape detection while so doing, at sunset sent a herald to the consul to ask a truce for burying the cavalrymen, and eluding the enemy stole away silently during the second watch, leaving numerous fires burning throughout the camp.

XXXIX. The consul was engaged in refreshing himself at the time it was announced that the herald had come and why he had come. Replying merely that in the morning there would be opportunity for a conference, he gave Philip what he sought, the chance to retire rapidly during the night and a part of the next day. He made for the mountains, choosing a road which he knew the Roman, with his heavy-armed column, would not take. At daybreak the consul sent the herald away after granting the truce, and when he learned, no long time later, that the enemy had gone, not knowing where to pursue him, he spent some days in the same camp while gathering supplies. Thence he marched to Stuberra and Pelagonia frumentum quod in agris erat convexit. Inde ad Pluinnam est progressus, nondum comperto quam regionem hostes petissent. Philippus cum primo ad Bruanium stativa habuisset, profectus inde transversis limitibus terrorem praebuit subitum hosti. Movere itaque ex Pluinna Romani et ad Osphagum flumen posuerunt castra. Rex haud procul inde et ipse vallo super ripam amnis ducto— Erigonum incolae vocant—consedit. Inde satis comperto Eordaeam petituros Romanos, ad occupandas angustias, ne superare hostes artis faucibus inclusum aditum possent, praecessit. Ibi alia vallo, alia fossa, alia lapidum congerie, ut pro muro essent, alia arboribus obiectis, ut aut locus postulabat aut materia suppeditabat, propere[1] permuniit atque, ut ipse rebatur, viam suapte natura difficilem obiectis per omnes transitus operibus inexpugnabilem fecit. Erant pleraque silvestria circa, incommoda phalangi maxime Macedonum, quae nisi ubi praelongis hastis velut vallum ante clipeos obiecit, quod ut fiat libero campo opus est, nullius admodum usus est. Thracas quoque rumpiae, ingentis et ipsae longitudinis, inter obiectos undique ramos impediebant. Cretensium una cohors non inutilis erat; sed ea quoque ipsa, ut, si quis impetum faceret, in patentem vulneri equum equitemque sagittas conicere poterat, ita adversus scuta Romana nec ad traiciendum satis magnam vim habebat, nec aperti quicquam erat quod peterent.

A.U.C. 554

[1] propere Voss: opere B.

[1] For the formation and battle tactics of the phalanx, and its advantages and disadvantages as compared with the more mobile Roman legion, see Polyb. XVIII. xxviii–xxxii. incl. Livy's account, while less explicit and detailed, is consistent with that of Polybius.

brought there from Pelagonia the grain which was in B.C. 200 the fields. He then marched to Pluinna, still ignorant as to where the enemy had gone. When Philip had established a base near Bruanium, marching from there across country he inspired sudden terror in the enemy. On that account the Romans moved from Pluinna and encamped on the Osphagus river. The king also pitched camp not far away, throwing up a rampart along the bank of a river—the natives call it Erigonus. Then, feeling certain that the Romans would move toward Eordaea, he hurried forward to gain the pass, that the Romans might not force the road, which was closed by the narrow entrance. There he threw up hasty fortifications, using sometimes a rampart, sometimes a ditch, sometimes piles of stones to serve as a wall, sometimes cut-down trees, as the nature of the terrain and the material at hand permitted, and, as he thought, rendered a road which was already naturally difficult impassable by the obstacles which he placed in all the open places. There were many forests in the neighbourhood, a great hindrance to the Macedonian phalanx,[1] which was of absolutely no use except where it could thrust, so to speak, a rampart in front of the shields with its very long spears, and for this purpose they needed open country. The Thracians too were impeded by their lances, which were likewise of great length, among the branches which projected in every direction. Only the Cretan contingent was of much service, but even they, since they could only, if there was an attack, direct their arrows against unprotected horses and riders, so against the Roman shields they lacked the power of penetration, and there were left no unexposed parts at which they could aim.

A.U.C. 554

13 Itaque id ut vanum teli genus senserunt esse, saxis passim tota valle iacentibus incessebant hostem. Ea maiore cum sonitu quam vulnere ullo pulsatio scu-
14 torum parumper succedentes Romanos tenuit. Deinde, iis quoque spretis, partim testudine facta per adversos vadunt hostes, partim brevi circuitu cum in 15 iugum collis evasissent, trepidos ex praesidiis stationibusque Macedonas deturbant et, ut in locis impeditis difficili fuga, plerosque etiam obtruncant.

XL. Ita angustiae minore certamine quam quod animis proposuerant superatae et in Eordaeam perventum, ubi pervastatis passim agris in Elimiam consul se [1] recepit. Inde impetum in Orestidem facit et oppidum Celetrum est adgressus in paene
2 insula situm; lacus moenia cingit; angustis faucibus unum ex continenti iter est. Primo situ ipso freti
3 clausis portis abnuere imperium; deinde, postquam signa ferri ac testudine succedi ad portam obsessasque fauces agmine hostium viderunt, priusquam experi-
4 rentur certamen metu in deditionem venerunt. Ab Celetro in Dassaretios processit urbemque Pelion vi cepit. Servitia inde cum cetera praeda abduxit et libera capita sine pretio dimisit oppidumque iis
5 reddidit praesidio valido imposito; nam et sita opportune urbs erat ad impetus in Macedoniam 6 faciendos. Ita peragratis hostium agris consul in

[1] consul se Harant: se B.

[1] An attack formation, in which overlapping shields, held above the heads and at the sides of the soldiers, offered protection to the men inside.

And so, when they perceived that weapons of this kind were ineffective, they harassed the enemy with the stones which lay everywhere through the whole valley. The clash of these against the shields, causing more noise than damage, delayed the advancing Romans for a little while. Then, scorning these also, part of the Romans, forming a testudo,[1] advanced in face of the enemy, while others, gaining the saddle by a short detour, dislodged the terrified Macedonians from their strong points and outposts, and even killed some of them, since flight was slow in the difficult country. B.C. 200

XL. So the pass was won with less trouble than had been anticipated, and the consul marched to Eordaea, and after laying waste the country in all directions, proceeded toward Elimia. Then he made an attack on Orestis and assaulted the town of Celetrum, which lay on a peninsula; a lake surrounds its walls; a narrow tongue of land offers the only approach from the mainland. At first the natives, relying on their position, closed the gates and refused the demand to surrender; but when they saw the standards brought forward and the testudo advancing towards the gates and the isthmus filled with a throng of hostile troops, in panic they surrendered before they tried the issue of a battle. From Celetrum he proceeded to the land of the Dassaretii and took the city of Pelium by storm. He carried off the slaves from there with the rest of the booty, dismissed the freemen without ransom, and restored the town to them, leaving a strong garrison; for the town was favourably situated as a base for conducting raids into Macedonia. So the consul, having traversed the enemy's country, led his troops back to the peaceful loca pacata ad Apolloniam, unde orsus bellum erat, copias reduxit.

A.U.C. 554

7 Philippum averterant Aetoli et Athamanes et Dardani et tot bella repente alia ex aliis locis exorta.
8 Adversus Dardanos, iam recipientes ex Macedonia sese, Athenagoran cum expeditis peditibus ac maiore parte equitatus misit, iussum instare ab tergo abeuntibus et carpendo postremum agmen segniores
9 eos ad movendos domo exercitus efficere. Aetolos Damocritus praetor, qui morae ad decernendum bellum ad Naupactum auctor fuerat, idem proximo concilio ad arma conciverat post famam equestris 10 ad Ottolobum pugnae Dardanorumque et Pleurati cum Illyriis transitum in Macedoniam, ad hoc classis Romanae adventum Oreum et super circumfusas tot Macedoniae gentes maritimam quoque instantem obsidionem.

XLI. Hae causae Damocritum Aetolosque restituerant Romanis; et Amynandro, rege Athamanum,
2 adiuncto profecti Cercinium obsedere. Clauserant portas, incertum vi an voluntate, quia regium habe-
3 bant praesidium. Ceterum intra paucos dies captum est Cercinium atque incensum; qui superfuerunt a magna clade, liberi servique, inter ceteram praedam
4 abducti. Is timor omnes qui circumcolunt Boeben paludem relictis urbibus montes coegit petere.
5 Aetoli inopia praedae inde aversi in Perrhaebiam ire pergunt. Cyretias ibi vi capiunt foedeque diriregion around Apollonia, whence he had begun the war. B.C. 200

Philip was distracted by the Aetolians, the Athamanes and the Dardani and so many wars breaking out in one place after another. Against the Dardani, who were by this time withdrawing from Macedonia, he sent Athenagoras with the light infantry and the greater part of the cavalry, with orders to press on them from behind as they withdrew, and by nibbling at their rearguard to make them less inclined to move their army from home. Damocritus, the same president who had caused the delay in declaring war at Naupactus, had, at the next council, stirred up the Aetolians to war after they had heard of the cavalry battle at Ottolobum and the invasion of Macedonia by the Dardani and Pleuratus with the Illyrians, and, in addition, of the arrival of the Roman fleet at Oreus and the naval blockade which threatened so many Macedonian cities on the coast.

XLI. These causes had reunited Damocritus and the Aetolians with the Romans; and joining Amynander, the king of the Athamanes, they set out and besieged Cercinium. The inhabitants closed its gates, whether willingly or under compulsion, since they had a royal garrison. But within a few days Cercinium was captured and burned; both the slave and free inhabitants who survived from the great disaster were carried off with the rest of the booty. Fear of the same fate drove all the dwellers around the marsh of Boëbe to leave their homes and flee to the mountains. The Aetolians then turned away and began to march toward Perrhaebia, by reason of the shortage of plunder. They captured and ruthlessly destroyed Cyretiae; they received in piunt; qui Maloeam incolunt voluntate in dedi-

A.U.C. 554

6 tionem societatemque accepti. Ex Perrhaebia Gomphos petendi Amynander auctor erat; et imminet Athamania huic urbi, videbaturque ex-
7 pugnari sine magno certamine posse. Aetoli campos Thessaliae opimos ad praedam petiere, sequente quamquam non probante Amynandro, nec effusas populationes Aetolorum nec castra, quo fors tulisset loco, sine ullo discrimine aut cura muniendi posita.
8 Itaque ne temeritas eorum neglegentiaque sibi ac suis etiam cladis alicuius causa esset, cum campestribus locis subicientes eos castra Pharcadoni urbi
9 videret, ipse paulo plus mille passuum inde tumulum
10 suis, quamvis levi munimento tutum, cepit. Cum Aetoli, nisi quod populabantur, vix meminisse viderentur se in agro hostium esse, alii palati semermes vagarentur, alii in castris sine stationibus per somnum vinumque dies noctibus aequarent, Philippus inopi-
11 nantibus advenit. Quem cum adesse refugientes ex agris quidam pavidi nuntiassent, trepidare Damocritus ceterique duces—et erat forte meridianum tempus, quo plerique graves cibo sopiti iacebant—
12 excitare alii alios, iubere arma capere, alios dimittere ad revocandos qui palati per agros praedabantur; tantaque trepidatio fuit ut sine gladiis quidam equi-13 tum exirent, loricas plerique non induerent. Ita raptim educti, cum universi[1] sescentorum aegre simul equites peditesque numerum explessent, voluntary surrender and alliance the people of B.C. 200 Maloea. After Perrhaebia, Amynander made the proposal that they march against Gomphi; Athamania lies close to this town, and it seemed possible to capture it without a great struggle. The Aetolians sought the fields of Thessaly, rich booty for the pillager, with Amynander following, though he did not approve either the haphazard raids of the Aetolians or their habit of pitching camp wherever chance suggested, without any deliberate choice of position or any care as to defence. Therefore, lest their rashness and carelessness cause any disaster to himself and his men, when he saw them encamping in the plains, exposed to attack from the town of Pharcado, he occupied a hill a little more than a mile away, that was safe even though weakly fortified. When the Aetolians, except that they were plundering, seemed scarcely to remember that they were in hostile territory, some wandering about half-armed, some lying around the unguarded camp, spending days and nights alike in sleeping and drinking, Philip fell upon them unawares. When some frightened fugitives from the fields had brought the news that he was approaching, Damocritus and the other commanders were terrified—for it was about the hour of noon, when most of them lay asleep and heavy with food—men were rousing one another, ordering them to arm, sending out messengers to recall the pillagers who were straggling through the fields, and so great was the panic that some of the cavalry went out without swords and most of them without putting on their breastplates. Led out in such haste, when they had been able with difficulty to collect six hundred out of the whole number, infantry and incidunt in regium equitatum numero, armis animisque praestantem. Itaque primo impetu fusi vix temptato certamine turpi fuga repetunt castra; caesi captique quos equites ab agmine fugientium interclusere.

[1] cum universi Gelenius: oum B.

A.U.C. 584

XLII. Philippus iam suis vallo appropinquantibus receptui cani iussit; fatigatos enim equos virosque non tam proelio quam itineris simul longitudine, simul praepropera celeritate habebat. Itaque turmatim equites, in vicem manipulos levis armaturae aquatum ire et prandere iubet, alios in statione armatos retinet, opperiens agmen peditum tardius ductum propter gravitatem armorum. Quod ubi advenit, et ipsis imperatum ut statutis signis armisque ante se positis raptim cibum caperent binis ternisve summum ex manipulis aquandi causa missis; interim eques cum levi armatura paratus instructusque stetit, si quid hostis moveret. Aetoli—iam enim et quae per agros sparsa multitudo fuerat receperat [1] se in castra—ut defensuri munimenta circa portas vallumque armatos disponunt, dum quietos hostes ipsi feroces ex tuto spectabant. Postquam mota signa Macedonum sunt et succedere ad vallum parati atque instructi coepere, repente omnes relictis stationibus per aversam partem castrorum ad tumulum ad castra Athamanum perfugiunt. Multi in hac quoque tam trepida fuga capti caesique sunt Aetolorum. Philippus, si satis diei superesset, non dubius quin Athamanes quoque exui castris

[1] receperat σ: receperant B.

cavalry, they encountered the king's cavalry, B.C. 200 superior in numbers, in equipment and in courage. And so at the first shock, barely essaying a battle, they made for the camp in disgraceful rout; those who were cut off by the cavalry were killed and captured.

XLII. Philip ordered the recall sounded as his men approached the rampart; for men and horses were wearied less by the battle than by the length and especially the excessive speed of the march. So he ordered the cavalry by troops, the companies of light infantry in succession, to go to get water and to take their meal, and kept some on guard under arms, as he awaited the column of infantry which moved more slowly on account of the weight of their equipment. When they arrived, they too were ordered to set up their standards, stack their arms, and take a hasty meal, only two or three from each company at a time being sent for water; meanwhile the cavalry and light infantry stood ready in formation in case the enemy should make any move. The Aetolians—for now even those who had been scattered through the country had returned to camp—stationed armed guards around the gates and wall to defend the fortification, while, themselves in high spirits, they watched from safety their inactive foes. After the Macedonian standards were moved and the soldiers arrayed and formed for battle began to approach the wall, all suddenly left their posts and fled through the rear part of the camp to the hill and the camp of the Athamanes. Many of the Aetolians were killed or captured in their headlong flight. If enough of the day had remained, Philip could without doubt have driven the Athamanes also from their potuissent, die per proelium, deinde per direptionem castrorum absumpto sub tumulo in proxima planitie consedit, prima luce insequentis diei hostem adgres-8 surus. Sed Aetoli eodem pavore quo sua castra reliquerant, nocte proxima dispersi fugerunt. Maximo usui fuit Amynander, quo duce Athamanes itinerum periti summis montibus per calles ignotas sequentibus

A.U.C. 554

9 eos hostibus in Aetoliam perduxerunt. Non ita multos in dispersa fuga error intulit in Macedonum equites, quos prima luce Philippus, ut desertum tumulum videt, ad carpendum hostium agmen misit.

XLIII. Per eos dies et Athenagoras regius praefectus Dardanos recipientes se in fines adeptus
2 postremum agmen turbavit; dein, postquam Dardani conversis signis direxere aciem, aequa pugna iusto proelio erat. Ubi rursus procedere Dardani coepissent, equite et levi armatura regii nullum talis [1] auxilii genus habentes Dardanos oneratosque immobilibus armis vexabant; et loca ipsa adiuvabant.
3 Occisi perpauci sunt, plures vulnerati, captus nemo, quia non excedunt temere ordinibus suis, sed confertim et pugnant et cedunt.
4 Ita damna Romano accepta bello duabus per opportunas expeditiones coercitis gentibus restituerat Philippus incepto forti, non prospero solum eventu. Minuit deinde ei forte oblata res hostium

[1] talis σ: om. B.

[1] I have supplied the object of adiuvabant in accordance with the apparent sense of the passage.

camp, but having used up the day in fighting and then in plundering the camp, he bivouacked in a nearby plain beneath the hill, intending to attack the enemy at the following dawn. But the Aetolians, still in the grip of the panic in which they had left their own camp, during the ensuing night fled in every direction. Amynander was of the greatest service, under whose leadership the Athamanes who knew the roads led them back to Aetolia over the mountains by paths unknown to the pursuing enemy. Aimless wandering in the disorderly flight threw no large number into the hands of the Macedonian cavalry, whom Philip had sent out to harass the enemy's column when at daybreak he saw the hill deserted. B.C. 200

XLIII. At the same time, moreover, Athenagoras, the king's prefect, overtaking the Dardani as they retired into their own country, threw the rear of the column into confusion; then, after the Dardani had faced about and formed their line, there was a regular battle on equal terms. When the Dardani had begun again to proceed on their march, the king's forces with their cavalry and light infantry harried the Dardani, who had no such auxiliaries, and were burdened with weapons that were hard to handle; the terrain too favoured the Macedonians.[1] A very few were killed, more wounded, none captured, for it is their way not to leave their ranks rashly, but to fight and give ground in close formation.

In this way Philip, by checking two nations with timely attacks, undertaken with boldness not merely successful in the result, had recouped the losses sustained in the Roman war. Then another piece of good fortune diminished the number of his enemies

A.U.C. 554

5 Aetolorum numerum. Scopas, princeps gentis, ab Alexandrea magno cum pondere auri ab rege Ptolomaeo missus, sex milia peditum et quingentos 6 equites mercede conductos Aegyptum vexit; nec ex iuventute Aetolorum quemquam reliquisset, ni Damocritus nunc belli quod instaret, nunc futurae 7 solitudinis admonens, incertum cura gentis an ut adversaretur Scopae, parum donis cultus, partem iuniorum castigando domi continuisset.

XLIV. Haec ea aestate ab Romanis Philippoque gesta terra;[1] classis a Corcyra eiusdem principio aestatis cum L. Apustio legato profecta Maleo superato circa Scyllaeum agri Hermionici Attalo regi 2 coniuncta est. Tum vero Atheniensium civitas, cui odio in Philippum per metum iam diu moderata erat, 3 id omne in auxilii praesentis spem effudit. Nec umquam ibi desunt linguae promptae ad plebem concitandam; quod genus cum in omnibus liberis civitatibus, tum praecipue Athenis, ubi oratio 4 plurimum pollet, favore multitudinis alitur. Rogationem extemplo tulerunt plebesque scivit, ut Philippi statuae et[2] imagines omnes nominaque earum, item maiorum eius virile ac muliebre secus omnium tollerentur delerenturque diesque festi, sacra, sacerdotes, quae ipsius maiorumque honoris 5 causa instituta essent, omnia profanarentur; loca quoque, in quibus positum aliquid inscriptumve honoris eius causa fuisset, detestabilia esse, neque

[1] terra Madvig: erant B.
[2] statuae et Madvig: statuae B.

[1] Scopas had been strategus of the Aetolians in 204 B.C., but after a political reverse had gone to Egypt and entered the service of Ptolemy.

in Aetolia. Scopas,[1] a prominent man among the tribe, sent by King Ptolemy from Alexandria with a great quantity of gold, had transported to Egypt six thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry whom he had hired; nor would he have left a single fighting-man of the Aetolians, if Damocritus, now warning them of the present war, now of the future depopulation of the state, had not by his reproofs kept at home a part of the younger men, though it is uncertain whether his action was due to concern for the state or a desire to thwart Scopas, who had not been generous with gifts to him. B.C. 200

XLIV. Such were the actions of the Romans and Philip on land during that summer; in the beginning of the same summer, the fleet, under the lieutenant Lucius Apustius, leaving Corcyra and rounding Malea joined King Attalus in the neighbourhood of Scyllaeum in the territory of Hermione. Then indeed the Athenian people, whose hatred for Philip had long been restrained by fear, in view of the prospect of aid at hand, gave full vent to their anger. Tongues ready to incite the mob are never lacking in that city; and this conduct is encouraged by popular applause, not only in free states generally, but especially in Athens, where oratory has greatest influence. They immediately proposed and the people passed a motion that all statues of Philip, all representations of him, and their inscriptions, and also those of his ancestors, male and female, should be removed and done away with, that all the feast-days, sacred observances and priesthoods which had been established in honour of him or his ancestors should be abolished; even the places in which any memorials or inscriptions in his honour had been set up should in iis quicquam postea poni dedicarique placere eorum quae in loco puro poni dedicarique fas esset;

A.U.C. 554

6 sacerdotes publicos, quotienscumque pro populo Atheniensi sociisque, exercitibus et classibus eorum precarentur, totiens detestari atque exsecrari Philippum, liberos eius regnumque, terrestres navalesque
7 copias, Macedonum genus omne nomenque. Additum decreto, si quis quid postea quod ad notam ignominiamque Philippi pertineret ferret, id omne populum
8 Atheniensem iussurum; si quis contra ignominiam prove honore eius dixisset fecissetve, qui occidisset eum iure caesurum. Postremo inclusum, ut omnia quae adversus Pisistratidas decreta quondam erant 9 eadem in Philippo servarentur. Athenienses quidem litteris verbisque, quibus solis valent, bellum adversus Philippum gerebant.

XLV. Attalus Romanique, cum Piraeum primo ab
2 Hermione petissent, paucos ibi morati dies oneratique aeque immodicis ad honores sociorum atque in iram adversus hostem fuerant, Atheniensium decretis,
3 navigant a Piraeo Andrum. Et cum in portu quem Gaurion vocant constitissent, missis qui temptarent oppidanorum animos, si voluntate tradere urbem
4 quam vim experiri mallent, postquam praesidio regio arcem teneri nec se potestatis suae esse respondebant, expositis copiis apparatuque omni urbium oppugnandarum diversis partibus rex et legatus be accursed, and that it should not be lawful to place B.C. 200 or dedicate in them thereafter anything that could lawfully be placed or dedicated in any unpolluted spot; the public priests, as often as they offered prayers on behalf of the people of Athens and their allies, their armies and fleets, should so often curse and execrate Philip, his children and his kingdom, his military and naval forces, and the whole race and name of the Macedonians. It was added to the decree that if anyone thereafter made any proposal that had to do with bringing disgrace or ignominy on Philip, the Athenian people would adopt it in toto; that if anyone said or did anything to lessen his ignominy or increase his honour, any person who slew such an one would be deemed to have slain him lawfully. Finally, it was added that all the decrees which had once been passed against the Pisistratidae [1] should be kept in force in the case of Philip. This was the Athenians' war against Philip, conducted by means of letters and words, which constitute their sole strength.

[1] Hippias and Hipparchus, tyrants of Athens in the sixth century B.C., and the traditional objects of her hatred.

XLV. Attalus and the Romans, putting in first at Piraeus after leaving Hermione, and tarrying there a few days and being loaded down with decrees as effusive in the praise of the allies as those others in condemnation of the enemy, sailed from Piraeus to Andros. And when they had anchored in the harbour which they call Gaurium, sending ashore agents to test the disposition of the people, whether they preferred to surrender the city voluntarily rather than endure an attack, after the citizens replied that the citadel was held by a garrison of the king and that they were powerless, Attalus and the Roman lieutenant landed troops and all the equip-

A.U.C. 554

5 Romanus ad urbem subeunt. Plus aliquanto Graecos Romana arma signaque non ante visa animique militum tam prompte succedentium muros terruere; 6 itaque fuga extemplo in arcem facta est, urbe hostes potiti. Et in arce cum biduum loci se magis quam armorum fiducia tenuissent, tertio die pacti ipsi praesidiumque, ut cum singulis vestimentis Delium Boeotiae transveherentur, urbem arcemque tradi- 7 derunt. Ea ab Romanis regi Attalo concessa; praedam ornamentaque urbis ipsi avexerunt. Attalus, ne desertam haberet insulam, et Macedonum fere omnibus et quibusdam Andriorum ut manerent 8 persuasit. Postea et ab Delio, qui ex pacto travecti eo fuerant, promissis regis, cum desiderium quoque patriae facilius ad credendum inclinaret animos, revocati.

9 Ab Andro Cythnum traiecerunt, ibi dies aliquot oppugnanda urbe nequiquam absumpti et, quia vix 10 operae pretium erat, abscessere. Ad Prasias—continentis Atticae is locus est—Issaeorum viginti lembi classi Romanorum adiuncti sunt. Ii missi ad populandos Carystiorum agros; cetera classis Geraestum, nobilem Euboeae portum, dum ab 11 Carysto Issaei redirent, tenuit. Inde omnes velis in altum datis mari medio praeter Scyrum insulam Icum pervenere. Ibi paucos dies saeviente Borea 12 retenti, ubi prima tranquillitas data est, Sciathum traiecere, vastatam urbem direptamque nuper a

[1] Issa was a small island off the Dalmatian coast.

ment for assaulting cities and approached the city B.C. 200 from different directions. The Roman arms and standards, which they had never seen before, and the spirit of the soldiers, so ready to advance to storm the walls, caused no small terror among the Greeks; so they straightway took refuge in the citadel and the enemy possessed the town. And after holding the citadel for two days, trusting to the strength of the place rather than to their arms, on the third day they bargained that they and the garrison be transferred to Delium in Boeotia with one garment each, and surrendered the city and the citadel. The Romans gave these to King Attalus; the booty and the ornaments of the city they took for themselves. Attalus, rather than possess a deserted island, persuaded both nearly all of the Macedonians and some of the Andrians to remain. Later on those who had already crossed under the agreement were brought back from Delium by the king's promises, since longing too for their native land increased their inclination to trust him.

From Andros they proceeded to Cythnos. After spending some days in vain in attacking the city, because it seemed scarcely worth the effort, they departed. At Prasiae—this is a place on the Attic mainland—twenty light-draft vessels of the Issaei [1] joined the Roman fleet. These were sent to ravage the territory of the Carystii, while the rest put into Geraestus, a famous port of Euboea, to wait until the Issaei should return from Carystus. Then all of them, setting sail for the open sea, went past the island of Scyros to Icos. Being delayed there a few days by strong north winds, as soon as calm weather returned, they sailed past Sciathus, a city recently looted and

A.U.C. 551

13 Philippo. Per agros palati milites frumentum et si qua alia usui esse ad vescendum poterant ad naves rettulere; praedae nec erat quicquam, nec meruerant
14 Graeci cur diriperentur. Inde Cassandream petentes primo ad Mendaeum, maritimum civitatis eius vicum, tenuere. Inde cum superato promuntorio ad ipsa moenia urbis circumagere classem vellent, saeva coorta tempestate prope obruti fluctibus, dispersi, magna ex parte amissis armamentis in terram
15 effugerunt. Omen quoque ea maritima tempestas ad rem terra gerendam fuit. Nam conlectis in unum navibus expositisque copiis adgressi urbem, cum multis vulneribus repulsi—et erat validum ibi regium praesidium—irrito incepto regressi ad Canastraeum Pallenes traiecere. Inde superato Toronae promun-
16 torio navigantes Acanthum petiere. Ibi primo ager vastatus, deinde ipsa vi capta ac direpta. Nec ultra progressi—iam enim et graves praeda naves habebant—retro unde venerant Sciathum et ab Sciatho Euboeam repetunt.

XLVI. Ibi relicta classe decem navibus expeditis sinum Maliacum intravere ad colloquium cum Aetolis 2 de ratione gerendi belli. Pyrrhias Aetolus princeps legationis eius fuit, quae ad communicanda consilia Heracleam cum rege et cum Romano legato venit.
3 Petitum ex foedere ab Attalo est ut mille milites praestaret; tantum enim numerum bellum gerenti-
4 bus adversus Philippum debebat. Id negatum Aetolis, quod illi quoque gravati prius essent ad destroyed by Philip. The soldiers, wandering around B.C. 200

the country, brought to the ships the grain and whatever food-stuffs they found; of booty there was none, nor had the Greeks done anything to deserve being plundered. Thence, on their way to Cassandrea, they held their course first for Mendaeus, the seaport of that city. Then, when they had rounded the promontory and were trying to bring the fleet up close to the city walls, a violent storm arising and the ships having been almost buried under the waves or scattered, they escaped to the shore with the loss of a great part of their rigging. This storm at sea was an omen of their fortunes on land. For when, after re-assembling the ships and landing the troops, they attacked the city, they were repulsed with considerable loss—there was a strong royal garrison there—and retiring after the failure of their enterprise they steered for Canastraeum in Pallene. Thence sailing around the cape of Torona they made for Acanthus. There they first plundered the country and then captured and sacked the town. They went no farther—for by now the ships were laden with booty—but returned to Sciathos and thence to Euboea by the way they had come.

XLVI. There they left the fleet and with ten light vessels entered the Malian gulf for a conference with the Aetolians regarding the plan of campaign. Pyrrhias the Aetolian was the head of the embassy which came to Heraclea to discuss plans with the king and the Roman lieutenant. Attalus was asked to furnish one thousand soldiers in accordance with the treaty; for he was bound to supply that number for the armies fighting against Philip. This was refused the Aetolians because they had previously populandam Macedoniam exire, quo tempore, Philippo circa Pergamum urente sacra profanaque, abstrahere eum inde respectu rerum suarum potuis-5 sent. Ita Aetoli cum spe magis, Romanis omnia pollicentibus, quam cum auxilio dimissi; Apustius cum Attalo ad classem redit.

A.U.C. 554

6 Inde agitari de Oreo oppugnando coeptum. Valida ea civitas et moenibus et, quia ante fuerat temptata, firmo erat praesidio. Coniunxerant se iis post expugnationem Andri cum praefecto Agesim-
7 broto viginti Rhodiae naves, tectae omnes. Eam classem in stationem ad Zelasium miserunt—Phthiotidis super Demetriadem promuntorium est peropportune obiectum—ut, si quid inde moverent
8 Macedonum naves, in praesidio essent. Heraclides, praefectus regius, classem ibi tenebat, magis per occasionem, si quam neglegentia hostium dedisset, 9 quam aperta vi quicquam ausurus. Oreum diversi Romani et rex Attalus oppugnabant, Romani a maritima arce, regii adversus vallem inter duas iacentem arces, qua et muro intersaepta urbs est.
10 Et ut loca diversa, sic dispari modo etiam oppugnabant: Romanus testudinibus et vineis et ariete admovendo muris, regii ballistis catapultisque et alio omni genere tormentorum tela ingerentes et pondere ingenti saxa; faciebant[1] et cuniculos et quidquid aliud priore oppugnatione expertum pro-
11 fuerat. Ceterum non plures tantum Macedones quam ante tuebantur urbem arcesque, sed etiam

[1] faciebant Kreyssig: iaciebant B.

objected to marching out to devastate Macedonia, B.C. 200 at the time when they might have compelled Philip, who was burning everything sacred and profane around Pergamum, to withdraw through concern for his own property. So the Aetolians were dismissed with hopes rather than actual assistance, the Romans making lavish promises; Apustius with Attalus returned to the fleet.

The question of an attack on Oreus was next discussed. The city was defended both by walls and, because it had been attacked before, by a strong garrison. After the capture of Andros twenty Rhodian ships, all decked, under command of Agesimbrotus, had joined the fleet. They were left on guard off Zelasium—this promontory in Phthiotis occupied a very strategic position beyond Demetrias —to watch if any movement from there was made by the Macedonian fleet. Heraclides, the king's prefect, was in command of the fleet there, intending to take advantage of any opportunity which was offered by the enemy's negligence rather than to undertake anything by open force. The Romans and King Attalus attacked Oreus from opposite sides, the Romans by way of the maritime citadel, the king's troops up the valley lying between the two citadels, where the city was guarded by a wall as well. And as they occupied different places, so they fought in different ways: the Romans by moving against the walls the mantlets, and sheds and battering-ram, the king's troops hurling missiles and huge stones with balistae, catapults, and every sort of artillery; they dug tunnels too, and whatever else had proved useful in the former siege. But the Macedonians defending the city and citadels were not only more praesentioribus animis, et castigationis[1] regis in admissa culpa et simul minarum, simul promissorum in futurum memores. Itaque cum praeter spem tempus ibi traheretur, plusque in obsidione et in operibus quam in oppugnatione celeri spei esset, 12 interim et aliud agi posse ratus legatus, relictis quod satis videbatur ad opera perficienda, traicit in proxima continentis Larisamque—non illam in Thessalia nobilem urbem, sed alteram quam Cremasten 13 vocant—subito adventu praeter arcem cepit. Attalus quoque Pteleon nihil minus quam tale quicquam in alterius oppugnatione urbis timentibus oppressit. 14 Et iam cum opera in effectu erant circa Oreum, tum praesidium quod intus erat labore adsiduo, vigiliis diurnis pariter nocturnisque et vulneribus confectum. 15 Muri quoque pars ariete incusso subruta multis iam locis prociderat; perque apertum ruina iter nocte Romani in arcem quae super portum est perru- 16 perunt.[2] Attalus luce prima signo ex arce dato ab Romanis ipse urbem invasit stratis magna ex parte muris; praesidium oppidanique in arcem alteram perfugere, unde biduo post deditio facta. Urbs regi, captiva corpora Romanis cessere.

A.U.C. 554

XLVII. Iam autumnale aequinoctium instabat; et est sinus Euboicus, quem Coela vocant, suspectus nautis. Itaque ante hiemales motus evadere inde cupientes Piraeum, unde profecti ad bellum erant,

[1] castigationis J. F. Gronovius: castigationibus B.

[2] verba in arcem, inter est et perruperunt posita in B, transp. Büttner.

---

[1] Oreus had been taken by Attalus and the Romans in 207 B.C. (XXVIII. vi. 1–6) through the treachery of the Macedonian commander.

numerous than before, but they fought with greater B.C. 200 courage, mindful at once of the king's rebuke for their former error[1] and also of his threats and promises for the future. Accordingly, when more time than was expected was being spent there, and a blockade and siege-works held out more hope than a sudden assault, the lieutenant, thinking that something else should be done in the meantime, leaving what seemed a sufficient force to complete the works, crossed to the nearest part of the mainland, to Larisa —this is not the famous Larisa in Thessaly, but another, which they call Cremaste—and by a surprise attack captured everything but the citadel. Attalus too took Pteleum when the citizens were fearing nothing of the sort, while the siege of the other city was going on. And now not only were the siege-works completed around Oreus, but the garrison which was inside was exhausted by continuous toil, by watchfulness day and night alike, and by wounds. Parts of the wall, moreover, fell in several places under the blows of the battering-ram; and the Romans, entering through the breaches by night penetrated to the citadel which is above the harbour. Attalus at daybreak, when the signal was given by the Romans from the citadel, also assailed the city, large parts of the wall having collapsed; the garrison and the townspeople fled to the other citadel, where they surrendered two days later. The city was given to the king, the prisoners to the Romans.

XLVII. The autumnal equinox was now at hand, and the Euboean gulf, which they call Coela, is dangerous to mariners. So, wanting to get away from there before the winter storms, they returned to Piraeus, whence they had set out on the campaign.

A.U.C. 554

2 repetunt. Apustius triginta navibus ibi relictis super Maleum navigat Corcyram. Regem statum initiorum Cereris, ut sacris interesset, tenuit; secundum initia et ipse in Asiam se recepit Agesimbroto et Rhodiis
3 domum remissis. Haec ea aestate terra marique adversus Philippum sociosque eius ab consule et legato Romanis adiuvantibus rege Attalo et Rhodiis gesta.

4 Consul alter C. Aurelius ad confectum bellum cum in provinciam venisset, haud clam tulit iram adversus
5 praetorem, quod absente se rem gessisset. Misso eo igitur in Etruriam ipse in agrum hostium legiones induxit populandoque cum praeda maiore quam
6 gloria bellum gessit. L. Furius, simul quod in Etruria nihil erat rei quod gereret, simul Gallico triumpho imminens, quem absente consule irato atque invidente facilius impetrari posse ratus, 7 Romam inopinato cum venisset, senatum in aede Bellonae habuit expositisque rebus gestis, ut triumphanti sibi in urbem invehi liceret petit.

XLVIII. Apud magnam partem senatus et magni-
2 tudine rerum gestarum valebat et gratia. Maiores

---

[1] See xiv. 7 above and the note.

[2] The narrative continues from xxii. 3 above.

[3] We do not know what effect the senatorial decree reported in xi. 1 above had on the imperium of Furius. Normally, he would have become a subordinate of Aurelius, and as such he would have no authority to fight without explicit orders from the consul and would be ineligible for a triumph. This is Aurelius' position. Furius seems to argue that his own imperium authorized him to act independently of the consul, and both of these claims are maintained in the debate that follows. The complicated legal question of the military status of Furius with respect to Aurelius is probably insoluble. The whole story of Furius' victory (xxi. 1–xxii. 3 above) and his Apustius left thirty ships there and sailed past Malea to Corcyra. The king waited for the day of the mysteries of Ceres,[1] that he might take part in the ceremonies; after the celebration he too departed for Asia, having previously sent Agesimbrotus and the Rhodians home. This is the record of the actions of this summer on land and sea performed against Philip and his allies by the Roman consul and lieutenant with the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians. B.C. 200

The other consul, Gaius Aurelius,[2] having arrived in his province and found the campaign finished, made no secret of his anger at the praetor for having fought in his absence.[3] Sending him accordingly to Etruria, he himself led the legions into the enemy's country, and, laying it waste, carried on the war with more booty than glory. Lucius Furius, partly because there was nothing for him to do in Etruria, partly because he was ambitious for a triumph over the Gauls, which he thought he could more easily obtain in the absence of the angry and jealous consul, when he had unexpectedly appeared in Rome, summoned the senate in the temple of Bellona,[4] gave an account of his achievements and asked that he be allowed to enter the city in triumph.

XLVIII. On many of the senators he made a favourable impression, because of the greatness of his achievements and through his personal influence.

triumph (xlvii. 6–xlix. 3 below) is rejected by some scholars as an anticipation of the events related in xxxii. 30, but their reasons seem inadequate.

[4] Magistrates and others possessing the imperium were not permitted to cross the pomerium, the religious boundary of Rome. The temple of Bellona was outside this limit, and the senate often met there under circumstances like these.

A.U.C. 554

natu negabant triumphum, et quod alieno exercitu rem gessisset et quod provinciam reliquisset cupiditate rapiendi per occasionem triumphi; id vero eum 3 nullo exemplo fecisse; consulares praecipue expectan- 4 dum fuisse consulem censebant; potuisse enim castris prope urbem positis tutanda colonia ita ut acie non decerneret, in adventum eius rem extrahere;[1] quod praetor non fecisset, senatui faciendum esse 5 ut consulem expectaret; ubi coram disceptantes consulem et praetorem audissent, verius de causa 6 existimaturos esse. Magna pars senatus nihil praeter res gestas, et an in magistratu suisque [2] auspiciis 7 gessisset, censebant spectare senatum debere. Ex duabus coloniis, quae velut claustra ad cohibendos Gallicos tumultus oppositae fuissent, cum una direpta et incensa esset, traiecturum id incendium velut ex continentibus tectis in alteram tam propinquam coloniam esset, quid tandem praetori 8 faciendum fuisse? Nam si sine consule geri nihil oportuerit, aut senatum peccasse, qui exercitum praetori dederit—potuisse enim, sicut non praetoris sed consulis exercitu rem geri voluerit, ita finire senatus consulto [3] ne per praetorem sed per consulem 9 gereretur—aut consulem, qui non, cum exercitum ex Etruria transire in Galliam iussisset, ipse Arimini

[1] extrahere Hertz: extraheret B.
[2] magistratu suisque ed. Frobeniana 1535: magistratus iusquis B.
[3] consulto Duker: consultum B.

[1] Dio (frg. 57. 81) adds that an explanation of his actions was demanded.

The older members were for refusing the triumph, B.C. 200 partly because he had fought with an army legally under another's command, partly because he had left his province as a result of his ardent desire to petition for a triumph when the opportunity offered itself; but this conduct was unprecedented;[1] the senators of consular rank especially urged that he should have waited for the consul; for he might, while defending the colony by locating his camp near the city, without committing himself to a decisive engagement, have delayed matters until the consul's arrival; the senate's proper conduct would be to wait for the consul, as the praetor had not done; when they had heard consul and praetor debating face to face, they would, they said, judge more fairly concerning the issue. A great part of the senate thought that the senators should consider only his record, and whether he had fought during his term of office and under his own auspices. When one of the two colonies which had been established as, so to speak, barriers to restrain Gallic uprisings had been sacked and burned, and the flames were about to leap over to the other, so close at hand, as from one building to another in a continuous row, what, pray, was the praetor to do? For if it was improper to take any action without the consul, either the senate was at fault for entrusting an army to the praetor—for it would have been possible to order by senatorial decree that nothing should be done by the praetor, but only by the consul, if it had been desired that the consul's army and not the praetor's should do the fighting—or else the consul was at fault, who had not joined the army at Ariminum, when he had ordered it to move from Etruria to Gaul,

A.U.C. 554

occurrerit ut bello interesset, quod sine eo geri fas 10 non esset. Non expectare belli tempora moras et dilationes imperatorum, et pugnandum esse interdum 11 non quia velis sed quia hostis cogat. Pugnam ipsam eventumque pugnae spectari debere. Fusos caesosque hostis, castra capta ac direpta, coloniam liberatam obsidione, alterius coloniae captivos recu-peratos restitutosque suis, debellatum uno proelio 12 esse. Non homines tantum ea victoria laetatos, sed diis quoque immortalibus per triduum supplicationes habitas, quod bene ac feliciter, non quod male ac temere, res publica a L. Furio praetore gesta esset.
Data fato etiam quodam Furiae genti Gallica bella.

XLIX. Huius generis orationibus ipsius amicorumque victa est praesentis gratia praetoris absentis consulis maiestas, triumphumque frequentes L.
2 Furio decreverunt. Triumphavit de Gallis in magis-tratu L. Furius praetor et in aerarium tulit trecenta viginti milia aeris, argenti centum [1] milia quingentos.
3 Neque captivi ulli ante currum ducti neque spolia praelata nec milites secuti. Omnia praeter victoriam penes consulem esse apparebat.
4 Ludi deinde a P. Cornelio Scipione, quos consul in 5 Africa voverat, magno apparatu facti. Et de agris militum eius decretum ut, quot quisque eorum annos

[1] aeris argenti centum σ : om. B.

---

[1] The dictator Camillus and his son, members of the gens Furia, had won fame in fighting the Gauls: cf. V. xlix. 6; VII. xxv. 11; Tacitus, Ann. II. lii. 8.

[2] Livy does not specify the denomination of these coins, which were probably denarii.

[3] The distribution of land mentioned in iv. 1–2 above probably included only veterans of the Italian armies. Provision is now made for those who had fought in Spain and Africa.

to participate in a war which could not be legally B.C. 200 conducted without him. The emergencies of war, they argued, do not wait for the delays and postponements of commanders, and sometimes you must fight, not because you wish it, but because the enemy compels it. The battle itself and its results should be considered. The enemy had been routed and slaughtered, their camp captured and plundered, the siege of the colony raised, the prisoners from the other colony recovered and restored to their friends, the war finished in a single battle. Not only had men rejoiced at that victory, but also a three-day period of thanksgiving had been decreed to the immortal gods, because Lucius Furius the praetor had conducted affairs, not poorly and rashly, but well and successfully. Finally, Gallic wars were by the will of fate, so to speak, entrusted to the Furii.[1]

XLIX. Through speeches of this kind, delivered by the praetor and his friends, the prestige of the consul, who was absent, was outweighed by the personal influence of the praetor, who was present, and a full session voted a triumph to Lucius Furius. Lucius Furius the praetor triumphed over the Gauls while still in office, and deposited in the treasury three hundred and twenty thousand asses of bronze, and one hundred thousand five hundred pieces[2] of silver. There were no captives led before his chariot, no spoils displayed, no soldiers in his train. Everything but the victory was in possession of the consul.

Next the games which had been vowed by Publius Cornelius Scipio during his consulship in Africa were celebrated with great splendour. It was also decreed, regarding lands for his soldiers,[3] that each

A.U.C. 554 in Hispania aut in Africa militasset, in singulos annos bina iugera agri acciperet; eum agrum
6 decemviri adsignarent. Triumviri item creati ad supplendum Venusinis colonorum numerum, quod bello Hannibalis attenuatae vires eius coloniae erant, C. Terentius Varro, T. Quinctius Flamininus, P. Cornelius Cn. f. Scipio. Hi colonos Venusiam adscripserunt.

7 Eodem anno C. Cornelius Cethegus, qui proconsul Hispaniam obtinebat, magnum hostium exercitum in agro Sedetano fudit. Quindecim milia Hispanorum eo proelio dicuntur caesa, signa militaria capta octo et septuaginta.

8 C. Aurelius consul, cum ex provincia Romam comitiorum causa venisset, non id quod animis praeceperant questus est, non expectatum se ab
9 senatu, neque disceptandi cum praetore consuli potestatem factam, sed ita triumphum decresse senatum, ut nullius nisi eius qui triumphaturus esset et non [1] eorum qui bello interfuissent, verba audiret.
10 Maiores ideo instituisse ut legati, tribuni, centuriones, milites denique triumpho adessent, ut testes [2] rerum gestarum eius cui tantus honos haberetur, populus 11 Romanus videret. Ecquem ex eo exercitu qui cum Gallis pugnaverit, si non militem, lixam saltem fuisse quem percunctari posset senatus, quid ver praetor 12 vanive adferret? Comitiis deinde diem edixit,

[1] et non Weissenborn: et B: haud σ.
[2] testes Madvig: uirtus (uirtutes) σ: om. B.

[1] Probably the commission that made the previous allotment, but Livy may have omitted a motion creating a new decemvirate.

[2] Aurelius' criticism of the procedure of the senate is surprisingly mild, but Furius had already celebrated his triumph.

should receive two iugera of land for each year of their service in Spain or Africa; the decemvirate [1] should make the distribution. Also, a commission of three was created to fill up the number of colonists for the people of Venusia, because the strength of that colony had been diminished in the Hannibalic war. The commissioners chosen were Gaius Terentius Varro, Titus Quinctius Flamininus, Publius Cornelius Scipio, the son of Gnaeus, and they enrolled the colonists for Venusia. B.C. 200

In the same year Gaius Cornelius Cethegus, who as proconsul was governing Spain, defeated a large hostile force in the territory of the Sedetani. According to report, fifteen thousand Spaniards were killed in this battle and seventy-eight standards captured.

Gaius Aurelius the consul, when he returned from the province to Rome to hold the elections, did not make the complaint that they had anticipated, that the senate had not waited for him nor given the consul an opportunity to debate with the praetor, but he did protest that they had decreed the triumph in such a way that they had heard the testimony of no one except the man who was to triumph, and not of those who had been present at the battle. Their ancestors had ordained that the lieutenants, tribunes, centurions, and even the common soldiers should attend a triumph, to the end that the Roman people might see the witnesses to the deeds of the man to whom so signal an honour was given. Was there no one from the army which had fought against the Gauls, no camp-follower at least, if there was no soldier, whom the senate could ask how much truth or untruth there was in the praetor's report? [2] He then announced the date of the elections, at which

A.U.C. 584 quibus creati sunt consules L. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Villius Tappulus. Praetores inde facti L. Quinctius Flamininus, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, Cn. Baebius Tamphilus.

L. Annona quoque eo anno pervilis fuit; frumenti vim magnam ex Africa advectam aediles curules M. Claudius Marcellus et Sex. Aelius Paetus 2 binis aeris in modios populo diviserunt. Et ludos Romanos magno apparatu fecerunt; diem unum instaurarunt; signa aenea quinque ex multaticio 3 argento in aerario posuerunt. Plebeii ludi ab aedilibus L. Terentio Massiliota et Cn. Baebio Tamphilo, qui praetor designatus erat, ter toti 4 instaurati. Et ludi funebres eo anno per quadriduum in foro mortis causa M. Valeri[1] Laevini a Publio et Marco filiis eius facti et munus gladiatorium datum 5 ab iis; paria quinque et viginti pugnarunt. M. Aurelius Cotta decemvir sacrorum mortuus; in eius locum M'. Acilius Glabrio suffectus.

6 Comitiis aediles curules creati sunt forte ambo qui statim occipere magistratum non possent. Nam C. Cornelius Cethegus absens creatus erat, cum 7 Hispaniam obtineret provinciam; C. Valerius Flaccus, quem praesentem creaverant, quia flamen Dialis erat, iurare in leges non poterat; magistratum plus quinque diebus, nisi qui iurasset in leges, non licebat 8 gerere. Petente Flacco ut legibus solveretur, sena-

[1] M. Valeri ed. Moguntina 1518: Valeri B.

[1] In that capacity he was not allowed to take any oath (Gellius, X. xv. 4), but Roman ingenuity finds a solution.

Lucius Cornelius Lentulus and Publius Villius Tappulus were chosen consuls. Then Lucius Quinctius Flamininus, Lucius Valerius Flaccus, Lucius Villius Tappulus, and Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus were elected praetors. B.C. 200

L. Also, grain was very cheap this year; a great quantity of grain which was brought from Africa was distributed to the people at two asses per modius by the curule aediles Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Sextus Aelius Paetus. They also celebrated the Roman Games with great magnificence; they repeated one day's performance; they set up in the treasury five bronze statues out of the money collected as fines. The Plebeian Games were thrice repeated entire by the aediles Lucius Terentius Massiliota and Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus, who had been chosen praetor. Funeral games lasting four days were exhibited in the forum in commemoration of the death of Marcus Valerius Laevinus, by his sons Publius and Marcus, and a gladiatorial show was given by them; twenty-five pairs of gladiators fought. Marcus Aurelius Cotta, decemvir in charge of sacrifices, died; in his stead Manius Acilius Glabrio was appointed.

It happened that both the curule aediles chosen at the election were men who could not be inaugurated at once. For Gaius Cornelius Cethegus was elected in his absence, since he was engaged in administering the province of Spain; Gaius Valerius Flaccus, who was present when he was elected, could not take the oath to observe the laws because he was the flamen of Jupiter,[1] and no magistrate was allowed to hold office for more than five days unless he had taken that oath. At the request of Flaccus that he

A.U.C. 554

tus decrevit ut si aedilis, qui pro se iuraret, arbitratu consulum daret, consules, si iis videretur, cum 9 tribunis plebis agerent uti ad plebem ferrent. Datus qui iuraret pro fratre L. Valerius Flaccus, praetor designatus. Tribuni ad plebem tulerunt plebesque
10 scivit ut perinde esset ac si ipse aedilis iurasset. Et de altero aedile scitum plebi est factum; rogantibus tribunis quos duos in Hispaniam cum imperio ad exercitus ire iuberent, ut C. Cornelius aedilis curulis be exempted from the operation of the law, the B.C. 200 senate decreed that if the aedile could find someone, approved by the consuls, who would take the oath on his behalf, the consuls, if it seemed wise to them, should request the tribunes to bring a resolution before the assembly. Lucius Valerius Flaccus, the praetor-elect, was proposed to take the oath in his brother's place. The tribunes proposed and the people voted, that it should be as if the aedile himself had sworn. Regarding the other aedile, the assembly passed a decree;[1] when the tribunes put the question what two men they would order to go to the armies in Spain, in order that Gaius Cornelius the curule aedile might come to enter upon his office, and that Lucius Manlius Acidinus might be relieved of his province after many years, the assembly ordered Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus[2] and Lucius Stertinius to exercise authority in Spain with the rank of proconsuls.
11 ad magistratum gerendum veniret, et L. Manlius Acidinus decederet de provincia multos post annos, plebes Cn. Cornelio Lentulo et L. Stertinio pro consulibus imperium esse in Hispania iussit.

[1] A plebiscitum (here scitum plebi) was strictly a vote carried in the plebeian assembly (contrast lex), but the term is used, somewhat loosely, for measures adopted by any of the assemblies. The number of such legislative bodies in Rome is debated.

[2] The name is probably an error for Gnaeus Cornelius Blasio (cf. XXXIII. xxvii. 1).

LIBRI XXXI PERIOCHA

Belli adversus Philippum, Macedoniae regem, quod intermissum erat repetiti causae referuntur hae. Tempore initiorum duo iuvenes Acarnanes qui non erant initiati Athenas venerunt et in sacrarium Cereris cum aliis popularibus suis intraverunt. Ob hoc, tamquam summum nefas commisissent, ab Atheniensibus occisi sunt. Acarnanes mortibus suorum commoti ad vindicandos illos auxilia a Philippo petierunt et Athenas oppugnaverunt, Athenienses auxilium a Romanis petierunt post pacem Carthaginiensibus datam paucis mensibus.[1] Cum[2] Atheniensium qui a Philippo obsidebantur legati auxilium a senatu petissent, et id senatus ferendum censuisset, plebe quod tot bellorum continuus labor gravis erat dissentiente, tenuit auctoritas patrum ut sociae civitati ferri opem populus quoque iuberet. Id bellum P. Sulpicio cos. mandatum est, qui exercitu in Macedoniam ducto equestribus proeliis prospere cum Philippo pugnavit. Aboedeni a Philippo obsessi ad exemplum Saguntinorum suos seque occiderunt. L. Furius praetor Gallos Insubras rebellantes et Hamilcarem Poenum bellum in ea parte Italiae molientem acie vicit. Hamilcar eo bello occisus est et milia hominum XXXV. Praeterea expeditiones Philippi regis et Sulpicii cos. expugnationesque urbium ab utroque factas continet. Sulpicius cos. bellum gerebat adiuvantibus rege Attalo et Rhodiis. Triumphavit de Gallis L. Furius praetor.

[1] paucis mensibus Rossbach: quadringentesimo anno ab urbe condita codd. praeter π, qui ab urbe condita omittit.

[2] Cum Jahn: coeptum est autem anno quingentesimo quinto. cum codd.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXI

THE causes of the renewal of the war against King Philip of Macedonia, for some time interrupted, are reported thus: At the time of the mysteries, two young Acarnanians who had not been initiated came to Athens and entered the temple of Ceres with others of their countrymen. For this reason they were killed by the Athenians as if guilty of a monstrous crime. The Acarnanians, incensed by their death, asked help of Philip to avenge them and laid siege to Athens; the Athenians asked aid of the Romans a few months after the grant of peace to the Carthaginians. When the ambassadors of the Athenians who were being besieged by Philip had asked the senate for assistance and the senate thought that it should be granted, the assembly dissenting because the long-continued toil of so many wars was a burden, the authority of the senate prevailed upon the assembly also to vote that aid be sent to the allied state. This war was entrusted to the consul Publius Sulpicius, who, leading his army to Macedonia, fought successfully with Philip in cavalry battles. The people of Abydus, besieged by Philip, slew themselves and their families after the manner of the Saguntines. Lucius Furius the praetor defeated in pitched battle the Insubrian Gauls who were in revolt and Hamilcar the Carthaginian who was stirring up war in that part of Italy. Hamilcar and thirty-five thousand men were killed in that campaign. It contains in addition the raids of King Philip and Sulpicius the consul and the captures of cities by each. The consul Sulpicius conducted the war with the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians. Lucius Furius the praetor triumphed over the Gauls.

BOOK XXXII

LIBER XXXII

A.U.C. 555

I. Consules praetoresque, cum idibus Martiis magistratum inissent, provincias sortiti sunt. L. Lentulo Italia, P. Villio Macedonia, praetoribus L. Quinctio urbana, Cn. Baebio Ariminum, L. Valerio Sicilia, L. Villio Sardinia evenit. Lentulus consul novas legiones scribere iussus, Villius a P. Sulpicio exercitum accipere; in supplementum eius quantum militum videretur ut scriberet, ipsi permissum. Praetori Baebio legiones quas C. Aurelius consul habuisset ita decretae, ut retineret eas, donec consul novo cum exercitu succederet; in Galliam ubi is venisset, omnes milites exauctorati domum dimitterentur praeter quinque milia socium; iis obtineri circa Ariminum provinciam satis esse. Prorogata imperia [1] praetoribus prioris anni, C.[2] Sergio, ut militibus, qui in Hispania, Sicilia, Sardinia stipendia per multos annos fecissent, agrum adsignandum curaret, Q. Minucio, ut in Bruttiis idem de coniurationibus quaestiones, quas praetor cum fide curaque exercuisset, perficeret et eos, quos sacrilegii compertos in vinculis Romam misisset, Locros mitteret ad suppli-

[1] prorogata imperia Gronovius: prorogato imperio B.
[2] C. Bekker: 1. B.

[1] Sergius had been praetor urbanus the year before. The legislation authorizing this distribution is not mentioned by Livy.
[2] For this episode see XXXI. xii. 1–4.

BOOK XXXII

I. The consuls and praetors, having entered upon B.C. 199 their offices on the Ides of March, drew lots for the provinces. The result gave Italy to Lucius Lentulus, Macedonia to Publius Villius, while of the praetors, the city jurisdiction fell to Lucius Quinctius, Ariminum to Gnaeus Baebius, Sicily to Lucius Valerius, and Sardinia to Lucius Villius. The consul Lentulus was directed to enlist new legions, Villius to take over the army from Publius Sulpicius; he was allowed, as addition thereto, to enroll whatever number of soldiers he saw fit. The legions which Gaius Aurelius the consul had had were decreed to the praetor Baebius, with the proviso that he should keep them until the consul with the new army should relieve him; when he arrived in Gaul, all the soldiers who had served their terms were to be sent home except five thousand of the allies; this number seemed sufficient to hold the province around Ariminum. The authority of two praetors of the preceding year was extended, that of Gaius Sergius, to permit him to organize the distribution of land to the soldiers who had served for many years in Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia,[1] and that of Quintus Minucius, to enable him to complete the inquiry[2] regarding conspiracies in Bruttium, which he had carried on as praetor with loyalty and energy, to return to Locri for punishment the men he had sent in chains to Rome after they were

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 555

cium, quaeque sublata ex delubro Proserpinae
9 essent, reponenda cum piaculis curaret. Feriae Latinae pontificum decreto instauratae sunt, quod legati ab Ardea questi in senatu erant sibi in monte Albano Latinis carnem, ut adsolet, datam non esse.
10 Ab Suessa nuntiatum est duas portas quodque inter eas muri erat de caelo tactum; et Formiani legati aedem Iovis, item Ostienses aedem Iovis, et Veliterni Apollinis et Sangus aedes, et in Herculis 11 aede capillum enatum; et ex Bruttiis ab Q. Minucio propraetore scriptum eculeum cum quinque pedibus, pullos gallinaceos tres cum ternis pedibus natos esse.
12 A P. Sulpicio proconsule ex Macedonia litterae adlatae, in quibus inter cetera scriptum erat lauream
13 in puppi navis longae enatam. Priorum prodigiorum causa senatus censuerat, ut consules maioribus hostiis, 14 quibus diis videretur, sacrificarent; ob hoc unum prodigium haruspices in senatum vocati, atque ex responso eorum supplicatio populo in diem unum indicta[1] et ad omnia pulvinaria res divinae factae.

II. Carthaginienses eo anno argentum in stipen-
2 dium impositum primum Romam advexerunt. Id quia probum non esse quaestores renuntiaverant,

[1] indicta Weissenborn: dicta B.

---

[1] This ceremonial had been practised by the member-states of the Latin League and later by them and the Romans jointly (see V. xvii. 2, etc.), and was continued after the subjugation to Rome in 338 B.C. White steers were sacrificed to Jupiter Latiaris, and the flesh was divided among the cities that were members of the league.

[2] Sangus (Semo Sancus) was a Sabine deity worshipped in Rome also; cf. VIII. xx. 8.

[3] Livy is pardonably vague about this phenomenon, but it was probably the hair on the statue in the temple that began to grow, rather than hair on the walls of the building.

found guilty of sacrilege, and to arrange to replace B.C. 199
the money stolen from the shrine of Persephone, along with the sin-offerings. The Latin Festival was repeated by order of the pontiffs, because delegates from Ardea had made complaint in the senate that the flesh of the animals sacrificed on the Alban Mount had not been given to them, as was the custom.[1]

News came from Suessa that two gates and the adjacent portion of the wall had been struck by lightning; and ambassadors from Formiae reported that the same thing had happened to the temple of Jupiter, from Ostia, to the temple of Jupiter, from Velitrae, to the shrines of Apollo and Sangus;[2] and it was said that the hair had grown in the temple of Hercules;[3] also, Quintus Minucius the propraetor wrote from Bruttium that a five-legged colt had been born, and three chicks each with three feet. Letters were brought from Macedonia, from the proconsul Publius Sulpicius, in which, among other things, it was said that a laurel had grown out of the stern of a war-ship. By reason of the former prodigies, the senate had decreed that the consuls should sacrifice full-grown victims to whatever gods it seemed wise; on account of this last event,[4] the haruspices were called into the senate, and on their advice a period of prayer was proclaimed to the people for one day, and sacrifices were performed at all the banquet tables of the gods.

II. The Carthaginians that year brought to Rome the first instalment of the tribute imposed upon them.[5] Because the quaestors reported that it was not

[4] The books of the pontiffs probably furnished no precedent.
[5] An initial payment was reported at XXX. xliv. 4.

A.U.C. 555 experientibusque pars quarta decocta erat, pecunia Romae mutua sumpta intertrimentum argenti ex-
3 pleverunt. Petentibus deinde, ut, si iam videretur senatui, obsides sibi redderentur, centum redditi obsides; de ceteris, si in fide permanerent, spes
4 facta. Petentibus iisdem, qui non reddebantur obsides, ut ab Norba ubi parum commode essent, alio traducerentur, concessum ut Signiam et Feren-
5 tinum transirent. Gaditanis item petentibus remissum, ne praefectus Gades mitteretur adversus id quod iis in fidem populi Romani venientibus cum L.
6 Marcio Septimo convenisset. Et Narniensium legatis querentibus ad numerum sibi colonos non esse et immixtos quosdam non sui generis pro colonis se gerere, earum rerum causa tresviros creare L.
7 Cornelius consul iussus. Creati P. et Sex. Aelii—Paetis fuit ambobus cognomen—et Cn. Cornelius Lentulus. Quod Narniensibus datum, ut colonorum numerus augeretur, id Cosani petentes non impetraverunt.

III. Rebus, quae Romae agendae erant, perfectis

---

[1] The quaestors melted up sample coins and the bullion proved to be 25 per cent. short in weight. This was due to the presence of base metal in the coins.

[2] The term praefectus was applied sometimes to a resident military governor, sometimes to a minor official sent by a provincial governor to administer affairs in individual communities, sometimes to an official designated to oversee civil and legal administration in a town. In Italy, communities so governed enjoyed only limited privileges. Probably a person of the last class is meant here.

[3] Marcius, a centurion, assumed command of the Roman forces in Spain after the death of the two Scipios (Cicero, pro Balbo, 34), and in 206 B.C. concluded a treaty with the people of Gades (XXVIII. xxxvii. 10).

pure silver and since a fourth part of it melted away[1] B.C. 199 while they were testing it, the Carthaginians made up the shortage in the amount of money by borrowing in Rome. At their request that, if the senate was now favourably disposed, their hostages should be returned to them, one hundred hostages were given back; hope for the rest was offered if they remained faithful. When they asked also that the hostages who were not returned should be moved from Norba, where they were not comfortable, to some other place, it was permitted them to go to Signia or Ferentinum. A concession was also made to the people of Gades, who asked that no prefect[2] should be sent to Gades contrary to what had been agreed upon with Lucius Marcius Septimus[3] when they put themselves under the protection of the Roman people. Also, when ambassadors from Narnia complained that the colonists there were not up to the number determined,[4] and that some persons of alien race, mingling with them, were conducting themselves as colonists, by reason of this report the consul Lucius Cornelius was directed to appoint a board of three to investigate. This board consisted of Publius and Sextus Aelius—both surnamed Paetus—and Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus. What had been granted to the people of Narnia, to wit, the increasing of the number of colonists, the people of Cosa asked but did not obtain.

III. The consuls transacted the necessary business

[4] The act establishing each colony determined the number of colonists assigned. The burdens imposed upon a colony were proportioned to the legal, and not to the actual number of colonists.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 555

2 consules in provincias profecti. P. Villius in Macedoniam cum venisset, atrox seditio militum iam ante irritata nec satis in principio compressa excepit. 3 Duo milia ea militum fuere, quae ex Africa post devictum Hannibalem in Siciliam, inde anno fere post in Macedoniam pro voluntariis transportata erant. Id voluntate factum negabant: ab tribunis recu- 4 santes in naves impositos. Sed utcumque, seu iniuncta seu suscepta foret militia, et eam exhaustam, 5 et finem aliquem militandi fieri aequum esse. Multis annis sese Italiam non vidisse; consenuisse sub armis in Sicilia, Africa, Macedonia; confectos iam se labore opere, exangues tot acceptis vulneribus esse. 6 Consul causam postulandae missionis probabilem, si modeste peteretur, videri dixit; seditionis nec eam 7 nec ullam aliam satis iustam causam esse. Itaque si manere ad signa et dicto parere velint, se de missione eorum ad senatum scripturum; modestia facilius quam pertinacia quod velint impetraturos.

IV. Thaumacos eo tempore Philippus summa vi oppugnabat aggeribus vineisque et iam arietem 2 muris admoturus erat; ceterum incepto absistere eum coegit subitus Aetolorum adventus, qui Archidamo duce inter custodias Macedonum moenia ingressi nec nocte nec die finem ullum erumpendi nunc in stationes nunc in opera Macedonum faciebant.

---

[1] The enlistment of volunteers from the African army was authorized at XXXI. viii. 6; their enlistment was mentioned at XXXI. xiv. 2.

[2] Here Livy resumes his account of Philip's campaign after the defeat of the Aetolians (XXXI. xlii. 9) in the autumn of the year 200 B.C.

at Rome and departed for their provinces. Publius B.C. 199
Villius, on his arrival in Macedonia, found a dangerous mutiny in the army, begun some time before and not repressed with sufficient vigour at the outset. There were about two thousand soldiers who had been brought back from Africa to Sicily after the defeat of Hannibal, and about a year later moved to Macedonia as volunteers.[1] They asserted that this had not been done with their consent; they had been put on board by their tribunes in spite of their protests. But whatever the facts were, whether their service was compulsory or voluntary, it was, they said, finished, and it was right that there be some end to their soldiering. For many years they had not seen Italy; they had grown old under arms in Sicily, Africa, Macedonia; they were now worn out by labour and exertion and drained of blood by the many wounds they had received. The consul replied that their demand for discharge seemed to have merit if properly presented; but neither this cause nor any other justified mutiny. Accordingly, if they chose to remain with the standards and obey orders, he would write to the senate regarding their discharge; they would obtain what they wanted more easily by obedience than by resistance.

IV. Philip[2] was at that time besieging Thaumaci with the greatest energy, using terraces and mantlets, and was on the point of using his battering-ram against the walls; but he was compelled to give up his enterprise by the sudden attack of the Aetolians, who, under the command of Archidamus, slipped through the screen of Macedonian patrols into the city, and never, either by night or day, ceased making sallies, now against the Macedonian outposts, now

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

A.U.C. 555

3 Et adiuvabat eos natura ipsa loci. Namque Thaumaci a Pylis sinuque Maliaco per Lamiam eunti loco alto siti sunt in ipsis faucibus, imminentes, 4 quam Coelen vocant, Thessaliae; quae transeunti confragosa loca implicatasque flexibus vallium vias, ubi ventum ad hanc urbem est, repente velut maris vasti sic universa panditur planities, ut subiectos 5 campos terminare oculis haud facile queas. Ab eo miraculo Thaumaci appellati.[1] Nec altitudine solum tuta urbs, sed quod saxo undique absciso rupibus 6 imposita est. Hae difficultates et quod haud satis dignum tanti laboris periculique pretium erat, ut 7 absisteret incepto Philippus, effecerunt. Hiems quoque iam instabat, cum inde abscessit et in Macedoniam in hiberna copias reduxit.

V. Ibi ceteri quidem data quanticunque[1] quiete temporis simul animos corporaque remiserant; 2 Philippum, quantum ab adsiduis laboribus itinerum pugnarumque laxaverat animum, tanto magis intentum in universum eventum belli curae angunt, non hostes modo timentem, qui terra marique urgebant, 3 sed nunc sociorum, nunc etiam popularium animos, ne et illi ad spem amicitiae Romanorum deficerent, et Macedonas ipsos cupido novandi res caperet. 4 Itaque et in Achaiam legatos misit, simul qui iusiurandum—ita enim pepigerant, quotannis iuraturos[2] in verba Philippi—exigerent, simul qui redderent

[1] quanticumque Gronovius: quantacumque B.

---

[1] Livy connects the name with the Greek θαῦμα, "a marvel."

[2] Livy says nothing elsewhere about this oath, but it may be mentioned by Polybius (IV. ix. 4), who speaks of a reciprocal pledge, which may have been gradually converted into an admission of Macedonian supremacy.

against their siege-works. The nature of the place, B.C. 199 too, aided them. For Thaumaci lies high above the road as you come from Pylae and the Malian Gulf by way of Lamia, on the very pass, overlooking what they call Hollow Thessaly; the country is rough as you pass through, over roads that wind their way through twisting valleys, and when you reach the city, suddenly the whole plain spreads out before you like an expanse of open sea, so that you can hardly measure with your eyes the fields beneath you. From this marvellous sight is derived the name "Thaumaci."[1] The city is defended both by its lofty site and by the fact that it lies on cliffs with steep descents on all sides. These difficulties, together with the fact that it was scarcely a due reward for so much effort and risk, induced Philip to abandon his design. Winter, too, was now at hand when he retired from there and led his troops into winter quarters in Macedonia.

V. There the rest devoted to relaxation of mind and body alike whatever little quiet time was allowed them; Philip, however great relief of mind he had obtained after the ceaseless labour of marching and fighting, was so much the more concerned and worried about the final outcome of the war, not only fearing the enemy, who was pressing upon him by land and sea, but distrusting the attitude now of his allies, now even of his subjects, fearing both that the former should revolt, in the hope of an alliance with the Romans, and that the Macedonians themselves should be inspired by a desire for revolution. So he sent ambassadors to Achaea, partly to demand the oath[2]—for they had agreed to renew annually their pledges of loyalty to him—and partly to restore

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 555

Achaeis Orchomenon et Heraean et Triphylian Eleis ademptam, Megalopolitis [1] Alipheran, contendentibus numquam eam urbem fuisse ex Triphylia, sed sibi debere restitui, quia una esset ex iis quae ad condendam Megalen polin ex concilio Arcadum contributae forent. Et cum Achaeis quidem per haec societatem firmabat; ad [2] Macedonum animos cum Heracliden amicum maxime invidiae sibi esse cerneret, multis criminibus oneratum in vincla coniecit ingenti popularium gaudio. Bellum si quando umquam ante alias, tum [3] magna cura apparavit exercuitque in armis et Macedonas et mercennarios milites principioque veris cum Athenagora omnia externa auxilia quodque levis armaturae erat in Chaoniam per Epirum ad occupandas quae ad Antigoneam fauces sunt—Stena vocant Graeci—misit. Ipse post paucis diebus graviore secutus agmine, cum situm omnem regionis adspexisset, maxime idoneum ad muniendum locum credidit esse praeter amnem Aoum. Is inter montes, quorum alterum Meropum, alterum Asnaum incolae vocant, angusta valle fluit, iter exiguum super ripam praebens. Asnaum Athenagoram cum levi armatura tenere et communire iubet; ipse in Meropo posuit castra. Qua abscisae rupes erant, statio paucorum armatorum tenebat; qua minus tuta erant alia fossis, alia vallo, alia tur-to the Achaeans Orchomenus and Heraea, and also B.C. 199.

[1] Eleis ademptam Megalopolitis Madvig: Eleis B.
[2] ad Madvig: om. B.
[3] tum edd.: cum B.

Triphylia which had been taken from the Eleans, and to the Megalopolites Aliphera, since they argued that this city had never belonged to Triphylia, but should be given back to them, since it was one of the towns that had been turned over to form the city of Megalopolis in accordance with the decree of the Arcadian council. And with the Achaeans indeed he did by these measures strengthen the alliance; but with regard to the disposition of the Macedonians, since he realized that his friendship with Heraclides was particularly a source of unpopularity for him, he heaped accusations upon him and threw him into prison, to the great joy of the people. Philip at this time made preparation with great energy, if he had ever done so before, on any occasion, and drilled both his Macedonians and his mercenary troops, and in the beginning of spring sent all his foreign auxiliaries and what light-armed troops he had, under Athenagoras, to Chaonia by way of Epirus, to hold the passes leading to Antigonea—the Greeks call them The Narrows. He himself followed a few days later with the heavier troops, and when he had reconnoitred the whole region, he determined upon a site near the river Aous as the most suitable place for a fortified base of operations. This river, flowing through a defile between ranges, one called by the natives Meropus, the other Asnaus, leaves a narrow road along the bank. He ordered Athenagoras and the light troops to hold and fortify Asnaus; he himself pitched camp on Meropus. Where the cliffs were steep, a guard of a few armed men held them; where they were less defensible, they were protected, some by ditches,

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 555

13 ribus muniebat. Magna tormentorum etiam vis, ut missilibus procul arcerent hostem, idoneis locis disposita est. Tabernaculum regium pro vallo in conspecto maxime tumulo, ut terrorem hostibus suisque spem ex fiducia faceret, positum.

VI. Consul per Charopum Epiroten certior factus, quos saltus cum exercitu insedisset rex, et ipse, cum Corcyrae hibernasset, vere primo in continentem
2 travectus ad hostem ducere pergit. Quinque milia ferme ab regiis castris cum abesset, loco munito relictis legionibus ipse cum expeditis progressus ad
3 speculanda loca postero die consilium habuit, utrum per insessum ab hoste saltum, quamquam labor ingens periculumque proponeretur, transitum temptaret, an eodem itinere, quo priore anno Sulpicius Mace-
4 doniam intraverat, circumduceret copias. Hoc consilium per multos dies agitanti ei nuntius venit T. Quinctium consulem factum sortitumque provinciam Macedoniam maturato itinere iam Corcyram traiecisse.

5 Valerius Antias intrasse saltum Villium tradit, quia recto itinere nequiverit omnibus ab rege insessis, secutum vallem, per quam mediam fertur Aous amnis,
6 ponte raptim facto in ripam, in qua erant castra regia,

---

[1] There is no real confusion in Livy's chronology. The source which Livy follows in sects. 1–4 represents Villius, the consul of 199 B.C., as reaching Greece too late to take the field in the autumn of that year (I am drawing this inference from the silence of Livy), as wintering in Corcyra, and as carrying on, in the spring of 198 B.C., before the arrival of his successor, the campaign just described. Then, in sects. 5–7, Livy quotes from Valerius Antias an entirely different story of the spring campaign of 198 B.C. This variant Livy, at least by implication, rejects. He reports, in sect. 4 and again in sect. 8, at the some by ramparts, some by towers. Numerous B.C. 199 pieces of artillery were also posted in suitable places, to keep the enemy at a distance with their missiles. The royal headquarters he established in plain sight on a hill in front of the rampart, to inspire terror in the enemy and in his own men the hope that springs from confidence.

VI. The consul had learned through Charopus the Epirote what passes the king had occupied with his army, and after wintering in Corcyra he crossed to the mainland at the coming of spring and began to lead his army against the enemy. When he was about five miles from the king's camp, after fortifying the place and leaving behind the legions, he himself went forward to reconnoitre with some light troops, and on the next day held a council, whether he should try to force a passage through the valley which was held by the enemy, although great labour and danger were involved, or should follow the same circuitous route by which Sulpicius had entered Macedonia the previous year. While he was spending many days in discussing this question, word came to him that Titus Quinctius had been elected consul, had obtained from the lots the province of Macedonia, had hastened his journey, and had already arrived at Corcyra.[1]

Valerius Antias writes that Villius, because he could not use the direct road, since the whole country was held by the king, entered the defile, followed the valley through the midst of which the river Aous flows, and, hastily throwing a bridge over the end of each of the conflicting narratives, the arrival of Quinctius in Greece, although he does not mention the election of Quinctius as consul for 198 B.C. until vii. 12 below.

A.U.C. 555

transgressum acie conflixisse; fusum fugatumque
7 regem, castris exutum; duodecim milia hostium eo proelio caesa, capta duo milia et ducentos et signa militaria centum triginta duo, equos ducentos triginta; aedem etiam Iovi in eo proelio votam, si res prospere
8 gesta esset. Ceteri Graeci Latinique auctores, quorum quidem ego legi annales, nihil memorabile a Villio actum integrumque bellum insequentem consulem T. Quinctium accepisse tradunt.

VII. Dum haec in Macedonia geruntur, consul alter L. Lentulus, qui Romae substiterat, comitia
2 censoribus creandis habuit. Multis claris petentibus viris creati censores P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus
3 et P. Aelius Paetus. Ii magna inter se concordia et senatum sine ullius nota legerunt et portoria venalicium Capuae Puteolisque, item Castrum portorium, quo in loco nunc oppidum est, fruendum locarunt colonosque eo trecentos—is enim numerus finitus ab senatu erat—adscripserunt et sub Tifatis Capuae agrum vendiderunt.

4 Sub idem tempus L. Manlius Acidinus ex Hispania

[1] Livy now records the events in Rome of the year 199 B.C.

[2] The censors could determine also a citizen's classification on the census lists, and so could degrade an individual by placing him in a lower classification. This was accomplished by placing a particular mark (nota) opposite his name on the rolls. But in Livy here, this reference is to membership of the Senate only.

[3] Capua was not a port, and portoria venalicium can not then refer to customs-duties, but must mean some other form of tax on merchandise, most probably a sales-tax of some kind. The town meant in the next clause cannot be identified, but it has been conjectured that it was a town which grew out of one of Hannibal's semi-permanent camps (Pliny, N.H. III. 95). If so, it may have been a harbour, and portorium would have its ordinary meaning of a "port-tax." My translation takes it thus, and regards Castrum as the river to the bank on which the king's camp lay, B.C. 199

crossed and engaged the enemy; that he defeated the king and put him to flight and expelled him from his camp; that he killed twelve thousand of the enemy in that battle and captured two thousand two hundred, together with one hundred thirty-two standards and two hundred thirty horses; and that he vowed a temple to Jupiter in this battle, if success attended him. The other Greek and Latin writers, at least those whose annals I have consulted, report that Villius did nothing worthy of remark, but handed over to the next consul, Titus Quinctius, the war in the same state that he had received it.

VII. While this was happening in Macedonia,[1] the other consul, Lucius Lentulus, who had remained at Rome, held the meeting for the election of censors. Although many distinguished men were candidates, Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus and Publius Aelius Paetus were elected censors. They selected the members of the senate in complete harmony with one another and without putting the brand of infamy[2] on any man, let the contract for the collection of the sales-tax at Capua and Puteoli and the port-duties of Castra,[3] where there is now a town, and for this place enrolled three hundred colonists—for this number had been fixed by the senate—and sold the land of Capua at the foot of Mount Tifata.

At this same time Lucius Manlius Acidinus, on shorter genitive of Castra. Possibly we should read Castrum Portorium (cf. Castrum Novum in XXXVI. iii. 6), but this leaves fruendum with no obvious construction. There is corruption in the text of the earlier part of the sentence, and perhaps it extends into this clause; in this case certainty as to the meaning is probably unattainable.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 555

decedens, prohibitus a P. Porcio Laeca tribuno plebis ne ovans rediret, cum ab senatu impetrasset, privatus urbem ingrediens mille ducenta pondo argenti, triginta pondo ferme auri in aerarium tulit.

5 Eodem anno Cn. Baebius Tamphilus,[1] qui ab C. Aurelio, consule anni prioris, provinciam Galliam acceperat, temere ingressus Gallorum Insubrum fines prope cum toto exercitu est circumventus: supra sex milia et septingentos milites amisit;
6 tanta ex eo bello, quod iam timeri desierat, clades
7 accepta est. Ea res L. Lentulum consulem ab urbe excivit. Qui ut in provinciam venit plenam tumultus, trepido exercitu accepto praetorem multis probris increpitum provincia decedere atque abire Romam
8 iussit. Neque ipse consul memorabile quicquam gessit, comitiorum causa Romam revocatus; quae ipsa per M. Fulvium et M'. Curium tribunos plebis
9 impediebantur, quod T. Quinctium Flamininum consulatum ex quaestura petere non patiebantur:
10 iam aedilitatem praeturamque fastidiri, nec per honorum gradus, documentum sui dantes, nobiles homines tendere ad consulatum, sed transcendendo

[1] Tamphilus Sigonius: pamphilus B.

---

[1] Manlius, like Lentulus (XXXI. xx.), had commanded in Spain after the return of Scipio (XXVIII. xxxviii. 1), and the situations of the two men, with respect to a triumph, were similar. The opposition of Laeca is more successful than that of Sempronius in the other case.

[2] Until the enactment of the lex Villia annalis in 180 B.C. (XL. xliv. 1), custom alone controlled the sequence in which the offices were held, though sect. 11 below suggests that there were certain legal conditions of eligibility. However, the later legislation that created the cursus honorum merely gave his return from Spain, was prevented by Publius B.C. 199

Porcius Laeca, tribune of the people, from entering the city in ovation,[1] although the privilege had been granted him by the senate, and, entering the city as a private person, deposited in the treasury twelve hundred pounds of silver and about thirty pounds of gold.

During the same year, Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus, who had succeeded Gaius Aurelius, consul of the preceding year, as governor of the province of Gaul, rashly invaded the territory of the Insubrian Gauls and was cut off with almost his entire army; he lost more than six thousand seven hundred men; such a disaster was suffered in a war that no one any longer feared. This event summoned Lucius Lentulus the consul from the city. When he arrived in a province full of terror and had taken over a panic-stricken army, he roundly upbraided the praetor and ordered him to leave the province and return to Rome. Nor did the consul, even, accomplish anything worth recording, being recalled to Rome to hold the elections; the actual meetings were blocked by the plebeian tribunes Marcus Fulvius and Manius Curius, because they would not allow Titus Quinctius Flamininus to stand for the consulship immediately after the quaestorship:[2] the aedileship and praetorship, they said, were already treated with contempt, and the nobles, without passing through the offices in succession, and so giving proof of their worth, were aiming straight at the consulship and, leaping over the intermediate stages, were making the legal form to the prevailing practice, which was that the offices of quaestor, aedile, praetor, and consul should normally be held in that order.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 555
11 media summa imis continuare. Res ex campestri certamine in senatum pervenit. Patres censuerunt, qui honorem quem sibi capere per leges liceret peteret, in eo populo creandi quem velit potestatem 12 fieri aequum esse. In auctoritate patrum fuere tribuni. Creati consules Sex. Aelius Paetus et 13 T. Quinctius Flamininus. Inde praetorum comitia habita. Creati L. Cornelius Merula, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, C. Helvius,[1] qui aediles plebis fuerant. Ab iis ludi plebeii instaurati; et 14 epulum Iovis fuit ludorum causa. Et ab aedilibus curulibus C. Valerio Flacco, flamine Diali, et C. Cornelio Cethego ludi Romani magno apparatu facti.
15 Ser. et C. Sulpicii[2] Galbae pontifices eo anno mortui sunt; in eorum locum M. Aemilius Lepidus et Cn. Cornelius Scipio pontifices suffecti sunt.

A.U.C. 556
VIII. Sex. Aelius Paetus T. Quinctius Flamininus magistratu inito senatum in Capitolio cum habuissent, decreverunt patres, ut provincias Macedoniam atque Italiam consules compararent inter se sortirenturve;
2 utri eorum Macedonia evenisset, in supplementum legionum tria milia militum Romanorum scriberet et trecentos equites, item sociorum Latini nominis
3 quinque milia peditum, quingentos equites. Alteri

[1] C. Helvius Gelenius: caelus B: caelius B^2.
[2] et C. Sulpicii Galbae Sigonius: sulpicius et galba B.

---

[1] The centuriate assembly met in the Campus Martius: hence campestri.

[2] The phrase per leges liceret may be rather negative in force: "it was not expressly forbidden." No legislation fixing eligibility qualifications is known to us antedating the lex Villia (see note to sect. 9 above), and had there been age limits, Flamininus, who was about thirty years of age (XXXIII. xxxiii. 3), would probably have been excluded by them. The highest distinctions continuous with the lowest. B.C. 199

After being debated in the assembly,[1] the matter was referred to the senate. The Fathers voted that it seemed proper that the right should reside in the people to elect anyone they chose who sought an office it was legally permissible to him to hold.[2] The tribunes yielded to the senate's will. Sextus Aelius Paetus and Titus Quinctius Flamininus were chosen consuls. Then the praetorian elections were held. The choice fell on Lucius Cornelius Merula, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, Marcus Porcius Cato, and Gaius Helvius, who had been plebeian aediles.[3] By them the Plebeian Games were repeated, and a banquet to Jupiter was held on the occasion of the games. Also, the Roman Games were celebrated with great splendour by the curule aediles Gaius Valerius Flaccus (who was Flamen Dialis) and Gaius Cornelius Cethegus. Servius and Gaius Sulpicius Galba, pontiffs, died that year; in their place Marcus Aemilius Lepidus and Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio were appointed pontiffs.

VIII. When Sextus Aelius Paetus and Titus B.C. 198
Quinctius Flamininus had been inaugurated and had convened the senate on the Capitoline, the senate decreed that the consuls should arrange between themselves or cast lots for the provinces of Macedonia and Italy; whichever of them was allotted Macedonia was authorized to enlist, as reinforcement to the legions, three thousand Roman infantry and three hundred cavalry, and besides five thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry of the allies of phrase then may refer to restrictions such as that which limited the tribunate to plebeians.

[3] The clause refers to Cato and Helvius alone.

a.u.c. 556

consuli novus omnis exercitus decretus. L. Lentulo, prioris anni consuli, prorogatum imperium, vetitusque aut ipse provincia decedere prius aut veterem deducere exercitum, quam cum legionibus novis consul venisset. Sortiti consules provincias; Aelio Italia, Quinctio Macedonia evenit. Praetores L.[1] Cornelius Merula urbanam, M. Claudius Siciliam, M. Porcius Sardiniam, C. Helvius Galliam est sortitus. Dilectus inde haberi est coeptus; nam praeter consulares exercitus praetoribus[2] quoque iussi scribere milites erant, Marcello in Siciliam quattuor milia peditum socium et Latini nominis et trecentos equites, Catoni in Sardiniam ex eodem genere militum duo milia peditum, ducentos equites, ita ut ii praetores ambo cum in provincias venissent, veteres dimitterent pedites equitesque.

Attali deinde regis legatos in senatum consules introduxerunt. Ii regem classe sua copiisque omnibus terra marique rem Romanam iuvare quaeque imperarent Romani consules, impigre atque oboedienter ad eam diem fecisse cum exposuissent, vereri dixerunt, ne id praestare ei per Antiochum regem ultra non liceret; vacuum namque praesidiis navalibus terrestribusque regnum Attali Antiochum invasisse. Itaque Attalum orare patres conscriptos, si sua classi suaque opera uti ad Macedonicum bellum vellent, mitterent ipsi praesidium ad regnum eius tutandum; si id nollent, ipsum ad sua defendenda cum

[1] L. edd.: t. B.
[2] praetoribus Crévier: praetores B.

the Latin confederacy. An entirely new army was B.C. 198 provided for the other consul. The command of Lucius Lentulus, consul of the previous year, was extended, and he was ordered not to leave the province himself or to discharge the veteran troops until the consul arrived with the new legions. The consuls drew lots for the provinces: Italy fell to Aelius, Macedonia to Quinctius. The praetors then drew, Lucius Cornelius Merula receiving the city jurisdiction, Marcus Claudius Sicily, Marcus Porcius Sardinia, Gaius Helvius Gaul. They then began to conduct the levy; for in addition to the consular armies the enlistment of troops for the praetors as well was ordered; for Marcellus, for service in Sicily, four thousand infantry of the allies and the Latin confederacy and three hundred cavalry; for Cato, two thousand infantry and two hundred cavalry from the same source for Sardinia, so that these two praetors, on arrival in their provinces, could send home their veteran infantry and cavalry.

The consuls then presented to the senate ambassadors from King Attalus. When they had explained that the king was aiding the Roman cause on land and sea with his fleet and all his forces, and had up to that day zealously and loyally performed whatever the Roman consuls ordered, they said that there was ground for fear that by reason of the activity of King Antiochus he could not guarantee to continue; for Antiochus had invaded the kingdom of Attalus when it was stripped of the protection of its navy and army. Therefore Attalus begged the senators, if they wished to employ his fleet and forces for the Macedonian war, themselves to send forces to defend his kingdom; if they did not, to permit him to return

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 556

12 classe ac reliquis copiis redire paterentur. Senatus legatis ita responderi iussit: quod rex Attalus classe copiisque aliis duces Romanos iuvisset, id gratum
13 senatui esse; auxilia nec ipsos missuros Attalo adversus Antiochum, socium et amicum populi Romani, nec Attali auxilia retenturos ultra, quam
14 regi commodum esset; semper populum Romanum alienis rebus arbitrio alieno usum; et principium et finem in potestatem ipsorum, qui ope sua velint
15 adiutos Romanos, esse; legatos ad Antiochum missuros, qui nuntient Attali naviumque eius et militum opera adversus Philippum communem
16 hostem uti populum Romanum; gratum eum facturum senatui, si regno Attali abstineat belloque absistat; aequum esse socios et amicos populi Romani reges inter se quoque ipsos pacem servare.

IX. Consulem T. Quinctium ita habito dilectu, ut eos fere legeret, qui in Hispania aut Africa meruissent, spectatae virtutis milites, properantem in provinciam prodigia nuntiata atque eorum procuratio Romae
2 tenuerunt. De caelo tacta erant via publica Veis, forum et aedes Iovis Lanuvi, Herculis aedes Ardeae, Capuae murus et turres et aedes, quae alba dicitur;
3 caelum ardere visum erat Arreti; terra Velitris trium iugerum spatio caverna ingenti desederat; Suessae Auruncae nuntiabant agnum cum duobus capitibus natum et Sinuessae porcum cum[1] humano to defend his possessions with his fleet and other troops. B.C. 196

[1] porcum cum Duker: porcum B.

The senate ordered this reply given the ambassadors: that the senate appreciated the fact that King Attalus had aided the Roman generals with his fleet and other forces; that they would neither themselves send aid to Attalus against Antiochus, an ally and friend of the Roman people, nor keep Attalus' troops longer than was convenient for the king; that the Roman people had always employed the property of others at the pleasure of those others; that both the beginning and the end of rendering assistance was under the control of those who wished the Roman people to enjoy their aid; that they would send ambassadors to Antiochus to point out that the Roman people was employing the aid of Attalus and his ships and soldiers against the common enemy Philip; that he would oblige the senate by keeping away from the kingdom of Attalus and refraining from war, and that it was proper that kings who were allies and friends of the Roman people should likewise be at peace with one another.

IX. The consul Titus Quinctius, when he had conducted his levy in such a way as to select generally soldiers of tried courage who had served in Spain or Africa, and was hastening his departure for his province, was detained by reports of prodigies and by their expiation. Lightning struck a public highway at Veii, the forum and temple of Jupiter at Lanuvium, the temple of Hercules at Ardea, the wall and towers and the so-called "White Temple" at Capua; flames were seen in the sky at Arretium; the earth subsided in a great cavern three iugera in extent at Velitrae; at Suessa Aurunca men said that a two-headed lamb was born, and at Sinuessa

A.U.C. 556

4 capite. Eorum prodigiorum causa supplicatio unum diem habita, et consules rebus divinis operam dederunt placatisque diis in provincias profecti sunt,
5 Aelius cum Helvio praetore in Galliam; exercitumque ab L. Lentulo acceptum, quem dimittere debebat, praetori tradidit, ipse novis legionibus, quas secum adduxerat, bellum gesturus. Neque memorabilis rei quicquam gessit.[1]
6 T. Quinctius alter consul maturius quam priores soliti erant consules, a Brundisio cum tramisisset, Corcyram tenuit cum octo milibus peditum, equitibus
7 octingentis.[2] Ab Corcyra in proxima Epiri quinqueremi traiecit et in castra Romana magnis itineri-
8 bus contendit. Inde Villio dimisso paucos moratus dies, dum se copiae ab Corcyra adsequerentur, consilium habuit, utrum recto itinere per castra
9 hostium vim facere conaretur, an ne temptata quidem re tanti laboris ac periculi per Dassaretios potius Lyncumque tuto circuitu Macedoniam intraret.
10 Vicissetque ea sententia, ni timuisset, ne, cum a mari longius recessisset, emisso e manibus hoste, si, quod antea fecerat, solitudinibus silvisque se tutari rex voluisset, sine ullo effectu aestas extraheretur.
11 Utcumque esset igitur, illo ipso tam iniquo loco adgredi hostem placuit. Sed magis fieri id placebat, quam, quomodo fieret, satis expediebant.

[1] gessit Madvig: gessit et B.
[2] octingentis Glareanus: d B.

---

[1] The narrative continues from the arrival of Quinctius (vi. 4 above); see the note.

a pig with a man's head. By reason of these prodigies a day of prayer was proclaimed, and the consuls attended to the sacrifices and, having appeased the gods, departed to their provinces, Aelius with the praetor Helvius to Gaul; and the army which he received from Lucius Lentulus, and which he was under obligation to discharge, he turned over to the praetor, intending himself to conduct the war with the new legions which he had brought with him. Nor did he accomplish anything noteworthy. B.C. 198

When the other consul, Titus Quinctius, had crossed from Brundisium earlier than previous consuls had been wont to leave, he proceeded to Corcyra with eight thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry.[1] From Corcyra he crossed in a quinquereme to the nearest parts of Epirus and hastened rapidly to the Roman camp. There he delayed a few days after sending Villius home, until the troops from Corcyra overtook him, and held a council, whether to attempt to force a passage straight through the enemy's camp or, without even trying so difficult and dangerous a feat, to proceed into Macedonia rather by the safe but longer route through the Dassaretii and by way of Lyncus. And this latter view would have prevailed had there not been the fear that, when he had moved farther from the sea, he would let the enemy slip from his grasp, if, as had happened before, the king preferred to safeguard himself in wildernesses and forests, and the summer would be spent in vain. Whatever might then be the result, it was decided to attack the enemy, even on this very unfavourable terrain. But the council was firmer in its resolution to do this than clear as to how to accomplish it.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 556

X. Diesque quadraginta sine ullo conatu sedentes in conspectu hostium absumpserant. Inde spes data Philippo est per Epirotarum gentem temp-
2 tandae pacis; habitoque concilio delecti ad eam rem agendam Pausanias praetor et Alexander magister equitum consulem et regem, ubi in artissimas ripas Aous cogitur amnis, in colloquium adduxerunt.
3 Summa postulatorum consulis erat: praesidia ex civitatibus rex deduceret; iis, quorum agros urbesque populatus esset, redderet res quae comparerent;
4 ceterorum aequo arbitrio aestimatio fieret. Philippus aliam aliarum civitatium condicionem esse respondit: quas ipse cepisset, eas liberaturum; quae sibi traditae a maioribus essent, earum here-
5 ditaria ac iusta possessione non excessurum. Si quas quererentur belli clades eae civitates, cum quibus bellatum foret, arbitrio quo vellent populorum,
6 cum quibus pax utrisque fuisset, se usurum. Consul nihil ad id quidem arbitro aut iudice opus esse dicere: cui enim non apparere ab eo, qui prior arma intulisset, iniuriam ortam, nec Philippum ab ullis bello laces-
7 situm priorem vim omnibus fecisse? Inde cum ageretur, quae civitates liberandae essent, Thessalos primos omnium nominavit consul. Ad id vero adeo accensus indignatione est rex, ut exclamaret: "Quid victo
8 gravius imperares, T. Quincti?" atque ita se ex colloquio proripuit; et temperatum aegre est, quin

[1] The exact significance of these titles, as applied to these individuals, is unknown.

X. Thus, sitting in sight of the enemy, they had B.C. 198 wasted forty days without attempting anything. And so Philip was encouraged to try peace proposals through the mediation of the people of Epirus, and, after a council had been called, Pausanias the praetor and Alexander the master of the horse,[1] chosen for the purpose, brought the consul and the king together in a conference at the point where the river Aous is confined within its narrowest course. The substance of the consul's demands was this: The king should withdraw his garrisons from the cities; he should restore what property was recoverable to those whose lands and towns he had ravaged; a valuation should be made of the rest by an impartial board. Philip replied that the status of the several cities was not uniform: those which he had himself captured, he would set free; of those which he had received from his forefathers he would not surrender his hereditary and lawful possession. If these states with which he had fought complained of any losses due to war, he would submit to arbiters chosen by them from nations with which both parties were at peace. The consul responded that for this purpose there was no need of any arbiter or umpire: for to whom was it not evident that he who had been the aggressor in war inflicted the injury, and that Philip, attacked by none, had first waged war on all? Then, when they came to discuss what states were to be set free, the consul named the Thessalians before all the rest. At this the king became so incensed with rage that he exclaimed, "What heavier command, Titus Quinctius, could you lay upon a beaten foe?" and so rushed from the conference; and he was with difficulty restrained from beginning the

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 556

missilibus, quia dirempti medio amni fuerant, pugnam 9 inter se consererent. Postero die per excursiones ab stationibus primo in planitie satis ad id patenti
10 multa levia commissa proelia sunt; deinde recipientibus se regiis in arta et confragosa loca aviditate accensi certaminis eo quoque Romani penetravere.
11 Pro his ordo et militaris disciplina et genus armorum erat, aptum[1] tegendis corporibus; pro hoste loca et catapultae ballistaeque in omnibus prope rupibus 12 quasi in muro dispositae. Multis hinc atque illinc vulneribus acceptis, cum etiam, ut in proelio iusto, aliquot cecidissent, nox pugnae finem facit.

XI. Cum in hoc statu res esset, pastor quidam a Charopo, principe Epirotarum, missus deducitur
2 ad consulem. Is se in eo saltu, qui regiis tum teneretur castris, armentum pascere solitum ait omnes montium eorum amfractus callesque nosse.
3 Si secum aliquos consul mittere velit, se non iniquo nec perdifficili aditu super caput hostium eos educ-
4 turum.[2] Haec ubi consul audivit, percunctatum ad Charopum mittit, satisne credendum super tanta re agresti censeret. Charopus renuntiari iubet, ita crederet, ut suae potius omnia quam illius potestatis
5 essent. Cum magis vellet credere quam auderet mixtumque gaudio et metu animum gereret, auctoritate
6 motus Charopi experiri spem oblatam statuit et, ut

[1] aptum Gelenius: amplum B.
[2] educturum Gronovius: deducturum B.

battle with missiles, since they were separated by B.C. 198 the intervening river. The next day, in consequence of sallies from the outposts, there were numerous slight skirmishes in the plain, which afforded ample space for them; then, as the royal forces withdrew to the steep and rugged hillsides, the Romans too, carried away by their zest for combat, forced their way to the same places. On their side were the advantages of order and discipline and armour adapted to affording protection to the wearer; on the enemy's, the terrain and the catapults and ballistae ranged on almost all the cliffs as along a wall. When many had been wounded on both sides, and a considerable number had even fallen, as in a regular engagement, night put an end to the fighting.

XI. When matters were in this state, a shepherd, sent by Charopus, a leading man of Epirus, was brought before the consul. He said that he had been accustomed to pasture his flocks in the valley which the king's camp then occupied, and knew all the tracks and paths of those hills. If the consul wished to send some men with him, he would guide them by a road, quite level and not very difficult, to a place commanding the enemy's position. The consul, on hearing this, sent to Charopus to inquire whether he thought the shepherd should be trusted in so important a matter. Charopus ordered the message back to be that he should trust him, but only so far as to keep the control of the situation in his own hands rather than in the shepherd's. Wishing, rather than venturing, to trust him, and with feelings of mingled joy and apprehension, he was persuaded by the assurances of Charopus and determined to use the chance presented to him,

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 556

averteret regem[1] ab suspicione, biduo insequenti lacessere hostem dispositis ab omni parte copiis succedentibusque integris in locum defessorum non 7 destitit. Quattuor milia inde lecta peditum et trecentos equites tribuno militum tradit. Equites quoad loca patiantur ducere iubet; ubi ad invia equiti ventum sit, in planitie aliqua locari equitatum,
8 pedites, qua dux monstraret viam, ire; ubi, ut polliceatur, super caput hostium perventum sit, fumo dare signum nec antea clamorem tollere, quam ab se signo recepto pugnam coeptam arbitrari posset.
9 Nocte itinera fieri iubet—et pernox[2] forte luna erat—interdiu cibi quietisque sumeret tempus. Ducem promissis ingentibus oneratum, si fides extet, vinctum
10 tamen tribuno tradit. His copiis ita dimissis eo intentius Romanus undique instat, capit[3] stationes.

XII. Interim die tertio cum verticem quem petierant Romani cepisse ac tenere se fumo significarent, tum vero trifariam divisis copiis consul valle media cum militum robore succedit, cornua dextra laevaque admovet castris; nec segnius hostes obviam eunt.
2 Et dum aviditate certaminis provecti extra munitiones pugnant, haud paulo superior est Romanus miles et virtute et scientia et genere armorum;

[1] regem Harant: rem B.
[2] pernox edd.: per noctem B.
[3] No entirely satisfactory emendation of capit of B has been proposed.

[1] The corruption in the text makes the meaning uncertain.

and, to prevent the king from suspecting, he did not B.C. 198 cease for two successive days to attack the enemy, posting detachments on all sides and sending fresh troops to relieve the weary. Then he put a tribune in command of four thousand picked infantry and three hundred cavalry. He ordered him to take the cavalry as far as the ground permitted; when the road became impassable for cavalry, he should leave them on some level spot and go with the infantry wherever the guide conducted them; when he reached, as the guide promised, the place above the enemy, the tribune should send up a smoke-signal but raise no shout until, after the answering signal had been received from him, he could judge that the battle had begun. He instructed the tribune to march by night—and the moon happened to be full—and by day to take time for food and rest. The guide, loaded with magnificent promises, if he should keep faith, but nevertheless in chains, he turned over to the tribune. Having thus sent out his troops, the Roman pressed the attack the more vigorously from all sides, selected vantage-grounds.[1]

XII. Meanwhile, on the third day, when the Romans had sent up the smoke-signal that they had reached and were holding the height which they had sought, then in earnest the consul formed his army in three columns and marched with the flower of his troops up the middle of the valley and hurled his right and left wings against the camp; the enemy came to meet him with no less vigour. And while, carried forward by their desire to fight, they were struggling outside the breastworks, the Roman army enjoyed no small advantage in courage and skill and character of weapons; but after the

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

a.u.c. 556

3 postquam multis vulneratis interfectisque recepere se regii in loca aut munimento aut natura tuta, verterat periculum in Romanos temere in loca iniqua nec
4 faciles ad receptum angustias progressos. Neque impunita temeritate inde recepissent sese, ni clamor primum ab tergo auditus, dein pugna etiam coepta
5 amentes repentino terrore regios fecisset. Pars in fugam effusi sunt; pars magis quia[1] locus fugae deerat, quam quod animi satis esset ad pugnam, cum substitissent, ab hoste et a fronte et ab tergo
6 urgente circumventi sunt. Deleri totus exercitus
7 potuit, si fugientes persecuti victores essent; sed equitem angustiae locorumque asperitas, peditem
8 armorum gravitas impediit. Rex primo effuse ac sine respectu fugit; dein quinque milium spatium progressus, cum ex iniquitate locorum, id quod erat, suspicatus esset, sequi non posse hostem, substitit in tumulo quodam dimisitque suos per omnia iuga
9 vallesque, qui palatos in unum colligerent. Non plus duobus milibus hominum amissis cetera omnis multitudo, velut signum aliquod secuta, in unum cum convenisset, frequenti agmine petunt Thessaliam.
10 Romani quoad tutum fuit insecuti caedentes spoliantesque caesos, castra regia, etiam sine defensoribus difficili aditu, diripiunt; atque ea nocte in suis castris manserunt.

XIII. Postero die consul per ipsas angustias, quas inter valle se[2] flumen insinuat, hostem sequitur.

[1] magis quia Muretus: quia magis B.
[2] valle se Weissenborn: valles B.

king's troops, when many had been wounded and killed, retired to positions strengthened by art or strong by nature, the danger recoiled upon the Romans, who pushed forward impetuously over unfavourable ground and cramped places that hindered easy withdrawal. Nor would they have succeeded in getting away without suffering for their rashness had not first a shout been heard from the rear and then an attack from that side too driven the king's troops mad with sudden panic. Part broke in a rout; others, when they had made a stand, more because they had no place to flee than because they had sufficient will to fight, were cut off by the enemy pressing on from both front and rear. The whole army could have been destroyed if the victors had pursued the routed enemy; but the narrow roads and the rough country hindered the cavalry, the weight of their arms the infantry. At first the king fled headlong and without looking back; then, having travelled five miles, suspecting what proved to be true, that the enemy could not follow on account of the unfavourable ground, he stopped on a certain hill and sent out messengers throughout the ridges and valleys to collect the stragglers in one place. When all the army (except not more than two thousand men who were lost) had come to the same place, as if following some signal, they made for Thessaly in solid column. The Romans followed as far as it was safe, killing and despoiling the slain, and plundered the king's camp, which, even when undefended, was difficult to approach; and spent that night in their own camp. B.C. 198

XIII. The next day the consul followed the enemy along the defile through which the river makes its

A.U.C. 556

2 Rex primo die ad castra Pyrrhi pervenit; locus quem ita vocant est in Triphylia terrae Molottidis. Inde postero die—ingens iter agmini, sed metus urgebat—
3 in montes Lyncon perrexit. Ipsi Epiri sunt, interiecti Macedoniae Thessaliaeque; latus, quod vergit in Thessaliam, oriens spectat, septentrio a Macedonia obicitur. Vestiti frequentibus silvis sunt; iuga summa campos patentes aquasque perennes habent.
4 Ibi stativis rex per aliquot dies habitis fluctuatus animo est, utrum protinus in regnum se reciperet,
5 an praeverti in Thessaliam posset. Inclinavit sententia ut in Thessaliam agmen demitteret, Triccamque proximis limitibus petit; inde obvias urbes
6 raptim peragravit. Homines quī sequi possent sedibus excibat; oppida incendebat. Rerum suarum quas possent ferendarum secum dominis ius fiebat,
7 cetera militis praeda erat. Nec, quod ab hoste crudelius pati possent, reliqui quicquam fuit, quam
8 quae ab sociis patiebantur. Haec etiam facienti Philippo acerba erant, sed e terra mox futura hostium
9 corpora saltem eripere sociorum volebat. Ita evastata oppida sunt Phacium, Iresiae, Euhydrium, Eretria, Palaepharsalus. Pheras cum peteret, exclusus, quia res egebat mora, si expugnare vellet, nec tempus erat, omisso incepto in Macedoniam transcendit; nam etiam Aetolos adpropinquare fama
10 erat. Qui audito proelio, quod circa amnem Aoum way down the valley. The king on the first day B.C. 198 reached the camp of Pyrrhus; the place called by this name is in Triphylia and belongs to the territory of Molottis. The next day—an over-long march for an army, but fear drove them on—they reached thence the Lyncus mountains. This range is in Epirus, lying between Macedonia and Thessaly; the side which overlooks Thessaly faces east, the northern, Macedonia. It is clothed with abundant forests; the summits of the ridges offer open fields and ever-flowing springs. There Philip remained in camp for several days, uncertain in mind whether he should straightway return to his kingdom or try to beat the enemy into Thessaly. His decision was to lead the army into Thessaly, and he moved to Tricca by the shortest routes; then he rapidly traversed the towns in his way. He summoned from their homes the men who could follow; the towns he burned. The owners were allowed to carry with them what they could of their possessions; the rest was booty for the army. Nor was there any hardship unexperienced, which an enemy could inflict, greater than what they suffered at the hands of their allies. Such actions were distasteful to Philip even as he did them, but he wished to rescue, from a land that was soon to belong to his enemies, at least the persons of his allies. So Phacium, Iresiae, Euhydrium, Eretria, Palaepharsalus, were destroyed. Excluded from Pherae, when he tried to take it, because it would require time if he tried to capture it, and he had no time, he gave up that undertaking and crossed into Macedonia; for it was rumoured that the Aetolians were close at hand. They, having heard of the battle at factum erat, proximis prius evastatis circa Sperchias et Macran quam vocant Comen, transgressi inde in Thessaliam Cymenes et Angeias primo impetu 11 potiti sunt. A Metropoli, dum vastant agros, concursu oppidanorum ad tuenda moenia facto repulsi sunt. Callithera inde adgressi similem impetum 12 oppidanorum pertinacius sustinuerunt; compulsisque intra moenia qui eruperant, contenti ea victoria, quia spes nulla admodum expugnandi erat, abscesserunt. Teuma inde et Celathara vicos expugnant 13 diripiuntque; Acharras per deditionem receperunt.

A.U.C. 556

14 Xyniae simili metu a cultoribus desertae sunt. Hoc sedibus suis extorre agmen in praesidium incidit, quod ad Thaumacum, quo tutior frumentatio esset, ducebatur; incondita inermisque multitudo, mixta et imbelli[1] turba, ab armatis caesa est. Xyniae desertae diripiuntur. Cyphaera inde Aetoli capiunt, 15 opportune Dolopiae imminens castellum. Haec raptim intra paucos dies ab Aetolis gesta. Nec Amynander atque Athamanes post famam prosperae pugnae Romanorum quieverunt.

XIV. Ceterum Amynander, quia suo militi parum fidebat, petito a consule modico praesidio cum Gomphos peteret, oppidum protinus nomine Phaecam situm inter Gomphos faucesque angustas, quae ab
2 Athamania Thessaliam dirimunt, vi cepit. Inde Gomphos adortus est,[2] et per aliquot dies summa vi

[1] et imbelli M. Müller: ex imbelli B.
[2] est Weissenborn: om. B.

[1] Probably the place called Thaumaci in chap. iv. above the Aous river, and having laid waste the country close around Sperchiae and Macra, which they call Come, crossed thence into Thessaly and captured Cymene and Angeia at the first assault. From Metropolis, while they were devastating the farms, they were driven back, the townsmen having collected to defend their walls. When they attacked Callithera they sustained more stubbornly a similar sally of townspeople; and driving back within their own walls the party that had made the sally, they departed, content with this success, because they had no real hope of capturing the town. Next they took and sacked the villages of Teuma and Celathara and received Acharrae in surrender. Xyniae was abandoned by the inhabitants in similar fear. The procession of its citizens, exiles from their homes, fell in with a garrison which was on its way to Thaumacus,[1] that it might forage in greater security; the undisciplined and unarmed mass, mingled too with the unwarlike mob, was slaughtered by the soldiers. The abandoned city of Xyniae was looted. The Aetolians next captured Cyphaera, a fortress favourably situated to threaten Dolopia. Such is the record of the Aetolians' swift campaign of a few days. Nor did Amynander and the Athamanes remain quiet after they heard of the Roman victory. B.C. 198

XIV. But when Amynander, having asked the consul for a small detachment, since he had little confidence in his own men, was moving on Gomphi, he immediately took by storm a town called Phaeca, lying between Gomphi and the narrow pass which separates Athamania and Thessaly. Then he attacked Gomphi, and the inhabitants, after defending the city with all their might for some days, were tuentes urbem, cum iam scalas ad moenia erexisset, eo demum[1] metu perpulit ad deditionem. Haec traditio Gomphorum ingentem terrorem Thessalis intulit. Dedidere deinceps sese qui Argenta quique Pherinium et Timarum et Ligynas et Strymonem et Lampsum habent aliaque castella iuxta ignobilia.

A.U.C. 556

Dum Athamanes Aetolique submoto Macedonum metu in aliena victoria suam praedam faciunt, Thessaliaque ab tribus simul exercitibus incerta, quem hostem quemve socium crederet, vastatur, consul faucibus, quas fuga hostium aperuerat, in regionem Epiri transgressus, etsi probe scit cui parti Charopo principe excepto Epirotae favissent, tamen quia ab satisfaciendi quoque cura imperata enixe facere videt, ex praesenti eos potius quam ex praeterito aestimat habitu et ea ipsa facilitate veniae animos eorum in posterum conciliat. Missis deinde nuntiis Corcyram, ut onerariae naves in sinum venirent Ambracium, ipse progressus modicis itineribus quarto die in monte Cercetio posuit castra, eodem Amynandro cum suis auxiliis accito, non tam virium eius egens, quam ut duces in Thessaliam haberet. Ab eodem consilio et plerique Epirotarum voluntarii inter auxilia accepti.

XV. Primam urbem Thessaliae Phaloriam est adgressus. Duo milia Macedonum in praesidio habebat, qui primo summa vi restiterunt, quantum

[1] eo demum Perizonius : eodem B.

finally reduced to surrender by their fear, when he B.C. 198 had placed his scaling-ladders against the walls. The surrender of Gomphi caused great terror to the Thessalians. In turn the inhabitants of Argenta and Pherinium and Timarum and Ligynae and Strymon and Lampsus and other insignificant forts in the vicinity surrendered.

While the Aetolians and Athamanes, laying aside their fear of Macedonia, were reaping, through plundering, the fruits of another's victory, and Thessaly was being wasted by three armies at once, not knowing which to believe was foe and which ally, the consul marched into the country of Epirus through the pass which had been laid open by the flight of the enemy; although he knew full well which side the Epirotes favoured, with the exception of one leading citizen, Charopus, nevertheless, because he saw them zealously carrying out his orders in their desire to please him, he judged them rather by their present than their past behaviour, and won over, by his readiness to pardon, their support for the future. Then, sending messengers to Corcyra, that the cargo-ships should proceed to the Ambracian gulf, he advanced by easy marches and on the fourth day encamped on Mount Cercetius, summoning there Amynander with his auxiliaries, not so much from need of his assistance as that he might have guides into Thessaly. From the same motive, many volunteers of the Epirotes were enlisted for service with the auxiliaries.

XV. The first city of Thessaly to be attacked was Phaloria. It had a garrison of two thousand Macedonians, which at first resisted with the greatest energy, using every resource for defence which their

A.U.C. 556

2 arma, quantum moenia tueri poterant. Sed oppugnatio continua, non nocte non die remissa, cum consul in eo verti crederet ceterorum Thessalorum animos, si primi vim Romanam non sustinuissent, vicit per-
3 tinaciam Macedonum. Capta Phaloria legati a Metropoli et a Cierio dedentes urbes venerunt. Venia eisdem petentibus datur; Phaloria incensa
4 ac direpta est. Inde Aeginium petit; quem locum cum vel modico praesidio tutum ac prope inexpugnabilem vidisset, paucis in stationem proximam telis coniectis ad Gomphorum regionem agmen vertit.
5 Degressusque in campos Thessaliae, cum iam omnia exercitui deessent, quia Epirotarum pepercerat agris, explorato ante, utrum Leucadem an sinum Ambracium onerariae tenuissent, frumentatum Am-6 braciam in vicem cohortes misit; et est iter a Gomphis Ambraciam sicut impeditum ac difficile, ita spatio per-7 brevi. Intra paucos itaque dies transvectis a mari commeatibus repleta omni rerum copia sunt castra.
8 Inde Atracem est profectus. Decem ferme milia ab Larisa abest; ex Perrhaebia oriundi sunt; sita est
9 urbs super Peneum amnem. Nihil trepidavere Thessali ad primum adventum Romanorum; et Philippus sicut in Thessaliam ipse progredi non audebat, ita intra Tempe stativis positis, ut quisque locus ab hoste temptabatur, praesidia per occasiones summittebat.

XVI. Sub idem fere tempus quo consul adversus arms and fortifications gave them. But the persistent B.C. 198 siege, relaxed by neither night nor day, since the consul thought that the attitude of the other Thessalians depended on whether the first had held out against the Roman attack, broke down the resistance of the Macedonians. After the capture of Phaloria delegations came from Metropolis and Cierium offering the surrender of these cities. Their request was granted; Phaloria was burned and destroyed. Then he proceeded against Aeginium; seeing that the place was very strong and almost impregnable, with even a small garrison, he hurled a few weapons against the outpost and turned his course towards the region around Gomphi. And descending into the plains of Thessaly, since the army was now in want of everything, because he had spared the farms of the Epirotes, he sent scouts in advance to ascertain whether the supply-ships had headed for Leucas or the Ambracian gulf, and sent the cohorts in relays to Ambracia to provision; and the road from Gomphi to Ambracia, while difficult and hard to travel, is short. And so in a few days, the supplies having been transported from the fleet, the camp was full of an abundance of all things. Thence he marched to Atrax. It is about ten miles from Larisa; its people are sprung from Perrhaebia; the town lies above the river Peneus. At first the Thessalians felt no concern at the coming of the Romans; and as for Philip, while he did not dare himself to move into Thessaly, yet, established in a base camp within Tempe, he sent troops as occasion arose, as each point was threatened by the enemy.

XVI. At about the same time that the consul had first established his camp face to face with

A.U.C. 556

Philippum primum in Epiri faucibus posuit castra,
2 et L. Quinctius frater consulis, cui classis cura maritimaeque orae imperium mandatum ab senatu erat, cum duabus quinqueremibus Corcyram travectus, postquam profectam inde classem audivit,
3 nihil morandum ratus, cum ad Samen insulam adsecu-
4 tus esset, dimisso Livio, cui successerat, tarde inde ad Maleum trahendis plerumque remulco navibus, 5 quae cum commeatu sequebantur, pervenit. A Maleo, iussis ceteris, quantum maxime possent maturare, sequi, ipse tribus quinqueremibus expeditis Piraeum praecedit accepitque naves relictas ibi ab L. Apustio legato ad praesidium Athenarum.
6 Eodem tempore duae ex Asia classes profectae, una cum Attalo rege—eae quattuor et viginti quinqueremes erant—Rhodia altera viginti navium tectarum;
7 Agesimbrotus praeerat. Hae circa Andrum insulam classes coniunctae Euboeam inde exiguo distantem
8 freto traiecerunt. Carystiorum primum agros vastarunt; deinde, ubi Carystus praesidio a Chalcide raptim misso firma visa est, ad Eretriam accesserunt.
9 Eodem et L. Quinctius cum iis navibus quae Piraei fuerant Attali regis adventu audito venit iussis, ut quaeque ex sua classe venissent naves, Euboeam
10 petere. Eretria summa vi oppugnabatur; nam et trium iunctarum classium naves omnis generis tormenta machinasque ad urbium excidia secum

[1] Livy now describes the naval operations of the same summer. Lucius Quinctius, while junior to Titus in official status, was older.

[2] At XXXI. xlvii. 2 Apustius was in command of the fleet.

Philip in the passes of Epirus, Lucius Quinctius, B.C. 198
the brother of the consul,[1] to whom the senate had entrusted the charge of the fleet and the command of the sea-coast, also crossed to Corcyra with two quinqueremes, and when he found that the fleet was gone from there, thinking he should not delay, when he had overtaken the ships at the island of Same, he sent back Livius;[2] whom he had succeeded, and finally reached Malea, generally towing the ships which were following loaded with supplies. Ordering the rest to follow from Malea with all possible speed, he himself led the way to Piraeus with three light quinqueremes and took over the ships left there by Lucius Apustius the lieutenant to guard Athens. At the same time two fleets sailed from Asia, one under King Attalus—this consisted of twenty-four quinqueremes—and one from Rhodes, comprising twenty decked vessels commanded by Agesimbrotus. These fleets met near the island of Andros and crossed from there to Euboea, separated from Andros by a narrow stretch of water. They first ravaged the lands of the Carystii; then, since Carystus seemed strong, a garrison having been hastily sent from Chalcis, they went on towards Eretria. There Lucius Quinctius also came with the ships from Piraeus, when he heard of the arrival of King Attalus, after leaving orders that as each ship of his own fleet arrived it should proceed to Euboea. Eretria had to endure a vigorous attack; for the ships of the three united fleets carried artillery of all kinds and devices for destroying cities, and the country

[1] The condensed treatment given the preceding year of the war may be responsible for Livy's having failed to mention Livius before (see note on vi. 4 above).

A.U.C. 556

portabant, et agri adfatim materiae praebebant
11 ad nova molienda opera. Oppidani primo impigre[1] tuebantur moenia, dein fessi vulneratique aliquot, cum et muri partem eversam operibus 12 hostium cernerent, ad deditionem inclinarunt. Sed praesidium erat Macedonum, quos non minus quam Romanos metuebant, et Philocles regius praefectus a Chalcide nuntios mittebat se in tempore adfuturum, 13 si sustinerent obsidionem. Haec mixta metu spes ultra quam vellent aut quam possent trahere eos
14 tempus cogebat; deinde, postquam Philoclen repulsum trepidantemque refugisse Chalciden acceperunt, oratores extemplo ad Attalum veniam fidemque
15 eius petentes miserunt. Dum in spem pacis intenti segnius munera belli obeunt et ea modo parte, qua murus dirutus erat, ceteris neglectis stationes armatas opponunt, Quinctius noctu ab ea parte, quae minime suspecta erat, impetu facto scalis urbem cepit.
16 Oppidanorum omnis multitudo cum coniugibus ac liberis in arcem confugit, deinde in deditionem venit.
17 Pecuniae aurique et argenti haud sane multum fuit; signa, tabulae priscae artis ornamentaque eius generis plura quam pro urbis magnitudine aut opibus ceteris inventa.

XVII. Carystus inde repetita, unde, priusquam e navibus copiae exponerentur, omnis multitudo urbe
2 deserta in arcem confugit. Inde ad fidem ab Romano

[1] impigre H. J. Müller: haud impigre B.

provided material in abundance for the construction B.C. 198 of new works. The citizens at first defended their wall stoutly, then, worn out and some of them wounded, when they saw part of the wall demolished by the enemy's engines, they bethought them of surrender. But there was a Macedonian garrison, which they feared no less than the Romans, and Philocles, the king's prefect, kept sending messages from Chalcis that he would be with them in due time, if they would withstand the siege. This hope mingled with fear compelled them to hold out beyond their wish or their ability; later on, when they learned that Philocles, now beaten and terrified, had sought refuge in Chalcis, they straightway sent ambassadors to Attalus asking his pardon and protection. While, with their hopes centred on peace, they were less zealous in performing their military duties, and were posting armed guards only at the point where the wall had been thrown down, paying no attention to the rest, Quinctius during the night, attacking with scaling-ladders in a quarter that seemed free from danger, captured the city. The whole multitude of the citizens with their wives and children fled to the citadel and then surrendered. There was no great quantity of money, gold or silver; statues, paintings of ancient workmanship, and adornments of that sort were found there in greater abundance than was to be expected, considering the size of the town or its wealth in other respects.

XVII. The allies then returned to Carystus, all the population of which, before the troops disembarked, left the city and fled to the citadel. Presently they sent ambassadors to seek protection petendam oratores mittunt. Oppidanis extemplo vita ac libertas concessa est; Macedonibus treceni nummi in capita statutum pretium est, et ut armis 3 traditis abirent. Hac summa redempti inermes in Boeotiam traiecti. Navales copiae duabus claris urbibus Euboeae intra dies paucos captis circumvectae Sunium, Atticae terrae promunturium, Cenchreas, Corinthiorum emporium, petierunt.

A.U.C. 556

4 Consul interim omnium spe longiorem Atracis [1] atrocioremque oppugnationem habuit, et ea qua
5 minimum credidisset resistebant hostes. Nam omnem laborem in muro crediderat diruendo fore; si aditum armatis in urbem patefecisset, fugam inde caedemque hostium fore, qualis captis urbibus fieri
6 solet; ceterum postquam parte muri arietibus decussa per ipsas ruinas transcenderunt in urbem armati, illud principium velut novi atque integri
7 laboris fuit. Nam Macedones, qui in praesidio erant et multi et delecti, gloriam etiam egregiam rati, si armis potius et virtute quam moenibus urbem tueren-
8 tur, conferti, pluribus introrsus ordinibus acie firmata, cum transcendere ruinas sensissent Romanos, per impeditum ac difficilem ad receptum locum expule-9 runt. Id consul aegre passus nec eam ignominiam ad unius modo oppugnandae moram urbis sed ad summam universi belli pertinere ratus, quod ex momentis parvarum plerumque rerum penderet, 10 purgato loco, qui strage semiruti muri cumulatus

[1] Atracis Heusinger: om. B.

[1] The value of the nummus or sestertius was about four cents, or two pence.

[2] The narrative of the siege of Atrax continues (see xv. 8 above).

from the Roman commander. Life and liberty were B.C. 198 at once granted the citizens; a ransom of three hundred nummi[1] per head was fixed for the Macedonians, and they were ordered to give up their arms and depart. Having paid this ransom they were transported to Boeotia unarmed. The fleets, having captured two important cities of Euboea within a few days, sailed around Sunium, the promontory of the land of Attica, and steered toward Cenchreae, the port of the Corinthians.

Meanwhile[2] the consul was finding the siege of Atrax longer and more difficult than anyone had expected, and the enemy resisted in a way that he had not in the least anticipated. For he had believed that the whole task would be to batter down the wall; and that if he had opened a way into the city for the soldiers, the flight and slaughter of the enemy would follow, as usually happens in captured towns; but when a section of the wall was thrown down by the battering-rams and the soldiers had entered the city over the ruins, that was, so to speak, the beginning of new and fresh toil. For the Macedonians who formed the garrison, numerous and picked men, thinking that it would be a most noble exploit to defend the city with arms and valour rather than with walls, in close array, strengthening their formation by increasing the number of ranks within it, when they saw the Romans scaling the ruins, thrust them out over ground that was rough and admitted no easy retreat. The consul was enraged, and thought that this disgrace not merely meant a delay in capturing this one city, but affected the final issue of the war as a whole, which generally turns on the influence of little things; clearing out the place which was heaped

A.U.C. 556

erat, turrem ingentis altitudinis magnam vim armatorum multiplici tabulato portantem promovit 11 et cohortes in vicem sub signis, quae cuneum Macedonum—phalangem ipsi vocant—si possent, vi
12 perrumperent, emittebat. Sed ad loci angustias, haud late patente intervallo diruti muri, genus
13 armorum pugnaeque hosti aptius erat. Ubi conferti hastas ingentis longitudinis prae se Macedones obiecissent, velut in constructam densitate clipeorum testudinem Romani pilis nequiquam emissis cum
14 strinxissent gladios, neque congredi propius neque praecidere hastas poterant, et, si quam incidissent aut praefregissent, hastile fragmento ipso acuto inter spicula integrarum hastarum velut vallum
15 explebat. Ad hoc et muri pars adhuc integra utraque tuta praestabat latera, nec ex longo spatio aut cedendum aut impetus faciendus erat, quae res 16 turbare ordines solet. Accessit etiam fortuita res ad animos eorum firmandos; nam cum turris per 17 aggerem parum densati soli ageretur, rota una in altiorem orbitam depressa ita turrim inclinavit, ut speciem ruentis hostibus, trepidationem insanam superstantibus armatis praebuerit.

---

[1] For the Roman testudo, see the note on XXXI. xxxix. 14. Livy seems to mean that the multitude of spears, projecting in front of the phalanx, offered a projection against frontal attack comparable to that afforded by the testudo.

To visualize this battle, we must picture the phalanx diminished in frontage sufficiently to fit it into the breach in the wall (this protected it against flank attack), and correspondingly deepened. Since the ranks, from front to rear, carried spears of increasingly greater length, the points presented an almost impenetrable barrier. In the characteristic Roman attack, the soldiers threw their javelins to break up, at least temporarily, the hostile formation, and then closed in in-up with the debris of the fallen wall, he moved up B.C. 198

a tower of great height, carrying a large number of men in its numerous galleries, and sent out cohorts, one after the other, under their standards, to pierce, if possible, with their attack the wedge-formation of the Macedonians—they themselves call it the phalanx. But in addition to the limits of space, only a little of the wall having been destroyed, the enemy had the advantage in character of weapons and in tactics. When the Macedonians in close order held before them spears of great length, and when the Romans, hurling their javelins to no purpose, had drawn their swords against this sort of testudo,[1] closely-fashioned as if with shields, they could neither approach near enough to engage hand to hand nor cut off the ends of the spears, and if they did cut off or break any of them, the spearshaft, the broken part being itself sharp, helped, along with the points of the undamaged pikes, to make a sort of wall. Moreover, the parts of the rampart that still stood protected the two flanks, nor was it possible either to retire or to charge from a distance, a manoeuvre which usually throws the ranks into disorder. An accident, too, served to increase the courage of the enemy; for when the tower was being moved along the terrace of loosely-compacted earth, one of its wheels, slipping into a deep rut, caused the tower to lean so much that it seemed to the enemy about to fall, and caused a panic fear among the soldiers standing upon it.

dividual hand-to-hand combat. The mass of the phalanx, in this situation, was too dense to be affected by the javelins, and the spears projecting in front prevented the Romans from closing in and reaching the enemy with their swords.

A.U.C. 556

XVIII. Cum parum quicquam succederet, consul minime aequo animo comparationem militum gene-2 risque armorum[1] fieri patiebatur, simul nec maturam expugnandi spem nec rationem procul a mari et in evastatis belli cladibus locis hibernandi ullam cerne-
3 bat. Itaque relicta obsidione, quia nullus in tota Acarnaniae atque Aetoliae ora portus erat, qui simul et omnes onerarias, quae commeatum exercitui portabant, caperet et tecta ad hibernandum legionibus
4 praeberet, Anticyra in Phocide, in Corinthium versa
5 sinum, ad id opportunissime sita visa, quia nec procul Thessalia hostiumque locis aberat et ex adverso Peloponnesum exiguo maris spatio divisam, ab tergo Aetoliam Acarnaniamque, ab lateribus
6 Locridem ac Boeotiam habebat. Phocidis primo impetu Phanoteam sine certamine cepit. Anticyra haud multum oppugnando morae praebuit. Am-
7 brysus inde Hyampolisque receptae. Daulis, quia in tumulo excelso sita est, nec scalis nec operibus capi
8 poterat. Lacessendo missilibus eos, qui in praesidio erant, cum ad excursiones elicuissent, refugiendo in vicem sequendoque et levibus sine effectu certaminibus eo neglegentiae et contemptus adduxerunt, ut cum refugientibus in portam permixti impetum
9 Romani facerent. Et alia ignobilia castella Phocidis terrore magis quam armis in potestatem venerunt. Elatia clausit portas, nec, nisi vi cogerentur, recepturi moenibus videbantur aut ducem aut exercitum Romanum.

[1] generisque armorum Baumgarten-Crusius: generis armorum B: generis armorumque ς.

XVIII. As nothing turned out successfully, the consul was most reluctant to permit a comparison of men and weapons to be made, and at the same time he realized that there was no immediate prospect of capturing the town nor any way to winter his troops far from the sea and in a region wasted by the calamities of war. So he raised the siege, and because there was no harbour on the whole coast of Acarnania and Aetolia which could both accommodate the fleet which brought supplies to the army and at the same time provide shelter for wintering the troops, Anticyra in Phocis, facing the Gulf of Corinth, seemed the most suitable place for this purpose, because it was not far from Thessaly and the enemy's country, and it had in front the Peloponnesus, separated by a narrow expanse of sea, and behind it Aetolia and Acarnania and on the sides Locris and Boeotia. He took Phanotea in Phocis at the first assault and without a struggle. Anticyra caused only a little delay to his siege. Ambrysus next and Hyampolis surrendered. Daulis, because it was located on a lofty hill, could not be taken by escalade or siege. By harassing the defenders with darts and tempting them to make sallies, by alternately retiring and pursuing, and by fighting small engagements of no significance, they brought them to such a pitch of carelessness and to such a feeling of contempt that the Romans, mingling with the defenders as they withdrew into the gate, assaulted the town. Other unimportant strongholds of Phocis surrendered, more from fear than by reason of attack. Elatia closed its gates, and seemed disinclined to admit either commander or Roman army, unless it were compelled by violence. B.C. 198

A.U.C. 556

XIX. Elatiam obsidenti consuli rei maioris spes adfulsit, Achaeorum gentem ab societate regia in Romanam amicitiam avertendi. Cycliadan, principem factionis ad Philippum trahentium res, expulerant; Aristaenus, qui Romanis gentem iungi volebat, praetor erat. Classis Romana cum Attalo et Rhodiis Cenchreis stabat, parabantque communi omnes consilio Corinthum oppugnare. Optimum igitur ratus est, priusquam eam rem adgrederentur, legatos ad gentem Achaeorum mitti pollicentes, si ab rege ad Romanos defecissent, Corinthum contributuros in antiquum gentis concilium. Auctore consule legati a fratre eius L. Quinctio et Attalo et Rhodiis et Atheniensibus ad Achaeos missi. Sicyone datum est iis concilium. Erat autem non admodum simplex habitus inter Achaeos animorum: terrebat Nabis Lacedaemonius, gravis et adsiduus hostis; horrebant Romana arma; Macedonum beneficiis et veteribus et recentibus obligati erant; regem ipsum suspectum habebant pro eius crudelitate perfidiaque, neque ex iis, quae tum ad tempus faceret, aestimantes graviorem post bellum dominum futurum cernebant. Neque solum, quid in senatu quisque civitatis suae aut in communibus conciliis gentis pro sententia dicerent ignorabant, sed ne ipsis quidem secum cogitantibus quid vellent aut quid optarent, satis constabat. Ad homines ita incertos introductis legatis potestas dicendi facta est. Romanus primum legatus L.

[1] See XXXI. xxv. 3 ff., and the Introductory Note.

XIX. While the consul was besieging Elatia, B.C. 198
there came the gleam of hope of a greater achievement, the winning over of the Achaeans from alliance with the king to friendship with the Romans. They had expelled Cycliadas,[1] the leader of the faction inclined to favour Philip; Aristaenus, who wished the state to join the Romans, was the president. The Roman fleet with Attalus and the Rhodians lay at Cenchreae, preparing for a concerted attack on Corinth. He therefore thought it best, before they undertook this task, to send ambassadors to the Achaean people, promising that if they would turn from the king to the Romans, they would reunite Corinth to the ancient council of the people. By the authority of the consul, delegates were sent to the Achaeans by his brother Lucius Quinctius, Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians. An audience was granted them at Sicyon. But the state of mind among the Achaeans was complex. The Spartan Nabis, a dangerous and ever-present enemy, terrified them; the Roman arms were a menace; to the Macedonians they were bound by acts of kindness both old and new; the king himself they looked on with suspicion, for his cruelty and treachery, and, not judging by what he was doing at that time, to suit the occasion, they saw that he would be a harsher master after the war. They not only did not know what opinion each one would express in the senate of his own state or in the common councils of the people, but were not very clear as to what they would want or desire as they considered the matter in their own thoughts. The opportunity was offered the ambassadors to speak to an audience in this state of uncertainty. The Roman delegate,

A.U.C. 556

Calpurnius, deinde Attali regis legati, post eos
12 Rhodii disseruerunt; Philippi deinde legatis potestas dicendi facta est; postremi Athenienses, ut refellerent Macedonum dicta, auditi sunt. Ii fere atrocissime in regem, quia nulli nec plura nec tam acerba 13 passi erant, invecti sunt. Et illa quidem contio sub occasum solis tot legatorum perpetuis orationibus die absumpto dimissa est.

XX. Postero die advocatur concilium; ubi cum per praeconem, sicut Graecis mos est, suadendi, si quis vellet, potestas a magistratibus facta esset, nec quisquam prodiret, diu silentium aliorum alios
2 intuentium fuit. Neque mirum, si, quibus sua sponte volutantibus res inter se repugnantes obtorpuerant quodam modo animi, eos si orationes quoque insuper turbaverant utrimque, quae difficilia essent, promendo
3 admonendoque per totum diem habitae. Tandem Aristaenus, praetor Achaeorum, ne tacitum concilium dimitteret: "Ubi" inquit "illa certamina animorum, Achaei, sunt, quibus in conviviis et circulis, cum de Philippo et Romanis mentio incidit, vix manibus
4 temperatis? Nunc in concilio ad eam rem unam indicto, cum legatorum utrimque verba audieritis, cum referant magistratus, cum praeco ad suadendum
5 vocet, obmutuistis! Si non cura salutis communis, ne studia quidem, quae in hanc aut in illam partem animos vestros inclinarunt, vocem cuiquam
6 possunt exprimere? Cum praesertim nemo tam

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN DIGITIZED

Lucius Calpurnius, was first heard, then the ambassadors of King Attalus, and after them the Rhodians; next the representatives of Philip were given audience, and finally the Athenians were heard, that they might refute the Macedonian arguments. They assailed the king in quite the fiercest terms, for no others had suffered so much or so grievously. And this meeting was dismissed at sunset, the whole day having been consumed by the set speeches of so many ambassadors. B.C. 198

XX. Next day the council assembled; and when, through the herald, after the Greek custom, the magistrates gave the opportunity to offer a motion, if anyone wished, and no one came forward, there was a long silence as men looked at one another. Nor was it strange, if men whose minds were in a way bewildered by pondering independently the conflicting claims, were rendered still more uncertain by the speeches on both sides, delivered through an entire day, bringing forward and urging arguments that were hard to meet. At length Aristaenus, the praetor of the Achaeans, so as not to dismiss the council without debate, spoke thus: "Where are those rivalries of feeling, Achaeans, which cause you hardly to refrain from blows, when mention is made of Philip and the Romans at your dinners and social gatherings? Now, in a council called for this one purpose, after you have heard the words of representatives of both sides, when the magistrates lay the question before you and the herald asks for motions, you are silent! If there is no concern for the general welfare, can no personal interest even, which has turned your minds this way or that, draw a word from anyone? Especially as there is no one so

A.U.C. 556

hebes sit, qui ignorare possit dicendi ac suadendi quod quisque aut velit aut optimum putet, nunc occasionem esse, priusquam quicquam decernamus; ubi semel decretum erit, omnibus id, etiam quibus ante displicuerit, pro bono atque utili fore defenden-7 dum." Haec adhortatio praetoris non modo quemquam unum elicuit ad suadendum, sed ne fremitum quidem aut murmur contionis tantae ex tot populis congregatae movit.

XXI. Tum Aristaenus praetor rursus: "Non magis consilium vobis, principes Achaeorum, deest quam lingua; sed suo quisque periculo in commune consultum non vult. Forsitan ego quoque tacerem, si privatus essem; nunc praetori video aut non dandum concilium legatis fuisse, aut non sine responso
2 eos[1] dimittendos esse; respondere autem nisi ex vestro decreto qui possum? Et quoniam nemo vestrum, qui in hoc concilium advocati estis, pro sententia quicquam dicere vult aut audet, orationes legatorum hesterno die ut[2] pro sententiis dictas
3 percenseamus, perinde ac non postulaverint, quae e re sua essent, sed suaserint quae nobis censerent
4 utilia esse. Romani Rhodiique et Attalus societatem amicitiamque nostram petunt et in bello quod adversus Philippum gerunt se a nobis adiuvari
5 aequum censent. Philippus societatis secum admonet et iuris iurandi et modo postulat ut secum stemus, modo ne intersimus armis, contentum ait se esse.
6 Nulline venit in mentem cur, qui nondum socii sunt, plus petant quam socius? Non fit hoc neque dull as not to know that this is the time to speak and to advise what each either desires or thinks best, before we reach any decision; when once a decree has been passed, all, even those who formerly opposed it, must defend it as good and expedient." This exhortation of the praetor not only prompted no one to make a proposal, but provoked no groan or whisper from so large a council, drawn from so many peoples. B.C. 198

[1] eos Madvig: eos non B. [2] ut Madvig: om. B.

XXI. So the praetor Aristaenus spoke again: "You lack counsel, leaders of the Achaeans, no less than the power of speech; but each one refuses to promote the public interest at the cost of peril to himself. Perhaps I too should keep silence if I were a private citizen; now I see that, so far as the praetor is concerned, either the ambassadors should not have been granted an audience or they should not be sent away unanswered; but how can I answer except in accordance with your decree? And since no one of you who have been summoned to this council wishes or dares to say anything in the way of suggestion, let us consider the ambassadors' speeches delivered yesterday as opinions expressed in debate, just as if they had not intended what was to their own interest but recommended what they deemed profitable for us. The Romans, the Rhodians and Attalus ask for our alliance and friendship, and in the war which they are waging with Philip they think it proper that we should assist them. Philip reminds us of our alliance with him and of our oath, and now demands that we take our stand with him, now says that he is satisfied if we refrain from taking up arms. Does it occur to no one why those who are not yet our allies demand more than our ally? This is not, ye Achaeans, the modestia Philippi neque impudentia Romanorum,

A.U.C. 556

7 Achaei: fortuna et dat fiduciam postulantibus et demit. Philippi praeter legatum videmus nihil; Romana classis ad Cenchreas stat urbium Euboeae spolia prae se ferens, consulem legionesque eius, exiguo maris spatio diiunctas, Phocidem ac Locridem
8 pervagantes videmus; miramini, cur diffidenter Cleomedon, legatus Philippi, ut pro rege arma
9 caperemus adversus Romanos, modo egerit? Qui, si ex eodem foedere ac iure iurando, cuius nobis religionem iniciebat, rogemus eum, ut nos Philippus et ab Nabide ac Lacedaemoniis et ab Romanis defendat, non modo praesidium, quo tueatur nos, sed ne quid
10 respondeat quidem nobis sit inventurus, non hercule magis quam ipse Philippus priore anno, qui pollicendo se adversus Nabidem bellum gesturum cum temptasset nostram iuventutem hinc in Euboeam extra-11 here, postquam nos neque decernere id sibi praesidium neque velle illigari Romano bello vidit, oblitus societatis eius quam nunc iactat vastandos populan-
12 dosque Nabidi ac Lacedaemoniis reliquit. Ac mihi quidem minime conveniens inter se oratio Cleomedontis visa est. Elevabat Romanum bellum eventumque eius eundem fore, qui prioris belli quod cum 13 Philippo gesserint, dicebat. Cur igitur nostrum ille auxilium absens petit potius quam praesens nos, socios veteres, simul ab Nabide ac Romanis tueatur? Nos dico? Quid ita passus est Eretriam Carystumque capi? Quid ita tot Thessaliae urbes? Quid ita result of Philip's moderation or the Romans' arrogance; fortune both gives and takes away confidence in making demands. We see no sign of Philip except his ambassador; the Roman fleet lies at Cenchreae, displaying the spoils of the cities of Euboea, we see the consul and his legions marching through Phocis and Locris, separated from us by a narrow stretch of water; do you wonder why Cleomedon, Philip's delegate, suggested with such hesitation a while ago that we take up arms in the king's cause against the Romans? If, in accordance with that treaty and oath, respect for which he tried to instil into us, we ask him that Philip protect us both against Nabis and his Lacedaemonians and against the Romans, he will not only find no garrison wherewith to protect us: he will not even find an answer to give us, any more, by Hercules, than Philip did last year; when, by promising that he would conduct the war against Nabis, he had tried to allure our fighting men away to Euboea, after he saw that we would neither vote him that protection nor consent to be involved in the Roman war, forgetful of that alliance about which he now uses such fine words, he left us to Nabis and the Lacedaemonians to plunder and rob. And to me, at least, Cleomedon's speech seemed by no means consistent with itself. He belittled the Roman war, and claimed that the result would be the same as that of the earlier war which they engaged in with Philip. Why then does Philip, remaining away, ask our aid, rather than, being present in person, defend us, his ancient allies, against both Nabis and the Romans? Defend us, do I say? Why did he permit Eretria and Carystus to be captured in that way? Why so many B.C. 198

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 556

14 Locridem Phocidemque? Quid ita nunc Elatiam oppugnari patitur? Cur excessit faucibus Epiri claustrisque illis inexpugnabilibus super Aoum amnem relictoque quem insidebat saltu penitus in 15 regnum abiit? Aut[1] vi aut metu aut voluntate. Si sua voluntate tot socios reliquit hostibus diripiendos, qui recusare potest quin et socii sibi consulant? Si metu, nobis quoque ignoscat timentibus; si victus armis cessit, Achaei Romana arma sustinebimus, Cleomedon, quae vos Macedones non sus-
16 tinuistis? An tibi potius credamus Romanos non maioribus copiis nec viribus nunc bellum gerere quam antea gesserint potius quam res ipsas intue-
17 amur? Aetolos tum classe adiuverunt; nec duce consulari nec exercitu bellum gesserunt; sociorum Philippi maritimae tum urbes in terrore ac tumultu erant; mediterranea adeo tuta ab armis Romanis fuerunt ut Philippus Aetolos nequiquam
18 opem Romanorum implorantes depopularetur; nunc autem defuncti bello Punico Romani, quod per sedecim annos velut intra viscera Italiae toleraverunt, non praesidium[2] Aetolis bellantibus miserunt, sed ipsi duces belli arma terra marique simul
19 Macedoniae intulerunt. Tertius iam consul summa vi gerit bellum. Sulpicius in ipsa Macedonia congressus fudit fugavitque regem, partem opulentissi-20 mam regni eius depopulatus; nunc Quinctius tenen-

[1] aut . . . voluntate post amnem in B locata, transp. Madvig.
[2] praesidium edd.: in praesidium B.

[1] In 211 B.C. (XXVI. xxiv. 10) the Romans sent a fleet to the east, but their land forces there were inconsiderable until 205 B.C. (XXIX. xii. 2). A consular army had as its nucleus, normally, two Roman legions; the forces assigned to inferior commanders were largely or wholly made up of Latin allies.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN DIGITIZED

towns of Thessaly? Why Locris and Phocis? Why B.C. 198 does he now allow Elatia to be besieged? Why did he leave the passes of Epirus and his impregnable position above the Aous river, abandon the defile which he held and retire far into his own kingdom? It was either under compulsion, or from fear, or by design. If he voluntarily left so many allies to be sacked by the enemy, how can he object if his allies take measures for their own security? If he was afraid, let him excuse also our fear. If he retired because he was beaten in battle, shall we Achaeans, Cleomedon, sustain the Roman attack which you Macedonians did not resist? Or should we take your word for it that the Romans are not employing in the war greater forces and military power than they did before, or should we rather look at the obvious facts? Then they aided the Aetolians with their fleet; they waged war with neither consular commander nor consular army;[1] at that time the maritime cities of Philip's allies were in fear and terror; the inland districts were so safe from Roman arms that Philip pillaged the Aetolians even while they asked in vain for Roman aid; but now the Romans have finished the Punic War, which they endured for sixteen years in, as it were, the very heart of Italy, and they have not sent assistance to the Aetolians, who were carrying on the war, but they themselves, as leaders in the war, have attacked Macedonia by land and sea at once. Now the third consul is here, prosecuting the war with boundless energy. Sulpicius, meeting the king in Macedonia itself, defeated him and put him to flight, and plundered the richest part of his kingdom; now Quinctius has dislodged him from his camp, tem claustra Epiri natura loci, munimentis, exercitu[1] fretum castris exuit, fugientem in Thessaliam persecutus praesidia regia sociasque urbes eius prope in conspectu regis ipsius expugnavit.

A.U.C. 556

21 " Ne sint vera, quae Atheniensis modo legatus de crudelitate, avaritia, libidine regis disseruit; nihil ad nos pertineant, quae in terra Attica scelera in 22 superos inferosque deos sunt admissa, multo minus quae Ciani Abydenique, qui procul ab nobis absunt, passi sunt; nostrorum ipsi vulnerum si vultis oblivis- 23 camur, caedes direptionesque bonorum Messenae in media Peloponneso factas, et hospitem Cyparissiae Charitelen contra ius omne ac fas inter epulas prope ipsas occisum, et Aratum patrem filiumque Sicyonios, cum senem infelicem parentem etiam appellare 24 solitus esset, interfectos, filii[2] etiam uxorem libidinis causa in Macedoniam asportatam, cetera stupra 25 virginum matronarumque oblivioni dentur; ne sit[3] cum Philippo res, cuius crudelitatis metu obmutuistis omnes—nam quae alia tacendi advocatis in concilium causa est?—; cum Antigono, mitissimo ac iustissimo rege et de nobis omnibus optime merito, existimemus disceptationem esse: num id postularet 26 facere nos quod fieri[4] non posset? Paene insula est Peloponnesus, angustis Isthmi faucibus continenti

[1] exercitu edd.: exercitus B.
[2] filii etiam ed. Frobeniana 1535: . . . eius B: pili (pilis) eius s.
[3] sit Duker: sint B.
[4] fieri Bekker: reri B: tam (iam, cum) fieri s.

[1] This crime seems to be unmentioned elsewhere.
[2] See Plutarch's life of Aratus, 52, 54 and elsewhere, and Polyb. VIII. xiv.
[3] Philip's predecessor on the Macedonian throne; he supported the Achaean against the Aetolian League.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

though he held the passes of Epirus, relying on the nature of the country, on his fortifications and on his army, pursued him as he fled to Thessaly, and captured the royal garrisons and allied towns almost under the king's very eyes. B.C. 198

"Grant that what the Athenians said about the king's cruelty, greed and passion was not true; grant that we are not interested in the crimes against supernal and infernal gods which he committed in the land of Attica, and much less interested in the sufferings of the Ciani and Abydeni, who are far away from us; let us forget, if you will, our own wounds; let us dismiss from memory the murders and robberies committed at Messene, in the centre of the Peloponnesus, the murder of Chariteles,[1] his host at Cyparissia, in the course of a feast, in violation of all human and divine justice; the murder of the two Sicyonians, Aratus the father and the son,[2] though he had been accustomed to call the unhappy old man even by the name of father; the removal of the son's wife to Macedonia to serve his lust; let the other debaucheries of maids and wives be consigned to oblivion; assume that our business is not with Philip, from fear of whose cruelty you have all kept silent (for what other explanation is there of your silence when called to deliberate?); let us consider that our relations are with Antigonus,[3] that most just and merciful king who served so well the cause of all of us: would he demand that we do what is impossible? The Peloponnesus is a peninsula, joined to the mainland by the narrow strip of the Isthmus,[4] exposed and open to attack

[4] The Isthmus of Corinth.

A.U.C. 556

adhaerens, nulli apertior neque opportunior quam
27 navali bello. Si centum tectae naves et quinquaginta leviores apertae et triginta Issaei lembi maritimam oram vastare et expositas prope in ipsis litoribus urbes coeperint oppugnare, in mediterraneas scilicet nos urbes recipiemus, tamquam non intestino et haerente
28 in ipsis visceribus uramur bello! Cum terra Nabis et Lacedaemonii, mari classis Romana urgebunt, unde regiam societatem et Macedonum praesidia implorem? An ipsi nostris armis ab hoste Romano tutabimur urbes quae oppugnabuntur? Egregie 29 enim Dymas priore bello sumus tutati! Satis exemplorum nobis clades alienae praebent; ne quaeramus quem ad modum ceteris exemplo simus.
30 "Nolite, quia ultro Romani petunt amicitiam, id quod optandum vobis ac summopere petendum erat,
31 fastidire. Metu enim videlicet compulsi et deprensi in aliena terra, quia sub umbra vestri auxilii latere volunt, in societatem vestram confugiunt, ut portibus
32 vestris recipiantur, ut commeatibus utantur! Mare in potestate habent; terras quascumque adeunt extemplo dicionis suae faciunt. Quod rogant, cogere possunt; quia pepercisse vobis volunt, 33 committere vos, cur pereatis, non patiuntur. Nam quod Cleomedon modo tamquam mediam et tutissimam vobis viam consilii, ut quiesceretis abstineretisque armis, ostendebat, ea non media, sed nulla via 34 est. Etenim praeterquam quod aut accipienda aut spernenda vobis Romana societas est, quid aliud quam

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN DIGITIZED

by sea beyond all else. If one hundred decked B.C. 198 vessels and fifty smaller undecked ships and thirty light Issaean boats begin to plunder our coast and lay siege to the cities lying almost on the shore, we shall of course retire to the inland strongholds, as if we were not consumed with internal war, raging in our very hearts! When Nabis and the Spartans press on us by land and the Roman fleet by sea, on what ground should I invoke the king's alliance and Macedonian guards? Or shall we with our own arms defend against the Romans the towns they will besiege? Nobly did we defend Dymae in the former war! The misfortunes of others furnish us examples in abundance; let us not seek how we may be an example to others.

"Do not, because the Romans come of their own accord to seek our friendship, disdain what you ought to have hoped for and particularly desired. Impelled by fear, no doubt, and entrapped in a strange land, because they wish to find shelter under the shadow of your protection, they flee to your alliance, that they may hide in your harbours, and secure supplies! The sea is in their power; they immediately assume control of whatever lands they visit. What they ask, they can compel; because they wish you spared, they do not permit you to do aught for which you should be destroyed. For as to what Cleomedon pointed out to you a while ago, a middle course, as it were, and the safest way to decide, to wit, that you remain neutral and avoid war, that is not a middle course: it is no course at all. For, in addition to the fact that you must either accept or reject the Roman alliance, what other course is open except for us, since we have no sure claim to nusquam gratia stabili, velut qui eventum expectaverimus, ut fortunae applicaremus nostra consilia, praeda victoris erimus? Nolite, si quod omnibus votis petendum erat, ultro offertur, fastidire. Non quem ad modum hodie utrumque vobis licet, sic semper liciturum est: nec saepe nec diu eadem occasio erit. Liberare vos a Philippo iam diu magis vultis quam audetis. Sine vestro labore et periculo qui vos in libertatem vindicarent, cum magnis classibus exercitibusque mare traiecerunt. Hos si socios aspernamini, vix mentis sanae estis; sed aut socios aut hostes habeatis oportet."

A.U.C. 556

XXII. Secundum orationem praetoris murmur ortum aliorum cum adsensu, aliorum inclementer adsentientes increpantium; et iam non singuli tantum sed populi universi inter se altercabantur. Tum inter magistratus gentis—damiurgos vocant; decem numero creantur—certamen nihilo segnius quam inter multitudinem esse. Quinque relaturos de societate Romana se aiebant suffragiumque daturos; quinque lege cautum testabantur, ne quid quod adversus Philippi societatem esset aut referre magistratibus aut decernere concilio ius esset. Is quoque dies iurgiis est consumptus.

Supererat unus iusti concilii dies; tertio enim lex iubebat decretum fieri; in quem adeo exarsere studia, ut vix parentes ab liberis temperaverint. Pisias Pellenensis erat; filium damiurgum nomine consideration anywhere, to play the part of men who B.C. 198 have been merely awaiting the event, with the intention of adapting our counsels to the decision of fortune, and eventually become the prey of the conqueror? If what we should all be praying for is voluntarily offered, do not despise the gift. It will not always be open to us, as it is to-day, to make a choice; the same opportunity rarely returns, and it tarries but a little while. For a long time you have wished, but not dared, to free yourselves from Philip. Now men have crossed the sea with mighty fleets and armies, to affirm your claims to liberty without trouble or danger on your part. If you reject them as allies, you are scarcely sane; but as either allies or enemies you must have them."

[1] Livy appropriately uses the Doric spelling of the word. The number was probably inherited from the time when the League consisted of ten cities.

XXII. After the praetor's speech there arose an outcry, some applauding, some sharply rebuking those who approved; and soon not individuals only but whole communities were involved in the quarrel. Then among the magistrates of the people—they call them damiurgi,[1] and the number appointed is ten—an argument began no less violent than that among the mass of the delegates. Five announced that they would put a motion favouring a Roman alliance and call for a vote; five held that it was illegal either for the magistrates to submit or the council to decree anything subversive of the alliance with Philip. This day too was spent in argument.

One day of the legal council remained; for the law ordered the decision to be reached on the third day; on the matter to be decided that day feeling ran so high that parents could scarcely keep their hands off their children. There was present Pisias of Pellene; he had a son, a damiurgus, Memnon by

A.U.C. 556

Memnonem habebat, partis eius quae decretum
6 recitari perrogarique sententias prohibebat. Is diu obtestatus filium ut consulere Achaeos communi saluti pateretur neu pertinacia sua gentem uni-7 versam perditum iret, postquam parum proficiebant preces,[1] iuratus se eum sua manu interempturum nec 8 pro filio sed pro hoste habiturum minis pervicit, ut postero die coniungeret iis se qui referebant. Qui cum plures facti referrent, omnibus fere populis haud dubie approbantibus relationem ac prae se ferentibus 9 quid decreturi essent, Dymaei ac Megalopolitani et quidam Argivorum, priusquam decretum fieret, consurrexerunt ac reliquerunt concilium neque 10 mirante ullo nec improbante. Nam Megalopolitanos avorum memoria pulsos ab Lacedaemoniis restituerat in patriam Antigonus, et Dymaeis, captis nuper direptisque ab exercitu Romano, cum redimi eos, ubicumque servirent, Philippus iussisset, non liber-11 tatem modo sed etiam patriam reddiderat; iam Argivi, praeterquam quod Macedonum reges ab se oriundos credunt, privatis etiam hospitiis familiarique 12 amicitia plerique illigati Philippo erant. Ob haec concilio, quod inclinaverat ad Romanam societatem iubendam, excesserunt, veniaque iis huius secessionis fuit et magnis et recentibus obligatis beneficiis.

XXIII. Ceteri populi Achaeorum, cum sententias perrogarentur, societatem cum Attalo[2] ac Rhodiis 2 praesenti decreto confirmarunt; cum Romanis,

[1] preces edd.: parum B.
[2] Attalo edd.: Romanis B.

[1] Actually, this had happened in 226 B.C. (Polyb. V. xciii), so that Livy's phrase avorum memoria is an exaggeration.

name, of the faction which forbade a motion to be made or a vote taken. Pisias for a long time entreated his son to allow the Achaeans to consult the general welfare and not to destroy the entire race by his obstinacy, but when prayers proved unavailing he swore that he would kill him with his own hand, treating him not as a son but as an enemy, and with these threats he won his point, so that next day he joined the party which proposed a vote. When now the majority favoured that course, and almost all the cities were clearly expressing their approval of the motion and openly declaring what the decision would be, the delegates from Dymae and Megalopolis and some of the Argives, before the motion was passed, arose and left the council, no one expressing either surprise or reproach. For within the memory of their forefathers, the Megalopolitani, defeated by the Spartans, had been restored to their homes by Antigonus,[1] and to the Dymaei, who had recently been captured and plundered by the Romans, Philip had restored both liberty and their homes, having ordered them to be ransomed wherever they were enslaved; many of the Argives, too, besides believing that the kings of Macedon were derived from them, were bound to Philip by personal ties as well and by private friendship. For such reasons they withdrew from a council which had leaned towards ordering an alliance with Rome, and indulgence was granted them for withdrawing, bound as they were by great and recent acts of kindness. B.C. 198

XXIII. The other peoples of the Achaeans, when called on to vote, approved by immediate decree the alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians; the treaty with the Romans, since it could not be ratified except

A.U.C. 556

quia iniussu populi non poterat rata esse, in id tempus
3 quo Romam mitti legati possent, dilata est; in praesentia tres legatos ad L. Quinctium mitti placuit et exercitum omnem Achaeorum ad Corinthum admoveri captis Cenchreis iam urbem ipsam Quinctio oppugnante.

4 Et hi quidem e regione portae quae fert Sicyonem posuerunt castra; Romani in [1] Cenchreas versam partem urbis, Attalus traducto per Isthmum exercitu ab Lechaeo, alterius maris portu, oppugnabant, primo segnius, sperantes seditionem intus fore inter
5 oppidanos ac regium praesidium. Postquam uno animo omnes, et Macedones tamquam communem patriam tuebantur, et Corinthii ducem praesidii Androsthenen haud secus quam civem et suffragio creatum suo imperio in se uti patiebantur, omnis inde spes oppugnantibus [2] in vi et armis et operibus
6 erat. Undique aggeres haud facili aditu ad moenia
7 admovebantur. Aries ex ea parte quam Romani oppugnabant aliquantum muri diruerat; in quem locum, quia nudatus munimento erat, protegendum armis cum Macedones concurrerent, atrox proelium
8 inter eos ac Romanos ortum est. Ac primo multitudine facile expellebantur Romani; adsumptis deinde Achaeorum Attalique auxiliis aequabant certamen, nec dubium erat, quin Macedonas 9 Graecosque facile loco pulsuri fuerint. Trans-

[1] in Hertz: om. B.
[2] oppugnantibus Gronovius: pugnantibus B.

[1] Foreign alliances required the approval of the assembly at Rome.
[2] The port of Corinth on the Saronic Gulf.

by vote of the people,[1] was postponed to the time B.C. 198
when ambassadors could be sent to Rome; for the present, it was voted that three commissioners should be sent to Lucius Quinctius and that all the army of the Achaeans should be moved to Corinth, since Quinctius was now besieging the city itself after his capture of Cenchreae.

They now encamped in the vicinity of the gate which leads to Sicyon; the Romans were operating on the side towards Cenchreae, Attalus, having led his army across the Isthmus, from the direction of Lechaeum, the port on the other sea,[2] conducting the siege at first without much energy, since they hoped for dissension within between the citizens and the royal garrison. When they proved completely harmonious, the Macedonians conducting the defence as if it were of their common fatherland, the Corinthians permitting Androsthenes, the commander of the garrison, to exercise his authority over them as if he were a citizen and their elected general, thenceforth all the hope of the besiegers rested in their own strength, their weapons, and their siege-works. From all sides, though the task was difficult, they moved their mounds towards the walls. On the side where the Romans were attacking the battering-ram had destroyed part of the wall; when the Macedonians rushed to defend this place with their arms, because it was without protection, a desperate battle took place between them and the Romans. And at first the Romans were easily repulsed by superior numbers; then, summoning reinforcements of the Achaeans and the troops of Attalus, they restored equality, and there seemed no doubt that the Macedonians and Greeks would be easily dis-

A.U.C. 556

fugarum Italicorum magna multitudo erat, pars ex Hannibalis exercitu metu poenae a Romanis Philippum secuta, pars navales socii relictis nuper classibus ad spem honoratioris militiae transgressi; hos desperata salus, si Romani vicissent, ad rabiem magis
10 quam audaciam accendebat. Promunturium est adversus Sicyonem Iunonis, quam vocant Acraeam, in altum excurrens; traiectus inde Corinthum 11 septem fere milium passuum. Eo Philocles, regius et ipse praefectus, mille et quingentos milites per Boeotiam duxit. Praesto fuere ab Corintho lembi qui praesidium id acceptum Lechaeum traicerent.
12 Auctor erat Attalus incensis operibus omittendae extemplo oppugnationis; pertinacius Quinctius[1] in incepto perstabat. Is quoque, ut pro omnibus portis disposita videt praesidia regia nec facile erumpentium impetus sustineri posse, in Attali sententiam concessit.
13 Ita inrito incepto dimissis Achaeis reditum ad naves est. Attalus Piraeum, Romani Corcyram petierunt.

XXIV. Dum haec ab navali exercitu geruntur, consul in Phocide ad Elatiam castris positis primo colloquiis rem per principes Elatensium temptavit; post-2 quam nihil esse in manu sua et plures validioresque esse regios quam oppidanos respondebatur, tum simul ab omni parte operibus armisque urbem est adgressus.
3 Ariete admoto cum[2] quantum inter duas[3] turres muri erat prorutum cum ingenti fragore ac strepitu

[1] Quinctius edd.: cum intus Romanus B.
[2] admoto cum Jacobs: admotoq. B.
[3] duas Madvig: om. B.

[1] The navales socii were freedmen or members of allied Italian cities, employed as rowers on war-ships.
[2] That is, Juno of the Heights.
[3] The narrative interrrupted at xix. 1 is continued.

lodged. There was a great host of Italian deserters, B.C. 198
some from Hannibal's army who had followed Philip from fear of punishment by the Romans, some naval allies who had recently deserted the fleet and come over in the hope of more highly-rewarded service;[1] their hopelessness regarding immunity, if the Romans conquered, inspired them to courage or rather to frenzy. On the side toward Sicyon is a promontory, sacred to the Juno whom they call Acraea,[2] and rising high into the air; thence the distance to Corinth is about seven miles. Thither Philocles, also a prefect of the king, brought fifteen hundred soldiers through Boeotia. Vessels from Corinth were at hand to transport the force thus arriving to Lechaeum. Attalus urged that the works be burned and the siege immediately abandoned; Quinctius persisted more stubbornly in his undertaking. He too, when he saw the royal guards stationed before all the gates, and perceived that their sallies could not be easily resisted, went over to the opinion of Attalus. And so, with their design unaccomplished, after sending the Achaeans home they returned to their ships. Attalus proceeded to Piraeus, the Romans to Corcyra.

XXIV. While this was being done by the navy,[3] the consul in Phocis, having pitched his camp in front of Elatia, tried first to attain his end by conferences, using the principal citizens of Elatia; after he had received the reply that the decision was not for them to make and that the king's garrison was stronger and more numerous than the citizens, he then attacked the city from all sides with arms and engines. When he brought up a battering-ram and a section of wall between two towers fell with a mighty crash and din and left the city

A.U.C. 556

nudasset urbem, simul et cohors Romana per apertum
4 recenti strage iter invasit, et ex omnibus oppidi partibus relictis suis quisque stationibus in eum qui premebatur impetu hostium locum concurrerunt.
5 Eodem tempore Romani et ruinas muri supervadebant et scalas ad stantia moenia inferebant. Et dum in unam partem oculos animosque hostium certamen averterat, pluribus locis scalis capitur
6 murus, armatique in urbem transcenderunt. Quo tumultu audito territi hostes relicto quem conferti tuebantur loco in arcem omnes, inermi quoque
7 sequente turba, confugerunt. Ita urbe potitur consul. Qua direpta missis in arcem qui vitam regiis, si inermes abire vellent, libertatem Elatensibus pollicerentur, fideque in haec data post dies paucos arcem recipit.

XXV. Ceterum adventu in Achaiam Philoclis, regii praefecti, non Corinthus tantum liberata obsidione, sed Argivorum quoque civitas per quosdam principes Philocli prodita est temptatis prius animis plebis.
2 Mos erat comitiorum die primo velut ominis causa praetores pronuntiare Iovem Apollinemque et Herculem; additum lege[1] erat, ut his Philippus rex
3 adiceretur. Cuius nomen post pactam cum Romanis societatem quia praeco non adiecit, fremitus primo
4 multitudinis ortus, deinde clamor subicientium

[1] lege edd. : legi B.

open to attack, at the same time a Roman cohort B.C. 198 broke through the gap left by the recent collapse, and also the guards from all parts of the city, each leaving his own post, hurried to the spot which was endangered by the enemy's attack. At the same moment the Romans were both climbing over the ruins of the wall and moving their ladders against the standing ramparts. And while the conflict drew the eyes and thoughts of the enemy in one direction, the wall in several places was taken by escalade and the soldiers climbed over into the city. Hearing their shouts, the terrified enemy left the place they had been defending in force and made for the citadel, the unarmed crowd too following. So the consul took the town. Having sacked it, he sent messengers to the citadel to promise life to the garrison, if they wished to give up their arms and depart, and liberty to the Elatenses, and an agreement having been made to this effect, a few days later he occupied the citadel.

XXV. But the arrival of Philocles, the king's prefect, in Achaea not only raised the siege of Corinth, but brought about the betrayal of the city of Argos to Philocles through the agency of certain chief men, after the sentiments of the commons had first been tested. It was the custom on assembly-days that at the beginning the presiding officers should pronounce, as an auspicious act, the names of Zeus, Apollo, and Heracles; and the custom was extended by a decree that King Philip's name should be joined to these. But because, after the alliance was made with the Romans, the herald did not add his name to the others, a shout first rose from the crowd, then an uproar, as his partisans supplied the name

A.U.C. 556

Philippi nomen iubentiumque legitimum honorem usurpare, donec cum ingenti adsensu nomen recitatum est. Huius fiducia favoris Philocles arcessitus nocte occupat collem imminentem urbi—Larisam eam arcem vocant—positoque ibi praesidio cum lucis principio signis infestis ad subiectum arci forum vaderet, instructa acies ex adverso occurrit. Praesidium erat Achaeorum, nuper impositum, quingenti fere iuvenes delecti omnium civitatium; Aenesidemus Dymaeus praeerat. Ad hos orator a praefecto regio missus qui excedere urbe iuberet: neque enim pares eos oppidanis solis, qui idem quod Macedones sentirent, nedum adiunctis Macedonibus esse, quos ne Romani quidem ad Corinthum sustinuissent, primo nihil nec ducem nec ipsos movit; post paulo, ut Argivos quoque armatos ex parte altera venientes magno agmine viderunt, certam perniciem cernentes, omnem tamen casum, si pertinacior dux fuisset, videbantur subituri. Aenesidemus, ne flos Achaeorum iuventutis simul cum urbe amitteretur, pactus a Philocle ut abire illis liceret, ipse quo loco steterat armatus cum paucis clientibus non excessit. Missus a Philocle qui quaereret quid sibi vellet. Nihil moto[1] tantummodo, cum proiecto prae se clipeo staret, in praesidio creditae urbis moriturum se armatum respondit. Tum iussu praefecti a Thraecibus coniecta of Philip and ordered that the legal honour be paid B.C. 198 him, until with roars of applause his name was read. With the confidence inspired by this show of loyalty, Philocles was summoned and occupied by night a hill overhanging the city—they call this citadel Larisa—and leaving a guard there he marched in embattled array at daybreak towards the market-place which lies at the foot of the citadel, where the battle-line from the other side was drawn up to meet him. This was a force of Achaeans, recently placed there, about five hundred youths chosen from all the cities; Aenesidemus of Dymae was in command. A herald was sent to them by the king's prefect, to order them to leave the city: he reminded them that they were no match for the citizens, who sided with the Macedonians, even by themselves, and still less after their junction with the Macedonians, whose attack at Corinth not even the Romans had withstood; but at first he influenced neither commander nor soldiers; a little later, when they saw the Argives too in arms, coming from the opposite direction in a strong column, and realized that their destruction was certain, they still seemed ready to suffer any fate, if their leader had been more stubborn. Aenesidemus, rather than lose the flower of the Achaean fighting men along with the city, having made a pact with Philocles that the men should be allowed to depart, himself with a few clients refused to leave the spot where he had taken his armed stand. Philocles sent to ask him what he meant. Without moving at all, with his buckler held out in front of him, he replied that he proposed to die under arms, in defence of the city entrusted to him. Then by order of the prefect javelins were thrown by the Thracians and all were 11 tela interfectique omnes. Et post pactam inter Achaeos ac Romanos societatem duae nobilissimae urbes, Argi et Corinthus, in potestate regis erant.

[1] moto Madvig: modo B.

A.U.C. 556

12 Haec ea aestate ab Romanis in Graecia terra marique gesta.

XXVI. In Gallia nihil sane memorabile ab Sex.
2 Aelio consule gestum. Cum duos exercitus in provincia habuisset, unum retentum, quem dimitti oportebat, cui L. Cornelius proconsul praefuerat—ipse ei C. Helvium praetorem praefecit, alterum
3 quem in provinciam adduxit, totum prope annum Cremonensibus Placentinisque cogendis redire in colonias, unde belli casibus dissipati erant, consumpsit.
4 Quem ad modum Gallia praeter spem quieta eo anno fuit, ita circa urbem servilis prope tumultus
5 est excitatus. Obsides Carthaginiensium Setiae custodiebantur. Cum iis, ut principum liberis,
6 magna vis servorum erat. Augebant eorum numerum, ut ab recenti Africo bello, et ab ipsis Setinis captiva aliquot nationis eius empta ex praeda
7 mancipia. Ea[1] cum coniurationem fecissent, missis ex eo numero, primum qui in Setino agro, deinde circa Norbam et Cerceios servitia sollicitarent, satis iam omnibus praeparatis, ludis qui Setiae prope diem futuri erant spectaculo intentum populum adgredi
8 statuerant; Setia per caedem et repentinum tumultum capta Norbam et Cerceios occupare non potuere

[1] Ea edd.: om. B.

[1] In his account of events in Greece, Livy has generally followed Polybius. He now gathers up from various sources isolated events of the same period in other parts of the world.
[2] See ix. 5 above.

killed. And after the alliance between the Achaeans and the Romans had been agreed upon, these two most celebrated cities, Argos and Corinth, were in the hands of the king. This is the record of the Romans' campaign in Greece, conducted during that summer on land and sea. B.C. 198

XXVI. In Gaul the consul Sextus Aelius accomplished nothing worth remark.[1] Although he had two armies in the province, one which he had retained in service, though he should have discharged it,[2] of which Lucius Cornelius the proconsul had been in command—he himself now placed Gaius Helvius the praetor in command of it—and one which he had brought into the province, he spent almost the whole year in compelling the people of Cremona and Placentia to return to the colonies whence they had been driven by the mishaps of war.

As Gaul was unexpectedly quiet that year, around Rome, on the other hand, there was almost a slave insurrection. The Carthaginian hostages were confined at Setia. With them, since they were sons of prominent men, was a large number of slaves. Their number was increased, as was natural after the recent African war, by numerous prisoners of war of that nation, bought up out of the booty by the people of Setia themselves. When these slaves had formed a conspiracy and had sent messengers from their company to stir up the slaves, first in the Setine territory, then around Norba and Cerceii, complete preparations having now been made, they had agreed to attack the crowd while occupied with the spectacle at the games which were soon to be held at Setia; the slaves captured Setia in the slaughter and confusion, but failed to take Norba and Cerceii.

A.U.C. 556

servitia.[1] Huius rei tam foedae indicium Romam ad L. Cornelium Lentulum praetorem urbanum delatum 9 est. Servi duo ante lucem ad eum venerunt atque ordine omnia quae acta futuraque erant, exposuerunt.
10 Quibus domi custodiri iussis, praetor senatu vocato edoctoque quae indices adferrent, proficisci ad eam coniurationem quaerendam atque opprimendam
11 iussus, cum quinque legatis profectus obvios in agris sacramento rogatos arma capere et sequi
12 cogebat. Hoc tumultuario dilectu duobus milibus ferme hominum armatis Setiam omnibus quo pergeret
13 ignaris venit. Ibi raptim principibus coniurationis comprehensis fuga servorum ex oppido facta est. Dimissis deinde per agros, qui vestigarent profugos.[2]
14 Egregia duorum opera servorum indicum et unius liberi fuit. Ei centum milia gravis aeris dari patres iusserunt, servis vicena quina milia aeris et libertatem; pretium eorum ex aerario solutum est
15 dominis. Haud ita multo post ex eiusdem coniurationis reliquiis nuntiatum est servitia Praeneste
16 occupatura. Eo L. Cornelius praetor profectus de quingentis fere hominibus qui in ea noxa erant, supplicium sumpsit. In timore civitas fuit obsides capti-
17 vosque Poenorum ea moliri. Itaque et Romae vigiliae per vicos servatae iussique circumire eas minores magistratus, et triumviri carceris lautumi-

[1] The addition of non potuere by the editors seems necessary to give the sense of the passage. B reads occupare servitia.

[2] Editors add a word like profugos as necessary, though the sentence is still incomplete. B reads uestigarent egregia.

[1] Lentulus is Livy's error for Merula. So also in § 16.

[2] Some such addition as this seems necessary to complete the sentence. It may be assumed that an account of the search and the punishment of the criminals is still missing.

News of this dreadful occurrence was transmitted to Rome, to Lucius Cornelius Lentulus[1] the urban praetor. Two slaves came to him before dawn and related in detail what had happened and what was likely to occur. Ordering them to be kept under guard at his home, the praetor summoned the senate and laid before them what the informants had told him, and on receiving orders to investigate and suppress this conspiracy, set out with five lieutenants, administered the oath to those he met in the fields, and compelled them to take arms and follow him. With this hastily-raised force of about two thousand armed men, he reached Setia before anyone knew where he was going. There, when the ringleaders in the plot had been summarily arrested, there was an exodus of slaves from the town. Cornelius sent troops through the country to pursue the fugitives, and himself returned to Rome.[2] Conspicuous service had been rendered by the two slaves who had given information, and by the one free man. To him the senate ordered given a reward of one hundred thousand asses; to the slaves, twenty-five thousand asses each, and their freedom; compensation for them from the treasury was paid to their owners. Shortly after this, word was received that the slaves, some of the remnants of the same conspiracy, were about to occupy Praeneste.[3] Lucius Cornelius the praetor went there and executed about five hundred who were implicated in the crime. The state feared that the Carthaginian hostages and prisoners had contrived the plot. So at Rome watchmen patrolled the streets, the minor magistrates were ordered to make B.C. 198.

[3] This town (now Palestrina), about twenty-five miles east of Rome, was strongly situated and therefore frequently a military objective. Catiline planned to seize it in 63 B.C.

A.U.C. 556

18 arum intentiorem custodiam habere iussi, et circa nomen Latinum a praetore litterae missae, ut et obsides in privato servarentur neque in publicum prodeundi facultas daretur, et captivi ne minus decem pondo compedibus vincti in nulla alia quam in carceris publici custodia essent.

XXVII. Eodem anno legati ab rege Attalo coronam auream ducentum quadraginta sex pondo in Capitolio posuerunt gratiasque senatui egere, quod Antiochus legatorum Romanorum auctoritate motus finibus Attali exercitum deduxisset.

2 Eadem aestate equites ducenti et elephanti[1] decem et tritici modium ducenta milia ab rege Masinissa ad exercitum qui in Graecia erat pervenerunt. Item ex Sicilia Sardiniaque magni commeatus
3 et vestimenta exercitui missa. Siciliam M. Marcellus, Sardiniam M. Porcius Cato obtinebat, sanctus et innocens, asperior tamen in faenore coercendo 4 habitus; fugatique ex insula faeneratores et sumptus, quos in cultum praetorum socii facere soliti erant circumcisi aut sublati.

5 Sex. Aelius consul, ex Gallia comitiorum causa Romam cum redisset, creavit consules C. Cornelium
6 Cethegum et Q. Minucium Rufum. Biduo post

[1] elephanti edd.: elephantes B.

[1] Stone quarries, probably on the north-east slope of the Capitoline, were used as places of temporary confinement, since imprisonment within Rome was rarely imposed as a punishment by the courts, and perhaps also for prisoners of war. The Mamertine Prison, still to be seen in the same vicinity, inspections, and the three officials in charge of the quarry-prison[1] to increase their vigilance, and the praetor sent letters around to the Latin confederacy, that the hostages kept should be in private custody, with no opportunity to come out into public places, the prisoners loaded with chains of not less than ten pounds' weight, and guarded only in a public prison.[2] B.C. 198.

XXVII. In the same year ambassadors from King Attalus deposited on the Capitoline a golden crown of a weight of two hundred forty-six pounds, and expressed to the senate his gratitude because Antiochus, influenced by the authority of the Roman ambassadors, had withdrawn his army from the frontiers of Attalus.

During the same summer two hundred cavalry, ten elephants, and two hundred thousand modii of grain arrived, sent by King Masinissa to the army which was serving in Greece. Also from Sicily and Sardinia great stores of provisions and clothing for the army were sent. Marcus Marcellus was governing Sicily, Marcus Porcius Cato, Sardinia, a man of integrity and uprightness, but considered overharsh in his restraint of usury; the usurers were expelled from the island, and the expenses which the allies were accustomed to incur for the comfort of the praetors were cut down or abolished.

When Sextus Aelius the consul had returned from Gaul to hold the elections, he announced that Gaius Cornelius Cethegus and Quintus Minucius Rufus may have been a part of the system, at least originally. The triumviri capitales had charge of the prison and of executions.

[2] That is, in a place like the lautumiae in Rome.

A.U.C. 556

praetorum comitia habita. Sex praetores illo anno primum creati crescentibus iam provinciis et latius 7 patescente imperio; creati autem hi: L.[1] Manlius Volso, C. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Silus, M. Helvius, M. Minucius Rufus, L. Atilius—Sempronius et Helvius ex iis aediles plebis erant; 8 curules aediles Q. Minucius Thermus et Ti. Sempronius Longus. Ludi Romani eo anno quater instaurati.

A.U.C. 557

XXVIII. C. Cornelio et Q. Minucio consulibus omnium primum de provinciis consulum praeto-
2 rumque actum. Prius de praetoribus transacta res, quae transigi sorte poterat. Urbana Sergio, peregrina iurisdictio Minucio obtigit; Sardiniam Atilius, Siciliam Manlius, Hispanias Sempronius citeriorem,
3 Helvius ulteriorem est sortitus. Consulibus Italiam Macedoniamque sortiri parantibus L. Oppius et Q. Fulvius tribuni plebis impedimento erant, quod
4 longinqua provincia Macedonia esset, neque ulla alia res maius bello impedimentum ad eam diem fuisset quam quod vixdum inchoatis rebus in ipso conatu gerendi belli prior consul revocaretur.
5 Quartum iam annum esse ab decreto Macedonico bello. Quaerendo regem et exercitum eius Sul-

[1] add. edd. vett.: om. B.

[1] In viii. 5 above Livy gives the assignments of the praetors for the current year. The new arrangement provides praetorian governors for the two Spanish provinces, which had since the expulsion of the Carthaginians been governed by pro-magistrates. The omission of Gaul, tacitly included with Italy, enabled the senate to designate a praetor peregrinus, had been chosen. Two days later the praetorian B.C. 196 election was held. This year, for the first time, six praetors were chosen, in consequence of the increase that had taken place in the number of the provinces[1] and the enlargement of the empire; the following were elected: Lucius Manlius Volso, Gaius Sempronius Tuditanus, Marcus Sergius Silus, Marcus Helvius, Marcus Minucius Rufus, and Lucius Atilius (of these, Sempronius and Helvius were plebeian aediles). The curule aediles were Quintus Minucius Thermus and Tiberius Sempronius Longus. The Roman Games were four times repeated that year.

XXVIII. When Gaius Cornelius and Quintus B.C. 197
Minucius assumed the consulship, the first question to be settled concerned the consular and praetorian provinces. The case of the praetors was first disposed of, since that could be done by lot. The city jurisdiction fell to Sergius, that between citizens and aliens to Minucius; Atilius obtained Sardinia, Manlius Sicily, Sempronius Nearer Spain and Helvius Farther Spain. As the consuls were making ready to draw lots for Italy and Macedonia, the tribunes of the people, Lucius Oppius and Quintus Fulvius, intervened, because, as they said, Macedonia was a distant province, and there had been no greater difficulty up to that time in the conduct of the war than the fact that just when he was undertaking to carry on the war, with the campaign scarce begun, the former consul was recalled. It was already the fourth year since the declaration of war with Macedonia. Sulpicius had spent the greater part of his [1] who presided over the court trying cases in which Romans and non-Romans were involved.

A.U.C. 557

picium maiorem partem anni absumpsisse. Villium congredientem cum hoste infecta re revocatum. 6 Quinctium rebus divinis Romae maiorem partem anni retentum ita gessisse tamen res ut, si aut maturius in provinciam venisset, aut hiems magis 7 sera fuisset, potuerit debellare; nunc prope in hiberna profectum ita comparare dici bellum, ut nisi successor impediat, perfecturus aestate proxima 8 videatur. His orationibus pervicerunt ut consules in senatus auctoritate fore dicerent se, si idem tribuni plebis facerent. Permittentibus utrisque liberam consultationem patres consulibus ambobus 9 Italiam provinciam decreverunt, T. Quinctio prorogarunt imperium donec successor ex senatus consulto venisset. Consulibus binae legiones decretae et ut bellum cum Gallis Cisalpinis, qui 10 defecissent a populo Romano, gererent. Quinctio in Macedoniam supplementum decretum, sex milia peditum, trecenti equites, sociorum navalium milia 11 tria. Praeesse eidem cui[1] praeerat classi L. Quinctius Flamininus iussus. Praetoribus in Hispanias octona milia peditum socium ac nominis Latini data et quadringeni equites, ut dimitterent veterem ex Hispaniis militem; et terminare iussi qua ulterior 12 citeriorve provincia servaretur. Macedoniae legatos

[1] cui Madvig: qui B.

[1] See ix. 1 above and, for a somewhat different interpretation, vi. 4.

[2] Although two proconsuls had usually exercised command in the Spanish peninsula, this is apparently the first time that definite boundary-lines were established. Henceforth two year in searching for the king and his army. Villius, B.C. 197 while making contact with the enemy, had been recalled before accomplishing anything. Quinctius, though detained for the greater part of the year[1] in Rome by religious observances, had still so managed things that if either he had arrived earlier or winter had been later, he could have finished the war; now, it was said, having retired into winter quarters, he was making such preparations that if no successor interfered he seemed in a fair way to end the war that coming summer. By such arguments they prevailed upon the consuls to say that they would put themselves in the senate's hands if the tribunes of the people would do the same. When both parties agreed to leave full discretion to the senate, the Fathers voted that both consuls should have Italy as province, and prolonged the term of Titus Quinctius until a successor, authorized by decree of the senate, should have arrived. To the consuls two legions each were assigned, and the task of prosecuting the war with the Cisalpine Gauls who had revolted against the Roman people. Reinforcements were voted for Quinctius for service in Macedonia, six thousand infantry, three hundred cavalry, and three thousand naval allies. Lucius Quinctius Flamininus was placed in command of the same fleet of which he already had charge. Each of the praetors sent to Spain received eight thousand infantry of the allies and the Latin confederacy, and four hundred cavalry, with orders to send the veterans home from Spain; they were directed, moreover, to fix the boundaries which should be observed between the nearer and the farther provinces.[2] Additional [1] distinct Spanish provinces are consciously recognized by the Romans.

A.U.C. 557

P. Sulpicium et P. Villium, qui consules in ea provincia fuerant, adiecerunt.

XXIX. Priusquam consules praetoresque in provincias proficiscerentur, prodigia procurari placuit, quod aedes Vulcani Summanique Romae, et quod
2 Fregenis murus et porta de caelo tacta erant, et Frusinone inter noctem lux orta, et Aefulae agnus biceps cum quinque pedibus natus, et Formiis duo lupi oppidum ingressi obvios aliquot laniaverant, Romae non in urbem solum sed in Capitolium penetraverat lupus.
3 C. Atinius tribunus plebis tulit ut quinque coloniae in oram maritimam deducerentur, duae ad ostia fluminum Vulturni Liternique, una Puteolos, una 4 ad Castrum Salerni: his Buxentum adiectum, trecenae familiae in singulas colonias iubebantur mitti. Triumviri deducendis iis, qui per triennium magistratum haberent, creati M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minucius Thermus, Ti. Sempronius Longus.
5 Dilectu rebusque aliis divinis humanisque quae per ipsos agenda erant, perfectis, consules ambo in 6 Galliam profecti, Cornelius recta ad Insubres via, qui tum in armis erant Cenomanis adsumptis; Q. Minucius in laeva Italiae ad inferum mare flexit iter Genuamque exercitu ducto[1] ab Liguribus orsus

[1] ducto edd.: educto B.

[1] The Via Flaminia.
[2] The left or west coast, looking north from Rome.
[3] The Tuscan Sea, to the west of Italy; contrasted with the mare superum or Adriatic.

lieutenants for Macedonia were named, Publius Sulpicius and Publius Villius, who had been consuls in that province. B.C. 197

XXIX. Before the consuls and praetors set out for their provinces, it was decreed that expiation for the prodigies should be made, because at Rome the temples of Vulcan and Summanus and the wall and gate at Fregellae had been struck by lightning, and at Frusino a light had shone during the night, and at Aefula a two-headed lamb with five feet had been born, and at Formiae two wolves had entered the town and injured certain persons they encountered, while at Rome a wolf had not only come into the city but had even climbed to the Capitoline.

Gaius Atinius, tribune of the people, carried a proposal that five colonies should be established on the sea-coast, two at the mouths of the Vulturnus and Liternus rivers, one at Puteoli, one at Castrum Salerni; to these Buxentum was added, and it was ordered that three hundred families be sent to each colony. A commission of three, to hold office for three years, was created to found these colonies, and Marcus Servilius Geminus, Quintus Minucius Thermus, and Tiberius Sempronius Longus were chosen as its members.

When the levy had been held and other matters, human and divine, which had to be done by them in person, had been disposed of, the two consuls set out for Gaul, Cornelius by the straight road [1] towards the Insubres, who were in arms, allied with the Cenomani; Quintus Minucius marched up the left [2] side of Italy towards the lower sea,[3] and having conducted his army to Genoa, began the war with the Ligures. The towns

A.U.C. 557

7 bellum est. Oppida Clastidium et Litubium, utraque Ligurum, et duae gentis eiusdem civitates, Celeiates Cerdiciatesque, sese dediderunt. Et iam omnia cis Padum praeter Gallorum Boios, Ilvates Ligurum
8 sub dicione erant; quindecim oppida, hominum viginti milia esse dicebantur quae se dediderant. Inde in agrum Boiorum legiones duxit.

XXX. Boiorum exercitus haud ita multo ante traiecerat Padum iunxeratque[1] se Insubribus et 2 Cenomanis, quod ita acceperant coniunctis legionibus consules rem gesturos, ut et ipsi collatas in unum
3 vires firmarent. Postquam fama accidit alterum consulem Boiorum urere agros, seditio extemplo orta est; postulare Boi ut laborantibus opem universi
4 ferrent; Insubres negare se sua deserturos. Ita divisae copiae, Boisque in agrum suum tutandum profectis Insubres cum Cenomanis super amnis
5 Mincii ripam consederunt. Infra eum locum duo milia et consul Cornelius eidem flumini castra
6 applicuit. Inde mittendo in vicos Cenomanorum Brixiamque, quod caput gentis erat, ut satis comperit non ex auctoritate seniorum iuventutem in armis esse nec publico consilio Insubrum defectioni Ceno-
7 manos sese adiunxisse, excitis ad se principibus id agere ac moliri coepit ut desciscerent ab Insubribus Cenomani et sublatis signis aut domos redirent aut of Clastidium and Litubium, both belonging to the Ligures, and two cantons of the same people, the Celeiates and the Cerdiciates, surrendered. And now all the states on this side of the Po except the Gallic Boi and the Ligurian Ilvates were under his control; there were altogether fifteen towns and twenty thousand men, according to report, that had surrendered. Thence he led his legions into the territory of the Boi. B.C. 197

[1] iunxeratque edd. : iunxerat B.

XXX. The army of the Boi had not long before this crossed the Po and had effected a junction with the Insubres and the Cenomani, because they had heard that the consuls were to carry on the war with their legions united, that they too might consolidate their strength by combining their armies. But when the news got around that one consul was burning the farms of the Boi, dissension at once arose; the Boi demanded that all should go to the relief of their harassed countrymen; the Insubres asserted that they would not desert their own possessions. So the army was divided, the Boi going home to defend their land, the Insubres with the Cenomani encamping along the river Mincius. Two miles farther down stream, the consul Cornelius was also encamped along the same river. Thence, sending messengers to the villages of the Cenomani and to Brescia, which was the capital of the tribe, when he was assured that the young men were in arms without the approval of the elders, and that the Cenomani had joined the revolt of the Insubres without a decision of the state to that effect, he summoned the chiefs to his presence and began to contrive and plan that the Cenomani should desert the Insubres and, taking up their standards, either go home or join

A.U.C. 567

8 ad Romanos transirent. Et id quidem impetrari nequiit; in id fides data consuli est, ut in acie aut quiescerent aut, si qua etiam occasio fuisset, adiuva-
9 rent Romanos. Haec ita convenisse Insubres ignorabant; suberat tamen quaedam suspicio animis labare fidem sociorum. Itaque cum in aciem eduxissent, neutrum iis cornu committere ausi, ne, si dolo cessissent, rem totam inclinarent, post signa in 10 subsidiis eos locaverunt. Consul principio pugnae vovit aedem Sospitae Iunoni, si eo die hostes fusi fugatique fuissent; a militibus clamor sublatus compotem voti consulem se facturos, et impetus in 11 hostes est factus. Non tulerunt Insubres primum concursum. Quidam et a Cenomanis, terga repente in ipso certamine adgressis, tumultum ancipitem iniectum auctores sunt, caesaque in medio quinque et triginta milia hostium, quinque milia et ducentos
12 vivos captos, in iis Hamilcarem, Poenorum imperatorem, qui belli causa fuisset; signa militaria centum 13 triginta et carpenta supra ducenta. Multa oppida Gallorum,[1] quae Insubrum defectionem secuta erant, dediderunt se Romanis.

XXXI. Minucius consul primo effusis populationibus peragraverat fines Boiorum, deinde, ut relictis

[1] Gallorum Bekker: Gallorumque B.

[1] In XXXIV. liii. 3 Livy records the dedication of a temple to Juno Matuta, vowed by Cornelius in the Gallic war four years before.

[2] Hamilcar was killed in the battle between Furius and the Gauls (XXXI. xxi. 18); he was also led in the triumph of Cornelius (XXXIII. xxiii. 5). Livy makes no effort to decide the Romans. And this, indeed, he could not accom- B.C. 197 plish; but a pledge was given the consul to this effect, that in the battle they would either remain quiet or, if occasion offered, even aid the Romans. The Insubres knew nothing of these negotiations; yet they somehow suspected that the fidelity of their allies was weakening. So when they formed the battle-line they did not dare to entrust either flank to them, lest, if they treacherously gave way, they might cause a complete defeat, but placed them behind the standards in support. The consul at the beginning of the battle vowed a temple to Juno Sospita[1] if the enemy should be routed and put to flight that day; the soldiers shouted out that they would bring about the fulfilment of the consul's vow and the attack on the enemy began. The Insubres broke at the first assault. Some say that when the Cenomani also, in the midst of the fighting, assailed them in the rear, there was a double turmoil, that between the two lines thirty-five thousand of the enemy were slain and five thousand two hundred taken alive, among them Hamilcar,[2] the Carthaginian general, who had been the prime mover of the war; and that one hundred and thirty military standards and more than two hundred wagons were captured. Many Gallic towns which had joined the Insubres in revolt gave themselves up to the Romans.

XXXI. The consul Minucius had at first wandered far and wide through the country of the Boi, raiding in every direction, but later, when they had left the which of these conflicting accounts is correct, though he is aware of the contradictions as well as the resemblances (note the phrase auctores sunt in sect. 11). Some scholars believe that Livy and his sources have made two battles out of one.

A.U.C. 557

Insubribus ad sua tuenda receperant sese, castris se
2 tenuit acie dimicandum cum hoste ratus. Nec Boi detrectassent pugnam, ni fama Insubres victos adlata animos fregisset. Itaque relicto duce castrisque dissipati per vicos, sua quisque ut defenderent,
3 rationem gerendi belli hosti mutarunt. Omissa enim spe per unam dimicationem rei decernendae rursus populari agros et urere tecta vicosque expug-
4 nare coepit. Per eosdem dies Clastidium incensum. Inde in Ligustinos Ilvates, qui soli non parebant, 5 legiones ductae. Ea quoque gens, ut Insubres acie victos, Boios ita, ut temptare spem certaminis non auderent, territos audivit, in dicionem venit.
6 Litterae consulum amborum de rebus in Gallia gestis prospere sub idem tempus Romam adlatae. M. Sergius praetor urbanus in senatu eas, deinde ex auctoritate patrum ad populum recitavit. Supplicatio in quadriduum decreta.

XXXII. Hiems iam eo tempore erat, et, cum T. Quinctius capta Elatia in Phocide ac Locride hiberna
2 disposita haberet, Opunte seditio orta est. Factio una Aetolos, qui propiores[1] erant, altera Romanos
3 accersebat. Aetoli priores venerunt; sed opulentior factio exclusis Aetolis missoque ad imperatorem Romanum nuntio usque in adventum eius tenuit

[1] propiores edd.: priores B.

---

[1] Livy returns to Polybius (XVIII. i.–viii), his authority for the eastern campaign, and the abrupt change of source may explain the harshness of the transitional clause.

[2] See xxiv. 7 above. The events now described belong accordingly to the winter of 198–197 B.C., and so antedate the Gallic campaigns just narrated.

Insubres and returned to defend their possessions, B.C. 197
he remained in camp, thinking that he would fight a regular battle with the enemy. The Boi would not have declined the contest if the news that the Insubres had been defeated had not diminished their ardour. So, leaving their leader and their camp, they scattered through the towns, each to defend his own property, and changed the enemy's plan of operations. For, giving up hope of deciding the war by a single engagement, he began once more to ravage the fields and burn the buildings and storm the towns. During this time Clastidium was burned. Thence he led his legions against the Ligurian Ilvates, who alone were not submissive. This tribe too surrendered when they heard that as the Insubres had been defeated in battle, so the Boi were too terrified to dare to try fortune in the open field. The dispatches of the two consuls, describing their successes in Gaul, reached Rome about the same time. Marcus Sergius the city praetor read them in the senate and, with the senate's authorization, then to the people. A thanksgiving of four days was decreed.

XXXII. By that time it was winter,[1] and while Titus Quinctius, after the capture of Elatia,[2] had his winter quarters distributed through Phocis and Locris, sedition broke out at Opus. One faction called in the Aetolians, who were nearer, the other the Romans. The Aetolians were first to arrive; but the richer faction[3] excluded the Aetolians and, sending a messenger to the Roman commander, held [3] The Romans consistently supported the wealthier and more conservative parties in the Greek towns.

A.U.C. 557

4 urbem. Arcem regium tenebat praesidium, neque ut decederent inde, aut Opuntiorum minis aut auctoritate imperatoris Romani perpelli potuerunt. 5 Mora, cur non extemplo oppugnarentur, ea fuit quod caduceator ab rege venerat locum ac tempus 6 petens colloquio. Id gravate regi concessum est, non quin cuperet Quinctius per se partim armis, partim condicionibus confectum videri bellum; 7 necdum enim sciebat utrum successor sibi alter ex novis consulibus mitteretur, an, quod summa vi ut tenderent amicis et propinquis mandaverat, imperium 8 prorogaretur; aptum autem fore colloquium credebat, ut sibi liberum esset vel ad bellum manenti vel 9 ad pacem decedenti rem inclinare. In sinu Maliaco prope Nicaeam litus elegere. Eo rex ab Demetriade cum quinque lembis et una nave rostrata venit. 10 Erant cum eo principes Macedonum et Achaeorum 11 exul, vir insignis, Cycliadas. Cum imperatore Romano rex Amynander erat et Dionysodorus, Attali legatus, et Agesimbrotus, praefectus Rhodiae classis, et Phaeneas, princeps Aetolorum, et Achaei 12 duo, Aristaenus et Xenophon. Inter hos Romanus ad [1] extremum litus progressus, cum rex in proram 13 navis in ancoris stantis processisset, "commodius" inquit, "si in terram egrediaris, ex propinquo dicamus in vicem audiamusque." [2] Cum rex facturum se id negaret, "quem tandem" inquit Quinctius

[1] ad edd. vett.: om. B.
[2] audiamusque edd.: audiemusque B.

the city until he came. A royal garrison held the B.C. 197 citadel and could not be induced either by the threats of the people of Opus or by the influence of the Roman commander to withdraw from it. A delay, preventing an immediate attack, occurred because a herald had come from the king requesting a time and place for a conference. This was reluctantly granted to the king, not because Quinctius was not eager to seem to have ended the war himself, partly by arms, partly by diplomacy; for he did not yet know whether a successor to him would be appointed, that is, one of the new consuls, or his own term would be extended, a thing which he had instructed his friends and relatives to strive for with all their might; but on the whole he considered that a conference would be expedient, that he might be free to lean either towards war, if he remained, or towards peace, if he were relieved. They chose a place on the shore of the Malian Gulf near Nicaea. Thither the king came from Demetrias with five light ships and one war-vessel. There were with him nobles of Macedonia and the Achaean exile Cycliadas, a man of distinction. King Amynander was with the Roman general, as well as Dionysodorus, representing Attalus, and Agesimbrotus, the commander of the Rhodian fleet, and Phaeneas, chief of the Aetolians, and two Achaeans, Aristaenus and Xenophon. The Roman, attended by them, went out to the edge of the strand, and when the king had taken his place in the prow of his ship as it lay at anchor Quinctius spoke: "It will be more convenient if you come ashore, that we may be nearer and speak and listen in turn." When the king refused to do this, Quinctius asked, "Whom, pray, do you fear?"

A.U.C. 557

14 "times?" Ad hoc ille superbo et regio animo: "Neminem equidem timeo praeter deos immortales; non omnium autem credo fidei, quos circa te video, 15 atque omnium minime Aetolis." "Istuc quidem" ait Romanus "par omnibus periculum est, qui cum hoste ad colloquium congrediuntur, si nulla fides 16 sit." "Non tamen" inquit, "T. Quincti, par perfidiae praemium est, si fraude agatur, Philippus et Phaeneas; neque enim aeque difficulter Aetoli praetorem alium ac Macedones regem in meum locum substituant."

XXXIII. Secundum haec silentium fuit, cum Romanus eum aequum censeret priorem dicere qui petisset colloquium, rex eius esse priorem orationem, qui daret pacis leges, non qui acciperet; tum 2 Romanus: simplicem suam orationem esse; ea enim se dicturum, quae ni fiant, nulla sit pacis 3 condicio. Deducenda ex omnibus Graeciae civitatibus regi praesidia esse, captivos et transfugas sociis populi Romani reddendos, restituenda Romanis ea Illyrici loca, quae post pacem in Epiro factam 4 occupasset, Ptolomaeo Aegypti regi reddendas urbes, quas post Philopatoris Ptolomaei mortem occupavisset. Suas populique Romani condiciones has esse: ceterum et socium audiri postulata verum 5 esse. Attali regis legatus naves captivosque quae ad Chium navali proelio capta essent, et Nicephorium Venerisque templum quae spoliasset evastassetque,

[1] After the peace of 205 B.C. (XXIX. xii. 1), Philip had occupied certain districts on the Illyrian coast which Rome had taken over after the defeat of the Illyrians in 229 B.C. (Per. XX).

[2] A sacred grove outside Pergamum: Strabo, XIII. iv.; Diodorus, XXVIII. 5.

With proud and kingly mien he replied, "None do I fear, save only the immortal gods; but I do not trust the word of all I see around you, and least of all that of the Aetolians." "As to that," replied the Roman, "we all share the danger equally who come to conference with an enemy, if there is no trust." "Nevertheless, Titus Quinctius," said the king, "Philip and Phaeneas are not equal rewards for perfidy, if there should be a breach of faith; for it would not be equally difficult for the Aetolians to find another praetor and the Macedonians another king to take my place." B.C. 197

XXXIII. Silence followed, the Roman believing that the conference should be opened by him who had asked it, the king that he who was proposing terms of peace, and not he who was receiving them, should speak first; then the Roman began: He said that his speech was simple; for he would say only what was essential if there were to be terms of peace. The king must withdraw his garrisons from all the cities of Greece, must give up the captives and fugitives to the allies of the Roman people, must restore to the Romans the parts of Illyricum[1] which he had occupied subsequent to the peace which had been made in Epirus, and must give back to King Ptolemy of Egypt the cities which he had seized since the death of Ptolemy Philopator. These were his conditions and those of the Roman people; but the king must hear besides the demands of the allies. The ambassador of King Attalus demanded that the ships and prisoners which had been taken in the naval battle off Chios be given back, and that the Nicephorium[2] and the temple of Venus which he had despoiled and destroyed should be restored to

A.U.C. 557

6 pro incorruptis restitui; Rhodii Peraeam—regio est continentis adversus insulam, vetustae eorum dicionis —repetebant postulabantque praesidia deduci ab Iaso et a Bargyliis et Euromensium urbe et in 7 Hellesponto Sesto atque Abydo, et Perinthum Byzantiis in antiqui formulam iuris restitui, et liberari omnia Asiae emporia portusque. Achaei Corinthum 8 et Argos repetebant. Praetor Aetolorum Phaeneas cum eadem fere quae Romani, ut Graecia decederetur, postulasset, redderenturque Aetolis urbes quae 9 quondam iuris ac dicionis eorum fuissent, excepit orationem eius princeps Aetolorum Alexander, vir 10 ut inter Aetolos facundus. Iam dudum se reticere ait, non quo quicquam agi putet eo colloquio, sed ne quem sociorum dicentem interpellet. Nec[1] de pace cum fide Philippum agere nec bella vera virtute 11 umquam gessisse. In colloquiis insidiari et captare; in bello non congredi aequo campo neque signis collatis dimicare, sed refugientem incendere ac diripere urbes et vincentium praemia victum corrum- 12 pere. At non antiquos Macedonum reges,[2] sed acie bellare solitos, urbibus parcere, quantum possent quo 13 opulentius haberent imperium. Nam de quorum possessione dimicetur tollentem nihil sibi praeter 14 bellum relinquere, quod consilium esse? Piures priore anno sociorum urbes in Thessalia evastasse

[1] nec Bekker: ne B: neque ς.
[2] post reges lacunam susp. edd.

---

[1] Taken at the time of the operations mentioned in XXXI. xiv. 4.

[2] I have completed the apparent sense of the first clause.

their former state; the Rhodians asked for Peraea B.C. 197
—a district on the mainland opposite their island, and under their ancient rule[1]—and demanded that the garrisons be withdrawn from Iasus and Bargyliae and the city of the Euromenses, and on the Hellespont from Sestus and Abydus, and that Perinthus should be given back to the Byzantines and permitted to enjoy its ancient rights, and that all the markets and ports of Asia should be made free. The Achaeans demanded Corinth and Argos. Phaeneas, praetor of the Aetolians, having made practically the same demands as the Romans, that Greece should be evacuated, and also that the cities which had formerly been under the control and sway of the Aetolians should be returned to them, was interrupted in his speech by Alexander, an Aetolian noble, and considered eloquent, as Aetolians go. He said that he had kept silent for a long time, not because he thought that anything was being accomplished at the conference, but to avoid breaking in on the speech of any of the allies. Philip, he said, had never kept peace with good faith or waged war with true courage. In conference he plotted and tried to entrap his opponents; in battle he would not engage in the open field or fight hand to hand, but instead would retreat, burn and rob cities and, though conquered, destroy the prizes of the conquerors. The Macedonian kings of old did not conduct matters thus,[2] but were used to fight in battle array and to spare the cities, so far as they could, that they might have a richer empire. For what sort of wisdom was it to destroy the things for the possession of which you fight, and leave yourself nothing but the fighting? Philip had, during the preceding cam-

A.U.C. 557 Philippum quam omnes qui umquam hostes Thes-15 saliae fuerint. Ipsis quoque Aetolis eum plura socium quam hostem ademisse: Lysimachiam pulso praetore 16 et praesidio Aetolorum occupasse eum; Cium, item suae dicionis urbem, funditus evertisse ac delesse;
eadem fraude habere eum Thebas Phthias, Echinum, Larisam, Pharsalum.

XXXIV. Motus oratione Alexandri Philippus navem, ut exaudiretur, propius terram applicuit.
2 Orsum eum dicere, in Aetolos maxime, violenter Phaeneas interfatus non in verbis rem verti ait; aut bello vincendum aut melioribus parendum esse.
3 "Apparet id quidem" inquit Philippus "etiam caeco," iocatus in valetudinem oculorum Phaeneae; et erat dicacior natura quam regem decet, et ne 4 inter seria quidem risu satis temperans. Indignari inde coepit, Aetolos tamquam Romanos decedi Graecia iubere, qui, quibus finibus Graecia sit, dicere non possent; ipsius enim Aetoliae Agraeos Apodotosque et Amphilochos, quae permagna eorum 5 pars sit, Graeciam non esse. "An, quod a sociis eorum non abstinuerim, iustam querellam habent, cum ipsi pro lege hunc antiquitus morem servent, ut adversus socios ipsi suos publica tantum auctoritate dempta iuventutem suam militare sinant, et contra-riae persaepe acies in utraque parte Aetolica auxilia
6 habeant? Neque ego Cium expugnavi, sed Prusiam

[1] King of Bithynia (XXIX. xii. 14).

paign, wasted more friendly cities in Thessaly than all the enemies Thessaly had ever had. To the Aetolians themselves, too, he had as an ally done more damage than he had as an enemy: he had taken possession of Lysimachia after driving out the magistrate and the Aetolian garrison; he had utterly ruined and destroyed Cios, another city under their control; with the same deceit he held Phthian Thebes, Echinus, Larisa, and Pharsalus. B.C. 197

XXXIV. Philip, angered at Alexander's speech, moved his ship nearer the shore, that he might be heard more clearly. When he had begun to reply, especially to the Aetolians, Phaeneas rudely interrupted him, saying that the decision did not turn on words: Philip must either conquer in battle or obey his betters. "That is clear," retorted Philip, "even to a blind man," making jest of Phaeneas' affliction of the eyes; he was, it must be admitted, more facetious by nature than becomes a king, and not even in serious business did he refrain from jesting. Then he began to complain that the Aetolians, like the Romans, ordered him to retire from Greece, although they could not say within what boundaries Greece lay; for in Aetolia itself, the Agraei, the Apodoti, the Amphilochi, who comprise a great part of the country, were not in Greece. "Or," he asked, "do they have just ground for complaint that I have not kept my hands off their allies, when they themselves have long observed this custom as an established practice, of allowing their own young men to fight against their allies, official sanction being merely withheld, and opposing battle-lines will very often both contain Aetolian auxiliaries? I did not capture Cios, but I aided my ally and friend Prusias[1] who was socium et amicum oppugnantem adiuvi; et Lysimachiam ab Thracibus vindicavi sed,[1] quia me necessitas ad hoc bellum a custodia eius avertit, Thraces 7 habent. Et Aetolis haec; Attalo autem Rhodiisque nihil iure debeo; non enim a me, sed ab illis princi-

A.U.C. 557

8 pium belli ortum est; Romanorum autem honoris causa Peraean Rhodiis et naves Attalo cum captivis
9 qui comparebunt restituam. Nam quod ad Nicephorium Venerisque templi restitutionem attinet, 10 quid restitui ea postulantibus respondeam, nisi, quo uno modo silvae lucique caesi restitui possunt, curam impensamque sationis[2] me praestaturum—quoniam haec inter se reges postulare et respondere
11 placet." Extrema eius oratio adversus Achaeos fuit, in qua orsus ab Antigono primum, suis deinde erga gentem eam meritis, recitari decreta eorum iussit omnes divinos humanosque honores complexa atque
12 eis obiecit recens decretum, quo ab se descivissent; invectusque graviter in perfidiam eorum, Argos
13 tamen se iis redditurum dixit; de Corintho cum imperatore Romano deliberaturum esse quaesiturumque ab eo simul, utrum iisne urbibus decedere se aequum censeat, quas ab se ipso captas iure belli habeat, an iis etiam, quas a maioribus suis accepisset.

XXXV. Parantibus Achaeis Aetolisque ad ea respondere, cum prope occasum sol esset, dilato in posterum diem colloquio Philippus in stationem,

[1] sed Ascensius: et B.
[2] sationis edd.: stationis B.

besieging it; also, I rescued Lysimachia from the B.C. 197 Thracians, but, because necessity diverted me from guarding it to this war, the Thracians hold it. So much for the Aetolians; but to Attalus and the Rhodians I owe nothing justly; for the beginning of the war was their act, not mine; however, to do honour to the Romans, I shall restore Peraea to the Rhodians and to Attalus the ships and such prisoners as can be found. Now as to the restoration of the Nicephorium and the temple of Venus, what reply can I make to those who demand that they be restored, except that (and in this way alone can woods and groves cut down be restored) I shall take upon myself the responsibility and cost of planting—since this is the sort of thing that kings are pleased to ask and reply to one another." The rest of his speech was directed to the Achaeans, in which he recounted first the services of Antigonus to the people and then his own, bade that their decrees be read, which included all honours, divine and human, and taunted them with their most recent decree, in which they repudiated the alliance with him; and after violently assailing their perfidy, he said that he would nevertheless give back Argos to them; regarding Corinth, he would confer with the Roman commander and ascertain from him at the same time whether he thought it proper that he evacuate those cities which he himself had captured and which he held by right of conquest, or those also which he had inherited from his sires.

XXXV. As the Achaeans and Aetolians were preparing to answer him, since the sun was now near its setting, the council was adjourned until next day, and Philip returned to the base from which he had

A.U.C. 557

ex qua profectus erat, Romani sociique in castra 2 redierunt. Quinctius postero die ad Nicaeam—is enim locus placuerat—ad constitutum tempus venit; Philippus nullus usquam, nec nuntius ab eo per aliquot horas veniebat, et iam desperantibus ven-3 turum repente apparuerunt naves. Atque ipse quidem, cum tam gravia et indigna imperarentur, inopem consilii diem consumpsisse deliberando 4 aiebat; vulgo credebant de industria rem in serum tractam, ne tempus dari posset Achaeis Aetolisque 5 ad respondendum, et eam opinionem ipse adfirmavit, petendo ut summotis aliis, ne tempus altercando tereretur et aliqui finis rei imponi posset, cum ipso 6 imperatore Romano liceret sibi colloqui. Id primo non acceptum, ne excludi colloquio viderentur 7 socii, dein, cum haud absisteret petere, ex omnium consilio Romanus imperator cum Ap. Claudio tribuno militum ceteris summotis ad extremum litus 8 processit; rex cum duobus, quos pridie adhibuerat, in terram est egressus. Ibi cum aliquamdiu secreto locuti essent, quae acta Philippus ad suos ret-9 tulerit, minus compertum est; Quinctius haec rettulit ad socios: Romanis eum cedere tota Illyrici 10 ora, perfugas remittere ac si qui sint captivi; Attalo naves et cum iis captos navales socios, Rhodiis regionem quam Peraean vocant reddere, Iaso et 11 Bargyliis non cessurum; Aetolis Pharsalum Larisamque reddere, Thebas non reddere; Achaeis come, the Romans and the allies to the camp. The next day Quinctius arrived at Nicaea—for this was the place agreed upon—at the appointed time; Philip was nowhere in sight and no messenger from him arrived for several hours, and just as they were ready to abandon hope of his coming, suddenly his ships appeared. And Philip said that, since such heavy and unjust demands had been made, being uncertain what to do, he had spent the day in deliberation; it was the general opinion that he had purposely deferred his arrival until late, so as to give the Achaeans and Aetolians no time to reply to him, and he himself confirmed this belief by asking that the others retire, that time might not be wasted in argument and that some end might be set to the affair, and that he be permitted to confer with the Roman commander by himself. At first the request was denied, lest the allies seem to be excluded from the conference, but finally, as he persisted in his plea, with the consent of all, the Roman general with Appius Claudius, tribune of the soldiers, left the rest behind and came out to the water's edge; the king with the two companions whom he had had with him the day before came ashore. After they had talked for some time apart, what account Philip gave his own friends is uncertain; the report of Quinctius to the allies was that Philip ceded to the Romans the whole Illyrian coast, sent back the deserters and whatever prisoners there were; to Attalus he returned the ships and the naval allies captured with them, and to the Rhodians the region which they call Peraea, but he would not give up Iasus or Bargyliae; to the Aetolians he surrendered Pharsalus and Larisa but not Thebes; to the Achaeans he would yield not only Argos but B.C. 197

A.U.C. 557 non Argis modo sed etiam Corintho cessurum.
12 Nulli omnium placere partium, quibus cessurus aut non cessurus esset, destinatio: plus enim amitti in iis quam acquiri, nec umquam, nisi tota deduxisset Graecia[1] praesidia, causas certaminum defore.

XXXVI. Cum haec toto ex concilio certatim omnes vociferarentur, ad Philippum quoque procul stantem
2 vox est perlata. Itaque a Quinctio petit ut rem totam in posterum diem differret: profecto aut persuasurum se aut persuaderi sibi passurum.
3 Litus ad Thronium colloquio destinatur. Eo mature conventum est. Ibi Philippus primum et Quinctium et omnes qui aderant rogare ne spem pacis turbare
4 vellent, postremo petere tempus, quo legatos mittere Romam ad senatum posset: aut iis condicionibus se pacem impetraturum aut quascumque senatus
5 dedisset leges pacis accepturum. Id ceteris haud-quaquam placebat: nec enim aliud quam moram et
6 dilationem ad colligendas vires quaeri; Quinctius verum id futurum fuisse dicere, si aestas et tempus rerum gerendarum esset; nunc hieme instante
7 nihil amitti dato spatio ad legatos mittendos: nam neque sine auctoritate senatus ratum quicquam eorum fore, quae cum rege ipsi pepigissent, et explorari, dum bello necessariam quietem ipsa
8 hiems daret, senatus auctoritatem posse. In hanc sententiam et ceteri sociorum principes concesserunt; indutiisque datis in duos menses, et ipsos mittere singulos legatos ad senatum edocendum, ne fraude

[1] Graecia edd.: et Graecia B.

Corinth as well. The decision as to the places from B.C. 197 which he would or would not retire pleased no party: for more, they maintained, was lost thereby than gained, nor would causes for strife ever be wanting until he withdrew his garrisons from all Greece.

XXXVI. When shouts to this effect were uttered by the whole council, all speaking at once, their words reached Philip even standing at a distance. Accordingly he asked Quinctius to postpone the whole question until the next day: he would assuredly persuade them or suffer himself to be persuaded. The beach near Thronium was selected for the meeting. Thither all came at an early hour. There Philip first asked both Quinctius and all the others who were present not to entertain views which would disturb the hope of peace, and finally begged for time in which he could send an embassy to the senate at Rome: he would either obtain peace on these terms or submit to whatever conditions of peace the senate imposed. The others did not all like this suggestion: for nothing else, they said, was sought than postponement and delay to collect fresh troops; Quinctius argued that this would have been true had it been summer and the time for active operations; now, with winter at hand, nothing was lost by granting an interval to send ambassadors: for none of the agreements they had made with the king could be ratified except on the authority of the senate, and while winter gave the necessary respite from war the views of the senate could be sought. The other leaders of the allies also agreed with this opinion; and having granted a truce of two months, they too decided to send one ambassador each to advise the senate, lest it be deceived by the

A.U.C. 557

9 regis caperetur, placuit. Additum indutiarum pacto, ut regia praesidia Phocide ac Locride extemplo 10 deducerentur. Et ipse Quinctius cum sociorum legatis Amynandrum, Athamanum regem, ut speciem legationi adiceret, et Q. Fabium—uxoris Quincti sororis filius erat—et Q. Fulvium et Ap. Claudium misit.

XXXVII. Ut ventum Romam est, prius sociorum legati quam regis auditi sunt. Cetera eorum
2 oratio conviciis regis consumpta est; moverunt eo maxime senatum, demonstrando maris terrarumque
3 regionis eius situm, ut omnibus appareret, si Demetriadem in Thessalia, Chalcidem in Euboea, Corinthum in Achaia rex teneret, non posse liberam
4 Graeciam esse, et ipsum Philippum non contumeliosius quam verius compedes eas Graeciae appellare.
5 Legati deinde regis intromissi; quibus longiorem exorsis orationem brevis interrogatio, cessurusne iis tribus urbibus esset, sermonem incidit, cum mandati sibi de iis nominatim negarent quicquam. Sic infecta pace regii dimissi; Quinctio liberum ar-
6 bitrium pacis ac belli permissum. Cui[1] ut satis apparuit non taedere belli senatum, et ipse victoriae quam pacis avidior neque colloquium postea Philippo dedit neque legationem aliam quam quae omni Graecia decedi nuntiaret, admissurum dixit.

XXXVIII. Philippus, cum acie decernendum videret et undique ad se contrahendas vires, maxime king's misrepresentations. A stipulation was added B.C. 197 to the agreement regarding the truce, that the king's garrisons should be immediately withdrawn from Phocis and Locris. And Quinctius himself sent with the ambassadors of the allies Amynander, king of the Athamanians, to add distinction to the embassy, and Quintus Fabius—he was the son of the sister of the wife of Quinctius—and Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius.

[1] cui Crévier: quod B.

XXXVII. When they reached Rome, the ambassadors of the allies were heard before those of the king. Much of their speech was devoted to reviling the king; they influenced the senate especially by their description of the geography of the sea and lands in that region, so that it was clear to all that if the king held Demetrias in Thessaly, Chalcis in Euboea, and Corinth in Achaea, Greece could not be free, and that Philip himself, with equal insolence and truth, called them the fetters of Greece. Then the ambassadors of the king were admitted; and when they had begun a lengthy argument, a terse question, whether he would evacuate these three cities, cut short their speech, since they said they had no explicit instructions from him regarding them. So the king's ambassadors were dismissed without obtaining peace; Quinctius was given full discretion regarding peace and war. When it was made clear to him that the senate was not ready to discontinue the war, he, being himself more eager for victory than for peace, thereafter neither granted Philip any conference nor consented to receive any embassy that did not announce a withdrawal from all Greece.

XXXVIII. When Philip saw that the decision must be reached on the battlefield and that he must

A.U.C. 557

2 de Achaiae urbibus, regionis ab se diversae, et magis tamen de Argis quam de Corintho sollicitus, optimum ratus Nabidi eam Lacedaemoniorum tyranno velut fiduciariam dare, ut victori sibi restitueret, si quid adversi accidisset, ipse haberet, Philocli, qui Corintho Argisque praeerat, scribit, ut tyrannum ipse con-
3 veniret. Philocles, praeterquam quod iam veniebat cum munere, adicit, ad pignus futurae regi cum tyranno amicitiae, filias suas regem Nabidis filiis
4 matrimonio coniungere velle. Tyrannus primo negare aliter urbem eam se accepturum, nisi Argivorum ipsorum decreto accersitus ad auxilium urbis esset,
5 deinde, ut frequenti contione non aspernatos modo sed abominatos etiam nomen tyranni audivit, causam se spoliandi eos nactum ratus tradere ubi vellet urbem
6 Philoclen iussit. Nocte ignaris omnibus acceptus in urbem est tyrannus; prima luce occupata omnia
7 superiora loca portaeque clausae. Paucis principum [1] inter primum tumultum elapsis, eorum absentium direptae fortunae; praesentibus aurum atque argentum ablatum, pecuniae imperatae ingentes.
8 Qui non cunctanter contulere, sine contumelia et laceratione corporum dimissi; quos occulere aut retrahere aliquid suspicio fuit, in servilem modum
9 lacerati atque extorti. Contione inde advocata rogationes [2] promulgavit, unam de tabulis novis,

[1] principum edd. vett.: principium B.
[2] rogationes edd.: rogationem B.

collect around himself forces from every quarter, B.C. 197 being especially concerned about the cities of Achaea, a region far away from him, and yet more concerned about Argos than Corinth, it seemed the best plan to commit Argos on deposit, as it were, to Nabis, the tyrant of the Lacedaemonians, with the provision that he would restore it to him if victorious, but that Nabis himself should keep it if misfortune should come, and he wrote to Philocles, who was in charge of Corinth and Argos, that he should have an interview with the tyrant. Philocles, apart from the fact that he was already coming bringing gifts, added as a pledge of future friendship between the king and the tyrant, that the king wished to unite his daughters in marriage with the sons of Nabis. The tyrant at first refused to accept the city on any other terms than an invitation to assist the city, proffered by a decree of the Argives themselves; later, when he heard them mentioning the name of tyrant in a crowded assembly not only with scorn but even with cursing, he, thinking that he had found a cause for despoiling them, bade Philocles deliver the city to him when he pleased. The tyrant was admitted to the city at night, without the knowledge of anyone; when day came all the commanding sites were in his hands and the gates were closed. A few of the leading men got away in the first confusion and their property was plundered in their absence; the gold and silver of those who remained was appropriated and heavy fines imposed upon them. Those who paid promptly were let go without insult or bodily injury; those who were suspected of concealing or holding back assets were punished and tortured like slaves. Then he called an assembly and proposed measures, alteram de agro viritim dividendo, duas faces novantibus res ad plebem in optimates accendendam.

A.U.C. 557

XXXIX. Postquam in potestate Argivorum civitas erat, nihil eius memor tyrannus, a quo eam civitatem et in quam condicionem accepisset, legatos Elatiam ad Quinctium et ad[1] Attalum Aeginae hibernantem mittit, qui nuntiarent Argos in potestate sua esse: eo si veniret Quinctius ad colloquium, non diffidere sibi omnia cum eo conventura. Quinctius, ut eo quoque praesidio Philippum nudaret, cum adnuisset se venturum, mittit ad Attalum, ut ab Aegina Sicyonem sibi occurreret, ipse ab Anticyra decem quinqueremibus, quas iis forte ipsis diebus L. Quinctius frater eius adduxerat ex hibernis Corcyrae, Sicyonem tramisit. Iam ibi Attalus erat; qui cum tyranno ad Romanum imperatorem, non Romano ad tyrannum eundum diceret, in sententiam suam Quinctium traduxit, ne in urbem ipsam Argos iret. Haud procul urbe Mycenica vocatur; in eo loco ut congrederentur convenit. Quinctius cum fratre et tribunis militum paucis, Attalus cum regio comitatu, Nicostratus, Achaeorum praetor, cum auxiliaribus paucis venit. Tyrannum ibi cum omnibus copiis opperientem invenerunt. Progressus armatus cum satellitibus armatis est in medium fere

[1] ad Madvig: om. B.

---

[1] Tabulae novae, or new contracts between debtors and creditors, which in extreme cases might absolve debtors entirely, provided Roman demagogues and even politicians with popular sympathies with an effective vote-getting argument: the case of Catiline is in point. Distribution of public one for the cancellation of debts,[1] the other for a B.C. 197 distribution of land to individuals, thus lighting two torches with which revolutionists could inflame the commons against the nobility.

XXXIX. Having the city of Argos in his power, the tyrant, no longer remembering from whom and on what terms he had received the city, sent agents to Quinctius at Elatia and to Attalus, who was wintering at Aegina, to tell them that Argos was in his power: if Quinctius would come there to a conference, he had no doubt that they would come to a complete agreement. Quinctius, with a view to stripping Philip of that source of strength also, having agreed to come, sent word to Attalus to leave Aegina and meet him at Sicyon, and himself crossed from Anticyra[2] to Sicyon with ten quinqueremes which his brother Lucius Quinctius had by chance recently brought there from their winter station at Corcyra. Attalus was already there; saying that the tyrant should come to the Roman general, and not the Roman to the tyrant, he prevailed upon Quinctius not to go to the city of Argos itself. Not far from the city is the place called Mycenica; there they agreed to meet. Quinctius arrived with his brother and a few military tribunes, Attalus with his royal retinue, Nicostratus, praetor of the Achaeans, with a few auxiliaries. They found the tyrant waiting there with his entire army. Wearing his armour and attended by an armed body-guard, he advanced to about the centre land to individuals was another plank in the popular platform in republican Rome, and Livy's personal opposition to such measures, which were regarded as subversive by conservatives, is clearly apparent in this passage.

[2] In Phocis, on the north shore of the Corinthian Gulf.

A.U.C. 557 interiacentis campi; inermis Quinctius cum fratre et duobus tribunis militum, inermi item regi praetor Achaeorum et unus ex purpuratis latus cingebant. 9 Initium sermonis ab excusatione tyranni ortum, quod armatus ipse armatisque saeptus, cum inermes Romanum imperatorem regemque cerneret, in colloquium venisset: neque enim se illos timere dixit; 10 sed exules Argivorum. Inde ubi de condicionibus amicitiae coeptum agi est, Romanus duas postulare res, unam, ut bellum cum Achaeis finiret, alteram, ut adversus Philippum mitteret secum auxilia. Ea se missurum dixit; pro pace cum Achaeis indutiae impetratae, donec bellum cum Philippo finiretur.

XL. De Argis quoque disceptatio ab Attalo rege est mota, cum fraude Philoclis proditam urbem vi ab eo teneri argueret, ille ab ipsis Argivis se defenderet 2 accitum. Contionem rex Argivorum postulabat, ut id sciri posset; nec tyrannus abnuere; sed deductis ex urbe praesidiis liberam contionem non immixtis Lacedaemoniis declaraturam, quid Argivi vellent, praeberi debere dicebat rex; tyrannus 3 negavit deducturum. Haec disceptatio sine exitu 4 fuit. De colloquio discessum sescentis Cretensibus ab tyranno datis Romano indutiisque inter Nicostratum, praetorem Achaeorum, et Lacedaemoniorum tyrannum in quattuor menses factis.

5 Inde Quinctius Corinthum est profectus et ad of the space between the two parties; Quinctius was B.C. 197 unarmed, as were his brother and two tribunes of the soldiers, while at either side of the king, who was likewise unarmed, stood the Achaean praetor and one of his own courtiers. The conversation began with an apology by the tyrant because he had come armed and hedged about by armed men though he saw the Roman commander and the king unarmed; he feared not them, he said, but the Argive exiles. Then, when they began to discuss the terms of alliance, the Roman made two demands: first, that he put an end to his war with the Achaeans, second, that he send with him auxiliaries against Philip. The auxiliaries he agreed to send; in place of peace with the Achaeans, he obtained an armistice until the war with Philip should be concluded.

XL. With regard to Argos, another dispute was started by King Attalus, who charged Nabis with holding by force a city betrayed by the guile of Philocles, while the other defended himself by pointing to his summons by the Argives themselves. The king demanded an assembly of the Argives, that this assertion might be proved; the tyrant did not refuse this; but the king said that a free assembly, that would show what the Argives wished, should be made possible, the guards having been withdrawn from the city and no Lacedaemonians intermingled; the tyrant refused to withdraw the guard. This discussion came to nought. They left the conference, six hundred Cretans having been furnished to the Roman by the tyrant, and a truce for four months made between Nicostratus, praetor of the Achaeans, and the Spartan tyrant.

Quinctius then set out for Corinth and approached

A.U.C. 587

portam cum Cretensium cohorte accessit, ut Philocli praefecto urbis appareret tyrannum a Philippo
6 descisse. Philocles et ipse ad imperatorem Romanum in colloquium venit hortantique, ut extemplo transiret urbemque traderet, ita respondit, ut distulisse
7 rem magis quam negasse videretur. A Corintho Quinctius Anticyram traiecit; inde fratrem ad temptandam Acarnanum gentem misit.

8 Attalus ab Argis Sicyonem est profectus. Ibi et civitas novis honoribus veteres regis honores auxit, et rex ad id quod sacrum Apollinis agrum grandi 9 quondam pecunia redemerat iis, tum quoque, ne sine aliqua munificentia praeteriret civitatem sociam atque amicam, decem talenta argenti dono dedit et decem milia medimnum frumenti; atque ita Cenchreas ad naves redit.

10 Et Nabis firmato praesidio Argis Lacedaemonem regressus, cum ipse viros spoliasset, ad feminas 11 spoliandas uxorem Argos remisit. Ea nunc singulas illustres, nunc simul plures genere inter se iunctas accersendo blandiendoque ac minando non aurum modo iis, sed postremo vestem quoque mundumque omnem muliebrem ademit.

the gate with the Cretan contingent, that it might B.C. 197 be clear to Philocles, the prefect of the city, that the tyrant had deserted Philip. Philocles also held a conference with the Roman commander, and to the suggestion that he at once desert and hand over the city, he returned a reply that hinted delay rather than refusal. From Corinth Quinctius crossed to Anticyra; thence he sent his brother to sound the people of the Acarnanes.

Attalus went from Argos to Sicyon. There the city, for its part, added new distinctions to the king's former honours, while he, in addition to the fact that he had once redeemed for them the sacred precinct of Apollo at a high price, at this time also, not to pass by an allied and friendly city without some act of generosity, gave them as a present ten talents of silver and ten thousand medimni of grain; and so he returned to his fleet at Cenchreae.

And Nabis, strengthening the garrison at Argos and returning to Sparta, even as he had despoiled the men, sent his wife to rob the women. She invited now prominent individuals, now groups of women related to one another, and partly by flattery, partly by threats, took from them not only their money but finally even their raiment and their whole feminine adornment as well.

LIBRI XXXII PERIOCHA

COMPLURA prodigia ex diversis regionibus nuntiata referuntur, inter quae in Macedonia in puppe longae navis lauream esse natam. T. Quinctius Flamininus cos. adversus Philippum feliciter pugnavit in faucibus Epiri fugatumque coegit in regnum reverti. Ipse Thessaliam, quae est vicina Macedoniae, sociis Aetolis et Athamanibus vexavit, L. Quinctius Flamininus, frater consulis, navali proelio Attalo rege et Rhodiis adiuvantibus Euboeam et maritimam oram. Achaei in amicitiam recepti sunt. Praetorum numerus ampliatus est ut seni crearentur. Coniuratio servorum facta de solvendis Carthaginiensium obsidibus oppressa est, duo milia D necati. Cornelius Cethegus cos. Gallos Insubres proelio fudit. Cum Lacedaemoniis et tyranno eorum Nabide amicitia iuncta est. Praeterea expugnationes urbium in Macedonia referuntur.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXII

MANY prodigies, reported from various quarters, are recorded, among them that the laurel had grown on the stern of a war-ship. Titus Quinctius Flamininus the consul fought successfully against Philip in the passes of Epirus, put him to flight, and forced him to retire to his kingdom. He himself, with the Aetolians and Athamanes as allies, harried Thessaly, which adjoins Macedonia, his brother Lucius Quinctius Flamininus Euboea and the sea-coast, in naval warfare, aided by King Attalus and the Rhodians. The Achaeans were received in friendship. The number of praetors was increased so that six each year were elected. A conspiracy of slaves, started for the purpose of freeing the Carthaginian hostages, was crushed and two thousand five hundred executed. Cornelius Cethegus the consul routed the Insubrian Gauls in battle. A treaty of friendship was struck with the Lacedaemonians and their tyrant Nabis. Besides, the takings of cities in Macedonia are recorded.

BOOK XXXIII

LIBER XXXIII

A.U.C. 557

I. Haec per hiemem gesta; initio autem veris Quinctius Attalo Elatiam excito Boeotorum gentem incertis ad eam diem animis fluctuantem dicionis suae facere cupiens,[1] profectus per Phocidem quinque milia ab Thebis, quod caput est Boeotiae, 2 posuit castra. Inde postero die cum[2] unius signi militibus et Attalo legationibusque quae frequentes undique convenerant pergit ire ad urbem, iussis legionis hastatis—ea duo milia militum erant—sequi 3 se mille passuum intervallo distanti. Ad medium[3] ferme viae Boeotorum praetor Antiphilus obvius fuit; cetera multitudo e muris adventum imperatoris 4 Romani regisque prospeculabatur. Rara arma paucique milites circa eos apparebant; hastatos sequentes procul anfractus viarum vallesque in- 5 teriectae occulebant. Cum iam adpropinquaret urbi[4] velut obviam egredientem turbam salutaret, tardius incedebat; causa erat morae ut hastati 6 consequerentur. Oppidani, ante lictorem turba acta, insecutum confestim agmen armatorum non

[1] facere cupiens ed. 1616 : pace recupiens B.
[2] die cum ed. 1616 : die B.
[3] ad medium ed. 1616 : ad medio B.
[4] urbi ed. 1616 : turbae B.

BOOK XXXIII

I. THESE events occurred during the winter; but B.C. 197 in the beginning of spring Quinctius summoned Attalus to Elatia, and, wishing to bring under his control the Boeotians, a people whose attitude had thus far been uncertain, he set out through Phocis and encamped five miles from Thebes, which is the capital of Boeotia. Thence the next day, taking the soldiers of one company and Attalus and the numerous embassies which had come in from all directions, he set out to march towards the city, ordering the hastati[1] of the legion—they amounted to two thousand men—to follow at the distance of a mile. When they had completed about half the march, Antiphilus, the praetor of the Boeotians, met them; the rest of the people from the wall watched the approach of the Roman commander and the king. Only weapons here and there and a few soldiers were seen around them; the windings of the road and the intervening valleys hid the hastati who were following at a distance. When Quinctius was close to the city he decreased his pace, as if to show respect to the approaching throng; the real reason for the delay was to allow the hastati time to overtake him. The townspeople, since the crowd was gathered in front of the lictor, did not see the rapidly approach-

[1] The soldiers in the foremost of the three lines (hastati, principes, triarii) in which a legion was normally formed for battle.

a.u.c. 557 ante quam ad hospitium imperatoris ventum est
7 conspexere. Tum velut prodita dolo Antiphili praetoris urbe captaque obstipuerunt omnes; et apparebat nihil liberae consultationis concilio quod in diem posterum indictum erat Boeotis relictum esse.
8 Texerunt dolorem quem et nequiquam et non sine periculo ostendissent.

II. In concilio Attalus primus verba fecit. Orsus a maiorum suorum suisque et communibus in omnem Graeciam et propriis in Boeotorum gentem meritis,
2 senior[1] iam et infirmior quam ut contentionem
3 dicendi sustineret, obmutuit et concidit; et dum regem auferunt perferuntque parte membrorum
4 captum, paulisper contio intermissa est. Aristaenus inde, Achaeorum praetor, eo cum maiore auctoritate auditus quod non alia quam quae Achaeis suaserat
5 Boeotis suadebat. Pauca ab ipso Quinctio adiecta, fidem magis Romanam quam arma aut opes extol-
6 lente verbis. Rogatio inde a Plataeensi Dicaearcho lata recitataque de societate[2] cum Romanis iungenda nullo contra dicere audente omnium Boeotiae civi-
7 tatum suffragiis accipitur iubeturque. Concilio dimisso Quinctius, tantum Thebis moratus quantum
8 Attali repens casus coegit, postquam non vitae praesens periculum vis morbi attulisse sed membrorum debilitatem visa est, relicto eo ad curationem
9 necessariam corporis, Elatiam unde profectus erat

[1] senior Gronovius: segnior B.
[2] de societate ed. 1616 in margine: om. B.

ing column of armed men until they arrived at the B.C. 197
general's quarters. Then all were dumbfounded, thinking that the city had been betrayed and captured by the treachery of Antiphilus the praetor, and it seemed clear that no opportunity was left the Boeotians for freedom of action in the council which had been called for the next day. They concealed their sorrow, the display of which would have been both fruitless and not without risk.

II. Attalus opened the discussion in the council. He began with the services of his forefathers and himself, in general to all Greeks and especially to the Boeotians, but being now an old man and too feeble to endure the strain of speaking, he fell silent and collapsed, and while he was being carried out and the report brought back that he had partially lost the use of his limbs, the assembly was adjourned for a time. Aristaenus, praetor of the Achaeans, spoke with the greater effect because he gave the Boeotians the same advice he had previously given the Achaeans. Quinctius himself added a few words, in praise of the loyalty of the Romans rather than of their military strength or material resources. A motion was then proposed and read by Dicaearchus of Plataea, about forming an alliance with Rome, and since no one dared to speak against it, it was received and carried by the unanimous consent of the Boeotian cities. The meeting then adjourning, Quinctius, having remained in Thebes only as long as the sudden illness of Attalus demanded, when it appeared that the attack did not for the moment imperil his life, but merely weakened his body, left him there to receive the necessary treatment and returned to Elatia, whence he had come; having brought the

A.U.C. 557 redit, Boeotis quoque, sicut prius Achaeis, ad societatem adscitis et, quoniam tuta ea pacataque ab tergo relinquebantur, omnibus iam cogitationibus in Philippum et quod reliquum belli erat conversis.

III. Philippus quoque primo vere, postquam legati 2 ab Roma nihil pacati rettulerant, dilectum per omnia oppida regni habere instituit in magna inopia iuniorum. Absumpserant enim per multas iam aetates continua 3 bella Macedonas; ipso quoque regnante et navalibus bellis adversus Rhodios Attalumque et terrestribus 4 adversus Romanos ceciderat magnus numerus. Ita et tirones ab sedecim annis milites scribebat, et emeritis quidam stipendiis, quibus modo quicquam 5 reliqui roboris erat ad signa revocabantur. Ita suppleto exercitu secundum vernum aequinoctium omnes copias Dium contraxit ibique stativis positis 6 exercendo cotidie milite hostem opperiebatur. Et Quinctius per eosdem ferme dies ab Elatia profectus praeter Thronium et Scarpheam ad Thermopylas 7 pervenit. Ibi concilium Aetolorum Heracleam indictum tenuit consultantium quantis auxiliis Roma- 8 num ad bellum sequerentur. Cognitis sociorum decretis tertio die ab Heraclea Xynias praegressus in confinio Aenianum Thessalorumque positis castris 9 Aetolica auxilia opperiebatur. Nihil morati Aetoli sunt; Phaenea duce sescenti pedites cum equitibus quadringentis venerunt. Ne dubium esset quid expectasset, confestim Quinctius movit castra.

[1] Dium was near the south-eastern frontier of Macedonia.

Boeotians, as well as the Achaeans before them, B.C. 197 into the confederacy and made the country behind him secure and peaceful, he now turned all his attention towards Philip and what remained of the war.

III. Philip, too, seeing that his ambassadors had brought from Rome no indication of peace, at the beginning of spring decided to conduct a levy through all the towns of his kingdom, since he was in great want of young recruits. For the continuous fighting through several generations had exhausted the Macedonians; during his own reign many had fallen in naval battles with the Rhodians and Attalus and in engagements with the Romans on land. He therefore enlisted recruits from the age of sixteen, and some who had served their allotted time but still possessed some share of strength were recalled to the colours. He thus filled up his ranks, and ordered a muster of all his troops at Dium[1] about the time of the vernal equinox. There he established a base and spent the time of waiting for the enemy in drilling his troops daily. Quinctius also meanwhile had left Elatia and marched to Thermopylae by way of Thronium and Scarphea. There he held the Aetolian council, summoned to meet at Heraclea, to determine with how many troops they should follow the Romans to the war. Having learned the decision of the allies, he advanced in three days from Heraclea to Xyniae, on the frontier of the Aenianes and Thessalians and made camp and waited for the Aetolian auxiliaries. These made haste, and six hundred infantry and four hundred cavalry arrived, commanded by Phaeneas. Quinctius broke camp at once, so as to leave no doubt why he had waited. When he had

A.U.C. 557

10 Transgresso in Phthioticum agrum quingenti Gortynii Cretensium duce Cydante et trecenti Apolloniatae haud dispari armatu se coniunxere nec ita multo post Amynander cum Athamanum peditum ducentis et mille.

11 Philippus cognita profectione ab Elatia Romanorum, ut cui de summa rerum adesset certamen, 12 adhortandos milites ratus, multa iam saepe memorata de maiorum virtutibus simul de militari laude Macedonum cum disseruisset, ad ea[1] quae tum maxime animos terrebant quibusque erigi[2] ad aliquam spem poterant venit.

IV. Acceptae ad Aoum flumen in angustiis cladi ter a[3] Macedonum phalange ad Atracem vi pulsos
2 Romanos opponebat. Et illic tamen, ubi insessas fauces Epiri non tenuissent, primam culpam fuisse
3 eorum qui neglegenter custodias servassent, secundam in ipso certamine levis armaturae mercenariorumque militum; Macedonum vero phalangem et tunc stetisse et loco aequo iustaque pugna semper
4 mansuram invictam. Decem et sex milia militum haec fuere, robur omne virium eius regni. Ad hoc duo milia caetratorum, quos peltastas[4] appellant, Thracumque et Illyriorum—Tralles est nomen genti
5 —par numerus, bina milia erant, et mixti ex pluribus gentibus mercede conducti auxiliares mille ferme et

[1] ad ea ed. 1616 in margine: de re B.
[2] erigi ed. 1616 in margine: om. B.
[3] ter a Horrion: terra B.
[4] peltastas ed. 1616 in margine: peltas B.

[1] Both contingents were archers and light-armed.

crossed the border into the Phthiotic country, five hundred Gortynii from Crete under the command of Cydas and three hundred from Apollonia, armed in the same fashion,[1] joined him and a little later Amynander arrived with twelve hundred infantry of the Athamanes. B.C. 197.

Philip learned of the departure of the Romans from Elatia, and since he was in a situation where a contest for supreme power impended, he determined to encourage his troops. After he had repeated many oft-told stories of the brave deeds of their forefathers and also of the martial glory of the Macedonians, he came to the points which at that time were causing them the greatest terror and by which they could be roused to some degree of hopefulness.

IV. Against the defeat sustained in the narrows at the Aous river he set the triple defeat inflicted at Atrax by the Macedonian phalanx upon the Romans. Even there, when they had failed to hold the passes of Epirus which they commanded, the blame rested first on those who had not maintained careful vigilance, next, in the actual battle, on the light infantry and the mercenaries; the Macedonian phalanx, on the other hand, had stood fast even then, and would always stand unconquered when regular battle was joined on level ground. There were sixteen thousand in the phalanx, the flower of the whole kingdom. In addition, there were two thousand with light shields, whom they call peltasts, and an equal number (two thousand each) of Thracians and Illyrians—Tralles is the name of the tribe—and auxiliary mercenaries from different nationalities to the number of about fifteen hundred quingenti et duo milia equitum. Cum iis copiis rex hostem opperiebatur. Romanis ferme par numerus erat; equitum copiis tantum quod Aetoli accesserant superabant.[1]

A.U.C. 557

V. Quinctius ad Thebas Phthioticas castra cum movisset, spem nactus per Timonem, principem civitatis, prodi urbem cum paucis equitum levisque armaturae ad muros successit. Ibi adeo frustrata spes est ut non certamen modo cum erumpentibus sed periculum quoque atrox subiret, ni castris exciti repente pedites equitesque in tempore subvenissent. Et postquam nihil conceptae temere spei succedebat, urbis quidem amplius temptandae in praesentia conatu abstitit; ceterum satis gnarus iam in Thessalia regem esse, nondum comperto quam in regionem venisset, milites per agros dimissos vallum caedere et parare iubet. Vallo et Macedones et Graeci usi sunt, sed usum nec ad commoditatem ferendi nec ad ipsius munitionis firmamentum aptaverunt; nam et maiores et magis ramosas arbores caedebant quam quas ferre cum armis miles posset, et cum castra his ante obiectis saepsissent, facilis molitio eorum valli erat. Nam et quia rari stipites magnarum arborum eminebant multique et validi rami praebebant, quod recte manu caperetur, duo aut summum tres iuvenes conixi arborem unam evellebant, qua evulsa portae instar extemplo patebat, nec in promptu erat quod obmolirentur. Romanus leves et bifurcos plerosque

[1] superabant Horrion: superabat B.

[1] The vallum, as here described, was a portable fortification which could be set up around a temporary camp.

and two thousand cavalry. With these forces the king awaited the enemy. The Romans had about the same number; it was only in cavalry strength that they were superior, because of the arrival of the Aetolians. B.C. 197

V. When Quinctius had moved his camp towards Phthiotic Thebes, he conceived the hope that the city would be betrayed to him by Timon, a leader among this people, and approached it with a few cavalry and light infantry. This hope was so wholly belied that there was not only a battle with forees which sallied forth, but there was even grave danger had not infantry and cavalry, hastily summoned from the camp, arrived in time. And after nothing of this rashly-formed hope turned out well, he gave up for the present his design of further attacks upon the town. And, assured that the king was in Thessaly, but not yet certain of the direction of his march, he ordered soldiers sent out into the country to cut timbers and prepare a stockade.[1] Both Macedonians and Greeks employed a stockade, but in a manner ill adapted to ease of transportation or security in defence; for they cut trees of too great size and with too many branches for one soldier to carry, especially with his arms, and when they had walled a camp by planting these in front, the destruction of their rampart was easy. For because the trunks of the great trees were planted far apart and numerous strong branches offered easy holds for the hand, two or at most three young men, if they exerted themselves, would easily pull out a tree, and, this being pulled out, there was at once an opening like a gate, nor was material ready at hand to block it. The Roman cuts light forked trees with et trium aut cum plurimum quattuor ramorum vallos caedit, ut et suspensis ab tergo armis ferat plures simul apte miles; et ita densos offigunt implicantque ramos ut neque quis cuiusque palmae stipes neque [1] quae cuiusque stipitis palma sit, pervideri possit; et adeo acuti aliusque per alium immissi rami [2] locum ad inserendam manum non relinquunt, ut neque prehendi quod trahatur neque trahi, cum inter se innexi rami vinculum in vicem praebeant,[3] possit; et si evulsus forte est unus, nec loci multum aperit et alium reponere perfacile est.

A.U.C. 557

VI. Quinctius postero die vallum secum ferente milite, ut paratus omni loco castris ponendis esset, progressus modicum iter sex ferme milia a Pheris cum consedisset, speculatum in qua parte Thessaliae hostis esset quidve pararet misit. Circa Larisam erat rex. Certior iam factus Romanum ab Thebis Pheras movisse, defungi quam primum et ipse certamine cupiens ducere ad hostem pergit et quattuor milia fere a Pheris posuit castra. Inde postero die cum expediti utrimque ad occupandos super urbem tumulos processissent, pari ferme intervallo ab iugo quod capiendum erat, cum inter se conspecti essent, constiterunt, nuntios in castra remissos qui quid sibi, quoniam praeter spem hostis occurrisset, faciendum esset consulerent, quieti opperientes. Et illo quidem die nullo inito certamine in castra revocati sunt; postero die circa eosdem tumulos equestre proelium

[1] quis . . . neque Crévier: om. B.
[2] rami Madvig: radii B.
[3] praebeant ed. 1616: praebent B.

[1] Polybius (XVIII. xviii) gives a very similar description (from which Livy borrows the above passage) and admires greatly the Roman art of war as thus manifested.

three or perhaps four branches, as a general rule, B.C. 197
so that each soldier could comfortably carry several at once, with his arms hanging on his back; and they plant them so close together and interweave the boughs so completely that it is difficult to tell to which branch each trunk is joined or to which trunk each branch belongs; moreover, the branches are so sharp as to leave, interlaced, little space for inserting the hand, so that there is nothing that can be grasped and pulled out, since the interwoven branches bind one another together; and, if one is by chance pulled out, it leaves a small gap and is easily replaced.[1]

VI. Quinctius made a short march the next day, the soldiers carrying the stockade with them, so that he was ready to fortify a camp in any place, and when he had halted about six miles from Pherae, he sent out patrols to find out in what part of Thessaly the king was and what he was doing. The king was near Larisa. Being now informed that the Roman had moved from Thebes to Pherae and desiring, for his part, to end the struggle at once, he began to march towards the enemy and encamped about four miles from Pherae. Thence next day both sides sent out light troops to seize the hills overlooking the town, and these, when they were about equidistant from the ridge which was to be occupied, came to a halt as soon as they espied one another, waiting quietly for the runners whom they had sent back to camp to ask what they were to do, since the enemy had unexpectedly been met. And on that day indeed they were withdrawn to camp without starting a battle; on the next day there was a cavalry engagement around the same hills, in which, mainly through the help of the Aetolians,

A.U.C. 557

fuit, in quo non minimum Aetolorum opera regii
7 fugati atque in castra compulsi sunt. Magnum utrisque impedimentum ad rem gerendam fuit ager consitus crebris arboribus hortique, ut in suburbanis locis, et coartata itinera maceriis et quibusdam locis
8 interclusa. Itaque pariter ducibus consilium fuit excedendi ea regione, et velut ex praedicto ambo Scotusam petierunt, Philippus spe frumentandi inde, Romanus ut progressus corrumperet hosti frumenta.
9 Per diem totum, quia colles perpetuo iugo intererant,
10 nullo conspecta inter se loco agmina ierunt. Romani ad Eretriam [1] Phthiotici agri, Philippus super amnem
11 Onchestum posuit castra. Ne postero quidem die, cum Philippus ad Melambium quod vocant Scotusaei agri, Quinctius circa Thetideum Pharsaliae terrae posuisset castra, aut hi aut illi ubi hostis esset satis
12 compertum habuerunt.[2] Tertio die primo nimbus effusus, dein caligo noctis simillima Romanos metu insidiarum tenuit.

2 VII. Philippus maturandi itineris causa, post imbrem nubibus in terram demissis nihil deterritus, signa ferri iussit; sed tam densa caligo occaecaverat diem ut neque signiferi viam nec signa milites cernerent, agmen ad incertos clamores vagum velut
3 errore nocturno turbaretur. Supergressi tumulos qui Cynoscephalae vocantur, relicta ibi statione
4 firma peditum equitumque posuerunt castra. Ro-

[1] ad Eretriam ed. 1616 : eretriam B.
[2] habuerunt ed. 1616 in margine : hauthabuerunt B.

[1] Literally, " Dog's Head " hills. Livy seems to misunderstand the manoeuvres here. The crossing of this ridge would, apparently, have placed Philip and the Romans on the same side, which is inconsistent with what follows. Polybius (XVIII. xx.) seems more accurate when he has Philip send the king's forces were defeated and driven back to B.C. 197 their camp. Both sides were greatly hindered in the action by the fact that the country was covered with many trees and gardens, as in suburban districts, while the roads were bordered with hedges and in some places entirely closed. Both commanders therefore reached the same decision, to retire from this country, and as if by agreement both marched in the direction of Scotusa, Philip hoping to find food there, the Roman by his advance to destroy the enemy's grain-supply. The two columns marched the whole day, nowhere seeing one another, since there was a continuous range of hills between them. The Romans encamped near Eretria in Phthiotis, Philip on the river Onchestus. Nor did either army know for certain where the enemy was, even the following day, though Philip encamped near Melambium, as they call it, in the country of Scotusa, and the Romans around Thetideum, in the territory of Pharsalia. The third day a heavy rain, followed by a fog dark as night, kept the Romans in camp in fear of an ambuscade.

VII. Philip wished to hurry and so ordered an advance, undeterred by the low-hanging clouds after the rain; but so dense a fog obscured the day that the standard-bearers could not see the road nor the soldiers the standards, and the column, straggling along in obedience to the various cries, was as disorderly as if wandering about at night. They crossed the hills which are called Cynoscephalae[1] and encamped after leaving there a strong guard of infantry and cavalry. Although the Roman had stayed in the

" his reserve back, with instructions to halt upon the summit of the intervening hills."

A.U.C. 557

manus eisdem ad Thetideum castris cum se tenuisset, exploratum tamen ubi hostis esset, decem turmas equitum et mille pedites misit monitos ut ab insidiis, quas dies obscurus apertis quoque locis tecturus
5 esset, praecaverent. Ubi ventum ad insessos tumulos est, pavore mutuo iniecto velut torpentes quieverunt; dein nuntiis retro in castra ad duces missis, ubi primus terror ab necopinato visu consedit, non diutius
6 certamine abstinuere. Principio a paucis procurrentibus lacessita pugna est, deinde subsidiis tuentium pulsos aucta. In qua cum haudquaquam pares Romani alios super alios nuntios ad ducem mitterent
7 premi sese, quingenti equites et duo milia peditum, maxime Aetolorum, cum duobus tribunis militum
8 propere missa rem inclinatam restituerunt, versaque fortuna Macedones laborantes opem regis per nuntios implorabant. Sed, ut qui nihil minus illo die propter effusam caliginem quam proelium expectasset, magna parte hominum omnis generis pabulatum missa aliquamdiu inops consilii trepi-
9 davit; deinde, postquam nuntii instabant, et iam iuga montium detexerat nebula, et in conspectu erant Macedones in tumulum maxime editum inter alios compulsi loco se magis quam armis tutantes, 10 committendam rerum summam in discrimen utcumque ratus, ne partis indefensae iactura fieret, 11 Athenagoram, ducem mercede militantium, cum same camp near Thetideum, nevertheless he sent out B.C. 197 ten troops of cavalry and one thousand infantry to discover where the enemy was, with orders to guard against ambushes, which the darkness would hide, even in open country. When they came to the guarded hills, both forces remained passive, as if struck with a mutual fear; then they sent messengers back to the camps to their commanders, as soon as their panic from this unexpected contact had subsided, and did not longer postpone the fight. The battle began at first with skirmishes of a few scouts in advance, then assumed larger proportions as reinforcements came to the aid of the defeated. In this battle, when the Romans were not holding their own, but kept sending message after message to their commander that they were hard pressed, five hundred cavalry and two thousand infantry, mostly Aetolians, under two military tribunes, were speedily sent and restored the unfavourable battle, and as fortune changed the Macedonians, finding themselves in difficulties, begged through messengers for aid from the king. But since he had expected anything but a pitched battle that day, on account of the general darkness from the fog, having sent most of his troops of every sort out to forage, he hesitated for a time, not knowing what to do; then, as messengers kept urging him, and the fog had now uncovered the ridges of the mountains and he could see the Macedonians crowded together on the highest of a number of hills, defending themselves more with the advantage of position than with arms, thinking that he must at any rate stake everything, lest he suffer the loss of some of his men, left unsupported, he sent Athenagoras, commander of the mercenaries,

A.U.C. 557 omnibus praeter Thracas auxiliis et equitatu Mace-12 donum ac Thessalorum mittit. Eorum adventu depulsi ab iugo Romani non ante restiterunt quam in 13 planiorem vallem perventum est. Ne effusa detruderentur fuga, plurimum in Aetolis equitibus praesidii fuit. Is longe tum optimus eques in Graecia erat; pedite inter finitimos vincebantur.

VIII. Laetior res quam pro successu pugnae nuntiata, cum alii super alios recurrentes ex proelio
2 clamarent fugere pavidos Romanos, invitum et cunctabundum et dicentem temere fieri, non locum sibi placere, non tempus, perpulit ut educeret omnes
3 copias in aciem. Idem et Romanus, magis necessitate quam occasione pugnae inductus, fecit. Dextrum cornu elephantis ante signa instructis in subsidiis reliquit; laevo cum omni levi armatura in hostem
4 vadit, simul admonens cum iisdem Macedonibus pugnaturos quos ad Epiri fauces, montibus fluminibusque saeptos, victa naturali difficultate locorum
5 expulissent acieque expugnassent, cum iis quos P. Sulpicii prius ductu obsidentes in Eordaeam aditum vicissent; fama stetisse non viribus Macedoniae regnum; eam quoque famam tandem evanuisse.
6 Iam perventum ad suos in ima valle stantes erat, qui adventu exercitus imperatorisque pugnam renovant with all the auxiliaries except the Thracians and with B.C. 197 the Macedonian and Thessalian cavalry. On their arrival the Romans were driven from the ridge and checked their retreat only when they reached more level ground in the valley. The Aetolian cavalry was the greatest safeguard to prevent their utter rout. At that time their cavalry was by far the best in Greece; in infantry they were inferior to their neighbours.

VIII. The news was more encouraging than their success in the battle warranted, since one after another, coming back from the field, shouted out that the Romans were fleeing in terror, and this compelled Philip, though against his will, reluctant, and maintaining that it was a rash undertaking and that he liked neither the place nor the time, to commit his entire force to the action. The Roman also did the same, from necessity rather than to seize an opportunity for fighting. The right wing, with the elephants alined in front of the standards, he held in reserve; with the left and all the light-armed troops he attacked the enemy, reminding them at the same time that they would meet the same Macedonians whom they had driven out and defeated in battle in the passes of Epirus, defended by mountains and rivers, conquering the difficulties of Nature herself, the same Macedonians whom they had previously defeated under the leadership of Publius Sulpicius, when they held the pass to Eordaea; that the Macedonian kingdom rested on reputation and not on strength, and that even this reputation had at last wholly faded away. By this time they had come up to their men stationed in the lowest part of the valley, who, encouraged by the arrival of the army and the general, renewed the 7 impetuque facto rursus avertunt hostem. Philippus cum caetratis et cornu dextro peditum, robore Macedonici exercitus, quam phalangem vocabant, 8 prope[1] cursu ad hostem vadit; Nicanori, ex purpuratis uni, ut cum reliquis copiis confestim sequatur 9 imperat. Primo, ut in iugum evasit, et iacentibus ibi paucis armis corporibusque hostium proelium eo loco fuisse pulsosque inde Romanos et pugnari prope 10 castra hostium vidit, ingenti gaudio est elatus; mox refugientibus suis et terrore verso paulisper incertus 11 an in castra reciperet copias trepidavit; deinde, ut adpropinquabat hostis, et praeterquam quod caedebantur aversi nec, nisi defenderentur, servari poterant, ne ipsi quidem in tuto iam receptus erat, 12 coactus nondum adsecuta parte suorum periculum summae rerum facere. equites levemque armaturam qui in proelio fuerant dextero in cornu locat,[2] 13 caetratos et[3] Macedonum phalangem hastis positis, quarum longitudo impedimento erat, gladiis rem 14 gerere iubet. Simul ne facile perrumperetur acies, dimidium de fronte demptum introrsus porrectis ordinibus duplicat, ut longa potius quam lata acies esset; simul et densari ordines iussit, ut vir viro, arma armis iungerentur.

A.U.C. 557

[1] prope Kreyssig: propere B.
[2] locat ed. 1616 in margine: locatus B.
[3] et Madvig: om. B.

[1] I have given the apparent meaning, although the Latin is so harsh as to suggest the possibility that the text is corrupt.

battle, charged, and again drove back the enemy. B.C. 197
Philip with the peltasts and the right wing of the infantry, the strength of the Macedonian army, which they called the phalanx, advanced on the run to meet the enemy, ordering Nicanor, one of his nobles, to follow at once with the rest of the army. At first as he reached the ridge and saw that the battle was over there, with a few weapons and a few corpses of the enemy lying about, and that the Romans had been driven back from there and that the battle was raging near the enemy's camp, he was filled with excessive joy; presently, as his men were retreating, made uncertain by the reversal of fear, he debated in terror whether he should withdraw his men to their own camp; then, as the enemy came nearer, when his men were being cut down in flight and could not be rescued unless they were reinforced, and not even he had any safe line of retreat, he was compelled, though his whole force had not come up, to try desperate measures. On the right flank he placed the cavalry and the light infantry who had been in the battle; he ordered the peltasts and the Macedonian phalanx to put aside their spears, the length of which was a hindrance, and to engage with swords. At the same time, to prevent the line from being easily broken through, he diminished the front by half and doubled the depth by extending the files backward, so that the formation was deep rather than wide; he also ordered the troops to lessen intervals, so that man stood close to man and arms to arms.[1]

[1] Polybius (XVIII. xxiv) says that they doubled the depth and closed in to the right. A drillmaster may wonder how these movements were executed, though he can hardly question that they were.

a.u.c. 557

IX. Quinctius iis qui in proelio fuerant inter signa
2 et ordines acceptis tuba dat signum. Raro alias tantus clamor dicitur in principio pugnae exortus; nam forte utraque acies simul conclamavere nec solum qui pugnabant sed subsidia etiam quique tum
3 maxime in proelium veniebant. Dextero cornu rex loci plurimum auxilio, ex iugis altioribus pugnans, vincebat; sinistro tum cum maxime adpropinquante phalangis parte quae novissimi agminis fuerat, sine
4 ullo ordine trepidabatur; media acies, quae propior dextrum cornu erat, stabat spectaculo velut nihil ad
5 se pertinentis pugnae intenta. Phalanx quae venerat agmen magis quam acies aptiorque itineri quam
6 pugnae, vixdum in iugum evaserat. In hos incompositos Quinctius, quamquam pedem referentes in dextro cornu suos cernebat, elephantis prius in hostem actis impetum facit, ratus partem profligatam
7 cetera tracturam. Non dubia res fuit; extemplo terga vertere Macedones, terrore primo bestiarum
8 aversi. Et ceteri quidem hos pulsos sequebantur; unus e tribunis militum ex tempore capto consilio, cum viginti signorum militibus, relicta ea parte suorum quae haud dubie vincebat, brevi circuitu
9 dextrum cornu hostium aversum invadit. Nullam aciem ab tergo adortus non turbasset; ceterum ad communem omnium in tali re trepidationem[1]
10 accessit quod phalanx Macedonum gravis atque

[1] re trepidationem ed. 1616 : reparationem B.

IX. Quinctius absorbed into his ranks and among the standards the men who had already been engaged and gave the signal with the trumpet. They say that only rarely at any other time has such a shout been raised at the beginning of a battle, for, as it happened, both armies shouted at once, and not only those who were fighting but also the reserves and those who were just then coming up to the line. On the right flank, the king prevailed easily, mainly because of his position, since he was fighting from higher ground; on the left there was panic and confusion, especially since the part of the phalanx which was in the rear was still coming up; the centre, which was nearer the right flank, stood watching the battle there, as if it were a spectacle which did not directly concern them. The phalanx, which had come up in column rather than in line, and in a form more fitted for the march than for battle, had barely reached the saddle. While it was still in disorder, Quinctius, although he saw his men retreating on the right, first sending his elephants against the enemy, attacked, thinking that the defeat of a part would involve the rest. The issue was never in doubt; the Macedonians immediately fled, turning back in terror at the first sight of the beasts. The others too followed them in their flight, and one of the tribunes of the soldiers, forming a plan to fit the emergency, took the soldiers of twenty companies and, leaving the action where his men were clearly victorious and making a short detour, attacked the enemy's right from behind. Any army would have been dismayed by an attack from the rear; but added to the general panic of all in such a crisis was the fact that the heavy and unwieldy Macedonian B.C. 197

A.U.C. 557 immobilis nec circumagere se poterat nec hoc[1] qui a fronte paulo ante pedem referentes tunc ultro 11 territis instabant patiebantur. Ad hoc loco etiam premebantur, quia iugum ex quo pugnaverant dum per proclive pulsos insequuntur tradiderant hosti ad terga sua circumducto. Paulisper in medio caesi, deinde omissis plerique armis capessunt fugam.

X. Philippus cum paucis peditum equitumque primo tumulum altiorem inter ceteros cepit, ut[2] specularetur quae in laeva parte suorum fortuna 2 esset; deinde, postquam fugam effusam animadvertit et omnia circa iuga signis atque armis fulgere, tum 3 et ipse acie excessit. Quinctius cum institisset cedentibus, repente quia erigentes hastas Macedonas conspexerat, quidnam pararent incertus, paulisper 4 novitate rei constituit signa; deinde, ut accepit hunc morem esse Macedonum tradentium sese, 5 parcere victis in animo habebat. Ceterum ab ignaris militibus omissam ab hoste pugnam et quid imperator vellet, impetus in eos est factus et primis caesis 6 ceteri in fugam dissipati sunt. Rex effuso cursu Tempe petit. Ibi ad Gonnos diem unum substitit ad excipiendos si qui proelio superessent. Romani

[1] hoc ed. 1616 in margine: hos B.
[2] ut ed. 1616 in margine: om. B.

---

[1] On rough ground, where space for movement was limited, the phalanx was at a serious disadvantage, and its vulnerability was in this case increased by the diminution of the intervals between files (see above). The necessary ground for the change of front to meet the new attack was denied them by the retreat of their own men who had backed up against the front of the phalanx, and the individual members of the phalanx could not change front, nor did the soldiers who were falling back a little while before from the front upon men who were by now terrified on their own account permit this.[1] They were at a disadvantage too because of their position, since the ridge from which they had been fighting, when they were pursuing the soldiers who had been driven [2] down the hill, had been given up to the enemy which had been led around behind them. For a while they were caught between the two lines and slaughtered, then most of them threw away their arms and took to flight. B.C. 197

X. Philip with a few troopers and infantrymen at first held a hill higher than the rest, so as to watch the fortune of his left flank; later, when he beheld the disorderly flight and saw all the ridges round about filled with the gleam of standards and arms, he too left the field. Quinctius, after pressing hard on the retreating enemy, suddenly, because he saw the Macedonians raising their spears, and not knowing what this meant, halted his troops for a moment because of the strangeness of the action. Then, when he learned that it was the customary gesture of the Macedonians to indicate their surrender, it was in his mind to spare the vanquished. But the soldiers, ignorant that the fighting was over, so far as the enemy was concerned, and not knowing the general's plans, charged, and killing the first put the rest to flight. The king fled at full speed to Tempe. Then he stopped a day at Gonni to collect any who had survived from the battle. The victorious Romans burst into the right files could not face about because of the cramped space and the character of their weapons.

[2] Cf. vii. 12 above.

A.U.C. 557

victores in castra hostium spe praedae irrumpunt;[1] ea magna iam ex parte[2] direpta ab Aetolis inveniunt. 7 Caesa eo die octo milia hostium, quinque[3] capta. 8 Ex victoribus septingenti ferme ceciderunt. Si Valerio qui credat omnium rerum immodice numerum augenti, quadraginta milia hostium eo die sunt caesa; capta—ibi modestius mendacium est—quinque milia 9 septingenti, signa militaria ducenta undequinquaginta.[4] Claudius quoque duo et triginta milia hostium caesa scribit, capta quattuor milia et tre- 10 centos. Nos non minimo potissimum numero credidimus sed Polybium secuti sumus, non incertum auctorem cum omnium Romanarum rerum tum praecipue in Graecia gestarum.

XI. Philippus collectis ex fuga qui variis casibus pugnae dissipati vestigia eius secuti fuerant, missisque Larisam ad commentarios regios comburendos, ne in hostium venirent potestatem, in Macedoniam 2 concessit. Quinctius captivis praedaque partim venumdatis, partim militi concessis Larisam est profectus, hauddum satis gnarus quam regionem 3 petisset rex quidve pararet. Caduceator eo regius venit, specie ut indutiae essent donec tollerentur ad sepulturam qui in acie cecidissent, re vera ad peten-

[1] irrumpunt ed. 1625 : om. B.
[2] iam ex parte ed. 1616 in margine : iam B.
[3] quinque ed. 1616 in margine : om. B.
[4] undequinquaginta Kreyssig : XLVmi B.

[1] Polybius (XVIII. xxvii) gives the Macedonian losses as they are quoted here. See the notes, passim, for Livy's use of Polybius for events in the east as compared with his dependence on Latin annalists for what happened in other parts of the world.

Livy's description of the battle of Cynoscephalae follows enemy's camp in the hope of loot, but found that it had, for the most part, already been plundered by the Aetolians. On that day eight thousand of the enemy perished, five thousand were captured. Of the victors about seven hundred fell. If we trust Valerius Antias, who is prone to increase numbers without restraint, forty thousand of the enemy were slain that day; the prisoners, he says—here his exaggeration is more moderate—numbered five thousand seven hundred, and two hundred and forty-nine standards were taken. Claudius too gives the figures as thirty-two thousand killed and four thousand three hundred captured. I have given my account, not because the numbers are smallest, but because I have followed Polybius, an authority worthy of credence on all matters of Roman history and especially on occurrences in Greece.[1] B.C. 197

XI. Philip, having collected the straggling fugitives who had followed his trail after the changing fortunes of the battle-field, sent agents to Larisa to burn the royal records, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the Romans, and retired into Macedonia. Quinctius sold part of the prisoners and booty and gave part to the soldiers, and marched towards Larisa, still uncertain where the king had gone and what he was planning. There the king's herald met him, ostensibly to ask for a truce, that those who had fallen in the battle might be removed for burial, in reality to ask permission to send an embassy.

closely that of Polybius, but was more obviously written by a man who was not a soldier and whose knowledge of the field was derived entirely from what he read and not from what he had seen or experienced.

A.U.C. 557

dam veniam legatis mittendis. Utrumque ab Romano impetratum. Adiecta etiam illa vox, bono animo esse regem ut iuberet, quae maxime Aetolos offendit iam tumentes querentesque mutatum victoria imperatorem: ante pugnam omnia magna parvaque communicare cum sociis solitum; nunc omnium expertes consiliorum esse, suo ipsum arbitrio cuncta agere, cum Philippo iam gratiae privatae locum quaerere, ut dura atque aspera belli Aetoli exhauserint, pacis gratiam et fructum Romanus in se vertat. Et haud dubie decesserat iis aliquantum honoris; sed cur neglegerentur ignorabant. Donis regis imminere credebant invicti ab ea cupiditate animi virum; sed et suscensebat non immerito Aetolis ob insatiabilem aviditatem praedae et arrogantiam eorum, victoriae gloriam in se rapientium, quae vanitate sua omnium aures offendebat,[1] et Philippo sublato, fractis opibus Macedonici regni Aetolos habendos Graeciae dominos cernebat. Ob eas causas multa sedulo, ut viliores levioresque apud omnes essent et viderentur, faciebat.

XII. Indutiae quindecim dierum datae hosti erant et cum ipso rege constitutum colloquium; cuius priusquam tempus veniret, in consilium advocavit socios; rettulit quas leges pacis placeret

[1] offendebat ed. 1616 : offendebatur B.

---

[1] This sounds like an echo of the complaint of the Roman soldiers when they found that the Aetolians had already plundered Philip's camp, to the effect that they suffered the hardships and the Aetolians received the booty (Polyb. XVIII. xxvii).

[2] The first clause of this sentence must be regarded as Livy's parenthetical explanation of what had happened.

Both requests were granted by the Roman. The consul, moreover, added that the king should take heart, a phrase which gave great offence to the Aetolians, who were already swollen with pride and complaining that victory had changed the general: before the battle he had been wont to discuss with the allies all matters great and small, but now they were excluded from all his deliberations, and he decided everything according to his own personal judgment, since he was trying to win a place of private influence with the king, in order that, although the Aetolians had endured the hardships and toils of the war, the Roman might take to himself the credit for the peace and the profits of victory.[1] And beyond doubt something of their honourable position had been lost; but they did not see why they should be utterly ignored.[2] They believed that the consul—a man of a soul unconquerable by such cupidity—was eager to receive gifts from the king; but he was in fact angry at the Aetolians, and with just cause, for their insatiable desire for booty and their arrogance in claiming the glory of the victory for themselves, while with their boasting they had offended the ears of everyone, and he saw that with Philip out of the way and the power of the Macedonian kingdom broken the Aetolians would be held the masters of Greece. For these reasons he deliberately took many steps to cause them to be and to seem of less moment and importance in the eyes of all men. B.C. 197

XII. A truce of fifteen days had been granted to the enemy and a conference arranged with the king; but before the time for this arrived, he called a council of the allies and referred to them the terms of peace

A.U.C. 557

2 dici. Amynander, Athamanum rex, paucis sententiam absolvit; ita componendam pacem esse ut Graecia etiam absentibus Romanis satis potens
3 tuendae simul pacis libertatisque esset. Aetolorum asperior oratio fuit, qui pauca praefati recte atque ordine imperatorem Romanum facere quod, quos belli socios habuisset, cum iis communicaret pacis
4 consilia; falli autem eum tota re si aut Romanis pacem aut Graeciae libertatem satis firmam se credat relicturum nisi Philippo aut occiso aut regno pulso; quae utraque proclivia esse si fortuna uti
5 vellet. Ad haec Quinctius negare Aetolos aut moris Romanorum memores aut sibi ipsis convenientem
6 sententiam dixisse. Et illos prioribus omnibus conciliis colloquiisque de condicionibus pacis semper,
7 non ut[1] ad internecionem bellaretur, disseruisse, et Romanos, praeter vetustissimum morem victis parcendi praecipuum clementiae documentum dedisse
8 pace Hannibali et Carthaginiensibus data. Omittere se Carthaginienses; cum Philippo ipso quotiens ventum in colloquium? Nec umquam ut cederet regno actum esse. An quia victus proelio foret 9 inexpiabile bellum factum? Cum armato hoste infestis animis concurri debere; adversus victos mitissimum quemque animum maximum habere.
10 Libertati Graeciae videri graves Macedonum reges;

[1] non ut Gronovius: ut B.

which they wished to be imposed. Amynander, B.C. 197 king of the Athamanes, spoke briefly: the peace should be so arranged that Greece, even in the absence of the Romans, should be strong enough to maintain at once peace and liberty. The language of the Aetolians was more harsh; they said, after a brief preface, that the Roman commander was acting correctly and in order in discussing the conditions of peace with those whom he had had as his allies in the war; but that he was totally wrong if he thought that he would leave either assured peace to the Romans or liberty to the Greeks unless Philip were either killed or dethroned, either of which was easy if he were willing to follow up his good fortune. In reply, Quinctius asserted that the Aetolians neither remembered Roman policy nor employed arguments consistent with themselves. On the one hand, in all previous conferences and conversations they had always spoken of conditions of peace and not of waging a war of extermination; on the other, the Romans, in addition to observing, from remote antiquity, their custom of sparing conquered peoples, had given striking proof of their mercifulness in the peace granted to Hannibal and the Carthaginians. He would say nothing about the Carthaginians: how many conferences had been held with Philip himself? Never was there any suggestion that he should give up his kingdom. Or, because he had been defeated in battle, did that make war an unpardonable offence? An armed enemy should be met in hostile mood; towards the conquered, the mildest possible attitude was the greatest thing. The Macedonian kings seemed a menace to Greek liberty; if that kingdom and people were removed, si regnum gensque tollatur, Thracas, Illyrios, Gallos deinde, gentes feras et indomitas, in Macedoniam 11 se et in Graeciam effusuras. Ne proxima quaeque amoliendo maioribus gravioribusque aditum ad se 12 facerent. Interfanti deinde Phaeneae, praetori Aetolorum, testificantique si elapsus eo tempore Philippus foret mox gravius eum rebellaturum, " desistite tumultuari " inquit " ubi consultandum 13 est. Non iis condicionibus illigabitur rex[1] ut movere bellum possit."

A.U.C. 557

XIII. Hoc dimisso concilio postero die rex ad 2 fauces quae ferunt in Tempe—is datus erat locus colloquio—venit; tertio die datur ei Romanorum ac 3 sociorum frequens concilium. Ibi Philippus perquam prudenter iis sine quibus pax impetrari non poterat sua potius voluntate omissis quam altercando extorqueren- 4 tur, quae priore colloquio aut imperata a Romanis aut postulata ab sociis essent omnia se concedere, de 5 ceteris senatui permissurum dixit. Quamquam vel inimicissimis omnibus praeclusisse vocem videbatur, 6 Phaeneas tamen Aetolus cunctis tacentibus " Quid? Nobis " inquit " Philippe, reddisne tandem Pharsalum et Larisam Cremasten et Echinum et Thebas 7 Phthias? " Cum Philippus nihil morari diceret quo minus reciperent, disceptatio inter imperatorem 8 Romanum et Aetolos orta est de Thebis; nam eas populi Romani iure belli factas esse Quinctius dicebat, quod integris rebus, exercitu ab se admoto, vocati in the Thracians, the Illyrians, and then the Gauls, fierce B.C. 197 and untamed peoples, would pour into Macedonia and into Greece. They should not, by breaking up all the nearest states, open the way to themselves for larger and more powerful tribes. Then, when Phaeneas, the Aetolian praetor, interrupted, reminding him that if Philip escaped this time he would soon cause a greater war, Quinctius replied, "Cease causing disturbance when we should be deliberating. The conditions by which the king will be bound will not be such that he will be able to start a war."

[1] rex Jacobs: pax B.

XIII. This council was adjourned, and the next day the king came to the pass which leads to Tempe —this was the place designated for the meeting —and on the third day a full council of the Romans and allies met him. There Philip conducted himself with great discretion, and conceding voluntarily those points without which peace could not be obtained, rather than having them wrung from him after argument, he said that he accepted all the conditions commanded by the Romans or demanded by the allies in the previous conference, and would submit everything else to the judgment of the senate. Although he seemed in this way to have sealed the lips of even his bitterest enemies, nevertheless, when all were silent, Phaeneas the Aetolian asked, "Well, Philip, do you restore to us at last Pharsalus and Larisa Cremaste and Echinus and Phthiotic Thebes?" When Philip replied that there was no reason why they should not receive them, a dispute over Thebes broke out between the Roman commander and the Aetolians; for Quinctius maintained that it belonged to the Roman people by the law of war, because at the beginning of the campaign, when the army had amicitiam cum potestas libera desciscendi ab rege esset, regiam societatem Romanae praeposuissent;

A.U.C. 557

9 Phaeneas et pro societate belli, quae ante bellum habuissent, restitui Aetolis aequum censebat et ita
10 in foedere primo cautum esse ut belli praeda rerum quae ferri agique possent Romanos, ager urbesque
11 captae Aetolos sequerentur. "Vos" inquit "ipsi" Quinctius "societatis istius leges rupistis quo tempore
12 relictis nobis cum Philippo pacem fecistis. Quae si maneret, captarum tamen urbium illa lex foret; Thessaliae civitates sua voluntate in dicionem 13 nostram venerunt." Haec cum omnium sociorum adsensu dicta Aetolis non in praesentia[1] modo gravia auditu, sed mox etiam belli causae magna-
14 rumque ex eo cladium iis fuerunt. Cum Philippo ita convenit ut Demetrium filium et quosdam ex amicorum numero obsides et ducenta talenta daret, de ceteris Romam mitteret legatos; ad eam rem 15 quattuor mensum indutiae essent. Si pax non impetrata ab senatu foret, obsides pecuniamque reddi Philippo receptum est. Causa Romano im-

[1] in praesentia Gronovius: praesentia B.

---

[1] The Roman attack on Thebes was described in v. 1–3 above.

[2] Whether these arguments are mere hair-splitting cannot be ascertained. In XXVI. xxiv. 8–13 Livy gives in some detail the contents of the treaty of 211 B.C., but does not cover this point (sect. 11 mentions the classification of booty referred to by Phaeneas). Livy's phrase foedere primo suggests a second treaty of which we have no knowledge. In any case, according to the Romans, existing treaties were annulled by the separate peace which the Aetolians had made with Philip.

[3] The ill-feeling thus engendered and increased by the been moved against the town and they had been invited to become friends to the Romans at a time when they had full power to break off relations with the king, they had preferred the alliance with the king to that with the Romans;[1] Phaeneas thought it right and in accordance with the military alliance, that what had belonged to the Aetolians before the war should be returned to them, and said that it had been provided in the original treaty, regarding booty taken in the war, that movables, which could be carried or driven away, should belong to the Romans, and lands and cities should go to the Aetolians. To this Quinctius replied, "You yourselves broke the rules laid down in that treaty, at the time you deserted us and made peace with Philip. But even if that treaty still held, that clause would pertain to cities that had been captured; the Thessalian cities submitted to us of their own accord."[2] These words were received with applause from all the allies, but to the Aetolians they were unpleasant to hear at the moment, and later on they were the cause of war and, as a result of the war, of great slaughter to the Aetolians.[3] It was agreed with Philip that he should surrender his son Demetrius and certain of his friends as hostages and pay two hundred talents, and send ambassadors to Rome with respect to other matters; for this purpose a truce of four months was granted. If peace was not obtained from the senate, it was agreed that Philip should recover his hostages and money. It is said that nothing influenced the Roman B.C. 197 resentment of the Aetolians at Rome's settlement with Philip led them, in 193 B.C. (XXXV. xii. 1 ff.), to invite Antiochus to invade Europe. They were not finally subjugated until 189 B.C. (XXXVIII. xi. 1 ff.).

A.U.C. 557

peratori non alia maior fuisse dicitur maturandae pacis quam quod Antiochum bellum transitumque in Europam moliri constabat.

XIV. Eodem tempore atque, ut quidam tradidere, eodem die ad Corinthum Achaei ducem regium
2 Androsthenem iusto proelio fuderunt. Eam urbem pro arce habiturus Philippus adversus Graeciae civitates et principes inde evocatos per speciem colloquendi quantum equitum dare Corinthii ad bellum
3 possent, retinuerat pro obsidibus, et praeter quingentos Macedonas mixtosque ex omni genere auxiliorum
4 octingentos, quot iam ante ibi fuerant,[1] mille Macedonum eo miserat et mille ac ducentos Illyrios Thracasque et Cretenses, qui in utraque parte militabant,
5 octingentos. His additi Boeoti Thessalique et Acarnanes mille, scutati omnes, et septingenti [2] ex [3] ipsorum Corinthiorum iuventute, impleta ut essent sex milia armatorum, fiduciam Androstheni fecerunt acie de-
6 cernendi. Nicostratus, praetor Achaeorum, Sicyone erat cum duobus milibus peditum, centum equitibus, sed imparem se et numero et genere militum cernens
7 moenibus non excedebat. Regiae copiae peditum equitumque vagae Pellenensem et Phliasium et 8 Cleonaeum agrum depopulabantur; postremo exprobrantes metum hosti in fines Sicyoniorum transcendebant; navibus etiam circumvecti omnem oram
9 Achaiae vastabant. Cum id effusius hostes et, ut fit

[1] quot . . . fuerant Drakenborch: quod . . . fuerat B.
[2] septingenti Walch: om. B.
[3] ex Gronovius: om. B.

commander more strongly to secure a speedy peace B.C. 197 than the ascertained fact that Antiochus was planning war and an invasion of Europe.

XIV. At the same time, and, as some have related, on the very same day, the Achaeans routed the king's general Androsthenes in a pitched battle near Corinth. Philip intended to hold this city as a stronghold against the Greek cities, and when he had invited there the leading citizens under pretence of discussing with them the number of cavalry the Corinthians could furnish for the war, he had held them as hostages, and in addition to five hundred Macedonians and eight hundred auxiliaries of various nations, the number that had already been there for some time, he had sent there a thousand Macedonians and twelve hundred Thracians and Illyrians and eight hundred Cretans, for this people fought on both sides. Added to these were one thousand Boeotians, Thessalians and Acarnanians, all provided with shields, and seven hundred of the youth of the Corinthians themselves, filling up his numbers to six thousand armed men, and these gave Androsthenes confidence enough to risk a decisive battle. Nicostratus, the praetor of the Achaeans, was at Sicyon with two thousand infantry and one hundred cavalry, but, seeing himself inferior both in numbers and in the quality of his troops, he would not leave his fortifications. The king's infantry and cavalry were roaming about and ravaging the lands of Pellene, Phlius and Cleonae, and finally crossed into the territory of Sicyon, taunting the enemy with cowardice; likewise they skirted with their ships the whole coast of Achaea and laid it waste. When the enemy was thus engaged in scattered groups and, as often happens in ab nimia fiducia, neglegentius etiam facerent, Nicostratus spem nactus necopinantes eos adgrediendi

A.U.C. 557

10 circa finitimas civitates nuntium occultum mittit, quo die et quod ex quaque civitate armati ad Apelaurum—
11 Stymphaliae terrae is locus est—convenirent. Omnibus ad diem edictam paratis profectus inde extemplo per Phliasiorum fines nocte Cleonas insciis omnibus quid 12 pararet pervenit. Erant autem cum eo quinque milia peditum, ex quibus . . .[1] armaturae levis, et trecenti equites. Cum iis copiis, dimissis qui specularentur quam in partem hostes effunderent sese, opperiebatur.

XV. Androsthenes omnium ignarus Corintho profectus ad Nemeam—amnis est Corinthium et Sicyon-
2 ium[2] interfluens agrum—castra locat. Ibi partem dimidiam exercitus, divisam trifariam,[3] et omnes equites discurrere ad depopulandos simul Pellenensem
3 Sicyoniumque agros et Phliasium iubet. Haec tria diversa agmina discessere. Quod ubi Cleonas ad Nicostratum perlatum est, extemplo validam mercennariorum manum praemissam ad occupandum saltum, 4 per quem transitus in Corinthium est agrum, ante signa equitibus ut praegrederentur locatis ipse con-
5 festim agmine duplici sequitur. Parte una mercennarii milites ibant cum levi armatura, altera clipeati;
6 id in illarum[4] gentium exercitibus robur erat. Iam haud procul castris aberant pedites equitesque, et Thracum quidam in vagos palatosque per agros hostes impetum fecerant,[5] cum repens terror castris infertur.

[1] Numerus deesse videtur.
[2] et Sicyonium ed. 1616: sicyonium B.
[3] The text here accepted is that of Madvig. The reading of B is: parte dimidia exercitus dimissa dimidiam trifariam diuisit (the last word corrected from dimsit).
[4] id in illarum Kreyssig: dein aliarum B.
[5] fecerant Crévier: fecerunt B.

cases of over-confidence, with a lack of vigilance, B.C. 197
Nicostratus, in the hope of attacking them unexpectedly, sent secret messages to the neighbouring states, naming the day and fixing the numbers from each state to assemble at Apelaurum—this place is in the land of Stymphalia. When all was ready on the appointed day, he at once set out by night through the country of the Phliasii and arrived at Cleonae, no one knowing what he was planning. He had with him five thousand infantry, including . . . light-armed troops, and three hundred cavalry. With these forces, after first sending out scouts to find out in which direction the enemy was moving, he waited.

XV. Androsthenes, in ignorance of all this, had left Corinth and encamped on the Nemea, which is a stream separating the lands of Corinth and Sicyon. There he ordered half of his army, divided into three columns, and all his cavalry to lay waste at the same time the country of Pellene, Sicyon and Phlius. The three separate columns marched out. When this was reported to Nicostratus at Cleonae, he immediately sent out a strong force of mercenaries to close the pass which gives access to Corinthian territory, and posting the cavalry ahead of the infantry to lead the way, himself followed rapidly in two columns. In one marched the mercenaries with the light infantry, in the other the shield-wearers: these constitute the chief strength in the armies of those states. The infantry and cavalry were now not far from the camp,[1] and some of the Thracians had made an attack upon the enemy, foraging and scattered through the fields, when sudden panic gripped the camp. The commander

[1] The camp of Androsthenes, mentioned in sect. 1 above.

A.U.C. 557

7 Trepidare dux, ut qui hostes nusquam nisi raros[1] in collibus ante Sicyonem non audentes agmen demittere[2] in campos vidisset, ab Cleonis quidem accessuros 8 numquam credidisset. Revocari tuba iubet vagos a castris dilapsos[3]; ipse raptim capere arma iussis militibus infrequenti agmine porta egressus super 9 flumen instruit aciem. Ceterae copiae, vix colligi atque instrui cum potuissent, primum hostium impe- 10 tum non tulerunt; Macedones et maxime omnium frequentes ad signa fuerant et diu ancipitem victoriae 11 spem fecerunt; postremo fuga ceterorum nudati, cum duae iam acies hostium ex diverso, levis armatura ab latere, clipeati caetratique a fronte urgerent, et 12 ipsi re inclinata primo rettulere pedem, deinde impulsi terga vertunt et plerique abiectis armis, nulla spe castrorum tenendorum relicta, Corinthum petierunt. 13 Nicostratus mercennariis militibus ad hos persequendos, equitibus Thracumque auxiliis in populatores agri Sicyonii missis, magnam ibi quoque caedem edidit, 14 maiorem prope quam in proelio ipso. Ex iis quoque qui Pellenen Phliuntaque depopulati erant, incompositi partim omniumque ignari[4] ad castra revertentes in hostium stationes tamquam in suas illati 15 sunt, partim ex discursu id quod erat suspicati ita se in fugam passim sparserunt[5] ut ab ipsis agrestibus 16 errantes circumvenirentur. Ceciderunt eo die mille

[1] raros Duker: raro B.
[2] demittere Gronovius: dimittere B.
[3] dilapsos Horrion: dilapsus B.
[4] incompositi partim omniumque ignari ed. 1616 in margine: compositi partim omnium signari B.
[5] sparserunt Crévier: sparserant B.

was afraid, inasmuch as he had nowhere seen the B.C. 197 enemy except in small detachments in the hills in front of Sicyon, not daring to march their column down into the plains, and had never believed that they would attack from Cleonae. He gave orders that the foragers should be recalled by a trumpet-blast and, hastily ordering the troops to arm, he marched out of the gate with his depleted column and formed his battle-line above the river. The rest of the force, assembled and formed with difficulty, did not oppose the enemy's initial charge; the Macedonians had rallied in the largest numbers of all to the standards, and for a long time they rendered the prospect of victory uncertain; at last, exposed by the flight of the rest, with two lines of the enemy advancing from different directions, the light infantry from the flank, the heavy infantry and peltasts from the front, as the hope of victory diminished they at first retired slowly, but then, as the pressure increased, they broke, and most of them threw away their arms, abandoning hope of holding the camp, and made for Corinth. Nicostratus sent the mercenaries to follow them and the cavalry and Thracian auxiliaries against the raiders in the territory around Sicyon, and caused great slaughter there also, greater, almost, than in the battle itself. Part of the troops, too, who had ravaged Pellene and Phlius, returning in disorder and ignorant of what had transpired, when near the camp, drifted into the enemy's outguards in the belief that they were their own, while part of them, suspecting from the confusion what the truth was, scattered in flight in every direction, with the result that as they wandered about they were set upon even by the country-people. The losses that day were fifteen hundred killed, three

A.U.C. 557 et quingenti, capti trecenti. Achaia omnis magno liberata metu.

XVI. Priusquam dimicaretur ad Cynoscephalas, L. Quinctius Corcyram excitis Acarnanum principibus, quae sola Graeciae gentium in societate Macedonum manserat, initium quoddam ibi motus fecit. 2 Duae autem maxime causae eos tenuerant in amicitia regis, una fides insita genti, altera metus odiumque 3 Aetolorum. Concilium Leucadem indictum est. Eo neque cuncti convenere Acarnanum populi, nec iis qui convenerant idem placuit; sed duo[1] principes et magistratus pervicerunt ut privatum decretum 4 Romanae societatis fieret. Id omnes qui afuerant aegre passi; et in hoc fremitu gentis a Philippo missi duo principes Acarnanum, Androcles et Echedemus, non ad tollendum modo decretum Romanae societatis 5 valuerunt, sed etiam ut Archelaus et Bianor, principes gentis ambo, quod auctores eius sententiae fuissent, proditionis in concilio damnarentur, et Zeuxidae praetori, quod de ea re rettulisset, imperium abro- 6 garetur. Rem temerariam sed eventu prosperam damnati fecerunt. Suadentibus namque amicis, cederent[2] tempori et Corcyram ad Romanos abirent, 7 statuerunt offerre se multitudini et aut eo ipso lenire 8 iras aut pati quod casus tulisset. Cum se frequenti concilio intulissent, primo murmur ac fremitus admirantium, silentium mox a verecundia simul pristinae dignitatis ac misericordia praesentis fortunae 9 ortum est. Potestate quoque dicendi facta principio hundred captured. All Achaea was freed from great terror. B.C. 197

[1] duo Gronovius: et B.
[2] cederent ed. 1616 in margine: cederetur B.

XVI. Before the battle of Cynoscephalae, Lucius Quinctius had summoned to Corcyra the leading men of the Acarnanes, the only people in Greece which had held to the Macedonian alliance, and had made some progress toward a movement there. But two principal causes had kept them loyal to the king; one, their native habit of fidelity, the other, their fear and hatred of the Aetolians. A council was called at Leucas. Not all the cities assembled there, nor did all who came agree; but two persons, leading men and magistrates, brought it to pass that an unofficial decree favouring a Roman alliance was adopted. All those who were not represented resented this bitterly; and in this time of confusion in the state, two prominent Acarnanians, Androcles and Echedemus, sent by Philip, succeeded not only in rescinding the decree for a Roman alliance, but in convicting before the council, on charges of treason, two men, both prominent in public life, Archelaus and Bianor, because they had proposed the decree, and in having Zeuxis the praetor removed from office because he had put the motion. The prisoners adopted a device rash but successful in its result. Though their friends advised them to yield to the situation and take refuge with the Romans at Corcyra, they determined to throw themselves on the mercy of the assembly, and, by so doing, either mollify their wrath or endure what fortune had in store for them. When they entered the crowded assembly, there was first applause and a demonstration of admiration, then silence, due to respect for their former high station and pity for their present state. When they were allowed to speak, they began

A.U.C. 557

suppliciter, procedente autem oratione, ubi ad crimina diluenda ventum est, cum tanta fiducia quantam
10 innocentia dabat disseruerunt; postremo ultro aliquid etiam queri et castigare iniquitatem simul in se 11 crudelitatemque ausi ita adfecerunt animos, ut omnia quae in eos decreta erant frequentes tollerent neque eo minus redeundum in societatem Philippi abnuendamque Romanorum amicitiam censerent.

XVII. Leucade haec sunt decreta. Id caput Acarnaniae erat, eoque in concilium omnes populi con-
2 veniebant. Itaque cum haec repentina mutatio Corcyram ad legatum Flamininum perlata esset, extemplo cum classe profectus Leucadem ad Heraeum,
3 quod vocant, naves adplicuit. Inde cum omni genere tormentorum machinarumque quibus expugnantur urbes ad muros accessit, ad primum terrorem ratus
4 inclinare animos posse. Postquam pacati nihil ostendebatur, tum vineas turresque erigere et arietem admovere muris coepit.

5 Acarnania universa inter Aetoliam atque Epirum posita solem occidentem et mare Siculum spectat.
6 Leucadia nunc insula est, vadoso freto quod perfossum manu est, ab Acarnania divisa; tum paeninsula erat, occidentis regione artis faucibus cohaerens
7 Acarnaniae; quingentos ferme passus longae eae fauces erant, latae haud amplius centum et viginti. In iis angustiis Leucas posita est, colli applicata verso

[1] Whether or not Leucas was in remote antiquity an island, a peninsula, or a tract of land separated from or joined to the mainland by something resembling a sand-bar or a tidal flat, Livy is here in accord with the usual ancient tradition, which represents it as an island made out of a peninsula by an artificial channel (Strabo I. iii. 18; X. ii. 8; Thucydides III. 81; IV. 8, etc.). The question naturally interlocks with the controversy over the identification of Leucas with the Homeric Ithaca (conveniently summarized by Buerchner in Pauly-like suppliants, but as their speech progressed and they reached the stage of defending themselves against the charges, they spoke with all the confidence that innocence gave them; finally, daring even to complain somewhat and to rebuke at once the injustice and the harshness of their treatment, they roused such feelings that a majority defeated all the decrees proposed against them but nevertheless voted to abide by the treaty with Philip and reject the friendship of the Romans. B.C. 197

XVII. Such were the decrees at Leucas. This was the capital of Acarnania, and thither all the peoples were wont to come to council. Accordingly, when this sudden change was reported to the lieutenant Flamininus at Corcyra, he at once set out with his fleet to Leucas and anchored in the harbour called Heraeum. He approached the walls with all kinds of artillery and equipment with which cities are assaulted, thinking that their minds would turn towards peace at the first alarm. But when they showed no signs of a peaceful disposition then he began to erect sheds and towers and to move the battering-ram towards the walls.

Acarnania as a whole lies between Aetolia and Epirus, facing the west and the Sicilian sea. Leucadia is now an island, cut off from Acarnania by a shallow channel dug by hand; then it was a peninsula,[1] joined to Acarnania by a narrow neck of land on its western side; this neck of land was about five hundred paces long and not more than one hundred twenty paces wide. In this constricted place lay Leucas, Wissowa, s.v. Leucas, by Jones in the Appendix to Vol. V of his Strabo in this series, and, most recently but very briefly, by Hennig, Die Geographie des Homerischen Epos, Neue Wege zur Antike, I. Reihe, Heft 10, Leipzig, 1934, 85–101).

A.U.C. 557

8 in orientem et Acarnaniam; ima urbis plana sunt, iacentia ad mare quo Leucadia ab Acarnania dividitur. Inde terra marique expugnabilis est; nam et vada sunt stagno similiora quam mari, et campus terrenus 9 omnis operique facilis. Itaque multis simul locis aut subruti aut ariete decussi ruebant muri. Sed quam urbs ipsa opportuna oppugnantibus erat, tam inex- 10 pugnabiles hostium animi. Die ac nocte intenti reficere quassata muri, obstruere quae patefacta ruinis erant, proelia impigre inire et armis magis muros 11 quam se ipsos moenibus tutari; diutiusque spe Romanorum obsidionem eam extraxissent, ni exules quidam Italici generis Leucade habitantes ab arce 12 milites accepissent. Eos tamen ex superiore loco magno cum tumultu decurrentes acie in foro instructa 13 iusto proelio aliquamdiu Leucadii sustinuerunt. Interim et scalis capta multis locis moenia, et per stragem 14 lapidum ac ruinas transcensum in urbem; iamque ipse legatus magno agmine circumvenerat pugnantes. Tum pars in medio caesi, pars armis abiectis dedi- 15 derunt sese victori. Et post dies paucos audito proelio, quo ad Cynoscephalas pugnatum erat, omnes Acarnaniae populi in dicionem legati venerunt.

XVIII. Iisdem diebus, omnia simul inclinante fortuna, Rhodii quoque ad vindicandam a Philippo continentis regionem—Peraeam vocant—possessam 2 maioribus suis, Pausistratum praetorem cum octin-clinging to a hill facing the east and Acarnania; the lower parts of the town were flat, lying along the sea which separates Leucadia from Acarnania.[1] On that side it is vulnerable by land and sea, for the shallows are more like a pool than a sea and the whole country is flat and favourable for siege-works. So the walls in many places were either undermined or thrown down by the battering-ram. But as the city itself was exposed to attack, just so were the minds of the enemy invincible. By day and night they laboured to rebuild the shattered walls, to close the ways laid open by their fall, to enter battle courageously, and to defend the walls with weapons rather than themselves with walls. They would have prolonged the siege beyond Roman expectations had not certain exiles of the Italian race, living in Leucas, come down from the citadel and admitted the soldiers. The Leucadians, nevertheless, rushing down from the higher ground with loud shouts and drawing up their array in the forum, resisted for a time in pitched battle. Meanwhile the fortifications in many places were taken by escalade, and entrance to the city was gained over piles of stones and fallen buildings, and now the lieutenant himself with a strong force had surrounded the defenders. Part fell in the mellay, some threw down their arms and surrendered to the victor. And a few days later, when news came of the battle which had been fought at Cynoscephalae, all the states of Acarnania submitted to the control of the lieutenant. B.C. 197

[1] The acropolis of Leucas was on a hill; the lower town extended eastward from its base.

XVIII. At the same time, when everything was going one way, the Rhodians also, with a view to reclaiming from Philip the district on the mainland—Peraea is its name—which their forefathers had held, dispatched Pausistratus the praetor with eight gentis Achaeis peditibus, mille et octingentis fere armatis, ex vario genere auxiliorum collectis, miserunt; Galli et Pisuetae et Nisuetae et Tamiani et Arei ex Africa et Laudiceni ex Asia erant. Cum iis copiis Pausistratus Tendeba in Stratonicensi agro, locum peropportunum, ignaris regiis qui Therae erant occupavit. In tempore et ad id[1] ipsum excitum auxilium, mille Achaei pedites cum centum equitibus supervenerunt; Theoxenus iis praeerat. Dinocrates, regius praefectus, reciperandi castelli causa primo castra ad ipsa Tendeba movet, inde ad alterum castellum, item Stratonicensis agri—Astragon vocant—omnibus praesidiis[2] quae multifariam[3] dis-iecta erant, devocatis et ab ipsa Stratonicea Thessalorum auxiliaribus ad Alabanda, ubi hostes erant, ducere pergit. Nec Rhodii pugnam detractaverunt. Ita castris in propinquo locatis extemplo in aciem descensum est. Dinocrates quingentos Macedonas dextro cornu, laevo Agrianas locat, in medium accipit contractos ex castellorum—Cares maxime erant—praesidiis, equites cornibus circumdat et Cretensium auxiliares Thracumque. Rhodii Achaeos, lectam peditum manum, habuere, medios mixta ex pluribus gentibus auxilia, equites levisque armaturae quod erat cornibus circumiectum. Eo die steterunt tantum

A.U.C. 557

[1] id Gelenius: om. B.
[2] praesidiis Madvig: ex praesidiis B.
[3] multifariam ed. Frobeniana 1531: multifaria B.

[1] I.e., the inhabitants of Laodicea in Asia; the Galli were from Galatia and the other tribes from Africa.

[2] Both the movements of the opposing forces and their purposes are obscure.

[3] This translation preserves what seems to be the soundest text of the sentence. It is, however, strange that Livy has not given in detail the formation of the Rhodian line, as he hundred Achaean infantry and about one thousand B.C. 197 eight hundred auxiliaries collected from different states: these were Gauls and Pisuetae and Nisuetae and Tamiani and Arei from Africa and Laudiceni[1] from Asia. With these forces Pausistratus took Tendeba, a city in the territory of Stratonicea and well situated, without the knowledge of the king's forces who were on Thera. There reinforcements, summoned at this time and for this purpose, to wit, one thousand Achaean infantry with one hundred cavalry, met them; Theoxenus was their commander. Dinocrates, the king's prefect, first moved his camp towards Tendeba itself for the purpose of recovering the fortress, then to another fort, also in the country of Stratonicea—they call it Astragon—recalling all the garrisons which had been scattered far and wide and Thessalian auxiliaries from Stratonicea itself, and began to march towards Alabanda, where the enemy lay.[2] The Rhodians did not decline the battle. So, placing their camp near by, they came down to the battle-field. Dinocrates placed five hundred Macedonians on his right flank and the Agrianes on the left; in the centre he posted the troops gathered up from the garrisons of the forts—they were mostly Carians—and he covered the flanks with the cavalry and the Cretan and Thracian auxiliaries. The Rhodians had in the centre the Achaeans, a picked force of infantry, and the auxiliaries, made up of men of different races, and the cavalry and what there was of light infantry placed outside the flanks.[3] On that day both lines merely remained standing has that of the Macedonian. All conjectures intended to meet this objection are unreasonably bold.

A.U.C. 557

acies utraque super ripam, qui tenui tum aqua interfluebat, torrentis paucisque telis emissis in castra receperunt sese. Postero die eodem ordine instructi maius aliquanto proelium quam pro numero edidere 13 pugnantium. Neque enim plus terna milia peditum
14 fuere et centeni ferme equites; ceterum non numero tantum nec armorum genere, sed animis quoque paribus et aequa spe pugnarunt. Achaei primo torrente superato in Agrianas impetum fecerunt;
15 deinde tota prope cursu transgressa amnem acies est.
16 Diu anceps pugna stetit. Numero Achaei, mille ipsi, quadringentos loco pepulere; inclinato deinde laevo
17 cornu in dextrum omnes conisi. Macedones, usque dum ordines et veluti stipata phalanx constabat, 18 moveri nequiverunt; postquam laevo latere nudato circumagere hastas in venientem ex transverso hostem conati sunt, turbati extemplo tumultum primo inter se fecerunt, terga deinde vertunt, postremo abiectis
19 armis in praecipitem fugam effunduntur. Bargylias petentes fugerunt; eodem Dinocrates perfugit. Rhodii quantum diei superfuit secuti receperunt sese in castra. Satis constat, si confestim victores Stratoniceam petissent, recipi eam urbem sine certamine 20 potuisse. Praetermissa eius rei occasio est, dum in castellis vicisque recipiendis Peraeae tempus teritur.
21 Interim animi eorum qui Stratoniceam praesidio obtinebant confirmati sunt. Mox et Dinocrates cum

[1] Presumably the Agrianes, though their number has not been given before.

on the banks of the river flowing between them, B.C. 197 which was then a small stream, and after hurling a few missiles retired to their camps. The next day the two armies were similarly formed and a battle began, severer than might be expected from the numbers of the combatants. For there were not more than three thousand infantry and one hundred cavalry on either side, but they fought not only with equal numbers and similar weapons but with the same courage and equal hope as well. The Achaeans at first crossed the river and attacked the Agrianes, and then almost the whole line hastily crossed the stream on the run. The issue was long in doubt. By weight of numbers, the Achaeans, a thousand strong, dislodged the four hundred;[1] then, as the left gave way, the whole effort was directed against the right flank. The Macedonians could not be moved as long as the line held and the phalanx was, so to speak, compact; when, after their left flank was exposed, they tried to change front so as to meet the enemy that was attacking them in flank, they first caused immediate disorder and confusion among themselves, then they began to fall back, and finally threw away their arms and fled at full speed. The fugitives made for Bargyliae, and Dinocrates sought refuge in the same place. The Rhodians followed as long as daylight lasted and then returned to camp. It is quite clear that if the victors had at once marched to Stratonicea, this city could have been recovered without a struggle. The opportunity for this was lost while they consumed time in occupying the forts and towns of Peraea. Meanwhile the courage of those who were holding Stratonicea with the garrison was renewed, and presently Dinocrates

A.U.C. 557 iis quae proelio superfuerant copiis intravit muros.
22 Nequiquam inde obsessa oppugnataque urbs est, nec recipi nisi aliquanto post per Antiochum potuit. Haec in Thessalia, haec in Achaia, haec in Asia per eosdem dies ferme gesta.

XIX. Philippus cum audisset Dardanos transgressos fines ab contemptu concussi tum regni superiora
2 Macedoniae evastare, quamquam toto prope orbe terrarum, undique se suosque exigente fortuna,
3 urgebatur, tamen morte tristius ratus Macedoniae etiam possessione pelli, dilecta raptim per urbes Macedonum habito cum sex milibus peditum et quingentis equitibus circa Stobos Paeoniae improviso
4 hostes oppressit. Magna multitudo hominum in proelio, maior cupidine praedandi palata per agros caesa est. Quibus fuga in expedito fuit, ne temptato
5 quidem casu pugnae in fines suos redierunt. Ea una expeditione, non pro reliquo statu fortunae facta, refectis suorum animis Thessalonicam sese recepit.
6 Non tam in tempore Punicum bellum terminatum erat, ne simul et cum Philippo foret bellandum, quam opportune iam Antiocho ex Syria movente bellum
7 Philippus est superatus; nam praeterquam quod facilius cum singulis quam si in unum ambo simul

---

[1] The meaning is quite uncertain. In XXX. 11 below it is said that the Romans gave the city to the Rhodians according to the peace of 196 B.C. It is also possible that the city was included in the settlement in 189 B.C., after the war with Antiochus (XXXVII. vi. 6).

[2] The narrative which was interrupted at Chap. XIV above is resumed.

[3] I.e., the northern frontiers.

[4] Livy now begins to relate the events preliminary to the entered the walls with the troops that had survived B.C. 19 the battle. In vain was the city then invested and besieged, nor was it recovered until some time later through the aid of Antiochus.[1] Such were the events of this period, which took place during, we may almost say, the same days in Thessaly, Achaea, and Asia.

XIX. When[2] Philip learned that the Dardani had crossed the borders, out of contempt for his stricken kingdom, and were then laying waste the farther[3] frontiers of Macedonia, although he was hard pressed in every quarter of the world, since fortune had turned against him and his people, nevertheless, thinking that to be robbed of the possession of Macedonia was a sadder fate than death, he quickly levied troops in the cities of Macedonia and with six thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry suddenly fell upon the enemy near Stobi in Paeonia. Many men fell in the battle, many more through their lust for booty while roving through the fields. Those to whom flight was possible returned to their country without even risking the hazard of a battle. Philip returned to Thessalonica with the courage of his people renewed by this one expedition, so different in its outcome from his other experiences.

The end of the Punic War,[4] coming in time to free the Romans from the necessity of fighting Philip at the same moment, was no more fortunate than the defeat of Philip when Antiochus was already preparing war from Syria; for, in addition to the fact that war is more easily waged against one at a time than when two have brought their united strength war with Antiochus. The reference to Spain is incidental, and Spain is neglected until we come to xxi. 6 below.

A.U.C. 557 contulissent vires, bellatum est, Hispania quoque sub idem tempus magno tumultu ad bellum con-
8 surrexit. Antiochus cum priore aestate omnibus quae in Coele Syria sunt civitatibus ex Ptolomaei dicione in suam potestatem redactis in hiberna Antiocheam concessisset, nihilo quietiora ea ipsis aestivis
9 habuit. Omnibus enim regni viribus conixus cum ingentes copias terrestres maritimasque comparasset, principio veris praemissis terra cum exercitu filiis
10 duobus, Ardye ac Mithradate, iussisque Sardibus se opperiri ipse cum classe centum tectarum navium, ad hoc levioribus navigiis cercurisque ac lembis ducentis 11 proficiscitur, simul per omnem oram Ciliciae Lyciaeque et Cariae temptaturus urbes quae in dicione Ptolomaei essent, simul Philippum—necdum enim debellatum erat—exercitu navibusque adiuturus.

XX. Multa egregie Rhodii pro fide erga populum Romanum proque universo nomine Graecorum terra
2 marique ausi sunt, nihil magnificentius quam quod ea tempestate, non territi tanta mole inminentis belli, legatos ad regem miserunt, ne Chelidonias—promunturium Ciliciae est inclutum foedere antiquo Atheniensium cum regibus[1] Persarum—superaret:
3 si eo fine non contineret classem copiasque suas, se obviam ituros, non ab odio ullo, sed ne coniungi eum Philippo paterentur et impedimento esse Romanis

[1] regibus Goeller: legibus B.

[1] This is the spring of 197 B.C.

[2] In 449 B.C., Cimon made a treaty providing that Persian warships should not pass this promontory (Plutarch, Cimon 13).

to bear upon one, in Spain also about the same time B.C. 197
there was a grave uprising and revolt. When Antiochus, during the preceding summer, had transferred all the cities which are situated in Coele Syria from the power of Ptolemy to his own dominion and had retired to Antioch for the winter, this period was as full of activity as the summer had been. For, when he had assembled huge military and naval forces by exerting all the strength of his kingdom, in the beginning of spring[1] he sent his two sons, Ardyes and Mithradates, ahead with the army by land. Ordering them to wait for him at Sardis, he set out in person with one hundred decked ships and besides two hundred lighter vessels, schooners and brigs, with the double purpose of trying to win over the cities which had been under the control of Ptolemy along the whole shore of Cilicia, Lycia, and Caria, and of aiding Philip with his army and navy—for that war had not yet been ended.

XX. Many are the noble ventures which the Rhodians have undertaken on land and sea, to testify to their loyalty to the Roman people and in behalf of the whole race of the Greeks, but they have done nothing more glorious than on this occasion, when, unterrified by the magnitude of the impending war, they sent ambassadors to the king, ordering him not to pass Chelidoniae—a promontory in Cilicia, made famous by the ancient treaty[2] between the Athenians and the Persian kings: if Antiochus did not keep his fleet and army within this limit, they vowed that they would oppose him, not from any ill-will towards him, but to prevent his joining Philip and interfering with the Romans who were undertaking to liberate

A.U.C. 557

4 liberantibus Graeciam. Coracesium eo tempore Antiochus operibus oppugnabat, Zephyrio et Solis et Aphrodisiade et Coryco et superato Anemurio—promunturium id quoque Ciliciae est—Selinunte recepto. 5 Omnibus his aliisque eius orae castellis aut metu aut voluntate sine certamine in dicionem acceptis, Cora- 6 cesium praeter spem clausis portis tenebat eum. Ibi legati Rhodiorum auditi. Et quamquam ea legatio 7 erat quae accendere regium animum posset, temperavit irae et legatos se Rhodum missurum respondit iisque mandaturum ut renovarent vetusta iura cum ea civitate sua maiorumque suorum et vetarent eos pertimescere adventum regis: nihil aut iis aut sociis 8 eorum noxiae futurum fraudive; nam Romanorum amicitiam se non violaturum, argumento et suam recentem ad eos legationem esse et senatus honorifica 9 in se decreta responsaque. Tum forte legati redierant[1] ab Roma comiter auditi dimissique, ut tempus postulabat, incerto adhuc adversus Philippum eventu belli. 10 Cum haec legati regis in contione Rhodiorum agerent, nuntius venit debellatum ad Cynoscephalas esse. Hoc nuntio accepto Rhodii dempto metu a Philippo omiserunt[2] consilium obviam eundi classe Antiocho; 11 illam alteram curam non omiserunt tuendae libertatis civitatum sociarum Ptolomaei, quibus bellum ab 12 Antiocho imminebat. Nam alias auxiliis iuverunt,

[1] redierant ed. Frobeniana 1535: rediebant B.
[2] omiserunt Goeller: omiserant B.

[1] In 198 B.C. (XXXII. viii. 15) the Romans sent an embassy to Antiochus with the request that he keep out of Pergamum, but the war with Philip compelled them to maintain this propitiatory attitude toward him. Antiochus shrewdly uses it to allay the suspicions of the Rhodians.

Greece. Antiochus was at the time besieging B.C. 197 Coracesium, having recovered Zephyrium and Soli and Aphrodisias and Corycus, and Selinus, after rounding Anemurium—this also is a cape in Cilicia. All these and other forts on this coast having surrendered to him without resistance, either from fear or voluntarily, Coracesium unexpectedly closed its gates and delayed him. There the ambassadors of the Rhodians were given audience. And although their message was one to inflame the king's mind, he restrained his anger and answered that he would send ambassadors to Rhodes with instructions to renew the long-standing relations existing between him and his ancestors and that state, and to bid them have no fears of the king's coming: no fraud or mischief was planned either for them or for their allies; for he would not violate the friendship of the Romans, in evidence whereof he cited both his own recent embassy to them and the senate's complimentary decrees and replies to him.[1] At that time, as it happened, his ambassadors had returned from Rome, where they had been heard and dismissed courteously, as the situation demanded, the outcome of the war with Philip being still in doubt. While the ambassadors of the king were relating this before the assembly of the Rhodians, the news came that the war had been ended at Cynoscephalae. Their fear of Philip having been dispelled by the receipt of this news, the Rhodians abandoned their design of going to meet Antiochus with the fleet; their other concern they did not forget, to wit, that of maintaining the liberty of the cities allied with Ptolemy, which were threatened with war by Antiochus. For some they helped with alias providendo ac praemonendo conatus hostis causaque libertatis fuerunt Cauniis, Myndiis, Hali-13 carnassensibus Samiisque. Non operae est persequi ut quaeque acta in his locis sint, cum ad ea quae propria Romani belli sunt vix sufficiam.

A.U.C. 557

XXI. Eodem tempore Attalus rex aeger ab Thebis Pergamum advectus moritur altero et septuagesimo anno, cum quattuor et quadraginta annos regnasset.
2 Huic viro praeter divitias nihil ad spem regni fortuna dederat. Iis simul prudenter, simul magnifice utendo effecit, primum ut sibi, deinde ut aliis, non indignus
3 videretur regno. Victis deinde proelio uno Gallis, quae tum gens recenti adventu terribilior Asiae erat, regium adscivit nomen, cuius magnitudini[1] semper
4 animum aequavit. Summa iustitia suos rexit, unicam
5 fidem sociis praestitit, comis uxori ac liberis[2]— quattuor[3] superstites habuit, mitis ac munificus amicis fuit; regnum adeo stabile ac firmum reliquit, ut ad tertiam stirpem possessio eius descenderit.
6 Cum hic status rerum in Asia Graeciaque et Macedonia esset, vixdum terminato cum Philippo bello, pace certe nondum perpetrata, ingens in Hispania
7 ulteriore coortum est bellum. M. Helvius eam provinciam obtinebat. Is litteris senatum certiorem

[1] magnitudini Aldus: magnitudinis B.
[2] uxori ac liberis Jacobs: uxor ac liberos B.
[3] quattuor Sigonius: duo B.

[1] The line became extinct in 133 B.C., when Pergamum became the property of Rome under the will of the grandson of this Attalus.

[2] The status of Spain had never been officially fixed since the Carthaginians were driven out during the Second Punic War. Until the present year it was normally governed by privati cum imperio (see notes on XXXII. xxvii. 6 and xxviii.

reinforcements, some by warnings and information as to the enemy's plans, and they were responsible for preserving the liberty of the people of Caunus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, and Samos. It is hardly worth while to record in detail the events in this part of the world, since I am scarce able to recount those things which belong properly to the Roman war. B.C. 197

XXI. At the same time King Attalus, who had fallen ill at Thebes and then removed from Thebes to Pergamum, died in his seventy-second year, after he had been on the throne for forty-four years. Fortune had bestowed upon this man nothing but wealth to give him hope of royal power. By using this both wisely and splendidly he brought it about that he seemed worthy of the throne, first in his own eyes, then in those of others. Then when in a single battle he had conquered the Gauls, a people the more terrible to Asia by reason of their recent arrival, he assumed the title of king, and thenceforth his greatness of soul always matched the greatness of his distinction. He ruled his subjects with perfect justice, exhibited remarkable fidelity to his allies, was courteous to his wife and sons—four survived him —and kind and generous to his friends; he left a kingdom so strong and well-established that possession of it was handed down to the third generation.[1]

While this was the state of affairs in Asia, Greece, and Macedonia, the war with Philip having been scarcely finished and peace, at any rate, not yet assured, a great war broke out in Farther Spain.[2] Marcus Helvius was now governor of that province. He sent dispatches to the senate that two petty kings, 11 above), and thorough pacification had not been attempted. Wars in Spain fill many pages in the next few books.

A.U.C. 557

fecit Culcham et Luxinium regulos in armis esse, 8 cum Culcha decem et septem oppida, cum Luxinio validas urbes Carmonem et Baldonem, in maritima ora Malacinos Sexetanosque et Baeturiam omnem et quae nondum animos nudaverant ad finitimorum 9 motus consurrectura.[1] His litteris a M. Sergio prae-tore, cuius iurisdictio inter cives et peregrinos erat, recitatis decreverunt patres ut comitiis praetorum perfectis, cui praetori provincia Hispania obvenisset, is primo quoque tempore de bello Hispaniae ad senatum referret.

XXII. Sub idem tempus consules Romam venerunt; quibus in aede Bellonae senatum habentibus postulantibusque triumphum ob res prospere bello 2 gestas C. Atinius Labeo et C. Afranius tribuni plebis ut separatim de triumpho agerent consules postularunt: communem se relationem de ea re fieri non passuros, ne par honos in dispari merito esset.
3 Cum Q. Minucius utrique Italiam provinciam obtigisse diceret, communi animo consilioque se et collegam res 4 gessisse, et C. Cornelius adiceret Boios adversus se transgredientes Padum, ut Insubribus Cenomanisque auxilio essent, depopulante vicos eorum atque agros 5 collega ad sua tuenda aversos esse, tribuni res tantas bello gessisse C. Cornelium fateri, ut non magis de triumpho eius quam de honore diis immortalibus

[1] consurrectura Goeller: consurrectur B.

[1] In XXXII. xxviii. 2 Sergius is praetor urbanus, and this assignment is more probable.

[2] I.e., a motion covering both triumphs: cf. communi animo consilioque three lines below.

Culcha and Luxinius, were in arms, that seventeen B.C. 197 towns had joined Culcha and the powerful cities of Carmo and Baldo were with Luxinius, and that on the coast, the Malacini and Sexetani and all Baeturia and other states which had not yet disclosed their intentions would soon rise to join the revolt of their neighbours. This letter was read to the senate by Marcus Sergius, the praetor who exercised jurisdiction in cases between citizens and aliens,[1] and the Fathers voted that as soon as the praetorian elections were over the praetor to whom the province of Spain had by then been allotted should at the earliest possible moment refer to the senate the question of the Spanish war.

XXII. At about the same time the consuls returned to Rome; when they summoned the senate to meet in the temple of Bellona and demanded a triumph for their successes in the war, Gaius Atinius Labeo and Gaius Afranius, tribunes of the people, insisted that the consuls offer separate motions regarding the triumph: they would not allow a common[2] motion to be voted on, lest equal honour be bestowed upon unequal merit. Quintus Minucius replied that the province of Italy had fallen to the lot of both consuls and that he and his colleague had acted in accordance with a common policy and plan of campaign, and Gaius Cornelius added that the Boi, who were crossing the Po against him, to aid the Insubres and Cenomani, had been called away to defend their own homes when his colleague laid waste their towns and farms. To this the tribunes rejoined that they agreed that Gaius Cornelius had accomplished in the war results of such magnitude that there was no more question of his triumph than 6 habendo dubitari possit; non tamen nec illum nec quemquam alium civem tantum gratia atque opibus valuisse ut, cum sibi meritum triumphum impetrasset, collegae eundem honorem immeritum impudenter 7 petenti daret. Q. Minucium in Liguribus levia proelia, vix digna dictu, fecisse, in Gallia magnum 8 numerum militum amisisse; nominabant etiam tribunos militum; T. Iuventium, Cn. Ligurium legionis quartae adversa pugna cum multis aliis viris fortibus, 9 civibus ac sociis, cecidisse. Oppidorum paucorum ac vicorum falsas et in tempus simulatas sine ullo 10 pignore deditiones factas esse. Hae inter consules tribunosque altercationes biduum tenuerunt, victique perseverantia tribunorum consules separatim rettulerunt.

A.U.C. 557

XXIII. C. Cornelio omnium consensu decretus triumphus. Et Placentini Cremonensesque addide- 2 runt favorem consuli, gratias agentes commemorantesque obsidione sese ab eo liberatos, plerique etiam, cum capti[1] apud hostes essent, servitute 3 exemptos. Q. Minucius temptata tantum relatione, cum adversum omnem senatum videret, in monte Albano se triumphaturum et iure imperii consularis 4 et multorum clarorum virorum exemplo dixit. C.[2]

[1] capti Cobet: om. B. [2] C. Drakenborch: Cn. B.

[1] The pignus is probably a guarantee, in the form of hostages, that the surrender was real.

[2] One may compare with the account given by the tribunes the narrative of Livy (XXXII. xxix. 5–xxxi. 5).

[3] Minucius, having gone thus far, feels compelled to offer a formal motion that he be granted a triumph. Since this was clearly destined to fail, he awarded himself a triumph in monte Albano, with which the senate could not interfere. So, in 211 B.C., Marcellus was refused a triumph, for technical reasons, but was granted an ovation and celebrated a triumph there could be of paying honour to the immortal gods; yet neither he nor any other citizen was so powerful in influence and resources that, when he had obtained a well-earned triumph, he could bestow the same unmerited honour upon a colleague who had the effrontery to demand it. Quintus Minucius, they continued, had fought some unimportant battles in Liguria, hardly worthy of mention, and in Gaul had lost a great number of his men; they even mentioned by name Titus Iuventius and Gnaeus Ligurius, military tribunes of the fourth legion, who had fallen in the defeat along with many other brave men, citizens and allies. The surrender of small towns and villages had taken place, but this was fictitious, manufactured for the occasion, and without guarantees.[1] These debates between the consuls and the tribunes continued for two days, but at last, overcome by the stubbornness of the tribunes, the consuls offered separate motions.[2] B.C. 197

XXIII. Gaius Cornelius was granted a triumph with the consent of all. The people of Placentia and Cremona contributed to the applause given the consul, expressing their gratitude to him and testifying that they had been freed by him from the peril of siege, and many even that they had been rescued from slavery after they had been prisoners in the hands of the enemy. Quintus Minucius, simply offering a motion, when he saw the whole senate opposed to him, declared that he would celebrate his triumph on the Alban Mount, both by virtue of his consular imperium and with the precedent of many distinguished men.[3] Gaius Cornelius the on the Alban Mount (XXVI. xxi. 2–6). See the notes on XXXI. xx. 5 and xlvii. 4 above.

A.U.C. 557

Cornelius de Insubribus Cenomanisque in magistratu triumphavit. Multa signa militaria tulit, multa
5 Gallica spolia captivis carpentis transvexit, multi nobiles Galli ante currum ducti, inter quos quidam Hamilcarem, ducem Poenorum, fuisse auctores sunt;
6 ceterum magis in se convertit oculos Cremonensium Placentinorumque colonorum turba, pilleatorum cur-
7 rum sequentium. Aeris tulit in triumpho ducenta triginta septem milia quingentos, argenti bigati undeoctoginta milia; septuagenii aeris militibus divisi,
8 duplex centurioni, triplex equiti.[1] Q. Minucius consul de Liguribus Boisque Gallis in monte Albano triumphavit. Is triumphus, ut loco et fama rerum gestarum et quod sumptum non erogatum ex aerario omnes sciebant, inhonoratior fuit, ita signis carpen-9 tisque et spoliis ferme aequabat. Pecuniae etiam prope par summa fuit; aeris tralata[2] ducenta quinquaginta quattuor milia, argenti bigati quinquaginta tria milia et ducenti; militibus centurionibusque et equitibus idem in singulos datum quod dederat collega.

XXIV. Secundum triumphum consularia comitia habita. Creati consules L. Furius Purpurio et M.
2 Claudius Marcellus. Praetores postero die facti Q. Fabius Buteo, Ti. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minucius

[1] duplex centurioni, triplex equiti Duker, cf. XXIV. xlvi. 3: duplex equiti centurionique B.
[2] tralata Bekker: tralati B.

---

[1] He was reported killed in XXXI. xxi. 18, but compare XXXII. xxx. 12.
[2] This was a conical cap worn by freedmen to mark their release from slavery and by the colonists here to signalize their rescue from captivity.

consul, while still in office, triumphed over the Insubres and Cenomani. In the procession were displayed many standards, much Gallic spoil was carried in captured carts, many noble Gauls were led before his chariot, and some say that Hamilcar[1] the Carthaginian general was among them; but what especially attracted attention was the throng of colonists of Cremona and Placentia, following his car with caps of liberty[2] upon their heads. He carried in the triumph two hundred and thirty-seven thousand asses of bronze, and seventy-nine thousand pieces of coined[3] silver; his gifts to the soldiers were seventy asses of bronze each, twice that amount to each centurion and thrice to each cavalryman. Quintus Minucius the consul triumphed over the Ligures and Gallic Boi on the Alban Mount. This triumph was of lesser note because of the place where it was held, the gossip about his exploits, and because all knew that the cost of it was taken, not duly requisitioned, from the treasury, but nevertheless in standards and wagons and spoils it almost equalled the other. The amount of money too was about the same: the money carried amounted to two hundred and fifty-four thousand asses of bronze, fifty-three thousand two hundred pieces of coined silver; his donatives to his soldiers were the same as his colleague's. B.C. 197

XXIV. After the triumph the consular elections were held. The choice fell on Lucius Furius Purpurio and Marcus Claudius Marcellus. Next day praetors were elected—Quintus Fabius Buteo, Tiberius Sempronius Longus, Quintus Minucius

[3] These coins (denarii) were stamped with a two-horse chariot.

A.U.C. 667 Thermus, M'. Acilius Glabrio, L. Apustius Fullo, C. Laelius.

3 Exitu ferme anni litterae a T. Quinctio venerunt se signis collatis cum rege Philippo in Thessalia pugnasse, 4 hostium exercitum fusum fugatumque. Hae litterae prius in senatu a M.[1] Sergio praetore, deinde ex auctoritate patrum in contione sunt recitatae et ob res prospere gestas in dies quinque supplicationes 5 decretae. Brevi post legati et ab T. Quinctio et ab rege Philippo venerunt. Macedones deducti extra urbem in villam publicam, ibique eis locus et lautia 6 praebita et ad aedem Bellonae senatus datus. Ibi haud multa verba facta, cum Macedones quodcumque senatus censuisset id regem facturum esse dicerent. 7 Decem legati more maiorum, quorum ex consilio T. Quinctius imperator leges pacis Philippo daret, decreti, adiectumque ut in eo numero legatorum P. Sulpicius et P. Villius essent, qui consules provinciam Macedoniam obtinuissent.

8 Cosanis eo die postulantibus ut sibi colonorum 9 numerus augeretur, mille adscribi iussi, dum ne quis in eo numero esset qui post P. Cornelium et Ti. Sempronium consules hostis fuisset.

[1] M. Madvig: om. B.

---

[1] A residence in the Campus Martius, set aside for the entertainment of foreign ambassadors and other guests of the state.

[2] A similar request from them in 199 B.C. was denied (XXXII. ii. 7).

Thermus, Manius Acilius Glabrio, Lucius Apustius Fullo, and Gaius Laelius. B.C. 197

About the end of the year a letter arrived from Titus Quinctius, stating that he had met King Philip in pitched battle in Thessaly and that the army of the enemy had been routed and put to flight. This letter was read by Marcus Sergius the praetor, first in the senate, and then, by order of the senate, in the assembly, and by reason of this victory a thanksgiving of five days was decreed. Soon after ambassadors arrived both from Titus Quinctius and from King Philip. The Macedonians were conducted outside the city to the villa publica,[1] and were there furnished quarters and hospitality, and were granted an audience before the senate in the temple of Bellona. Their message was brief, to the effect that the king promised to do whatever the senate should have ordered. In the traditional manner, a commission of ten was created, with whose advice Titus Quinctius the commander should determine the conditions of peace for Philip, and a clause was added, providing that Publius Sulpicius and Publius Villius, who as consuls had held the province of Macedonia, should be members of the commission.

The people of Cosa[2] at this time requested that the number of their colonists be increased; one thousand were ordered to be enrolled, with the proviso that no one should be included in the number who had been engaged in hostilities against the state since the consulship of Publius Cornelius and Tiberius Sempronius.[3]

[2] The purpose of this is to exclude the Latins who had revolted during the Second Punic War. Cornelius and Sempronius were consuls in 218 B.C., the first year of that war.

A.U.C. 557

XXV. Ludi Romani eo anno in circo scaenaque ab aedilibus curulibus P. Cornelio Scipione et Cn. Manlio Volsone et magnificentibus quam alias facti et laetius propter res bello bene gestas spectati, totique ter 2 instaurati. Plebei septiens instaurati; M'. Acilius 3 Glabrio et C. Laelius eos ludos fecerunt; et de argento multaticio tria signa aenea, Cererem Liberumque et Liberam, posuerunt.

A.U.C. 558

4 L. Furius et M. Claudius Marcellus consulatu inito, cum de provinciis ageretur et Italiam utrique provinciam senatus decerneret, ut Macedoniam cum 5 Italia sortirentur tendebant. Marcellus, provinciae cupidior, pacem simulatam ac fallacem dicendo et rebellaturum si exercitus inde deportatus esset regem, 6 dubios sententiae patres fecerat. Et forsitan obtinuisset consul, ni Q. Marcius Ralla et C. Atinius Labeo tribuni plebis se intercessuros dixissent, ni prius ipsi ad plebem tulissent vellent iuberentne cum rege 7 Philippo pacem esse. Ea rogatio in Capitolio ad plebem lata est; omnes quinque et triginta tribus 8 " uti rogas " iusserunt. Et quo magis pacem ratam esse in Macedonia vulgo laetarentur, tristis ex Hispania 9 adlatus nuntius effecit vulgataeque litterae " C. Sempronium Tuditanum proconsulem in citeriore Hispania

---

[1] Theatrical performances had been given as early as 214 B.C. (XXIV. xliii. 7).

[2] The aediles had police powers, including the right to impose fines: cf. xlii. 10 below.

[3] " Uti rogas " (" as you propose ") is the regular formula for an affirmative vote.

XXV. The Roman Games were celebrated that year in the circus and theatre [1] by the curule aediles Publius Cornelius Scipio and Gnaeus Manlius Volso. They were celebrated with greater splendour than at any other time, and were also viewed with greater joy because of the successes in war, and were thrice repeated entire. The Plebeian Games were repeated seven times; Manius Acilius Glabrio and Gaius Laelius presided over these games, and out of the money received as fines [2] they erected three bronze statues of Ceres and Liber and Libera. B.C. 197

Lucius Furius and Marcus Claudius Marcellus were duly inaugurated as consuls, and when the question of the provinces was brought up and the senate was for decreeing Italy to both consuls, they urged that they should draw lots for Macedonia along with Italy. Marcellus, who was more anxious for a province, by arguing that the peace was a make-believe and a fiction, and that the king would rebel once the army was withdrawn from there, unsettled the minds of the senators. And the consul might have won his point, had not Quintus Marcius Ralla and Gaius Atinius Labeo, tribunes of the people, announced that they would veto any action if the question was not first referred to the assembly whether they wished and ordered that peace be made with King Philip. This motion was then laid before the people convened on the Capitoline; all the thirty-five tribes voted "aye." [3] And that there might be more general rejoicing that peace in Macedonia had been ratified, serious news had come from Spain, and a letter was read announcing that "Gaius Sempronius Tuditanus had been defeated in battle in Nearer Spain, his army routed and put to B.C. 196

A.U.C. 558

proelio victum, exercitum eius fusum fugatumque, multos illustres viros in acie cecidisse, Tuditanum cum gravi vulnere relatum ex proelio haud ita multo 10 post expirasse." Consulibus ambobus Italia provincia cum iis legionibus quas superiores consules habuissent, decreta, et ut quattuor legiones novas scriberent, duas urbanas, duas quae quo senatus censuisset mit-11 terentur; et T. Quinctius Flamininus provinciam[1] eodem exercitu obtinere iussus; imperium ei prorogatum satis iam ante videri esse.

XXVI. Praetores deinde provincias sortiti, L. Apustius Fullo urbanam iurisdictionem, M'. Acilius Glabrio inter cives et peregrinos, Q. Fabius Buteo Hispaniam 2 ulteriorem, Q. Minucius Thermus citeriorem, C. Laelius Siciliam, Ti. Sempronius Longus Sardiniam.
3 Q. Fabio Buteoni et Q. Minucio, quibus Hispaniae provinciae evenerant, consules legiones singulas ex
4 quattuor ab se scriptis quas videretur ut darent decretum est et socium ac Latini nominis quaterna milia peditum, trecenos equites; iique primo quoque
5 tempore in provincias ire iussi. Bellum in Hispania quinto post anno motum est quam simul cum Punico bello fuerat[2] finitum.
6 Priusquam aut[3] hi praetores ad bellum prope novum, quia tum primum suo nomine sine ullo Punico exercitu aut duce ad arma ierant, proficiscerentur, aut ipsi consules ab urbe moverent, procurare ut

[1] provinciam Crévier: cum duabus legionibus prouinciam B.
[2] fuerat ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. B.
[3] aut Weissenborn: et B.

[1] In XXXII. xxviii. 9 it is recorded that his imperium was extended until the arrival of an authorized successor.

flight, that many distinguished men had fallen on B.C. 196
the field, and that Tuditanus himself had been carried from the battle severely wounded and had died soon after." Italy was then decreed to both the consuls, with the same legions which the previous consuls had had, and it was further ordered that four new legions be recruited, two to guard the city, two to be sent wherever the senate directed; in addition, that Titus Quinctius Flamininus should hold his province with the same legions: it appeared that the previous prorogation of his imperium was sufficient.[1]

XXVI. The praetors then drew lots for their provinces: Lucius Apustius Fullo received the city jurisdiction, Manius Acilius Glabrio that between citizens and aliens, Quintus Fabius Buteo Farther Spain, Quintus Minucius Thermus Nearer Spain, Gaius Laelius Sicily, and Tiberius Sempronius Longus Sardinia. A motion was passed that the consuls should transfer to Quintus Fabius Buteo and Quintus Minucius, to whose lots the Spanish provinces had fallen, one each of the four legions enlisted by them, the selection being left to them, and in addition should assign to each four thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry of the allies and the Latin confederacy; the praetors were ordered to leave at once for their provinces. The war in Spain had broken out five years after it had been ended along with the Punic War.

Before either these praetors had left for a war which was virtually new, since this was the first time the Spaniards had taken up arms on their own account and without any Carthaginian army or commander, or even the consuls had departed from the city, they were

A.U.C. 558

7 adsolet prodigia quae nuntiabantur iussi. P. Villius eques Romanus in Sabinos proficiscens fulmine ipse 8 equusque exanimati fuerant; aedes Feroniae in Capenati de caelo tacta erat; ad Monetae duarum hastarum spicula arserant; lupus Esquilina porta ingressus, frequentissima parte urbis cum in forum 9 decurrisset, Tusco vico atque inde Cermalo per portam Capenam prope intactus evaserat. Haec prodigia maioribus hostiis sunt procurata.

XXVII. Iisdem diebus Cn. Cornelius Blasio, qui ante C. Sempronium Tuditanum citeriorem Hispaniam obtinuerat, ovans ex senatus consulto urbem est 2 ingressus. Tulit prae se auri mille et quingenta quindecim pondo,[1] argenti viginta milia, signati de- 3 narium triginta quattuor milia et quingentos. L. Stertinius ex ulteriore Hispania, ne temptata quidem triumphi spe, quinquaginta milia pondo argenti in 4 aerarium intulit et de manubiis duos fornices in foro boario ante Fortunae aedem et matris Matutae, unum in maximo circo fecit et his fornicibus signa aurata 5 inposuit. Haec per hiemem ferme acta.

[1] quindecim pondo Gronovius: pondo B: pondo quindecim ed. Moguntina 1518.

---

[1] This town and sanctuary were in the neighbourhood of Veii.

[2] The temple, in which the mint was located, stood on the northern summit of the Capitoline.

[3] The Esquiline Gate was on the eastern side of the city; the Vicus Tuscus led south from the Forum along the Cermalus, the extension of the Palatine towards the Capitoline; the Appian Way left the city by the Porta Capena.

[4] See XXXI. l. 11, where he is called Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus.

[5] Livy does not specify the unit here, but comparison with the next clause suggests that this is silver bullion. The coins ordered to expiate the prodigies which were reported. B.C. 196

Publius Villius, a Roman knight, while travelling into the Sabine country, was struck by lightning and he and his horse were killed; the temple of Feronia, in the district of Capena,[1] was struck by lightning; near the temple of Juno Moneta [2] the points of two spears burst into flame; a wolf entered through the Esquiline Gate, passed through the most crowded part of the city into the Forum, through the Vicus Tuscus and the Cermalus, and escaped almost unharmed by the Porta Capena.[3] These prodigies were atoned for with full-grown victims.

XXVII. At the same time Gnaeus Cornelius Blasio,[4] who had been the predecessor of Gaius Sempronius Tuditanus in the governorship of Nearer Spain, entered the city in ovation by authorization of the senate. He displayed in the procession fifteen hundred and fifteen pounds of gold, twenty thousand pounds [5] of silver, and thirty-four thousand five hundred denarii of coined silver. Lucius Stertinius,[6] returning from Farther Spain, without even putting in a claim to a triumph, deposited in the treasury fifty thousand pounds of silver, and out of the booty erected two arches in the Forum Boarium in front of the temples of Fortuna and Mater Matuta,[7] and one in the Circus Maximus, and on these arches he placed gilded statues. These were the events of the winter.

of the following phrase are probably Spanish and comparable in value to the Roman denarius.

[6] He had gone to Spain with Blasio (XXXI. l. 11).

[7] These may be the well-known temples called by these names and still standing in this region. The arches were probably formal entrances to the temples.

A.U.C. 558

Hibernabat eo tempore Elatiae T. Quinctius, a quo cum multa socii peterent, Boeoti petierunt impetraveruntque ut, qui suae gentis militassent apud
6 Philippum, sibi restituerentur. Id a Quinctio facile impetratum, non quia satis dignos eos credebat, sed quia Antiocho rege iam suspecto favor conciliandus
7 nomini Romano apud civitates erat. Restitutis iis confestim apparuit quam nulla inita apud Boeotos gratia esset; nam ad Philippum legatos gratias agentes ei pro redditis hominibus, perinde atque ipsis[1] et non Quinctio et Romanis id datum esset,
8 miserunt et comitiis proximis Boeotarchen ob nullam aliam causam Brachyllem quendam, quam quod praefectus Boeotorum apud regem militantium fuisset,
9 fecerunt praeteritis Zeuxippo et Pisistrato aliisque,
10 qui Romanae societatis auctores fuerant. Id aegre et in praesentia hi passi et in futurum etiam metum ceperunt: cum ad portas prope sedente exercitu Romano ea fierent, quidnam se futurum esse profectis 11 in Italiam Romanis, Philippo ex propinquo socios adiuvante et infesto iis, qui partis adversae fuissent?

XXVIII. Dum Romana arma in propinquo haberent, tollere Brachyllem, principem fautorum regis, statue-
2 runt. Et tempore ad eam rem capto, cum in publico epulatus reverteretur domum temulentus prosequenti-
3 bus mollibus viris, qui ioci causa convivio celebri

[1] ipsis Weissenborn: ipsis iis B.

[1] If the text is right as it stands here, Livy implies that Quinctius transmitted to Philip, with his approval, the request, and that the Boeotians ignored his intercession on their behalf.

[2] A typical Greek coinage, used as the title of the presiding magistrate of a Greek state.

Titus Quinctius was at this time wintering at Elatia, and when the allies were making many requests of him, the Boeotians asked and were permitted to recover their fellow-countrymen who had served with Philip. Quinctius readily granted this, not because he thought they really deserved it, but because in view of the suspicions entertained about King Antiochus he was anxious to win sympathy for the Roman people among the Greek states. When these had been restored, it at once became clear how little gratitude he had won from the Boeotians; for they sent ambassadors to Philip, thanking him for restoring their countrymen, just as if that boon had been granted to them and not to Quinctius and the Romans,[1] and at the next election they chose as Boeotarch [2] one Brachyllas, for no other reason than that he had commanded the Boeotians who had served with the king, passing over Zeuxippus and Pisistratus and others who had sponsored the alliance with Rome. These men were incensed at this action for the moment and also fearful for the future: since such things happened with the Roman army encamped almost at the gates, what in the world would become of them when the Romans had gone back to Italy, and Philip, from his kingdom near by, was aiding his friends and opposing those who had belonged to the other party? B.C. 196

XXVIII. While they had the Roman army close at hand, they determined to do away with Brachyllas, the principal partisan of the king. They chose for this an occasion when, after a public dinner, he was returning to his home in a drunken state and accompanied by a crowd of effeminate creatures who had been present as entertainers at the crowded dinner.

A.U.C. 558

interfuerant, ab sex armatis, quorum tres Italici, tres Aetoli erant, circumventus occiditur. Fuga comitum et quiritatio facta et tumultus per totam urbem discurrentium cum luminibus; percussores proxima porta evaserunt. Luce prima contio frequens velut ex ante indicto aut voce praeconis convocata in theatro erat. Palam ab suo comitatu et obscenis illis viris fremebant interfectum, animis autem Zeuxippum auctorem destinabant caedis. In praesentia placuit comprehendi eos qui simul fuissent, quaestionemque ex iis haberi. Qui dum quaeruntur, Zeuxippus[1] constanti animo avertendi ab se criminis causa in contionem progressus errare ait homines, qui tam atrocem caedem pertinere ad illos semiviros crederent, multaque in eam partem probabiliter est argumentatus, quibus fidem apud quosdam fecit numquam, si sibi conscius esset, oblaturum se multitudini mentionemve eius caedis nullo lacessente facturum fuisse; alii non dubitare impudenter[2] obviam crimini eundo suspicionem averti. Torti post paulo insontes, cum scirent ipsi nihil, opinione omnium pro indicio Zeuxippum et Pisistratum nominaverunt nullo adiecto, cur scire quicquam viderentur, argumento. Zeuxippus tamen cum Stratonida quodam nocte perfugit Tanagram, suam magis conscientiam quam indicium hominum nullius rei consciorum metuens; Pisistratus

[1] Zeuxippus Hertz: Zeuxippus et B.
[2] impudenter ed. Frobeniana 1535: inprudenter B.

He was set upon by six armed men, of whom three B.C. 196 were Italians and three Aetolians, and killed. His companions scattered; there was a search and the noise of guards with torches hurrying through the whole city; the assassins escaped by the nearest gate. At daybreak there was a full assembly in the theatre, as if at a meeting called in advance or summoned by the voice of a herald. Openly the cry was that he had been killed by his own suite and the degenerates who were with him, but in their thoughts they pointed to Zeuxippus as instigator of the murder. For the time being, it was voted that the men who were with him should be arrested and questioned. While they were being examined, Zeuxippus, with ready courage, in order to divert suspicion from himself, came into the assembly, and declared that those men were mistaken who put the responsibility for so cruel a murder upon those eunuchs, and he put forth many plausible arguments to that effect, and by these he created the assurance in some that, if he had felt any sense of guilt, he would never have exposed himself to the crowd or made any reference to this murder without being called upon to do so; others had no doubt that he was shamelessly trying to avert suspicion by volunteering to meet the charge. A little later the innocent witnesses were tortured, and, knowing nothing themselves, mentioned Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, treating as evidence the general suspicion, but citing no proof to show that they had any knowledge of the affair. Zeuxippus, nevertheless, and a certain Stratonidas fled to Tanagra by night, fearing his own conscience more than the testimony of men who knew nothing about the crime; Pisistratus paid no attention to

A.U.C. 558 spretis indicibus Thebis mansit. Servus erat Zeuxippi, totius internuntius et minister rei, quem indicem Pisistratus timens eo ipso timore[1] ad indicium protraxit. Litteras ad Zeuxippum mittit ut servum 12 conscium tolleret: non tam idoneum ad celandam rem eum videri sibi quam ad agendam fuerit. Has qui tulerat litteras iussus Zeuxippo dare quam primum, 13 quia non statim conveniendi eius copia fuit, illi ipsi servo, quem ex omnibus domino fidissimum credebat, tradit et adicit a Pisistrato de re magno opere perti-
14 nente ad Zeuxippum esse. Conscientia ictus, cum extemplo traditurum eas affirmasset, aperit perlectisque litteris pavidus Thebas refugit et ad magis-
15 tratus indicium defert. Et Zeuxippus quidem fuga servi motus Anthedonem, tutiorem exilio locum ratus, concessit; de Pisistrato aliisque quaestiones tormentis habitae et sumptum supplicium est.

XXIX. Efferavit ea caedes Thebanos Boeotosque omnes ad execrabile odium Romanorum, credentes non sine consilio imperatoris Romani Zeuxippum, principem gentis, id facinus conscisse. Ad rebellan-
2 dum neque vires neque ducem habebant; proximum bello quod erat, in latrocinium versi alios in hospitiis, alios vagos per hiberna milites ad varios commeantes
3 usus excipiebant. Quidam in ipsis itineribus ad notas

[1] timore ed. Frobeniana 1535: timore rem B.

---

[1] The meaning appears to be that Pisistratus, by advising Zeuxippus to do away with the slave, thereby brought about the very thing he was trying to prevent, viz., the giving of testimony by the slave, since the latter, learning the substance of the message, took steps to protect himself. This seems a more natural interpretation of protraxit than to translate the witnesses and remained in Thebes. Zeuxippus B.C. 196 had a slave, the go-between and agent in the whole affair, and fearing him as an informer, Pisistratus, by reason of that very fear, brought him forth to give evidence.[1] He sent word to Zeuxippus advising him to get rid of the slave who was his accomplice: he seemed to him, he said, less skilful in concealing an act than in performing it. The messenger had orders to deliver this letter to Zeuxippus as soon as possible, but being unable to find him at once, he gave it to that very same slave, whom he believed to be most faithful to his master of all the slaves, adding that it came from Pisistratus and contained information of the greatest interest to Zeuxippus. The slave, conscious of guilt, promised to deliver it at once, but opened it and having read it fled in terror to Thebes and laid his testimony before the magistrates. And Zeuxippus, frightened at the flight of his slave, retired to Anthedon, thinking it a safer place of exile; Pisistratus and others were examined under torture and executed.

XXIX. This murder roused the Thebans and all the Boeotians to a frenzy of hatred against the Romans, for they thought that Zeuxippus, a leading man in the state, would not have committed such a crime without the cognizance of the Roman commander. They had neither army nor leader for a rebellion; turning to what was most like war, to brigandage, they cut off some soldiers in the taverns, others as they travelled about on various errands during the winter season. Some on the public highways were lured by decoys into planned

[1] "summoned," "haled into court," or "caused to turn state's evidence."

A.U.C. 558

latebras ab insidiantibus, pars in deserta per fraudem
4 deversoria deducti opprimebantur; postremo non tantum ab odio sed etiam aviditate praedae ea facinora fiebant, quia negotiandi ferme causa argentum in
5 zonis habentes in commeatibus erant. Cum primo pauci, deinde in dies plures desiderarentur, infamis esse Boeotia omnis coepit, et timidius quam in hostico
6 egredi castris miles. Tum Quinctius legatos ad quaerendum de latrociniis per civitates mittit. Plurimae caedes circa Copaidem paludem inventae; ibi ex limo eruta extractaque ex stagno cadavera saxis aut amphoris, ut pondere traherentur in profundum, adnexa; multa facinora Acraephiae et Coroneae facta
7 inveniebantur. Quinctius primo noxios tradi sibi iussit et pro quingentis militibus—tot enim interempti
8 erant—quingenta talenta Boeotos conferre. Quorum neutrum cum fieret, verbis tantum civitates excusarent nihil publico consilio factum esse, missis Athenas et in Achaiam legatis, qui testarentur socios iusto pioque
9 se bello persecuturum Boeotos, et cum parte copiarum Ap. Claudio Acraephiam ire iusso ipse cum parte Coroneam circumsidit vastatis prius agris qua ab 10 Elatia duo diversa agmina iere. Hac perculsi clade Boeoti, cum omnia terrore ac fuga completa essent, legatos mittunt. Qui cum in castra non admitterentur ambushes, some were brought by trickery to deserted B.C. 196 inns and killed; finally, such crimes were committed not only from hatred, but also from greed of booty, because the soldiers who were usually travelling on business had money in their purses on their journeys. While at first the losses were small, but then grew larger day by day, all Boeotia began to have a bad name, and the soldiers were more afraid to leave camp than if they were in hostile territory. Then Quinctius sent agents among the cities to inquire into the charges of robbery. Most of the murders, it was found, had been committed around the Copaic swamp; there bodies were dug out of the muck and drawn from the marshes, with stones or jugs fastened to them so that the weight might drag them deeper into the mire; many other crimes were found to have been committed at Acraephia and Coronea. Quinctius at first ordered the criminals to be delivered to him by the Boeotians and a fine paid of five hundred talents for the five hundred soldiers, for so many had been killed. When the cities obeyed neither order, but merely made the verbal excuse that no act had been committed with official sanction, having sent ambassadors to Athens and into Achaea, to call the allies to witness that he was about to wage lawful and rightful war upon the Boeotians, he ordered Appius Claudius to proceed against Acraephia with part of the forces and himself with another detachment invested Coronea, after first devastating the country through which both columns marched from Elatia. The Boeotians, dismayed by this calamity, when the whole region was filled with terror and flight, sent ambassadors. When these were not admitted to the camp, the 11 Achaei Atheniensesque supervenerunt. Plus auctoritatis Achaei habuerunt deprecantes quia, ni impetrassent pacem Boeotis bellum simul gerere decreverant. 12 Per Achaeos et Boeotis copia adeundi adloquendique Romanum facta est iussisque tradere noxios et multae nomine triginta conferre talenta pax data et ab oppugnatione recessum.

A.U.C. 558

XXX. Paucos post dies decem legati ab Roma venerunt, quorum ex consilio pax data Philippo in 2 has leges est, ut omnes Graecorum civitates, quae in Europa quaeque in Asia essent, libertatem ac suas haberent leges; quae earum sub dicione Philippi fuissent, praesidia ex iis Philippus deduceret vacuasque 3 traderet Romanis ante Isthmiorum tempus; deduceret et[1] ex iis, quae in Asia essent, Euromo Pedasisque et Bargyliis et Iaso et Myrina et Abydo et Thaso 4 et Perintho: eas quoque enim placere liberas esse; de Cianorum libertate Quinctium Prusiae, Bithynorum regi, scribere, quid senatui et decem legatis placuisset; 5 captivos transfugasque reddere Philippum Romanis et naves omnes tectas tradere praeter quinque et regiam unam inhabilis prope magnitudinis, quam 6 sedecim versus remorum agebant; ne plus quinque milia armatorum haberet neve elephantum ullum; bellum extra Macedoniae fines ne iniussu senatus 7 gereret; mille talentum daret populo Romano, dimi-

[1] deduceret et Kreyssig: duceret ut B.

[1] This is the probable meaning, though the Latin is obscure.

[2] In XXXII. xxxiv. 6 Philip asserts that he aided Prusias to capture this town; Polybius (XV. xxii), on the other hand, says that Philip took it. Livy's accounts are at least consistent with one another.

[3] The last two clauses are omitted by Polybius (XVIII. xliv), and seem not to have been observed.

Achaeans and Athenians arrived. The pleas of the Achaeans had more weight, because, if they did not obtain peace for the Boeotians, they had decided to join the war upon them.[1] Through the Achaeans an opportunity was gained for the Boeotians to visit and address the Roman, and they were ordered to hand over the criminals and pay thirty talents by way of fine, and were granted peace and the discontinuance of the siege. B.C. 196

XXX. A few days later the ten commissioners arrived from Rome, and with their approval peace was granted to Philip on these terms: that all the Greek cities which were in Europe or in Asia should enjoy their liberty and laws; that, whatever cities had been under the sway of Philip, from these Philip should withdraw his garrisons and should hand them over to the Romans, free of his troops, before the time of the Isthmian Games; that he should withdraw also from the following cities in Asia: Euromum and Pedasa and Bargyliae and Iasus and Myrina and Abydus and Thasos and Perinthus (for it was determined that these too should be free); that, regarding the liberation of the Ciani, Quinctius should write to Prusias, king of Bithynia, the decision of the senate and the ten commissioners;[2] that Philip should turn over to the Romans the prisoners and deserters, all his warships except five, and one royal galley of almost unmanageable size, which was propelled by sixteen tiers of oars; that he should have a maximum of five thousand soldiers and no elephants at all; that he should wage no war outside Macedonia without the permission of the senate;[3] that he should pay to the Roman people an indemnity of one thousand talents, half at dium praesens, dimidium pensionibus decem annorum.

A.U.C. 558

8 Valerius Antias quaternum milium pondo argenti vectigal in decem annos impositum regi tradit; Claudius in annos triginta quaterna milia pondo et 9 ducena,[1] in praesens[2] viginti milia pondo. Idem nominatim adiectum scribit, ne cum Eumene Attali
10 filio—novus is tum rex erat—bellum gereret. In haec obsides accepti, inter quos Demetrius Philippi filius. Adicit Antias Valerius Attalo absenti Aeginam 11 insulam elephantosque dono datos et Rhodiis Stratoniceam Cariaeque alias urbes quas Philippus tenuisset; Atheniensibus insulas datas Parum, Imbrum, Delum, Scyrum.

XXXI. Omnibus Graeciae civitatibus hanc pacem approbantibus soli Aetoli decretum decem legatorum
2 clam mussantes carpebant; litteras inanes vana specie libertatis adumbratas esse; cur enim alias Romanis tradi urbes nec nominari eas, alias nominari et sine
3 traditione liberas iuberi esse, nisi quod, quae in Asia sint, liberentur, longinquitate ipsa tutiores, quae in Graecia sint, ne nominatae quidem intercipiantur, Corinthus et Chalcis et Oreus cum Eretria et Deme-
4 triade? Nec tota ex vano criminatio erat. Dubitabatur enim de Corintho et Chalcide et Demetriade, quia in senatus consulto, quo missi decem legati ab urbe erant, ceterae Graeciae atque Asiae urbes haud
5 dubie liberabantur, de iis tribus urbibus legati, quod

[1] ducena Weissenborn: ducentum B.
[2] in praesens Madvig: praesens B.

[1] The talent is calculated to be the equivalent of eighty Roman pounds, so that the figures here given vary a good deal. Livy's account is that of Polybius (XVIII. xliv).

once and half in ten annual instalments. Valerius B.C. 196
Antias states that a tribute of four thousand pounds of silver annually for ten years was imposed upon the king; Claudius fixes the payments at four thousand two hundred pounds annually for thirty years and twenty thousand pounds immediately.[1] The same writer mentions an explicit provision that he should not wage war with Eumenes, son of Attalus—he was the new king there. Hostages were taken to insure performance, among them Demetrius, the son of Philip. Valerius Antias adds that the island of Aegina and the elephants were presented as a gift to Attalus, who was absent, that the Rhodians were given Stratonicea and other cities in Caria which Philip had held, and the Athenians the islands of Paros, Imbros, Delos, and Scyros.

XXXI. While all the Greek cities approved this settlement, only the Aetolians with secret grumblings criticized the decision of the ten commissioners: mere words had been trimmed up with the empty show of liberty; why were some cities delivered to the Romans without being named, others specified and ordered to be free without such delivery, unless the purpose was that those which were in Asia, being more secure by reason of their remoteness, should be set free, but those which were in Greece, not being named, should become Roman property, to wit, Corinth and Chalcis and Oreus along with Eretria and Demetrias? Their complaint was not altogether groundless. For there was some uncertainty with respect to Corinth and Chalcis and Demetrias, because in the decree of the senate, under which the ten commissioners were sent from Rome, the other cities of Greece and Asia were beyond question set free, but regarding these three tempora rei publicae postulassent, id e re publica

A.U.C. 558

6 fideque sua facere ac statuere iussi erant. Antiochus rex erat, quem transgressurum in Europam, cum primum ei vires suae satis placuissent, non dubitabant; ei tam opportunas ad occupandum patere urbes
7 nolebant. Ab Elatia profectus Quinctius Anticyram cum decem legatis, inde Corinthum traiecit. Ibi consilia de libertate Graeciae dies prope totos in 8 concilio decem legatorum agitabantur. Identidem Quinctius liberandam omnem Graeciam, si Aetolorum linguas retundere, si veram caritatem ac maiestatem
9 apud omnes nominis Romani vellent esse, si fidem facere ad liberandam Graeciam non ad transferendum
10 a Philippo ad se imperium sese mare traiecisse. Nihil contra ea de libertate urbium alii dicebant; ceterum ipsis tutius esse manere paulisper sub tutela praesidii Romani quam pro Philippo Antiochum dominum 11 accipere. Postremo ita decretum est: Corinthus redderetur Achaeis, ut in Acrocorintho tamen praesidium esset; Chalcidem ac Demetriadem retineri donec cura de Antiocho decessisset.

XXXII. Isthmiorum statum ludicrum aderat, semper quidem et alias frequens cum propter spectaculi studium insitum genti, quo certamina omnis generis
2 artium viriumque et pernicitatis visuntur, tum quia cities the commissioners were instructed to take such action as the public interest should have proved to demand, in accordance with the general good and their own sense of honour. There was King Antiochus, who, there was no doubt, would invade Europe as soon as his forces seemed adequate; they did not wish to leave these cities, so favourably located, open to his occupancy. Quinctius with the ten commissioners moved from Elatia to Anticyra and thence to Corinth. There plans for the liberation of Greece were discussed almost every day at meetings of the ten commissioners. Quinctius urged repeatedly that all Greece should be set free, if they wished to stop the muttering of the Aetolians and to create genuine affection and respect for the Roman name among all the Greeks, and if they wished to convince them that they had crossed the sea to liberate Greece and not to transfer dominion from Philip to themselves. The others said nothing opposed to this as regards the freedom of the cities, but they believed it safer for the Greeks themselves to remain for a while under the protection of Roman garrisons than to receive Antiochus as lord in place of Philip. Finally, this decision was reached: Corinth should be given over to the Achaeans, a garrison, however, to be retained in Acrocorinthus; Chalcis and Demetrias should be held until the anxiety about Antiochus should have passed. B.C. 196

XXXII. The appointed time of the Isthmian Games was at hand, a spectacle always, even on other occasions, attended by crowds, on account of the fondness, native to the race, for exhibitions in which there are trials of skill in every variety of art as well as of strength and swiftness of foot; moreover, they came because, on account of the favourable situation of the place, lying

A.U.C 554 propter opportunitatem loci, per duo diversa maria omnium rerum usus ministrantis humano generi, 3 concilium Asiae Graeciaeque is mercatus erat; tum vero non ad solitos modo usus undique convenerant, sed expectatione erecti, qui deinde status futurus Graeciae, quae sua fortuna esset; alii alia non taciti solum opinabantur, sed sermonibus etiam ferebant Romanos facturos; vix cuiquam persuadebatur Graecia 4 omni cessuros. Ad spectaculum consederant, et praeco cum tubicine, ut mos est, in mediam aream, unde sollemni carmine ludicrum indici solet, processit 5 et tuba silentio facto ita pronuntiat: "Senatus Romanus et T. Quinctius imperator Philippo rege Macedonibusque devictis liberos, immunes, suis legibus esse iubet Corinthios, Phocenses, Locrensesque omnes et insulam Euboeam et Magnetas, Thessalos, 6 Perrhaebos, Achaeos Phthiotas." Percensuerat omnes gentes quae sub dicione Philippi regis fuerant. Audita voce praeconis maius gaudium fuit quam quod univer- 7 sum homines acciperent. Vix satis credere se quisque audisse, et alii alios intueri mirabundi velut ad somni vanam speciem; quod ad quemque pertinebat, suarum aurium fidei minimum credentes, proximos interro- 8 gabant. Revocatus praeco, cum unusquisque non audire modo sed videre libertatis suae nuntium averet, 9 iterum pronuntiavit eadem. Tum ab certo iam between the two opposite seas and furnishing mankind with abundance of all wares, the market was a meeting-place for Asia and Greece. But at this time they had assembled from all quarters not only for the usual purposes, but especially because they were consumed with wonder what thenceforth the state of Greece would be, and what their own condition; they not only had their own silent thoughts, some believing one thing and others another, but discussed openly what the Romans would do; almost no one was convinced that they would withdraw from all Greece. They had taken their seats at the games and the herald with the trumpeter, as is the custom, had come forth into the midst of the arena, where the games are regularly opened with a ritual chant, and proclaiming silence with a trumpet-call, the herald read the decree: "The Roman senate and Titus Quinctius, imperator, having conquered King Philip and the Macedonians, declare to be free, independent, and subject to their own laws, the Corinthians, the Phocians, all the Locrians, the island of Euboea, the Magnesians, the Thessalians, the Perrhaebians, and the Phthiotic Achaeans." He had named all the states which had been subject to King Philip. When the herald's voice was heard there was rejoicing greater than men could grasp in its entirety. They could scarce believe that they had heard aright, and they looked at one another marvelling as at the empty vision of a dream; they asked their neighbours what concerned each one, unwilling to trust the evidence of their own ears. The herald was recalled, each one desiring not only to hear but to behold the man who brought the tidings of his freedom, and again the herald read the same decree. Then, when the ground B.C. 196

A.U.C. 566 gaudio tantus cum clamore plausus est ortus totiensque repetitus, ut facile appareret nihil omnium bonorum multitudini gratius quam libertatem esse. Ludicrum deinde ita raptim peractum est, ut nullius nec animi nec oculi spectaculo intenti essent; adeo unum gaudium praeoccupaverat omnium aliarum sensum voluptatium.

XXXIII. Ludis vero dimissis cursu prope omnes tendere ad imperatorem Romanum, ut ruente turba in unum adire, contingere dextram cupientium, coronas lemniscosque iacientium haud procul periculo fuerit. Sed erat trium ferme et triginta annorum, et cum robur iuventae tum gaudium ex tam insigni gloriae fructu vires suppeditabat. Nec praesens tantummodo effusa est laetitia, sed per multos dies gratis et cogitationibus et sermonibus renovata: esse aliquam in terris gentem quae sua inpensa, suo labore ac periculo bella gerat pro libertate aliorum nec hoc finitimis aut propinquae vicinitatis hominibus aut terris continentibus iunctis praestet, sed maria traiciat, ne quod toto orbe terrarum iniustum imperium sit, ubique ius, fas, lex potentissima sint. Una voce praeconis liberatas omnis Graeciae atque Asiae urbes; hoc spe concipere audacis animi fuisse, ad effectum adducere et virtutis et fortunae ingentis.

XXXIV. Secundum Isthmia Quinctius et decem legati legationes regum gentiumque audivere. Primi omnium regis Antiochi vocati legati sunt. Iis eadem for their joy was certain, such a storm of applause began and was so often repeated[1] that it was easily apparent that of all blessings none pleases a throng more than liberty. The contests were then rapidly finished, no man's eyes or thoughts being fixed upon the sight; joy alone had so completely replaced their perception of all other delightful things. B.C. 196

[1] Valerius Maximus (IV. viii. 5) naïvely says that the loud and prolonged shouting produced air-pockets into which the birds flying above the arena dropped!

XXXIII. When the games were over, almost everyone rushed towards the Roman commander, so that he was endangered by the crowd that rushed to one place, desiring to draw near him, to touch his hand, and showering garlands and chaplets upon him. But he was only about thirty-three years old, and both the vigour of youth and the joy he felt at so remarkable a reward of fame gave him strength. Nor did the rejoicing spend itself at once, but was renewed for many days in thoughts and expressions of gratitude: there was one people in the world which would fight for others' liberties at its own cost, to its own peril and with its own toil, not limiting its guaranties of freedom to its neighbours, to men of the immediate vicinity, or to countries that lay close at hand, but ready to cross the sea that there might be no unjust empire anywhere and that everywhere justice, right, and law might prevail. By the single voice of a herald, they said, all the cities of Greece and Asia had been set free; to conceive hopes of any such thing as this required a bold mind; to bring it to pass was the proof of immense courage and good fortune as well.

XXXIV. After the Isthmian Games Quinctius and the ten commissioners received the embassies from the kings and states. First of all, the representatives of King Antiochus were summoned. As they made about the same deceptive speech that they had fere quae Romae egerant verba sine fide rerum iactan-3 tibus nihil iam perplexe, ut ante, cum dubiae res incolumi Philippo erant, sed aperte denuntiatum, ut excederet Asiae urbibus, quae Philippi aut Ptolomaei regum fuissent, abstineret liberis civitatibus, neu quam[1] lacesseret armis: et in pace et in libertate

A.U.C. 558

4 esse debere omnes ubique Graecas urbes. Ante omnia denuntiatum ne in Europam aut ipse transiret aut
5 copias traiceret. Dimissis regis legatis conventus civitatum gentiumque est haberi coeptus; eoque maturius peragebatur, quod decreta decem legatorum
6 in civitates[2] nominatim pronuntiabantur. Orestis—Macedonum ea gens est—quod primi ab rege defecissent, suae leges redditae. Magnetes et Perrhaebi et 7 Dolopes liberi quoque pronuntiati. Thessalorum genti praeter libertatem concessam Achaei Phthiotae dati, Thebis Phthioticis et Pharsalo excepta. Aetolos de Pharsalo et Leucade postulantes ut ex foedere sibi
8 restituerentur ad senatum reiecerunt. Phocenses Locrensesque, sicut ante fuerant, adiecta decreti
9 auctoritate iis contribuerunt. Corinthus et Triphylia et Heraea—Peloponnesi et ipsa urbs est—reddita 10 Achaeis. Oreum et Eretriam decem legati Eumeni regi, Attali filio, dabant dissentiente Quinctio; ea una res in arbitrium senatus reiecta est; senatus libertatem his civitatibus dedit Carysto adiecta.

[1] neu quam Madvig: ne umquam B.
[2] in civitates Crévier: ciuitates B.

previously made at Rome, no ambiguous answer was B.C. 196
now given, as on the former occasion, when the future was uncertain and Philip was unconquered, but clear warning was given him, to withdraw from the cities in Asia which had belonged to King Philip or King Ptolemy, to keep his hands off the free states and molest none of them in war: all the Greek cities everywhere must enjoy both peace and liberty. Before all, he was warned not to cross to Europe in person nor to send troops there. After the departure of the king's ambassadors, a council of the cities and states began, and its work was accomplished the more speedily because the decisions of the ten commissioners were addressed to the states by name. To the Orestae —that is a tribe of the Macedonians—their own laws were restored, because they had been the first to revolt against the king. The Magnesians, Perrhaebians, and Dolopians were likewise declared free. The Thessalian people, in addition to receiving their liberty, were granted the Phthiotic Achaeans with the exception of Phthiotic Thebes and Pharsalus. The Aetolians demanded that Pharsalus and Leucas should be restored to them in accordance with the treaty, and their petition was referred to the senate. The Phocians and the Locrians were annexed to them, as they had formerly been, the sanction of a decree having been added, Corinth and Triphylia and Heraea—this too is a city in the Peloponnesus—were given back to the Achaeans. Oreus and Eretria the ten commissioners gave to King Eumenes, the son of Attalus, despite the protests of Quinctius; this one question was referred to the decision of the senate; the senate bestowed freedom upon these states, with the addition of Carystus. Lychnidus 11 Pleurato Lychnidus et Parthini dati; Illyriorum utraque gens sub dicione Philippi fuerant. Amynandrum tenere iusserunt castella quae per belli tempus Philippo capta ademisset.

A.U.C. 558

XXXV. Dimisso conventu decem legati, partiti munia inter se, ad liberandas suae quisque regionis civitates 2 discesserunt, P. Lentulus Bargylias, L. Stertinius Hephaestiam et Thasum et Thraeciae urbes, P. Villius et L. Terentius ad regem Antiochum, Cn. Cornelius 3 ad Philippum. Qui [1] de minoribus rebus editis mandatis percunctatus, si consilium non utile solum sed 4 etiam salutare admittere auribus posset, cum rex gratias quoque se acturum diceret, si quid quod in 5 rem suam esset expromeret, magno opere ei suasit, quoniam pacem impetrasset, ad societatem amici- 6 tiamque petendam mitteret Romam legatos, ne, si quid Antiochus moveret, expectasse et temporum opportunitates captasse ad rebellandum videri posset. 7 Ad Tempe Thessalica Philippus est conventus. Qui cum se missurum extemplo legatos respondisset, 8 Cornelius Thermopylas, ubi frequens Graeciae statis diebus esse solet conventus—Pylaicum [2] appellant— 9 venit; Aetolos praecipue monuit constanter et fideliter 10 in amicitia populi Romani permanerent. Aetolorum principes alii leniter questi sunt quod non idem erga suam gentem Romanorum animus esset post victoriam 11 qui in bello fuisset, alii ferocius incusarunt expro-

[1] qui Gronovius: cui B.

[2] conventus—Pylaicum ed. Frobeniana 1531: Pylai conuentus B: conventus, Phylaicum ed. Moguntina 1518.

---

[1] For the Pylaic Council and its possible identity with the Amphictyonic Council, see XXXI. xxxii, 3 and the note.

and the Parthini were given to Pleuratus; both of B.C. 196 these Illyrian states had been under the control of Philip. They directed Amynander to hold the forts which he had taken from Philip during the period of the war.

XXXV. After the dismissal of the council the ten commissioners, dividing up the tasks among themselves, went their several ways, each to liberate the cities in his own territory. Publius Lentulus went to Bargyliae, Lucius Stertinius to Hephaestia and Thasos and the cities of Thrace, Publius Villius and Lucius Terentius to King Antiochus, Gnaeus Cornelius to Philip. He, after performing the less important tasks assigned him, asked the king whether he was disposed to listen to advice that was both sound and profitable. When the king replied that he would receive it gratefully, if he suggested anything advantageous to him, Cornelius urged him earnestly, now that he had been granted peace, to send ambassadors to Rome to ask for a treaty of alliance and friendship, lest, if Antiochus made any disturbance, he might seem to have dallied and to have watched for an opportunity to revolt. The meeting with Philip took place at Thessalian Tempe. When he had replied that he would at once send ambassadors, Cornelius went to Thermopylae, where a full meeting of the states of Greece is held on stated days—they call this the Pylaic council;[1] the Aetolians especially he advised to abide resolutely and faithfully by the alliance with the Roman people. Some of the Aetolian leaders complained mildly that the attitude of the Romans towards their people was not the same after their victory as it had been during the war, others more loudly reproached and taunted them, saying braruntque non modo vinci sine Aetolis Philippum, sed ne transire quidem in Graeciam Romanos potuisse. 12 Adversus ea respondere, ne in altercationem excederet res, cum supersedisset Romanus, omnia eos aequa impetraturos si Romam misissent dixit. Itaque ex auctoritate eius decreti legati sunt. Hunc finem bellum cum Philippo habuit.

A.U.C. 558

XXXVI. Cum haec in Graecia Macedoniaque et Asia gererentur, Etruriam infestam prope coniuratio 2 servorum fecit. Ad quaerendam opprimendamque eam M'. Acilius Glabrio praetor, cui inter cives peregrinosque iurisdictio obtigerat, cum una ex duabus legione urbana est missus, alios . . . ,[1] alios iam[2] congregatos pugnando vicit; ex his multi occisi, multi 3 capti; alios verberatos crucibus adfixit, qui principes coniurationis fuerant, alios dominis restituit.

4 Consules in provincias profecti sunt. Marcellum Boiorum ingressum fines fatigato per diem totum milite via facienda castra in tumulo quodam ponentem Corolamus quidam, regulus Boiorum, cum magna 5 manu adortus ad tria milia hominum occidit; et illustres viri aliquot in illo tumultuario proelio ceciderunt, inter quos praefecti socium T. Sempronius Gracchus et M. Iunius Silanus et tribuni militum de 6 legione secunda M. Ogulnius et P. Claudius. Castra tamen ab Romanis impigre permunita retentaque, cum hostes prospera pugna elati nequiquam oppugnas- 7 sent. Stativis deinde iisdem per dies aliquot sese

[1] lacunam indic. Madvig.
[2] alios iam Madvig: iam B.

[1] This is a guess at the meaning of the lost text.

that Philip could not have been conquered without B.C. 196
the Aetolians, and, more than that, the Romans could not even have crossed to Greece. The Roman, after declining to reply to this, lest the argument degenerate into a quarrel, said that they would obtain full justice if they appealed to Rome. Therefore, on his suggestion, ambassadors were decided upon. This was the end of the war with Philip.

XXXVI. While these events were taking place in Greece, Macedonia, and Asia, a slave insurrection rendered Etruria almost a battle-field. Manius Acilius Glabrio, the praetor exercising jurisdiction in cases between citizens and aliens, was sent with one of the two city legions to investigate and suppress it, and destroyed part of them, cutting them off in detail,[1] part of them by encountering them in a body; many of them were killed and many captured; some, who had been the instigators of the revolt, he scourged and crucified, others he turned over to their masters.

The consuls departed to their provinces. As Marcellus was entering the territory of the Boi, and was pitching camp on a certain hill, his troops being exhausted by building roads all the day, a chieftain of the Boi, Corolamus by name, fell upon him with a large force and killed about three thousand of his men; some distinguished men fell in that surprise attack, among them Titus Sempronius Gracchus and Marcus Iunius Silanus, commanders of allied detachments, and Marcus Ogulnius and Publius Claudius, military tribunes of the second legion. The camp, however, was strongly fortified and stubbornly held by the Romans, when the enemy, elated by their victory, had assaulted it in vain. For some days after that he remained in the same camp, while he was treating the wounded tenuit, dum et saucios curaret et a tanto[1] terrore animos militum reficeret. Boi, ut est gens minime ad morae taedium ferendum patiens, in castella sua vicosque passim dilapsi sunt. Marcellus Pado confestim traiecto in agrum Comensem, ubi Insubres Comensibus ad arma excitis castra habebant, legiones ducit. Galli, feroces Boiorum ante dies paucos pugna, in ipso itinere proelium committunt; et primo adeo acriter invaserunt ut antesignanos impulerint. Quod ubi Marcellus animadvertit, veritus ne moti semel pellerentur, cohortem Marsorum cum opposuisset, equitum Latinorum omnes turmas in hostem emisit. Quorum cum primus secundusque impetus rettudisset inferentem se ferociter hostem, confirmata et reliqua acies Romana restitit primo, deinde signa acriter intulit. Nec ultra sustinuere certamen Galli quin terga verterent atque effuse fugerent. In eo proelio supra quadraginta milia hominum caesa Valerius Antias scribit, octoginta[2] septem signa militaria capta et carpenta septingenta triginta duo et aureos torques multos, ex quibus unum magni ponderis Claudius in Capitolio Iovi donum in aede positum scribit. Castra eo die Gallorum expugnata direptaque, et Comum oppidum post dies paucos captum. Castella inde duodetriginta ad consulem defecerunt. Id quoque inter scriptores ambigitur, utrum in Boios prius an Insubres consul exercitum duxerit adversamque prospera pugna oblitteraverit, an victoria ad Comum parta deformata clade in Bois accepta sit.

A.U.C. 558

XXXVII. Sub haec tam varia fortuna gesta L.

[1] a tanto Gronovius: tanto B.
[2] octoginta Kreyssig: octingenta B.

and restoring the courage of his men after so serious B.C. 196 an alarm. The Boi—a people intolerant of the tiresomeness of delay—gradually dispersed to their forts and towns. Marcellus quickly crossed the Po and led the legions into the district of Comum, where the Insubres were encamped after calling the Comenses to arms. The Gauls, encouraged by the success of the Boi a few days before, attacked while still in march formation, and their first charge was so vigorous that it drove in the Roman front line. When Marcellus observed this and feared that once broken they would be routed, he threw in a cohort of the Marsi and then sent all the squadrons of the Latin cavalry against the enemy. Their first and second charges dulled the edge of the enemy's spirited attack, and the rest of the Roman line, with renewed courage, first resisted and then charged fiercely. The Gauls did not continue the contest longer, but turned and fled in all directions. Valerius Antias writes that more than forty thousand men perished in that battle, and that eighty-seven standards were taken and seven hundred and thirty-two wagons and many necklaces of gold, one of which, of great weight, Claudius says was deposited in the temple on the Capitoline as a gift to Jupiter. The Gallic camp was captured and plundered that day, and the town of Comum was taken a few days later. After that, twenty-eight strongholds went over to the consul. This question, too, is debated by the writers, whether the consul led his army against the Boi first or the Insubres, and whether the victory wiped out the memory of the defeat or the success gained at Comum was marred by the defeat among the Boi.

XXXVII. During this period of alternating fortunes the other consul Lucius Furius Purpurio

A.U.C. 558

Furius Purpurio alter consul per tribum Sapiniam in 2 Boios venit. Iam castro Mutilo appropinquabat cum, veritus ne intercluderetur simul a Bois Liguribusque, exercitum eadem via qua adduxerat reduxit et magno circuitu per aperta eoque tuta loca ad collegam per-
3 venit. Inde iunctis exercitibus primum Boiorum agrum usque ad Felsinam oppidum populantes per-
4 agraverunt. Ea urbs ceteraque circa castella et Boi fere omnes praeter iuventutem, quae praedandi causa in armis erat—tunc in devias silvas recesserat—in deditionem venerunt. In Ligures inde traductus
5 exercitus. Boi neglegentius coactum agmen Romanorum, quia ipsi procul abesse viderentur, improviso aggressuros se rati per occultos saltus secuti sunt.
6 Quos non adepti, Pado repente navibus traiecto Laevos Libuosque cum pervastassent, redeuntes inde per Ligurum extremos fines cum agresti praeda in
7 agmen incidunt Romanum. Proelium celerius acriusque commissum quam si tempore locoque ad certamen
8 destinato praeparatis animis concurrissent. Ibi, quantam vim ad stimulandos animos ira haberet, apparuit; nam ita caedis magis quam victoriae avidi pugnarunt Romani, ut vix nuntium cladis hosti relinquerent.
9 Ob has res gestas consulum litteris Romam adlatis supplicatio in triduum decreta est. Brevi post Marcellus consul Romam venit, triumphusque ei magno invaded the territory of the Boi by way of the tribus B.C. 196 Sapinia.[1] When he was already approaching the fortified town of Mutilum, fearing that he would be cut off by the Boi and Insubres together, he led the army back by the same way he had come, and after a long roundabout march through country that was open, and therefore safe, he joined his colleague. Thenceforth with united forces they penetrated first the Boian territory as far as Felsina, plundering as they went. This city and all the forts in the neighbourhood and all the Boi except the men of military age, who were in arms in the hope of plunder—they had at this time retired into the pathless forests—surrendered. The army was then led against the Ligures. The Boi, with the intention of falling suddenly upon the Roman column, which would not be under strict discipline, since the Boi would be believed to be far away, followed by secret paths. Failing to overtake them, and suddenly crossing the Po in boats, when they had laid waste the country of the Laevi and Libui, and were returning from there loaded with the spoils of the country along the edges of the Ligurian territory, they encountered the Roman column. A battle began, more sudden and furious than if they had clashed with minds prepared to fight at a predetermined time and place. There it was apparent how much stimulus passion can apply to courage; for the Romans fought with so much greater desire for slaughter than for victory that they left the enemy hardly a messenger to tell of the defeat. By reason of these achievements, when the letters of the consuls were received in Rome, the senate decreed a thanksgiving of three days. A little later the consul Marcellus arrived in Rome, and was voted a

[1] See XXXI. ii. 6 and note.

A.U.C. 558

10 consensu patrum est decretus. Triumphavit in magistratu de Insubribus Comensibusque; Boiorum triumphi spem collegae reliquit, quia ipsi proprie adversa pugna 11 in ea gente evenerat, cum collega secunda. Multa spolia hostium captivis carpentis travecta, multa militaria signa; aeris lata trecenta viginti milia, argenti bigati ducenta triginta quattuor milia. In 12 pedites singulos dati octogeni aeris, triplex equiti centurionique.

XXXVIII. Eodem anno Antiochus rex, cum hibernasset Ephesi, omnes Asiae civitates in antiquam
2 imperii formulam redigere est conatus. Et ceteras quidem, aut quia locis planis positae erant aut quia parum moenibus armisque ac iuventuti fidebant,
3 haud difficulter videbat iugum accepturas; Zmyrna et Lampsacus libertatem usurpabant, periculumque erat ne, si concessum iis foret quod intenderent, Zmyrnam in Aeolide Ioniaque, Lampsacum in Helles-
4 ponto aliae[1] urbes sequerentur. Igitur et ipse ab Epheso ad Zmyrnam obsidendam misit et quae Abydi copiae erant praesidio tantum modico relicto duci ad
5 Lampsacum oppugnandam iussit. Nec vi tantum terrebat, sed per legatos leniter adloquendo castigandoque temeritatem ac pertinaciam spem cona-
6 batur facere, brevi quod peterent habituros, sed cum satis et ipsis et omnibus aliis appareret, ab rege

[1] aliae ed. Frobeniana 1531 : aliquae B.

---

[1] There is no indication that Furius received a triumph, and this fact has been used to discredit the account of his earlier triumph. See the note to XXXI. xlvii. 4 above.

[2] This spelling is attested by the Livy MSS. and by MSS. in general.

triumph with the complete agreement of the senators. B.C. 196
While still in office he triumphed over the Ligures and Comenses; the hope of a triumph over the Boi he left to his colleague, because he personally had suffered defeat at the hands of that people, but had been victorious when associated with his colleague.[1] Many spoils of the enemy were transported in captured carts, and many standards; three hundred and twenty thousand asses of bronze and two hundred and thirty-four thousand pieces of coined silver were carried. Each infantryman was given eighty asses, each cavalryman and centurion thrice that sum.

XXXVIII. In the same year King Antiochus, after wintering at Ephesus, tried to coerce all the cities of Asia into acknowledging the sovereignty which he had once exercised over them. And he saw that the others, either because they were situated on level ground, or because they did not trust their walls or their weapons or their fighting men, would readily accept his yoke; Zmyrna [2] and Lampsacus were contending for their independence, and there was danger that if they were allowed what they demanded, other cities in Aeolis and Ionia would follow the example of Zmyrna, those on the Hellespont, of Lampsacus. He therefore sent troops from Ephesus to invest Zmyrna and ordered his troops at Abydus to leave only a small guard there and march to attack Lampsacus. Nor did he seek only to frighten them by this show of force, but also through the mouths of his agents by courteous address and mild reproach for their rashness and stubbornness, to create the hope that they would soon have what they desired, but only when it was clear both to them and to everyone else that their liberty had been granted by the king

A.U.C. 558

impetratam eos libertatem, non per occasionem raptam 7 habere. Adversus quae respondebatur, nihil neque mirari neque suscensere Antiochum debere, si spem libertatis differri non satis aequo animo paterentur.
8 Ipse initio veris navibus ab Epheso profectus Hellespontum petit, terrestres copias traici ab Abydo Cher-9 sonesum iussit. Cum ad Madytum, Chersonesi urbem, terrestri navalem exercitum iunxisset, quia clauserant portas, circumdedit moenia armatis; et iam opera admoventi deditio facta est. Idem metus Sestum incolentes aliasque Chersonesi urbes in deditionem 10 dedit. Lysimachiam inde omnibus simul navalibus terrestribusque copiis venit. Quam cum desertam 11 ac stratam prope omnem ruinis invenisset—ceperant autem direptamque incenderant Thraces paucis ante annis—cupido eum restituendi nobilem urbem et loco 12 sitam opportuno cepit. Itaque omnia simul est aggressus et tecta murosque restituere et partim redimere servientes Lysimachenses, partim fuga sparsos per Hellespontum Chersonesumque conquirere et 13 contrahere, partim novos colonos spe commodorum 14 proposita adscribere et omni modo frequentare; simul, ut Thracum summoveretur metus, ipse parte dimidia terrestrium copiarum ad depopulanda proxima Thraciae est profectus, partem navalesque omnes socios reliquit in operibus reficiendae urbis.

XXXIX. Sub hoc tempore et L. Cornelius, missus ab senatu ad dirimenda inter Antiochum Ptolomae-and not attained through mere grasping at oppor- B.C. 196

tunity. To this they responded that Antiochus should be neither surprised nor angry if they were not inclined to submit with indifference to their hope of liberty being deferred. At the beginning of spring Antiochus himself left Ephesus with his fleet and sailed for the Hellespont and ordered his land forces to be transported from Abydus to Chersonesus. When he had united his army and navy at Madytus, a city in the Chersonesus, since the people had closed their gates, he surrounded the walls with armed men; and the town surrendered as he was on the point of moving forward his engines. Fear of the same fate caused the people of Sestus and other towns of the Chersonesus to yield. Thence he proceeded with all his forces, naval and military alike, to Lysimachia. When he had found it almost entirely abandoned and in ruins (the Thracians had captured, plundered, and burned it a few years before), he was seized by the desire of rebuilding a city so famed and so advantageously situated. Therefore he undertook everything at once; to rebuild the houses and walls, to ransom some of the Lysimachenses who were in slavery, to seek out and bring back some of them who had scattered in flight through the Hellespont and Chersonesus, to attract new colonists by the prospects of advantage held out to them, and to populate the city in every possible manner; at the same time, in order to dispel their fear of the Thracians, he set out in person with half his land forces to devastate the neighbouring parts of Thrace, leaving the rest and all the naval allies engaged in the work of rebuilding the city.

XXXIX. At this time, too, Lucius Cornelius, sent by the senate to arbitrate the difference between the

A.U.C. 558

2 umque reges certamina, Selymbriae substitit, et decem legatorum P. Lentulus a Bargyliis, P. Villius et L. Terentius ab Thaso Lysimachiam petierunt. Eodem et ab Selymbria L. Cornelius et ex Thracia paucos 3 post diebus Antiochus convenerunt. Primus congressus cum legatis et deinceps invitatio benigna et hospitalis fuit; ut de mandatis statuque praesenti 4 Asiae agi coeptum est, animi exasperati sunt. Romani omnia acta eius, ex quo tempore ab Syria classem solvisset, displicere senatui non dissimulabant restituique et Ptolomaeo omnes civitates quae dicionis 5 eius fuissent aequum censebant; nam quod ad eas civitates attineret quas a Philippo possessas Antiochus per occasionem, averso Philippo in Romanum bellum, 6 intercepisset, id vero ferendum non esse, Romanos per tot annos terra marique tanta pericula ac labores 7 exhausisse, Antiochum belli praemia habere. Sed ut in Asiam adventus eius dissimulari ab Romanis tamquam nihil ad eos pertinens potuerit, quid? Quod iam etiam in Europam omnibus navalibus terrestribusque copiis transierit, quantum a bello aperte Romanis indicto abesse? Illum quidem, etiam si in Italiam traiciat, negaturum; Romanos autem non expectaturos, ut id posset facere.

XL. Adversus ea Antiochus mirari se dixit Romanos tam diligenter inquirere quid regi Antiocho faciendum aut quousque terra marique progrediendum fuerit, kings, Antiochus and Ptolemy, stopped at Selymbria, B.C. 196 and some of the ten commissioners, Publius Lentulus from Bargyliae and Publius Villius and Lucius Terentius from Thasos, came to Lysimachia. Also, Lucius Cornelius from Selymbria and Antiochus from Thrace arrived there a few days later. There was a preliminary meeting with the ambassadors and then a kindly and hospitable reception, but when the debate over their instructions and the present situation in Asia began, there were displays of temper. The Romans did not conceal the fact that his conduct, from the time he set sail from Syria, was displeasing to the senate, and they also deemed it right that all the cities which had belonged to Ptolemy should be restored to him; for, as regards the cities formerly held by Philip, which Antiochus had taken the opportunity to seize while Philip was engaged in the Roman war, they regarded it as surely unendurable that the Romans should have suffered so many toils and dangers for so many years on land and sea and that Antiochus should carry off the prizes of war. But, granting that the Romans pretended to ignore his advance into Asia as an act which did not concern them, what then? What of the fact that he was even then crossing into Europe with all his fleets and armies, and how far did that differ from an open declaration of war on the Romans? He, of course, would deny it, even if he crossed into Italy, but the Romans would not wait for him to have the power to do this.

XL. To this Antiochus replied that he was surprised that the Romans were making such diligent inquiry into what King Antiochus should do or how far he should advance by land or sea, and that they

A.U.C. 558

2 ipsos non cogitare Asiam nihil ad se pertinere, nec magis illis inquirendum esse quid Antiochus in Asia, quam Antiocho quid in Italia populus Romanus faciat. 3 Quod ad Ptolomaeum attineat, cui ademptas civitates querantur, sibi cum Ptolomaeo et amicitiam esse, et 4 id agere ut brevi etiam adfinitas iungatur. Ne ex[1] Philippi quidem adversa fortuna spolia ulla se petisse aut adversus Romanos in Europam traiecisse; sed qua Lysimachi quondam regnum fuerit, quo victo omnia quae illius fuissent iure belli Seleuci facta sint, 5 existimare suae dicionis esse. Occupatis maioribus suis rerum aliarum cura primo quaedam ex iis Ptolomaeum, inde et Philippum usurpanda aliena[2] posses- 6 sionis causa tenuisse. Chersonesus quidem et proxima Thraciae quae circa Lysimachiam sint quem dubitare quin Lysimachi fuerint? Ad ea recipienda in antiquum ius venisse et Lysimachiam deletam Thracum

[1] ne ex Bekker: nec ex B.
[2] usurpanda aliena Madvig: usurpandae alienae B.

---

[1] In 193 B.C. (XXXV. xiii. 4) Ptolemy married the daughter of Antiochus: preliminary arrangements for this may have been under way at this time.

It may be noted that just as Antiochus silenced the Rhodian ambassadors by quoting to them the complimentary speeches of Rome (see xx. 8 above), so he now silences the Romans by quoting to them a treaty of which they, apparently, knew nothing before and which weakened their case a good deal. Open covenants would have saved the free-speaking Romans a good deal of embarrassment in the east.

[2] One of Alexander's generals, who had carved out a kingdom for himself in this region. He was defeated by Seleucus, founder of the Seleucid dynasty, to which Antiochus belonged, in 281 B.C. (XXXIV. lviii. 5; Justin XVII. l).

[3] See xxxviii. 1 above.

did not see that Asia was no concern of theirs, and B.C. 196 that they had no more right to ask what Antiochus was doing in Asia than Antiochus had to ask what the Roman people was doing in Italy. So far as Ptolemy was concerned, the loss of whose cities was a subject of complaint, he already had a treaty of friendship with Ptolemy and was taking steps which would soon lead to a tie of relationship as well.[1] He had not even taken advantage of Philip's ill fortune to seize and plunder, nor had he entered Europe to threaten the Romans; but all the country which had once been the kingdom of Lysimachus,[2] and which, on his defeat, had passed with his other possessions into the hands of Seleucus by right of conquest, he considered his own. While his forefathers were busy with the disposition of other matters, possession of some of these towns had been seized, first by Ptolemy,[3] then by Philip,[4] usurping the property-rights of others.[5] Who could doubt that Lysimachus had been lord of the Chersonesus and the neighbouring parts of Thrace which are around Lysimachia? He himself had come only to recover his ancient possessions and to found anew Lysimachia, [4] See XXXI. xvi. 4. Antiochus had apparently suffered along with Ptolemy from the depredations committed by Philip under the authority of the treaty which he had made with Antiochus to plunder the young Ptolemy (see the Introductory Note).

[5] In XXXV. xvi. the argument turns on the Roman legal doctrine of possessio (the unchallenged occupancy of a piece of property for a specified period), which under certain conditions could confer a valid title. Antiochus means that Ptolemy and Philip had violently interrupted his own possessio and had thus robbed him of property which he was trying to recover. The propriety of attributing to Antiochus this much acquaintance with Roman law might be questioned.

A.U.C. 558

impetu de integro condere, ut Seleucus filius eam sedem regni habeat.

XLI. His disceptationibus per dies aliquot habitis rumor sine ullo satis certo auctore allatus de morte Ptolomaei regis, ut nullus exitus imponeretur sermoni- 2 bus effecit. Nam et dissimulabat pars utraque se audisse, et L. Cornelius, cui legatio ad duos reges, Antiochum Ptolomaeumque, mandata erat, spatium modici temporis ad conveniendum Ptolomaeum pete- 3 bat, ut, priusquam moveretur aliquid in nova possessione regni, praeveniret in Aegyptum, et Antiochus suam fore Aegyptum, si tum occupasset, censebat. 4 Itaque dimissis Romanis relictoque Seleuco filio cum 5 terrestribus copiis ad restituendam ut instituerat Lysimachiam, ipse omni classe navigat Ephesum, legatis ad Quinctium missis, qui ad fidem faciendam nihil novaturum regem de societate agerent. Oram Asiae legens pervenit in Lyciam, Patarisque cognito vivere Ptolomaeum navigandi quidem in Aegyptum 6 omissum consilium est; Cyprum nihilo minus petens, cum Chelidoniarum promunturium superasset, paulisper seditione remigum est retentus in Pamphylia 7 circa Eurymedontem amnem. Inde profectum eum ad capita quae vocant Sari fluminis foeda tempestas adorta prope cum omni classe demersit. Multae fractae, multae eiectae naves, multae ita haustae mari 8 ut nemo in terram enaverit. Magna vis hominum ibi interiit, non remigum modo militumque ignotae turbae destroyed by the attack of the Thracians, that his son Seleucus might make it the capital of his kingdom. B.C. 196

XLI. They had spent some days in such debates when an unauthenticated rumour that King Ptolemy was dead caused no conclusion to be reached by their conversations. For each party pretended not to have heard it, and Lucius Cornelius, to whom had been entrusted the embassy to the two kings, Antiochus and Ptolemy, requested an adjournment of a short time, that he might visit Ptolemy, his purpose being that he might arrive in Egypt before any revolution should occur while the throne was changing hands, while Antiochus believed that Egypt would be his if he should have succeeded in gaining possession of it at this time. So he dismissed the Romans, leaving his son Seleucus with the army to rebuild Lysimachia according to plan, and himself sailed for Ephesus with his entire fleet, sending ambassadors to Quinctius to say, with a view to creating confidence, that the king would do nothing to modify their alliance. Skirting the coast of Asia, he came to Lycia, and learning at Patara that Ptolemy was alive, he gave up his design of sailing to Egypt; nevertheless, he set out for Cyprus, and when he had passed the promontory of Chelidoniae, he was delayed for a while in Pamphylia near the mouth of the Eurymedon river by a mutiny among his rowers. When he resumed his voyage and was off the mouth of the river which they call Sarus, a terrific storm almost overwhelmed him and his whole fleet. Many ships were wrecked, many driven ashore, many so swallowed up in the sea that no one escaped to the shore. A large number of men perished, not only rowers and the nameless mass of soldiers, but some of the nobles,

A.U.C. 558

9 sed etiam insignium regis amicorum. Collectis reliquiis naufragii, cum res non in eo essent ut Cyprum temptaret, minus opulento agmine quam profectus erat, Seleuciam rediit. Ibi subduci navibus iussis—iam enim et hiems instabat—ipse in hiberna Antiochiam concessit. In hoc statu regum erant res.

XLII. Romae eo primum anno tresviri epulones facti C. Licinius Lucullus tribunus plebis, qui legem de creandis iis tulerat, et P. Manlius et P. Porcius Laeca. Iis triumviris item ut pontificibus [1] lege 2 datum est togae praetextae habendae ius. Sed magnum certamen cum omnibus sacerdotibus eo anno fuit quaestoribus urbanis, Q. Fabio Labeoni et L. 3 Aurelio. Pecunia opus erat quod ultimam pensionem pecuniae in bellum collatae persolvi placuerat privatis. 4 Quaestores ab auguribus pontificibusque quod stipendium per bellum non contulissent petebant. Ab sacerdotibus tribuni plebis nequiquam appellati, omniumque annorum per quos non dederant exactum 5 est. Eodem anno duo mortui pontifices, novique in eorum locum suffecti, M. Marcellus consul in locum C. Semproni Tuditani, qui praetor in Hispania deces-

[1] pontificibus Pighius: pontifici B.

[1] A college of three (later seven) priests, entrusted with the responsibility of conducting the feasts of the gods (see note on XXXI. viii. 2). Election of members now replaces the older method of co-optation, under which each college filled vacancies in its own ranks.

[2] The toga worn by the ordinary citizen was of white or natural-coloured wool. This purple-bordered toga was reserved to boys who had not reached manhood (at which time they put on the ordinary toga) and to civil and religious dignitaries.

[3] These were minor magistrates responsible for the care of public funds.

friends of the king. Collecting the remnants left B.C. 196 from the wreck, and being in no condition to try an expedition to Cyprus, he returned to Seleucia with a train less rich than that with which he had set out. There he ordered the ships to be hauled up on land —for winter was now at hand—and went into winter quarters at Antioch. The affairs of the kings were in this state.

XLII. At Rome, in this year for the first time, the tresviri epulones[1] were elected—Gaius Licinius Lucullus, tribune of the people, who had proposed the law for their election, Publius Manlius, and Publius Porcius Laeca. These triumvirs, like the pontiffs, were given the right to wear the toga praetexta.[2] But a bitter struggle broke out that year between the whole body of priests and the city quaestors,[3] Quintus Fabius Labeo and Lucius Aurelius. Money was needed because it had been decided to pay to the private lenders the last instalment of the money contributed for the war.[4] The quaestors demanded it of the augurs and pontiffs because they had not paid the taxes during the war. The priests appealed in vain to the tribunes of the people, and the money was collected for the whole period in which it had not been paid.[5] In the same year two pontiffs died and new ones were appointed in their place, the consul Marcus Marcellus to replace Gaius Sempronius Tuditanus, who had fallen while serving as praetor in Spain, and Lucius

[4] See XXXI. xiii. 2–9 and the note.

[5] Exemption from the payment of taxes seems not to have been a prerogative of the priesthoods. Perhaps in the confusion of the war period, they had for a time evaded payment, and had continued to do so after the war closed. At this time collection in full of all back-taxes was made: this seems to be the implication of the words omnium annorum.

A.U.C. 558

serat, et L. Valerius Flaccus in locum M. Corneli
6 Cethegi. Et Q. Fabius Maximus augur mortuus est admodum adulescens, priusquam ullum magistratum caperet; nec eo anno augur in eius locum est suffectus.
7 Comitia inde consularia habita a M. Marcello consule. Creati consules L. Valerius Flaccus et M. Porcius Cato. Praetores inde facti Cn. Manlius Volso, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Porcius Laeca, C. Fabricius Luscinus, C. Atinius [1] Labeo, P. Manlius.
8 Eo anno aediles curules, M. Fulvius Nobilior et C. Flaminius, tritici deciens centena milia binis aeris populo discripserunt. Id C. Flamini honoris causa ipsius patrisque advexerant Siculi Romam; Flaminius 9 gratiam eius communicaverat cum collega. Ludi Romani et apparati magnifice sunt et ter toti in-10 staurati. Aediles plebis, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus et C. Scribonius Curio,[2] multos pecuarios ad populi iudicium adduxerunt; tres ex his condemnati sunt; ex eorum multaticia pecunia aedem in insula Fauni 11 fecerunt. Ludi plebei per biduum instaurati, et epulum fuit ludorum causa.

A.U.C. 559

XLIII. L. Valerius Flaccus et M. Porcius Cato consules idibus Martiis, quo die magistratum inierunt, de provinciis cum ad senatum rettulissent, patres
2 censuerunt, quoniam in Hispania tantum glisceret bellum ut iam consulari et duce et exercitu opus esset, placere consules Hispaniam citeriorem Itali-

[1] Luscinus, C. Atinius Labeo ed. Frobeniana 1535: Labeo B.
[2] Curio Drakenborch: curio maximus B.

---

[1] They had probably rented public pasture lands but had trespassed on land which they had not leased.
[2] The island in the Tiber was in general sacred to Aesculapius (cf. X. xlvii. 7 for the introduction of this divinity), but other temples were erected there (XXXIV. liii. 7).

Valerius Flaccus in place of Marcus Cornelius Cethegus. B.C. 196
Quintus Fabius Maximus the augur also died while still a young man, before he had held any public office, and this year no augur was chosen in his stead.

Marcus Marcellus the consul presided over the consular elections, and Lucius Valerius Flaccus and Marcus Porcius Cato were announced as successful. Then the praetors were chosen, Gnaeus Manlius Volso, Appius Claudius Nero, Publius Porcius Laeca, Gaius Fabricius Luscinus, Gaius Atinius Labeo, and Publius Manlius.

In that year the curule aediles, Marcus Fulvius Nobilior and Gaius Flaminius, distributed to the people one million measures of grain at two asses per measure. The Sicilians had brought this to Rome as a mark of respect to Gaius Flaminius himself and to his father; Flaminius had shared the credit for it with his colleague. The Roman Games were celebrated splendidly and were thrice repeated entire. The plebeian aediles, Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus and Gaius Scribonius Curio, brought many grazers[1] to trial before the people; three of them were convicted, and out of the money paid by them as fines they built a temple to Faunus on the Island.[2] The Plebeian Games were repeated for two days and a banquet held on the occasion of the games.

XLIII. When Lucius Valerius Flaccus and Marcus B.C. 195
Porcius Cato the consuls had, on the Ides of March, on which day they were inaugurated, laid before the senate the question of the provinces, the Fathers voted it as their decision that, since so great a war was raging in Spain that it now needed a consular commander and a consular army, the consuls should either arrange between themselves or cast lots for amque provincias aut comparare inter se aut sortiri; utri Hispania provincia evenisset, eum duas legiones et quindecim milia socium Latini nominis et octingentos equites secum portare et naves longas viginti ducere; alter consul duas scriberet legiones; iis Galliam obtineri provinciam satis esse fractis proximo anno Insubrum Boiorumque animis. Cato Hispaniam, Valerius Italiam est sortitus. Praetores deinde provincias sortiti, C. Fabricius Luscinus urbanam, C. Atinius Labeo peregrinam, Cn. Manlius Volso Siciliam, Ap. Claudius Nero Hispaniam ulteriorem, P. Porcius Laeca Pisas, ut ab tergo Liguribus esset; P. Manlius in Hispaniam citeriorem adiutor consuli datus. T. Quinctio suspectis non solum Antiocho et Aetolis, sed iam etiam Nabide, Lacedaemoniorum tyranno, prorogatum in annum imperium est, duas legiones ut haberet. In eas si quid supplementi opus esset, consules scribere et mittere in Macedoniam iussi. Ap. Claudio praeter legionem quam Q. Fabius habuerat, duo milia peditum et[1] ducentos equites novos ut scriberet permissum. Par numerus peditum equitumque novorum et P. Manlio in citeriorem Hispaniam decretus et legio eadem quae fuerat sub Q. Minucio praetore data. Et P. Porcio Laecae ad Etruriam circa Pisas decem milia peditum et quingenti equites ex Gallico exercitu decreti. In Sardinia prorogatum imperium Ti. Sempronio Longo.

A.U.C. 559

[1] peditum et ed. Frobeniana 1531 : et B.

Nearer Spain and Italy as their provinces; that B.C. 195 whichever received Spain as his province should take with him two legions, fifteen thousand of the allies of the Latin confederacy and eight hundred cavalry, and should take with him twenty war-ships; that the other consul should recruit two legions; that the province of Gaul could be adequately defended with these, since the spirits of the Insubres and the Boi had been broken the previous year. Cato received Spain in the drawing and Valerius Italy. Then the praetors received their assignments: Gaius Fabricius Luscinus the city jurisdiction, Gaius Atinius Labeo that between citizens and aliens, Gnaeus Manlius Volso Sicily, Appius Claudius Nero Farther Spain, Publius Porcius Laeca Pisae, that he might be in the rear of the Ligures, and Publius Manlius was assigned to Nearer Spain as assistant to the consul. Since not only Antiochus and the Aetolians were causes of concern, but now, in addition, Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, the authority of Titus Quinctius was extended for a year, with the command of two legions. If any addition to these forces should be needed, the consuls were directed to enlist them and send them to Macedonia. Appius Claudius was permitted to enrol two thousand infantry and two hundred new cavalry in addition to the legion which Quintus Fabius had commanded. An equal number of new infantry and cavalry was authorized for Publius Manlius in Nearer Spain, and he was given the same legion which had served under the praetor Quintus Minucius. Also, to Publius Porcius Laeca were assigned ten thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry for service in Etruria in the neighbourhood of Pisae. In Sardinia, the command of Tiberius Sempronius Longus was extended.

A.U.C. 559

XLIV. Provinciis ita distributis consules, priusquam ab urbe proficiscerentur, ver sacrum ex decreto pontificum iussi[1] facere, quod A. Cornelius Mammula praetor voverat de senatus sententia populique iussu Cn. Servilio C. Flaminio consulibus. Annis post uno et viginti factum est quam votum. Per eosdem dies C. Claudius Appi filius Pulcher augur in Q. Fabi Maximi locum, qui priore anno mortuus erat, lectus inauguratusque est. Mirantibus iam vulgo hominibus quod Hispania movisset bellum neglegi, litterae a Q. Minucio adlatae sunt se ad Turdam oppidum cum Budare et Baesadine, imperatoribus Hispanis, signis collatis prospere pugnasse; duodecim milia hostium caesa, Budarem imperatorem captum, ceteros fusos fugatosque. His litteris lectis minus terroris ab Hispanis erat, unde ingens bellum expectatum fuerat; omnes curae, utique post adventum decem legatorum, in Antiochum regem conversae. Hi expositis prius quae cum Philippo acta essent et quibus legibus data pax, non minorem belli molem instare ab Antiocho docuerunt: ingenti classe, egregio terrestri exercitu in Europam eum traiecisse et nisi avertisset vana spes, ex vaniore rumore orta, Aegypti invadendae, mox bello Graeciam arsuram fuisse; neque enim ne Aetolos quidem quieturos, cum ingenio inquietam tum iratam Romanis

[1] iussi Baumgarten-Crusius: iussit B.

[1] This vow taken in 217 B.C. and its text are found in XXII. ix. 10–x. 6 (the name of the praetor given there is M. Aemilius, instead of A. Cornelius Mammula. Such confusions are too frequent in Livy or in the MSS.). A briefer description of the ver sacrum is given also in XXXIV. xliv. 3 below, where reference is made to the repetition of the celebration because of flaws in the performance of 195 B.C. The essence of the rite is the dedication to the gods of all animals born within a designated period in the "spring."

XLIV. When the provinces had been thus assigned, B.C. 196
the consuls, before they left the city, were instructed, in accordance with the decision of the priests, to conduct the ceremony of the "sacred spring" which the praetor Aulus Cornelius Mammula had vowed by decree of the senate and vote of the people, in the consulship of Gnaeus Servilius and Gaius Flaminius. The performance took place twenty-one years after the vow.[1] At this time Gaius Claudius Pulcher, son of Appius, was chosen augur in place of Quintus Fabius Maximus, who had died the year before, and was installed in office.

When everyone wondered why the war which Spain had begun was receiving so little attention, a letter arrived from Quintus Minucius, saying that he had fought successfully in a pitched battle near the town of Turda with Budares and Baesadines, the Spanish commanders; that twelve thousand of the enemy had been killed, Budares their general captured, and the rest routed and put to flight. When this letter was read, less fear was felt with respect to Spain, where a great war had been anticipated; all their anxieties, especially after the return of the ten commissioners, were centred on King Antiochus. These reported what had been done in the matter of Philip and on what terms peace had been granted, and gave warning that a war of no less magnitude was threatened by Antiochus: he had already invaded Europe with a huge fleet and a splendid army, and if an idle hope—sprung from an idler rumour—of invading Egypt, had not diverted his attention, Greece would presently be flaming with war; for not even the Aetolians would remain quiet, a people both naturally restless and ill-disposed towards the Romans. There was,

A.U.C. 559

8 gentem. Haerere et aliud in visceribus Graeciae ingens malum, Nabim, nunc Lacedaemoniorum, mox, si liceat, universae Graeciae futurum tyrannum, avaritia et crudelitate omnes fama celebratos tyrannos
9 aequantem; cui si Argos velut arcem Peloponneso impositam tenere liceat, deportatis in Italiam Romanis exercitibus nequiquam liberatam a Philippo Graeciam fore, pro rege si nihil aliud longinquo, vicinum tyrannum dominum habituram.

XLV. Haec cum ab tam gravibus auctoribus, qui omnia per se ipsos explorata adferrent, audirentur,
2 maior res, quod ad Antiochum attineret, maturanda magis, quoniam rex quacumque de causa in Syriam
3 concessisset, de tyranno consultatio visa est. Cum diu disceptatum esset, utrum satis iam causae videretur, cur decerneretur bellum, an permitterent T. Quinctio, quod ad Nabim Lacedaemonium attineret, faceret, quod e re publica censeret esse, permiserunt, 4 eam rem esse rati, quae maturata dilatave non ita magni momenti ad summam rem publicam esset;
5 magis id animadvertendum esse, quid Hannibal et Carthaginienses, si cum Antiocho bellum motum foret, acturi essent.
6 Adversae Hannibali factionis homines principibus Romanis, hospitibus[1] quisque suis, identidem scribebant nuntios litterasque ab Hannibale ad Antiochum
7 missas, et ab rege ad eum clam legatos venisse; ut

[1] hospitibus Jacobs: hostibus B.

they said, another great evil in Greece, clinging to its B.C. 195
vitals, Nabis, now tyrant of the Lacedaemonians, but soon, if it were permitted, to be tyrant of all Greece, the equal in greed and cruelty of all the tyrants known to fame; if he were allowed to hold Argos, which dominates Peloponnesus almost like a citadel, when the Roman armies were withdrawn to Italy, the liberation of Greece from Philip would prove to have been in vain, and in place of a king who was at least far distant, if nothing else could be said for him, they would have as master a tyrant close at hand.

XLV. When they heard words like these from men whose opinion carried such weight, especially on matters which they had investigated personally, the more important question, that which concerned Antiochus, called more for urgent action, but since the king for some reason or other had gone back to Syria, the question of the tyrant was rather one for debate. After it had long been debated whether there seemed sufficient cause for declaring war, or whether the decision should be left to Titus Quinctius, they gave him the responsibility of taking such action, in the case of Nabis the Lacedaemonian, as would be to the advantage of the state, thinking that such action, whether accelerated or retarded, was not of so very great importance to the general interest of the state; it was more to be considered what Hannibal and the Carthaginians would do if war should break out with King Antiochus.

The members of the faction opposed to Hannibal kept writing, each to his own friends among the leaders at Rome, that Hannibal had been sending messengers and letters to Antiochus and receiving from the king his secret agents; that, as some wild

A.U.C. 559 feras quasdam nulla mitescere arte, sic immitem et implacabilem eius viri animum esse; marcescere oti situ queri civitatem et inertia sopiri nec sine armorum 8 sonitu excitari posse. Haec probabilia memoria prioris belli per unum illum non magis gesti quam moti faciebat. Irritaverat etiam recenti facto multorum potentium animos.

XLVI. Iudicum ordo Carthagine ea tempestate dominabatur, eo maxime quod iidem perpetui iudices
2 erant. Res fama vitaque omnium in illorum potestate erat. Qui unum eius ordinis offendisset, omnes adversos habebat, nec accusator apud infensos iudices
3 deerat. Horum in tam impotenti regno—neque enim civiliter nimiis opibus utebantur—praetor factus
4 Hannibal vocari ad se quaestorem iussit. Quaestor id pro nihilo habuit; nam et adversae factionis erat et, quia ex quaestura in iudices, potentissimum ordinem, referebatur, iam pro futuris mox opibus
5 animos gerebat. Enimvero indignum id ratus Hannibal viatorem ad prendendum quaestorem misit subductumque in contionem non ipsum magis quam ordinem iudicum, prae quorum superbia atque opibus nec leges quicquam essent nec magistratus, accusavit.
6 Et ut secundis auribus accipi orationem animadvertit et infimorum quoque libertati gravem esse superbiam
7 eorum, legem extemplo promulgavit pertulitque, ut

[1] It consisted of about one hundred members.

beasts can in no wise be tamed, so this man's temper B.C. 195 was violent and implacable; that he complained that a nation wasted away in a state of peace and could be aroused from its stupor only by the din of arms. The recollection of the recent war, not more waged than caused by this one man, made these accounts seem plausible. He had, moreover, provoked the wrath of the leading citizens of Carthage by his recent conduct.

XLVI. The order of judges[1] at that time was in control in Carthage, principally because the same men were judges for life. The property, reputation, and life of every citizen were in their hands. A man who offended one of the judges made enemies of them all, nor was there any lack of persons to bring accusations before hostile judges. Under their administration, marked by such violence—for they did not use their excessive wealth in the spirit of a free state—Hannibal had been elected praetor and summoned a quaestor to report to him. The quaestor ignored the order; for he belonged to the opposing faction, and since he would be promoted from the quaestorship to the all-powerful order of judges, he already displayed arrogance proportioned to the power he would presently exercise. Hannibal, thinking this conduct highly improper, sent a messenger to arrest the quaestor, and haling him before the assembly, assailed him and not less the order of judges, in comparison with whose pride of place and power the laws were as nought, and the magistrates as well. When he saw that his speech was well received, and that their haughty spirits menaced the liberty of the lowest classes also, he immediately proposed and enacted a law, that judges should be elected for one year

A.U.C. 559 in singulos annos iudices legerentur, neu[1] quis biennium continuum iudex esset. Ceterum quantam eo facto ad plebem inierat gratiam, tantum magnae partis
8 principum offenderat animos. Adiecit et aliud, quo bono publico sibi proprias simultates irritavit. Vectigalia publica partim neglegentia dilabebantur, partim praedae ac divisui et principum quibusdam et magis-
9 tratibus erant, et pecunia quae in stipendium Romanis suo quoque anno penderetur, deerat, tributumque grave privatis imminere videbatur.

XLVII. Hannibal postquam vectigalia quanta terrestria maritimaque essent et in quas res erogarentur animadvertit, et quid eorum ordinarii rei publicae usus consumerent, quantum peculatus averteret, 2 omnibus residuis pecuniis exactis, tributo privatis remisso satis locupletem rem publicam fore ad vectigal praestandum Romanis pronuntiavit in contione et praestitit promissum.

3 Tum vero ii, quos paverat per aliquot annos publicus peculatus, velut bonis ereptis, non furtorum manubiis[2] extortis infensi et irati Romanos in Hannibalem, et 4 ipsos causam odii quaerentes, instigabant. Ita diu repugnante P. Scipione Africano, qui parum ex dignitate populi Romani esse ducebat subscribere
5 odiis accusatorum Hannibalis et factionibus Carthaginiensium inserere publicam auctoritatem nec satis

[1] neu Duker: ne B.
[2] manubiis Madvig: manibus B.

---

[1] In 191 B.C. (XXXVI. iv. 7), Carthage offered to pay at once all the remaining instalments on her indemnity. It might be inferred that Hannibal's reforms had proved successful.

each, and that no one should be a judge for two con- B.C. 195
secutive terms. But whatever influence he gained in this way with the commons, to the same extent he roused the animosity of a large party among the nobility. Moreover, by another act he served the public interest but roused personal enmities against himself. The public revenues were being partly wasted through carelessness, partly appropriated as their booty and spoils of office by some of the prominent men and magistrates, and money to pay the tribute to the Romans each successive year was lacking, and a heavy assessment seemed to threaten the citizens.[1]

XLVII. When Hannibal had investigated the revenues, how much was collected as taxes on land and as duty at the ports, for what purposes it was spent, how much the ordinary expenses of the state required, and how much embezzlement took from the treasury, he asserted in the assembly that the state would be rich enough, if it collected the revenues not otherwise used and omitted the assessment on individual citizens, to pay its debt to the Romans, and this assertion he was able to make good.

But now the men whom embezzlement from the treasury had maintained for many years, as if they were being robbed of their property instead of being made to give up the profits of their thefts, in passion and anger tried to bring upon Hannibal the wrath of the Romans, who were themselves seeking an excuse for venting their hatred upon him. So, although Publius Scipio Africanus resisted this tendency for a long time, urging that it was undignified for the Roman people to become parties to the animosities of Hannibal's accusers, to lend the support of official prestige to party strife at Carthage, and, not satisfied with having habere bello vicisse Hannibalem, nisi velut accusatores calumniam in eum iurarent ac nomen deferrent, 6 tandem pervicerunt ut legati Carthaginem mitterentur, qui ad senatum eorum arguerent Hannibalem 7 cum Antiocho rege consilia belli faciendi inire. Legati tres missi, Cn. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, Q. Terentius Culleo. Qui cum Carthaginem venissent, ex consilio inimicorum Hannibalis quaerentibus 8 causam adventus dici iusserunt, venisse se ad controversias quae cum Masinissa rege Numidarum 9 Carthaginiensibus essent dirimendas. Id creditum vulgo; unum Hannibalem se peti ab Romanis non fallebat et ita pacem Carthaginiensibus datam esse ut inexpiabile bellum adversus se unum maneret. 10 Itaque cedere tempori et fortunae statuit; et praeparatis iam ante omnibus ad fugam, obversatus eo die in foro avertendae suspicionis causa, primis tenebris vestitu forensi ad portam cum duobus comitibus ignaris consilii est egressus.

A.U.C. 559

XLVIII. Cum equi quo in loco iusserat praesto fuissent, nocte Byzacium—ita regionem quandam agri vocant—transgressus, postero die ad mare inter 2 Acyllam et Thapsum ad suam turrem pervenit. Ibi eum parata instructaque remigio excepit navis. Ita Africa Hannibal excessit, saepius patriae quam suum 3 eventum miseratus. Eodem die in Cercinam insulam traiecit. Ubi cum in portu naves aliquot Phoenicum conquered Hannibal in battle, acting, so to speak, as his prosecutors, to assert good faith and bring charges against him,[1] they at length prevailed upon the senate to send an embassy to Carthage which should lay charges before their senate that Hannibal was conspiring with King Antiochus to foment war. Three ambassadors were sent—Gnaeus Servilius, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, and Quintus Terentius Culleo. When they arrived in Carthage, on the advice of Hannibal's enemies, they caused the answer to be given to those who asked what their errand was, that they had come to put an end to the disputes which had arisen between the Carthaginians and Masinissa, king of the Numidians. This was generally accepted; but Hannibal did not fail to see that he and he alone was the object of the Romans' attack and that peace had been granted to the Carthaginians with the reservation that with him alone there should be implacable war. So he decided to give way to the emergency and his fate; and having already made all his preparations in advance for his departure, he spent that day in the forum in order to avert suspicion and at dusk, clad in his ordinary dress, he made his way to the gate with two companions who were ignorant of his design. B.C. 195

[1] The legal procedures referred to in technical language are: subscribere: to sign one's name as seconding a prosecution brought by another without necessarily participating in the action; calumniam iurare: to swear that a prosecutor is acting in good faith; nomen deferre: to report the defendant's name to a magistrate as one who should be prosecuted on some charge.

XLVIII. When he had found the horses ready in the place he had ordered them to be, he crossed by night the territory which they call Byzacium and arrived next day at his castle on the coast between Acylla and Thapsus. There a ship was waiting for him, manned and equipped. Thus Hannibal left Africa, bewailing his country's fate more often than his own. The same day he reached the island of Cercina. Since there were in port many Phoenician onerarias cum mercibus invenisset et ad egressum eum e nave concursus salutantium esset factus, percunctantibus legatum se Tyrum missum dici iussit. 4 Veritus tamen ne qua earum navis nocte profecta Thapsum aut Hadrumetum nuntiaret se Cercinae visum, sacrificio apparari iusso magistros navium mercatoresque invitari iussit et vela cum antemnis 5 ex navibus conrogari, ut umbraclum [1]—media aestas 6 forte erat—cenantibus in litore fieret. Quanto res et tempus patiebatur apparatu celebratae eius diei epulae sunt; multoque vino in serum noctis con- 7 vivium productum. Hannibal, cum [2] primum fallendi eos qui in portu erant tempus habuit, navem solvit. 8 Ceteri sopiti cum postero die tandem ex somno pleni crapulae surrexissent, ad id quod serum erat, aliquot horas referendis in naves collocandisque [3] et aptandis armamentis absumpserunt.

A.U.C. 559

9 Carthagine [4] multitudinis adsuetae domum Hannibalis frequentare concursus ad vestibulum aedium 10 est factus. Ut non comparere eum vulgatum est, in forum turba convenit principem civitatis quaerentium; 11 et alii fugam conscisse, id quod erat, alii fraude Romanorum interfectum, idque magis vulgo fremebant, variosque vultus cerneres ut in civitate aliorum alias partes foventium et factionibus discordi; visum deinde Cercinae eum tandem allatum est.

XLIX. Et Romani legati cum in senatu exposuis-

[1] umbraclum Madvig: umbraetum B.
[2] cum ed. Leidensis 1553: quod B.
[3] collocandisque Kreyssig: collocandis B.
[4] Carthagine Weissenborn: Carthagine et B.

vessels, loaded with merchandise, and crowds of B.C. 195 people came to pay their respects to him as he landed, he bade that the answer be given to their questions that he had been sent on an embassy to Tyre. Fearing nevertheless that one of these ships might leave at night and take the word to Thapsus or Hadrumetum that he had been seen at Cercina, he ordered preparations made for a sacrifice and the ship-captains and merchants invited to dinner and the sails and yards borrowed from their ships to provide a canopy—it chanced to be midsummer—for the diners on the shore. The dinner was given that day with all the pomp the situation and the time permitted, and the feasting was prolonged until late into the night with abundance of wine. As soon as Hannibal found an opportunity to elude the men who were in the harbour, he set sail. The rest were sound asleep, and when they finally woke from slumber the next day, still heavy with wine, too late to accomplish anything, they spent some hours with the rigging, carrying it back to the ships, setting it up, and adjusting it.

At Carthage, the crowd of people which was accustomed to visit Hannibal gathered about the doors of his house. When it was generally known that he could not be found, the crowd rushed to the forum, demanding their foremost citizen; some said that he had escaped, which was the case, others that he had been murdered at the instigation of the Romans, and this aroused the greater resentment; one could see the various looks natural in a state made up of men of opposing parties and torn by factional strife; finally word came that he had been seen at Cercina.

XLIX. The Roman ambassadors stated in the senate that proof had been furnished the Fathers at sent compertum patribus Romanis esse, et Philippum regem ante ab Hannibale maxime accensum bellum 2 populo Romano fecisse, et nunc litteras nuntiosque ab eo ad Antiochum et Aetolos missos, consiliaque inita impellendae ad defectionem Carthaginis, nec alio eum quam ad Antiochum regem profectum; haud quieturum eum antequam bellum[1] toto orbe 3 terrarum concisset;[2] id ei non debere impune esse, si satisfacere Carthaginienses populo Romano vellent nihil eorum sua voluntate nec publico consilio factum 4 esse; Carthaginienses responderunt quidquid aequum censuissent Romani, facturos esse.

A.U.C. 559

5 Hannibal prospero cursu Tyrum pervenit exceptusque a conditoribus Carthaginis, ut ab altera patria, vir tam clarus omni genere honorum, paucos moratus dies 6 Antiochiam navigat. Ibi profectum iam regem in Asiam cum audisset filiumque eius sollemne ludorum ad Daphnen celebrantem convenisset, comiter ab eo 7 exceptus nullam moram navigandi fecit. Ephesi regem est consecutus, fluctuantem adhuc animo incertumque de Romano bello; sed haud parvum momentum ad animum eius moliendum adventus 8 Hannibalis fecit. Aetolorum quoque eodem tempore alienati ab societate Romana animi sunt, quorum legatos Pharsalum et Leucadem et quasdam alias civitates ex primo foedere repetentes senatus ad T. Quinctium reiecit.

[1] eum antequam bellum Kreyssig: eum quam bellum antequam B.

[2] concisset ed. Frobeniana 1531: consciisset B.

Rome, first, that King Philip had made war upon the Roman people mainly at the instigation of Hannibal, second, that recently letters and messages had been sent by him to Antiochus and the Aetolians, stating that plans had been considered for drawing Carthage into the revolt, and that he had gone nowhere else than to Antiochus; he would never rest, they said, until he had roused the whole world to war; they added that such conduct should not go unpunished if the Carthaginians wished to convince the Roman people that none of these things had been done with their approval or with public sanction. The Carthaginians responded that they would do whatever the Romans should have determined was proper. B.C. 195

Hannibal arrived at Tyre after a prosperous voyage and was received by the founders of Carthage as coming from a second home-land, a man so distinguished by every kind of honour. After a brief stay he sailed to Antioch, and when, on his arrival there, he heard that the king had already gone to Asia, he met his son, who was holding the ritual games at Daphne, and after a courteous reception he set sail without delay. At Ephesus he overtook the king, still wavering in mind and undecided about the war with Rome, but the arrival of Hannibal was no small factor in making up his mind. At that time, too, the Aetolians were inclined to abandon their alliance with Rome, since the ambassadors whom they had sent to recover Pharsalus and Leucas and certain other cities in accordance with the original treaty had been referred by the senate to Titus Quinctius.

LIBRI XXXIII PERIOCHA

T. QUINCTIUS FLAMININUS procos. cum Philippo ad Cynoscephalas in Thessalia acie victo debellavit. L. Quinctius Flamininus, ille frater procos., Acarnanas, Leucade urbe quod caput est Acarnanum expugnata, in deditionem accepit. Pax petenti Philippo Graecia liberata data est. Attalus ab Thebis ob subitam valetudinem Pergamum translatus decessit. C. Sempronius Tuditanus praetor ab Celtiberis cum exercitu caesus est. L. Furius Purpurio et Claudius Marcellus coss. Boios et Insubres Gallos subegerunt. Marcellus triumphavit. Hannibal frustra in Africa bellum molitus et ob hoc Romanis per epistulas ab adversae [1] factionis principibus delatus propter metum Romanorum, qui legatos ad senatum Carthaginiensium de eo miserant, profugus ad Antiochum, Syriae regem, se contulit bellum adversus Romanos parantem.

[1] ab adversae Jahn : adversae codd.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXIII

TITUS QUINCTIUS FLAMININUS the proconsul ended the war by defeating Philip in battle at Cynoscephalae in Thessaly. Lucius Quinctius Flamininus, the brother of the proconsul, received the surrender of the Acarnanes after capturing Leucas, the capital of the Acarnanes. Peace was granted to Philip, who petitioned for it, and Greece was set free. Attalus, moved from Thebes to Pergamum on account of a sudden illness, died. Gaius Sempronius Tuditanus the praetor with his army was slain by the Celtiberi. Lucius Furius Purpurio and Claudius Marcellus the consuls defeated the Boi and the Insubrian Gauls. Marcellus triumphed. Hannibal, having vainly plotted war in Africa, and for this reason having been betrayed to the Romans through the letters of leading men of the opposing party, on account of his fear of the Romans, who had sent ambassadors to the senate of the Carthaginians, fled and took refuge with Antiochus, king of Syria, who was planning war against the Romans.

BOOK XXXIV

LIBER XXXIV

A.U.C. 559

I. Inter bellorum magnorum aut vixdum finitorum aut imminentium curas intercessit res parva dictu, sed quae studiis in magnum certamen excesserit. 2 M. Fundanius et L. Valerius tribuni plebi ad plebem 3 tulerunt de Oppia lege abroganda. Tulerat eam C. Oppius tribunus plebis Q. Fabio Ti. Sempronio consulibus, in medio ardore Punici belli, ne qua mulier plus semunciam auri haberet neu vestimento versicolori uteretur neu iuncto vehiculo in urbe oppidove aut propius inde mille passus nisi sacrorum 4 publicorum causa veheretur. M. et P. Iunii Bruti tribuni plebis legem Oppiam tuebantur nec eam se abrogari passuros aiebant; ad suadendum dissuadendumque multi nobiles prodibant; Capitolium turba hominum faventium adversantiumque legi 5 complebatur. Matronae nulla nec auctoritate nec verecundia nec imperio virorum contineri limine poterant, omnes vias urbis aditusque in forum obsidebant viros descendentes ad forum orantes ut florente re publica, crescente in dies privata omnium fortuna, matronis quoque pristinum ornatum reddi 6 paterentur. Augebatur haec frequentia mulierum

[1] Sempronius was consul with Fabius (Cunctator) in 215 B.C., and with his son in 213 B.C. The former date for the law is more probable: see vi. 9 and viii. 3 below.

[2] Particularly one trimmed with purple.

BOOK XXXIV

I. Amid the anxieties of great wars, either scarce finished or soon to come, an incident occurred, trivial to relate, but which, by reason of the passions it aroused, developed into a violent contention. Marcus Fundanius and Lucius Valerius, tribunes of the people, proposed to the assembly the abrogation of the Oppian law. The tribune Gaius Oppius had carried this law in the heat of the Punic War, in the consulship of Quintus Fabius and Tiberius Sempronius,[1] that no woman should possess more than half an ounce of gold or wear a parti-coloured[2] garment or ride in a carriage in the City or in a town within a mile thereof, except on the occasion of a religious festival. The tribunes Marcus and Publius Iunius Brutus were supporting the Oppian law, and averred that they would not permit its repeal; many distinguished men came forward to speak for and against it; the Capitoline was filled with crowds of supporters and opponents of the bill. The matrons could not be kept at home by advice or modesty or their husbands' orders, but blocked all the streets and approaches to the Forum, begging the men as they came down to the Forum that, in the prosperous condition of the state, when the private fortunes of all men were daily increasing, they should allow the women too to have their former distinctions restored. The crowd of women B.C. 195 in dies; nam etiam ex oppidis conciliabulisque[1] 7 conveniebant. Iam et consules praetoresque et alios magistratus adire et rogare audebant; ceterum minime exorabilem alterum utique consulem, M. Porcium Catonem, habebant, qui pro lege quae abrogabatur ita disseruit:

A.U.C. 559

II. "Si in sua quisque nostrum matre familiae, Quirites, ius et maiestatem viri retinere instituisset, minus cum universis feminis negotii haberemus; 2 nunc domi victa libertas nostra impotentia muliebri hic quoque in foro obteritur et calcatur, et quia singulas non continuimus[2] universas horremus. 3 Equidem fabulam et fictam rem ducebam esse, virorum omne genus in aliqua insula coniuratione 4 muliebri ab stirpe sublatum esse; ab nullo genere non summum periculum est, si coetus et concilia et secretas consultationes esse sinas. Atque ego vix statuere apud animum meum possum, utrum peior 5 ipsa res an peiore exemplo agatur; quorum alterum ad nos consules reliquosque magistratus, alterum ad vos, Quirites, magis pertinet. Nam utrum e re publica sit necne id quod ad vos fertur, vestra existi- 6 matio est, qui in suffragium ituri estis; haec consternatio muliebris, sive sua sponte sive auctoribus vobis, M. Fundani et L. Valeri, facta est, haud dubie ad culpam magistratuum pertinens, nescio vobis,

[1] conciliabulisque ed. Moguntina 1518: conciliabulis B.
[2] continuimus Hertz: potuimus B.

[1] Cato must refer to the story of Hypsipyle (Herodotus VI. 138; Hyginus, Fabulae 15), who, however, saved her father Thoas, king of Lemnos, when all the other men on the island were murdered by the women.

[2] Cato's point is that it was the duty of the magistrates to suppress the gathering of the women as a disturbance of the peace and that it was the duty of the citizens to defeat the grew larger day by day; for they were now coming B.C. 195 in from the towns and rural districts. Soon they dared even to approach and appeal to the consuls, the praetors, and the other officials, but one consul, at least, they found adamant, Marcus Porcius Cato, who spoke thus in favour of the law whose repeal was being urged.

II. "If each of us, citizens, had determined to assert his rights and dignity as a husband with respect to his own spouse, we should have less trouble with the sex as a whole; as it is, our liberty, destroyed at home by female violence, even here in the Forum is crushed and trodden underfoot, and because we have not kept them individually under control, we dread them collectively. For my part, I thought it a fairy-tale and a piece of fiction that on a certain island all the men were destroyed, root and branch, by a conspiracy of women;[1] but from no class is there not the greatest danger if you permit them meetings and gatherings and secret consultations. And I can scarcely decide in my own mind whether the act itself or the precedent it sets is worse; the act concerns us consuls and other magistrates; the example, citizens, rather concerns you.[2] For whether the proposal which is laid before you is in the public interest or not is a question for you who are soon to cast your votes; but this female madness, whether it is spontaneous or due to your instigation, Marcus Fundanius and Lucius Valerius, but which beyond question brings discredit upon the magistrates—I do not know, I say, whether this madness is more shameful for you, tribunes, proposal to repeal, lest success at this time embolden the women to interfere with legislation on other occasions.

A.U.C. 559

7 tribuni, an consulibus magis sit deformis: vobis, si feminas ad concitandas tribunicias seditiones iam adduxistis; nobis, si ut plebis[1] quondam, sic nunc 8 mulierum secessione leges accipiendae sunt. Equidem non sine rubore quodam paulo ante per medium agmen mulierum in forum perveni. Quod nisi me verecundia singularum magis maiestatis et pudoris quam universarum tenuisset, ne compellatae a 9 consule viderentur, dixissem: 'Qui hic mos est in publicum procurrendi et obsidendi vias et viros alienos appellandi? Istud ipsum suos quaeque domi 10 rogare non potuistis? An blandiores in publico quam in privato et alienis quam vestris estis? Quamquam ne domi quidem vos, si sui iuris finibus matronas contineret pudor, quae leges hic rogarentur 11 abrogarenturve, curare decuit.' Maiores nostri nullam, ne privatam quidem rem agere feminas sine tutore auctore voluerunt, in manu esse parentium, fratrum, virorum; nos, si diis placet, iam etiam rem publicam capessere eas patimur et foro quoque et 12 contionibus et comitiis immisceri. Quid enim nunc aliud per vias et compita faciunt quam rogationem tribunorum plebi suadent, quam[2] legem abrogandam 13 censent? Date frenos impotenti naturae et indomito animali et sperate ipsas modum licentiae 14 facturas; nisi vos feceritis, minimum hoc eorum est,

[1] si ut plebis ed. Frobeniana 1535 : sicut B : sicut plebis σ.
[2] quam Harant: aliam B.

[1] The plebeian secession of 494 B.C.

[2] A woman was never sui iuris and was not a person in the legal sense. If she was not under the potestas of a father or the manus of a husband, a tutor was appointed to act for her in legal matters.

[3] See note on XXXI. vii. 2 above.

or for the consuls: for you, if you have brought B.C. 195 these women here to support tribunicial seditions; for us, if we must accept laws given us by a secession of women, as formerly by a secession of plebeians.[1] For myself, I could not conceal my blushes a while ago, when I had to make my way to the Forum through a crowd of women. Had not respect for the dignity and modesty of some individuals among them rather than of the sex as a whole kept me silent, lest they should seem to have been rebuked by a consul, I should have said, 'What sort of practice is this, of running out into the streets and blocking the roads and speaking to other women's husbands? Could you not have made the same requests, each of your own husband, at home? Or are you more attractive outside and to other women's husbands than to your own? And yet, not even at home, if modesty would keep matrons within the limits of their proper rights, did it become you to concern yourselves with the question of what laws should be adopted in this place or repealed.' Our ancestors permitted no woman to conduct even personal business without a guardian to intervene in her behalf;[2] they wished them to be under the control of fathers, brothers, husbands; we (Heaven help us!) allow them now even to interfere in public affairs, yes, and to visit the Forum and our informal and formal sessions.[3] What else are they doing now on the streets and at the corners except urging the bill of the tribunes and voting for the repeal of the law? Give loose rein to their uncontrollable nature and to this untamed creature and expect that they will themselves set bounds to their licence; unless you act, this is the least of the things enjoined quae iniquo animo feminae sibi aut moribus aut legibus iniuncta[1] patiuntur. Omnium rerum libertatem, immo licentiam, si vere dicere volumus, desiderant.

A.U.C. 559

III. " Quid enim, si hoc expugnaverint, non temptabunt? Recensete omnia muliebria iura quibus licentiam earum adligaverint maiores vestri per quaeque eas[2] subiecerint viris; quibus omnibus constrictas vix tamen continere potestis. Quid? 2 Si carpere singula et extorquere[3] et exaequari ad extremum viris patiemini, tolerabiles vobis eas fore 3 creditis? Extemplo, simul pares esse coeperint, superiores erunt. At hercule ne quid novum in eas rogetur recusant, non ius sed iniuriam deprecantur, 4 immo, ut quam accepistis iussistis suffragiis vestris legem, quam usu tot annorum et experiendo comprobastis, hanc ut abrogetis, id est, ut unam tollendo 5 legem ceteras infirmetis. Nulla lex satis commoda omnibus est; id modo quaeritur si maiori parti et in summam prodest. Si, quod cuique privatim officiet ius, id destruet ac demolietur, quid attinebit universos rogare leges, quas mox abrogare in quos latae sunt 6 possint? Volo tamen audire quid sit, propter quod matronae consternatae procucurrerint in publicum 7 ac vix foro se et contione abstineant. Ut captivi ab Hannibale redimantur parentes, viri, liberi, fratres

[1] iniuncta Gronovius: iniunctum B.
[2] quaeque eas Wulsch: quaeque B.
[3] extorquere ed. Moguntina 1518: extorqueri B.

upon women by custom or law and to which they B.C. 195 submit with a feeling of injustice. It is complete liberty or, rather, if we wish to speak the truth, complete licence that they desire.

III. "If they win in this, what will they not attempt? Review all the laws with which your forefathers restrained their licence and made them subject to their husbands; even with all these bonds you can scarcely control them. What of this? If you suffer them to seize these bonds one by one and wrench themselves free and finally to be placed on a parity with their husbands, do you think that you will be able to endure them? The moment they begin to be your equals, they will be your superiors. But, by Hercules, they object to the passage of any new law against them, they complain not of law but of wrongs done them; what they want, rather, is that you repeal this law which you have approved and ratified and which in the trial and experience of so many years you have found good: in other words, that by abolishing this one law you weaken the force of all the rest. No law is entirely convenient for everyone; this alone is asked, whether it is good for the majority and on the whole. If every law which harms anyone in his private affairs is to be repealed and discarded, what good will it do for all the citizens to pass laws which those at whom they are aimed will at once annul? I should like to know what it is which has caused the panic-stricken matrons to rush out into the streets and barely refrain from entering the Forum and a public meeting. Is it that our captives, their fathers, husbands, sons or brothers, may be ransomed from Hannibal? Such earum? Procul abest absitque semper talis fortuna rei publicae; sed tamen, cum fuit, negastis hoc piis 8 precibus earum. At non pietas nec sollicitudo pro suis, sed religio congregavit eas: matrem Idaeam a Pessinunte ex Phrygia venientem accepturae sunt. Quid honestum dictu saltem seditioni praetenditur 9 muliebri? 'Ut auro et purpura fulgamus' inquit 'ut carpentis festis profestisque diebus, velut triumphantes de lege victa et abrogata et captis et ereptis suffragiis vestris per urbem vectemur; ne ullus modus sumptibus, ne luxuriae sit.'

A.U.C. 559

IV. "Saepe me querentem de feminarum, saepe de virorum nec de privatorum modo sed etiam magis- 2 tratuum sumptibus audistis, diversisque duobus vitiis, avaritia et luxuria, civitatem laborare, quae pestes 3 omnia magna imperia everterunt. Haec ego, quo melior laetiorque in dies fortuna rei publicae est imperiumque crescit—et iam in Graeciam Asiamque transcendimus omnibus libidinum illecebris repletas et regias etiam attrectamus gazas—eo plus horreo, ne illae magis res nos ceperint quam nos illas. 4 Infesta, mihi credite, signa ab Syracusis illata sunt huic urbi. Iam nimis multos audio Corinthi et Athenarum ornamenta laudantes mirantesque et

[1] See XXII. lxi. 3, where Livy records the refusal to redeem the Romans captured at Cannae.

[2] The worship of the Magna Mater was imported into Rome in 204 B.C., and the stone which symbolized the goddess was received by the women (XXIX. x. 5; xiv. 10).

[3] Marcellus transferred to Rome works of art captured in Syracuse in 212 B.C. and thereby began a revolution in Roman taste (XXV. xl. 2). The pun on the military meaning of infesta signa can be more easily noted than reproduced.

[4] The ornamenta brought from Corinth were usually of bronze (hence bronze dishes and small statuary were coma calamity to the state is far away, and may it always be; but yet, when it did happen, you refused this to their pious prayers.[1] But it was not affection nor anxiety about their dear ones which had brought them together: it was a religious rite, and they were about to receive the Idaean Mother as she came from Pessinus in Phrygia.[2] What pretext, respectable even to mention, is now given for this insurrection of the women? 'That we may glitter with gold and purple,' says one, 'that we may ride in carriages on holidays and ordinary days, that we may be borne through the city as if in triumph over the conquered and vanquished law and over the votes which we have captured and wrested from you; that there may be no limits to our spending and our luxury.' B.C. 195

IV. "You have often heard me complaining of the extravagance of the women and often of the men, both private citizens and magistrates even, and lamenting that the state is suffering from those two opposing evils, avarice and luxury, which have been the destruction of every great empire. The better and the happier becomes the fortune of our commonwealth day by day and the greater the empire grows—and already we have crossed into Greece and Asia, places filled with all the allurements of vice, and we are handling the treasures of kings—the more I fear that these things will capture us rather than we them. Tokens of danger, believe me, were those statues[3] which were brought to this city from Syracuse. Altogether too many people do I hear praising the baubles[4] of Corinth and Athens and laughing at the fictile monly called "Corinthia" in Rome) and from Athens painted vases.

A.U.C. 559

5 antefixa fictilia deorum Romanorum ridentes. Ego hos malo propitios deos et ita spero futuros, si in 6 suis manere sedibus patiemur. Patrum nostrorum memoria per legatum Cineam Pyrrhus non virorum modo sed etiam mulierum animos donis temptavit. Nondum lex Oppia ad coercendam luxuriam muliebrem lata erat; tamen nulla accepit. Quam causam 7 fuisse censetis? Eadem fuit quae maioribus nostris nihil de hac re lege sanciundi; nulla erat luxuria 8 quae coerceretur. Sicut ante morbos necesse est cognitos esse quam remedia eorum, sic cupiditates prius natae sunt quam leges quae iis modum facerent. 9 Quid legem Liciniam excitavit de quingentis iugeribus nisi ingens cupido agros continuandi? Quid legem Cinciam de donis et muneribus nisi quia vectigalis iam et stipendiaria plebs esse senatui coeperat? 10 Itaque minime mirum est nec Oppiam nec aliam ullam tum legem desideratam esse quae modum sumptibus mulierum faceret, cum aurum et purpuram 11 data et oblata ultro non accipiebant. Si nunc cum illis donis Cineas urbem circumiret, stantes in publico 12 invenisset quae acciperent. Atque ego nonnullarum cupiditatium ne causam quidem aut rationem inire possum. Nam ut, quod alii liceat, tibi non licere aliquid fortasse naturalis aut pudoris aut indignationis habeat, sic aequato omnium cultu quid unaquae-

[1] The antefixa were ornaments placed on the ends of ridge-poles and on roof-corners of temples. Those used in early Rome were frequently of terra-cotta (fictilia), and these seemed old-fashioned to changed tastes.

[2] See Periocha XIII.

[3] One clause of the famous law of 367 B.C. limited to five hundred iugera the amount of public land that any individual might hold (VI. xxxv. 5).

[4] By this law of 204 B.C. advocates were forbidden to charge antefixes[1] of our Roman gods. I prefer that these B.C. 195 gods be propitious to us, and I trust that they will be if we allow them to remain in their own dwellings. In the memory of our forefathers Pyrrhus, through his agent Cineas, tried to corrupt with gifts the minds of our men and women as well.[2] Not yet had the Oppian law been passed to curb female extravagance, yet not one woman took his gifts. What do you think was the reason? The same thing which caused our ancestors to pass no law on the subject: there was no extravagance to be restrained. As it is necessary that diseases be known before their cures, so passions are born before the laws which keep them within bounds. What provoked the Licinian law[3] about the five hundred iugera except the uncontrolled desire of joining field to field? What brought about the Cincian law[4] except that the plebeians had already begun to be vassals and tributaries to the senate? And so it is not strange that no Oppian or any other law was needed to limit female extravagance at the time when they spurned gifts of gold and purple voluntarily offered to them. If it were to-day that Cineas were going about the city with those presents he would have found women standing in the streets to receive them. And for some desires I can find no reason or explanation. For though it may perhaps cause some natural shame or even anger that what is denied to you is permitted to another, yet, when the dress of all is made alike, what is fees for their services or to circumvent the law by accepting presents from their clients. Among the possible purposes was the desire to relieve the commons of financial and other obligations to the aristocracy.

A.U.C. 559

13 que vestrum veretur ne in se conspiciatur? Pessimus quidem pudor est vel parsimoniae vel paupertatis; sed utrumque lex vobis demit, cum id quod
14 habere non licet non habetis. 'Hanc' inquit 'ipsam exaequationem non fero' illa locuples. 'Cur non insignis auro et purpura conspicior? Cur paupertas aliarum sub hac legis specie latet, ut quod habere non possunt habiturae, si liceret, fuisse
15 videantur?' Vultis hoc certamen uxoribus vestris inicere, Quirites, ut divites id habere velint quod nulla alia possit; pauperes, ne ob hoc ipsum con-
16 temnantur, supra vires se extendant? Ne eas[1] simul pudere quod non oportet coeperit, quod oportet non pudebit. Quae de suo poterit, parabit; quae
17 non poterit, virum rogabit. Miserum illum virum, et qui exoratus et qui non exoratus erit, cum quod
18 ipse non dederit datum ab alio videbit. Nunc vulgo alienos viros rogant et, quod maius est, legem et suffragia rogant et a quibusdam impetrant. Adversus te et rem tuam et liberos tuos exorabilis es; simul lex modum sumptibus uxoris tuae facere 19 desierit, tu numquam facies. Nolite eodem loco existimare, Quirites, futuram rem quo fuit antequam lex de hoc ferretur. Et hominem improbum non accusari tutius est quam absolvi, et luxuria non mota

[1] ne eas Lentz: ne B.

there which any of you fears will not be conspicuous B.C. 195 in herself? The worst kind of shame, I tell you, is that derived from stinginess or poverty; but the law takes from you the chance of either, since you do not have what it is not allowed you to have. 'It is just this equality that I will not put up with,' says yonder rich woman. 'Why do I not stand out conspicuous by reason of gold and purple? Why does the poverty of other women lie concealed under cover of this law, that it may seem that, had it been legal, they would have owned what it is not in their power to own?' Do you wish, citizens, to start a race like this among your wives, so that the rich shall want to own what no other woman can have and the poor, lest they be despised for their poverty, shall spend beyond their means? Once let these women begin to be ashamed of what they should not be ashamed, and they will not be ashamed of what they ought. She who can buy from her own purse will buy; she who cannot will beg her husband. Poor wretch that husband, both he who yields and he who yields not, since what he will not himself give he will see given by another man. Now they publicly address other women's husbands, and, what is more serious, they beg for a law and votes, and from sundry men they get what they ask. In matters affecting yourself, your property, your children, you, Sir, can be importuned; once the law has ceased to set a limit to your wife's expenditures you will never set it yourself. Do not think, citizens, that the situation which existed before the law was passed will ever return. It is safer for a criminal to go unaccused than to be acquitted; and luxury, left undisturbed, would have been more endurable tolerabilior esset quam erit nunc, ipsis vinculis, sicut ferae bestiae, irritata,[1] deinde emissa.[2] Ego nullo modo abrogandam legem Oppiam censeo; vos quod faxitis, deos omnes fortunare velim."

A.U.C. 559

V. Post haec tribuni quoque plebi qui se intercessuros professi erant, cum pauca in eandem sententiam adiecissent, tum L. Valerius pro rogatione ab se promulgata ita disseruit: "Si privati tantummodo ad suadendum dissuadendumque id quod ab nobis rogatur processissent, ego quoque, cum satis dictum pro utraque parte existimarem, tacitus 2 suffragia vestra expectassem; nunc cum vir gravissimus, consul M. Porcius, non auctoritate solum, quae tacita satis momenti habuisset, sed oratione etiam longa et accurata insectatus sit rogationem nostram, 3 necesse est paucis respondere. Qui tamen plura verba in castigandis matronis quam in rogatione nostra dissuadenda consumpsit, et quidem ut in dubio poneret, utrum id quod reprenderet matronae 4 sua sponte an nobis auctoribus fecissent. Rem defendam, non nos, in quos iecit magis hoc consul 5 verbo tenus quam ut re insimularet. Coetum et seditionem et interdum secessionem muliebrem appellavit, quod matronae in publico vos rogassent ut legem in se latam per bellum temporibus duris in pace et florenti ac beata re publica abrogaretis. 6 Verba magna quae rei augendae causa conquirantur.

[1] irritata Gronovius: irritatae B.
[2] emissa Gronovius: emissae B.

then than it will be now, when it has been, like a wild beast, first rendered angry by its very fetters and then let loose. My opinion is that the Oppian law should on no account be repealed; whatever is your decision, I pray that all the gods may prosper it." B.C. 195

V. After this the tribunes of the people who had declared that they would veto the bill spoke briefly to the same effect, and then Lucius Valerius argued thus for the measure which he had proposed: "If only private citizens had come forward to support or oppose the measure which we have placed before you, I too, since I judged that enough had been said on each side, should have waited in silence for your ballots; now, since that most influential man, the consul Marcus Porcius, has attacked our proposal not only with his authority, which unexpressed would have had enough of weight, but also in a long and carefully-prepared speech, it is necessary to make a brief reply. And yet he used up more words in reproving the matrons than he did in opposing our bill, and, in fact, left it in doubt whether the conduct for which he rebuked the matrons was spontaneous or inspired by us. I propose to defend the measure rather than ourselves, at whom the consul directed his insinuations, more to have something to say than to make a serious charge. This gathering of women he called a sedition and sometimes 'a female secession,' because the matrons, in the streets, had requested you to repeal, in a time of peace and in a rich and prosperous commonwealth, a law that was passed against them in the trying days of a war. I know that there is this and still other vigorous language, which has been sought out to make the argument et haec et alia esse scio, et M. Catonem oratorem non solum gravem sed interdum etiam trucem esse 7 scimus omnes, cum ingenio sit mitis. Nam quid tandem novi matronae fecerunt, quod frequentes in causa ad se pertinente in publicum processerunt? Numquam ante hoc tempus in publico apparuerunt?

A.U.C. 559

8 Tuas adversus te Origines revolvam. Accipe quotiens id fecerint, et quidem semper bono publico. Iam a principio, regnante Romulo, cum Capitolio ab Sabinis capto medio in foro signis collatis dimicaretur, nonne intercursu matronarum inter acies duas
9 proelium sedatum est? Quid? Regibus exactis cum Coriolano Marcio duce legiones Volscorum castra ad quintum lapidem posuissent, nonne id agmen, quo obruta haec urbs esset, matronae averterunt? Iam urbe capta a Gallis, quo redempta urbs est? Nempe aurum matronae consensu omnium in publicum
10 contulerunt. Proximo bello, ne antiqua repetam, nonne et, cum pecunia opus fuit, viduarum pecuniae adiuverunt aerarium et, cum dii quoque novi ad opem ferendam dubiis rebus accerserentur, matronae universae ad mare profectae sunt ad matrem Idaeam 11 accipiendam? Dissimiles, inquis, causae sunt. Nec mihi causas aequare propositum est; nihil novi

---

[1] The amplification of an argument was a recognized rhetorical device; to an opponent it would easily seem to be an exaggeration.

[2] Valerius quotes or pretends to quote from Cato's own historical work, which treated of early Roman history. The Origines had not actually been written at the time of the feminist agitation (Nepos, Cato 3; Quintilian XII. xi. 23, etc.). The scroll form of the ancient book explains the choice of the verb revolvam.

sound more convincing;[1] we all know, too, that B.C. 195
Marcus Cato is an orator not only powerful but sometimes even savage, though he is kind of heart. What new thing, pray, have the matrons done in coming out into the streets in crowds in a case that concerned them? Have they never before this moment appeared in public? Let me unroll your own Origines against you.[2] Hear how often they have done it and always, indeed, for the general good. Even in the beginning, while Romulus was king, when the Capitoline had been taken by the Sabines and pitched battle was raging in the centre of the Forum, was not the fighting stopped by the rush of the matrons between the two battle-lines?[3] What of this? When, after the expulsion of the kings, the Volscian legions led by Marcius Coriolanus had encamped at the fifth milestone, did not the matrons turn away from us the army which would have destroyed our city?[4] When the City was later captured by the Gauls, how was it ransomed? Why, the matrons by unanimous consent contributed their gold to the public use.[5] In the recent war (not to go to remoter times), did not the widows, when there was a scarcity of money, aid the treasury with their wealth,[6] and when new gods too were brought in to help us in our crisis, did not the matrons in a body go down to the sea to receive the Idaean Mother? These cases, you say, are different. It is not my purpose to prove them similar; it suffices if I prove that this

[2] The story is told in I. ix. 1–xiii. 5.
[4] The story is told in II. xxxv. 6–xl. 10.
[5] This story is told in v. 1–7.
[6] See XXIV. xviii. 14.

A.U.C. 669

12 factum purgare satis est. Ceterum quod in rebus ad omnes pariter, viros feminas, pertinentibus fecisse eas nemo miratus est, in causa proprie ad ipsas pertinente miramur fecisse? Quid autem fecerunt?
13 Superbas, me dius fidius, aures habemus si, cum domini servorum non fastidiant preces, nos rogari ab honestis feminis indignamur.

VI. "Venio nunc ad id de quo agitur. In quo duplex consulis oratio fuit; nam et legem ullam omnino abrogari est indignatus, et eam praecipue
2 legem quae luxuriae muliebris coercendae causa lata esset. Et illa communis pro legibus visa consularis oratio est, et haec adversus luxuriam severissimis
3 moribus conveniebat; itaque periculum est, nisi quid in utraque re vani sit docuerimus, ne quis error vobis
4 offundatur. Ego enim quem ad modum ex iis legibus, quae non in tempus aliquod sed perpetuae utilitatis causa in aeternum latae sunt, nullam abrogari debere fateor, nisi quam aut usus coarguit aut status aliquis
5 rei publicae inutilem fecit, sic quas tempora aliqua desiderarunt leges, mortales, ut ita dicam, et tem-
6 poribus ipsis mutabiles esse video. Quae in pace lata sunt, plerumque bellum abrogat; quae in bello, pax, ut in navis administratione alia in secunda alia
7 in adversa tempestate usui sunt. Haec cum ita natura distincta sint, ex utro tandem genere ea lex esse videtur, quam abrogamus? Quid? Vetus regia 8 lex, simul cum ipsa urbe nata aut, quod secun-is nothing new. But what no one wonders that all, B.C. 195 men and women alike, have done in matters that concern them, do we wonder that the women have done in a case peculiarly their own? What now have they done? We have proud ears, upon my word, if, although masters do not scorn to hear the petitions of slaves, we complain that we are appealed to by respectable women.

VI. "I come now to the matter which is under discussion. On this point the consul's argument was twofold: for he protested against the repeal of any law at all, and particularly of that law which was designed to limit feminine luxury. The former argument, a general appeal on behalf of the laws, was becoming to a consul; the latter, against luxury, was consistent with his strict moral code; accordingly, unless I reveal the fallacy in both, there is a danger that some misconception may blind your eyes. For while I acknowledge that, of these laws which have been passed, not for a particular occasion, but as permanent institutions because of their enduring benefit, none should be repealed, unless experience shows it to be useless or some emergency in the state renders it valueless, yet I see that certain laws which crises in the state have demanded are, so to speak, mortal, and subject to change as conditions themselves change. Laws passed in time of peace, war frequently annuls, and peace those passed in times of war, just as in handling a ship some means are useful in fair weather and others in a storm. Since they are so distinguished by nature, to which class, I ask, does the law which we are trying to repeal seem to belong? Well? Is it an ancient regal law, born with the City itself, or, what is next to that, one

A.U.C. 559

dum est, ab decemviris ad condenda iura creatis in duodecim tabulis scripta, sine qua cum maiores nostri non existimarint decus matronale servari posse, nobis quoque verendum sit ne cum ea pudorem 9 sanctitatemque feminarum abrogemus? Quis igitur nescit novam istam legem esse, Q. Fabio et Ti. Sempronio consulibus viginti ante annis latam? Sine qua cum per tot annos matronae optimis moribus vixerint, quod tandem ne abrogata ea effundantur
10 ad luxuriam periculum est? Nam si ista lex vetus[1] aut ideo lata esset ut finiret libidinem muliebrem, verendum foret ne abrogata incitaret; cur sit autem
11 lata, ipsum indicabit[2] tempus. Hannibal in Italia erat, victor ad Cannas; iam Tarentum, iam Arpos, 12 iam Capuam habebat; ad urbem Romam admoturus exercitum videbatur; defecerant socii; non milites in supplementum, non socios navales ad classem tuendam, non pecuniam in aerario habebamus; servi quibus arma darentur, ita ut pretium pro iis bello
13 perfecto dominis solveretur, emebantur; in eandem diem[3] pecuniae frumentum et cetera quae belli usus postulabant praebenda publicani se conducturos professi erant; servos ad remum numero ex censu
14 constituto cum stipendio nostro dabamus; aurum et argentum omne ab senatoribus eius rei initio orto in publicum conferebamus; viduae et pupilli pecunias suas in aerarium deferebant; cautum erat quo ne plus auri et argenti facti, quo ne plus signati argenti

[1] lex vetus Meyerhoefer: lex B.
[2] indicabit Gronovius: indicauit B.
[3] eandem diem Gelenius: eadem die B.

[1] Tarentum did not surrender to him until 213 or 212 B.C. (XXV. xi. 20).
[2] I.e., after the war; cf. XXIII. xlix. 1–3.

inscribed on the twelve tables by the decemvirs B.C. 195 appointed to codify the law? Is it a law without which our ancestors held that a matron's virtue could not be preserved, and which we too must fear to repeal lest along with it we repeal the modesty and purity of our women? Who is there, then, who does not know that this is a new law, passed twenty years ago, in the consulship of Quintus Fabius and Tiberius Sempronius? Since for so many years our matrons lived virtuous lives without it, what danger is there that when it is repealed they will rush into riotous luxury? For if it were an ancient law, or passed for the purpose of holding feminine caprice under restraint, there would be danger that its abrogation would rouse their passion; but the occasion itself will tell you why the law was passed. Hannibal was in Italy, victorious at Cannae; he already held Tarentum,[1] Arpi, Capua; he seemed ready to march on our city of Rome; our allies had deserted us; we had no troops in reserve, no naval allies to maintain the fleet, no money in the treasury; slaves were being purchased for employment as soldiers, on condition that the price should be paid their owners after the war; the contractors agreed to furnish grain and other things demanded by the war on the same settlement-day;[2] we furnished slaves for rowers in proportion to our census-ratings, and ourselves bore the costs;[3] we all, following the example set by the senators, gave our gold and silver for the public use; widows and minors deposited their money in the treasury; we were forbidden to have at home more than a certain quantity of gold or silver plate or [2] In 214 B.C. (XXIV. xi. 7–9), the senate took the action here described; cf. also XXVI. xxxv. 1–xxxvi. 12.

A.U.C. 559

15 et aeris domi haberemus: tali tempore in luxuria et ornatu matronae occupatae erant ut ad eam coercendam Oppia lex desiderata sit, cum, quia Cereris sacrificium lugentibus omnibus matronis intermissum erat, senatus finiri luctum triginta diebus iussit? 16 Cui non apparet inopiam et miseriam civitatis, quia [1] omnium privatorum pecuniae in usum publicum vertendae erant, istam legem scripsisse, tam diu mansuram quam diu causa scribendae legis mansisset? 17 Nam si, quae tunc temporis causa aut decrevit senatus aut populus iussit, in perpetuum servari oportet, cur pecunias reddimus privatis? Cur publica 18 praesenti pecunia locamus? Cur servi qui militent non emuntur? Cur privati non damus remiges sicut tunc dedimus?

VII. "Omnes alii ordines, omnes homines mutationem in meliorem statum rei publicae sentient: ad coniuges tantum nostras pacis et tranquillitatis 2 publicae fructus non perveniet? Purpura viri utemur, praetextati in magistratibus, in sacerdotiis; liberi nostri praetextis purpura togis utentur; magistratibus in coloniis municipiisque, hic Romae infimo generi, magistris vicorum, togae praetextae 3 habendae ius permittemus, nec ut vivi solum habeant tantum insigne, sed etiam ut cum eo crementur

[1] quia Gronovius: et quia B.

[1] This statement is not quite consistent with the proposal of M. Valerius Laevinus in 210 B.C. (XXVI. xxxvi. 5–8). The speaker for rhetorical effect ignores the fact that the sumptuary laws he mentions were passed at different times.

[2] This happened in 216 B.C. (XXII. lvi. 4).

[3] Valerius argues that the Oppian law was merely one of a series of emergency measures by which all elements in the state were affected. To leave this one law in force would coined silver or bronze;[1] at such a time were the matrons so absorbed in luxury and adornment that the Oppian law was needed to restrain them, when, since the rites of Ceres had to be omitted because all the women were in mourning, the senate limited the period of mourning to thirty days?[2] Who fails to see that the poverty and distress of the state wrote that law, since all private property had to be diverted to public use, and that the law was to remain in force so long as the cause of its enactment lasted?[3] For, if whatever emergency measure was passed by senatorial decree or popular vote should be for ever observed, why do we repay the loans advanced by private citizens? Why do we let contracts calling for cash payment? Why are slaves not bought to serve in the armies? Why do not private citizens furnish rowers as we did then? B.C. 195

VII. "All other orders, all men, will feel the change for the better in the state; shall our wives alone get no enjoyment from national peace and tranquillity? Shall we men wear purple and walk clad in the toga praetexta[4] while holding priesthoods and offices? Shall our sons wear togas bordered with purple? Shall officials[5] in the colonies and the municipal towns, and here in Rome, the ward-masters,[6] the lowest official rank, be allowed to wear the toga praetexta, and enjoy so great a distinction not only during life, but even after death be burned with mean continued discrimination against one element, the women, after the other methods had been abandoned.

[4] See the note on XXXIII. xlii. 1.

[5] While not strictly possessed of these privileges, communities of these types freely imitated Roman customs.

[6] These officials had certain duties in connection with the games, and so enjoyed special privileges.

A.U.C. 559

mortui: feminis dumtaxat purpurae usu[1] interdicemus? Et, cum tibi viro liceat purpura in vestem stragulam uti, matrem familiae tuam purpureum amiculum habere non sines, et equus tuus speciosius instratus erit quam uxor vestita? Sed in purpura, quae teritur absumitur, iniustam[2] quidem, sed aliquam tamen causam tenacitatis video; in auro vero, in quo praeter manupretium[3] nihil intertrimenti fit, quae malignitas est! Praesidium potius in eo est et ad privatos et ad publicos usus, sicut experti estis. Nullam aemulationem inter se singularum, quoniam nulla haberet, esse aiebat. At hercule universis dolor et indignatio est, cum sociorum Latini nominis uxoribus vident ea concessa ornamenta quae sibi adempta sint, cum insignes eas esse auro et purpura, cum illas vehi per urbem, se pedibus sequi, tamquam in illarum civitatibus, non in sua, imperium sit. Virorum hoc animos vulnerare posset; quid muliercularum censetis, quas etiam parva movent? Non magistratus nec sacerdotia nec triumphi nec insignia nec dona aut spolia bellica iis contingere possunt; munditiae et ornatus et cultus, haec feminarum insignia sunt, his gaudent et gloriantur, hunc mundum muliebrem appellarunt maiores nostri. Quid aliud in luctu quam purpuram atque aurum deponunt? Quid cum eluxerunt sumunt? Quid in [1] usu ed. Frobeniana 1535: usui B.

[2] iniustam ed. Frobeniana 1535: in his iustam B.
[3] manupretium Bekker: manui pretium B.

---

[1] So in Petronius (lxxi. 9), Trimalchio wishes himself to be represented on his monument wearing the accumulated distinctions won in his public career.

[2] Cf. vi. 14 and the note above,

[3] To balance Cato's pun on signa, Valerius makes one on it:[1] shall women and women alone be forbidden the B.C. 195 use of purple? And when you, a man, are allowed to have purple on your outer garment, will you not permit your wife to own a purple cloak, and will the trappings of your horse be more splendid than the dress of your wife? In the matter of purple, which is worn out and destroyed, I see some reason—not a good one, it is true—for niggardliness; but in regard to gold, in which there is no loss except the cost of manufacture, what spitefulness does the law show! It is rather a safeguard for use in both private and public emergency, as in fact you have experienced.[2] He said there would be no rivalry among individuals if no one owned anything. But, by Hercules, there is mourning and anger among all when they see the wives of allies of the Latin confederacy permitted the ornaments which are refused to them, when they see them decked out in gold and purple, when they see them riding through the city, and themselves following on foot, as if dominion resided in the Latin towns and not in Rome. A thing like this would hurt the feelings even of men: what do you think is its effect upon weak women, whom even little things disturb? No offices, no priesthoods, no triumphs, no decorations, no gifts, no spoils of war can come to them; elegance of appearance, adornment, apparel —these are the woman's badges of honour; in these they rejoice and take delight; these our ancestors called the woman's world.[3] What else do they lay aside in times of mourning than purple and jewellery? What do they put on when they have finished their time of mourning? What do they add save more mundus, which signifies both universe and adornment. See note on sect. 15 below.

A.U.C. 559

gratulationibus supplicationibusque nisi excellen-11 tiorem ornatum adiciunt? Scilicet, si legem Oppiam abrogaritis, non vestri arbitrii erit si quid eius vetare volueritis, quod nunc lex vetat; minus filiae, uxores, 12 sorores etiam quibusdam in manu erunt—numquam salvis suis exuitur servitus muliebris; et ipsae libertatem quam viduitas et orbitas facit detestantur.
13 In vestro arbitrio suum ornatum quam in legis malunt esse; et vos in manu et tutela, non in servitio debetis habere eas et malle patres vos aut viros
14 quam dominos dici. Invidiosis nominibus utebatur modo consul seditionem muliebrem et secessionem appellando. Id enim periculum est ne Sacrum montem, sicut quondam irata plebs, aut Aventinum capiant. Patiendum huic infirmitati est, quodcumque 15 vos censueritis. Quo plus potestis, eo moderatius imperio uti debetis."

VIII. Haec cum contra legem proque lege dicta essent, aliquanto maior frequentia mulierum postero
2 die sese in publicum effudit, unoque agmine omnes Brutorum ianuas obsederunt, qui collegarum rogationi intercedebant, nec ante abstiterunt quam
3 remissa intercessio ab tribunis est. Nulla deinde dubitatio fuit quin omnes tribus legem abrogarent. Viginti annis post abrogata est quam lata.

---

[1] Under the stricter Roman law, a woman was throughout life under the potestas of her father or his representative or the manus of her husband. Valerius makes the point that this domestic authority will be resumed in full with the repeal of the law, and that the same restrictions which the law provided can be enforced if desired.

[2] This pair of speeches seems to make an elaborate rhetorical exercise, with careful attention, at least in Cato's speech, to characterization of the speaker. It must be admitted, how-splendid jewels in times of congratulation and thanks- B.C. 195 giving? Of course, if you repeal the Oppian law, you will have no authority if you wish to forbid any of these things which now the law forbids; daughters, wives, even sisters of some will be less under control —never while their males survive is feminine slavery shaken off; and even they abhor the freedom which loss of husbands and fathers gives.[1] They prefer to have their finery under your control and not the law's; you too should keep them in control and guardianship and not in slavery, and should prefer the name of father or husband to that of master. The consul a while ago used words intended to create prejudice when he spoke of female 'sedition' and 'secession.' For the danger, he tells you, is that they will seize the Sacred Mount or the Aventine, as the angered plebeians once did: in reality their frail nature must endure whatever you decree. The greater the authority you exercise, the greater the self-restraint with which you should use your power."[2]

VIII. When these speeches against and for the bill had been delivered, the next day an even greater crowd of women appeared in public, and all of them in a body beset the doors of the Bruti, who were vetoing their colleagues' proposal, and they did not desist until the threat of veto was withdrawn by the tribunes. After that there was no question that all the tribes would vote to repeal the law. The law was repealed twenty years after it was passed.

ever, that the psychology of Cato is more cleverly presented than his style, for critics find little trace of the real Cato in the speech. None of the fragments of the actual speech of Cato (collected, e.g., in Meyer's Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, s.v.) is to be found in Livy.

A.U.C. 559

4 M. Porcius consul, postquam abrogata lex Oppia est, extemplo viginti quinque navibus longis, quarum quinque sociorum erant, ad Lunae portum profectus 5 est eodem exercitu convenire iusso et edicto per oram maritimam misso navibus omnis generis contractis ab Luna proficiscens edixit ut ad portum Pyrenaei sequerentur; inde se frequenti classe ad 6 hostes iturum. Praetervecti Ligustinos montes sinumque Gallicum ad diem quam dixerat convenerunt. Inde Rhodam ventum et praesidium 7 Hispanorum quod in castello erat vi deiectum. Ab Rhoda secundo vento Emporias perventum. Ibi copiae omnes praeter socios navales in terram expositae.

IX. Iam tunc Emporiae duo oppida erant muro divisa. Unum Graeci habebant, a Phocaea, unde et 2 Massilienses, oriundi, alterum Hispani; sed Graecum oppidum in mare expositum totum orbem muri minus quadringentos passus patentem habebat, Hispanis retractior a mare trium milium passuum 3 in circuitu murus erat. Tertium genus Romani coloni ab divo Caesare post devictos Pompei liberos adiecti. Nunc in corpus unum confusi omnes Hispanis prius, postremo et Graecis in civitatem 4 Romanam adscitis. Miraretur qui tum cerneret, aperto mare ab altera parte, ab altera Hispanis, tam fera et bellicosa gente, obiectis, quae res eos tutaretur. Disciplina erat custos infirmitatis, quam

---

[1] Since one of Pompey's sons fell in the battle of Munda (45 B.C.), the establishment of the colony was probably the work of Caesar (the other son of Pompey survived to contend with Augustus).

Marcus Porcius the consul, as soon as the Oppian law was abrogated, at once set out for the harbour of Luna with twenty-five warships, of which five belonged to the allies, having ordered his army to muster at the same place and sent a proclamation along the coast to collect ships of every kind; as he set out from Luna he issued an order that they should follow him to the port of Pyrenaeus, and thence he would proceed against the enemy with all the fleet. They sailed past the Ligurian mountains and the Gallic gulf and joined him on the day he had set. Thence they sailed to Rhoda and ejected by violence a guard of Spaniards that was in the fortress. From Rhoda with favouring winds they came to Emporiae, and there landed all the forces except the naval allies. B.C. 195

IX. Even at that time Emporiae consisted of two towns separated by a wall. One was inhabited by Greeks from Phocaea, whence came the Massilienses also, the other by the Spaniards; but the Greek town, being entirely open to the sea, had only a small extent of wall, of less than four hundred paces in length, while the Spaniards, who were farther back from the sea, had a wall three miles around. A third class of inhabitants, Roman colonists, was added by the deified Caesar [1] after the final defeat of the sons of Pompey, and at present all are fused into one mass, the Spaniards first, and later the Greeks, having been received into Roman citizenship. One who saw them at that time would wonder what secured the safety of the Greeks, with the open sea on one side and the Spaniards, so fierce and warlike a people, their neighbours on the other. Discipline was their protector against their weakness,

A.U.C. 559

5 inter validiores optime timor continet. Partem muri versam in agros egregie munitam habebant, una tantum in eam regionem porta imposita, cuius adsiduus custos semper aliquis ex magistratibus
6 erat. Nocte pars tertia civium in muris excubabat; neque moris causa tantum aut legis, sed quanta si hostis ad portas esset et servabant vigilias et circumibant cura. Hispanum neminem in urbem recipiebant; ne ipsi quidem temere urbe excedebant.
8 Ad mare patebat omnibus exitus. Porta ad Hispanorum oppidum versa numquam nisi frequentes, pars tertia fere, cuius proxima nocte vigiliae in muris
9 fuerant, egrediebantur. Causa exeundi haec erat: commercio eorum Hispani, imprudentes maris, gaudebant mercarique et ipsi ea quae externa navibus inveherentur et agrorum exigere fructus volebant. Huius mutui usus desiderium, ut Hispana urbs
10 Graecis pateret, faciebat. Erant etiam eo tutiores quod sub umbra Romanae amicitiae latebant quam sicut minoribus viribus quam Massilienses pari colebant fide. Tum quoque consulem exercitumque 11 comiter ac benigne acceperunt. Paucos ibi moratus dies Cato, dum exploraret ubi et quantae hostium copiae essent, ut ne mora quidem segnis esset, omne
12 id tempus exercendis militibus consumpsit. Id erat

[1] Livy may be thinking of the discipline enforced by circumstances upon cities like Sparta.

which among more vigorous peoples is best maintained when there is cause for fear.[1] The part of the wall which faced the interior they kept strongly fortified, with only a single gate leading in that direction, and at this one of the magistrates was posted as a continuous guard. At night a third of the citizens kept vigil on the walls; they did this not merely as a result of custom or in obedience to the law, but they posted their sentinels and sent out their patrols with all the care they would have used had the enemy been at their gates. No Spaniard was admitted to the city, nor did the Greeks themselves leave the city without good cause. Towards the sea the gates were open to all. Through the gate which led to the Spanish town they never passed except in large bodies, usually the third which had maintained the watch on the walls the night before. The cause of going out of the town was this: the Spaniards, who had no experience with the sea, enjoyed transacting business with them, and wanted both to buy the foreign merchandise which they brought in in their ships and to dispose of the products of their farms. The desire for the benefits of this interchange caused the Spanish city to be open to the Greeks. They were safer, too, for the reason that they were under the shelter of the Roman friendship, which they cultivated with resources inferior to those of the Massilienses but with equal devotion. At this time also they received the consul and his army with courtesy and kindness. Cato delayed there a few days, until he could find out where the forces of the enemy lay and what strength they possessed, and, not to be idle even in that time of waiting, he spent the whole period in drilling his B.C. 195

A.U.C. 559

forte tempus anni ut frumentum in areis Hispani haberent; itaque redemptoribus vetitis frumentum parare ac Romam dimissis "bellum" inquit "se 13 ipsum alet." Profectus ab Emporiis agros hostium urit vastatque, omnia fuga et terrore complet.

X. Eodem tempore M. Helvio decedenti ex ulteriore Hispania cum praesidio sex milium, dato ab Ap. Claudio praetore, Celtiberi agmine ingenti
2 ad oppidum Iliturgi occurrunt.[1] Viginti milia armatorum fuisse Valerius scribit, duodecim milia ex iis caesa, oppidum Iliturgi receptum et puberes omnes
3 interfectos. Inde ad castra Catonis Helvius pervenit et, quia tuta iam ab hostibus regio erat, praesidio in ulteriorem Hispaniam remisso Romam est profectus et ob rem feliciter gestam ovans urbem est ingressus.
4 Argenti infecti tulit in aerarium decem quattuor milia pondo septingenta triginta duo et signati bigatorum septendecim milia viginti tres et Oscensis argenti centum undeviginti milia quadringentos
5 undequadraginta. Causa triumphi negandi senatui fuit quod alieno auspicio et in aliena provincia pugnasset. Ceterum biennio post redierat, cum provincia successori Q. Minucio tradita annum insequentem retentus ibi longo et gravi fuisset morbo.
6 Itaque duobus modo mensibus ante Helvius ovans

[1] occurrunt ς: accurrunt B.

---

[1] Helvius had been governor of this province since 197 B.C. (XXXII. xxviii. 2); Claudius succeeded him in 195 B.C.

[2] Silver was produced in the region of Osca. The coins were probably Spanish denarii with Iberian inscriptions.

[3] In XXXIII. xxvi. 1 Minucius received the province of Nearer Spain, and so did not succeed Helvius. Probably troops. It happened to be the time of year when B.C. 195 the Spaniards had the grain on their threshing-floors; he therefore forbade the contractors to purchase any and sent them back to Rome, saying, "This war will support itself." Leaving Emporiae, he burned and laid waste the fields of the enemy and filled everything with flight and terror.

X. At the same time, as Marcus Helvius [1] was retiring from Farther Spain, accompanied by a guard of six thousand men furnished by Appius Claudius the praetor, the Celtiberi with a large force fell upon him near the town of Iliturgi. Valerius writes that there were twenty thousand men there, that twelve thousand of them were killed, the town of Iliturgi taken and all the adults put to death. After that Helvius came to the camp of Cato, and, because this region was now safe from the enemy, sent his guard back to Farther Spain and set out for Rome, and by reason of his victory entered the city in an ovation. He deposited in the treasury fourteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-two pounds of uncoined silver, seventeen thousand and twenty-three denarii stamped with the two-horse chariot, and one hundred and nineteen thousand four hundred and forty-nine silver coins of Osca.[2] The reason for the senate's refusal of a triumph was that he had fought under another's auspices and in another's province. But it was not until two years later that he had returned home, though he had turned his province over to his successor Quintus Minucius,[3] having been detained there the following year by a long and serious illness. So he entered Rome in an ovation Helvius accomplished little in his province and the confusion in the records resulted.

A.U.C. 559

urbem est ingressus quam successor eius Q. Minucius
7 triumpharet. Hic quoque tulit argenti pondo triginta quattuor milia octingenta et bigatorum septuaginta tria milia et Oscensis argenti ducenta septuaginta octo milia.

XI. In Hispania interim consul haud procul
2 Emporiis castra habebat. Eo legati tres ab Ilergetum regulo Bilistage, in quibus unus filius erat, venerunt querentes castella sua oppugnari nec spem ullam esse resistendi, nisi praesidium Romanus
3 misisset;[1] tria milia militum satis esse, nec hostes, si tanta manus venisset, mansuros. Ad ea consul moveri quidem se vel periculo eorum vel metu dicere;
4 sed sibi nequaquam tantum copiarum esse ut, cum magna vis hostium haud procul absit, et quam mox signis collatis dimicandum sit in dies expectet, dividendo exercitum minuere tuto vires possit.[2]
5 Legati, ubi haec audierunt, flentes ad genua consulis provolvuntur, orant ne se in rebus tam trepidis deserat: quo enim se, repulsos ab Romanis, ituros?
6 Nullos se socios, nihil usquam in terris aliud spei
7 habere. Potuisse se extra id periculum esse, si decedere fide, si coniurare cum ceteris voluissent. Nullis minis, nullis terriculis se motos, sperantes
8 satis opis et auxilii sibi in Romanis esse. Id si nullum sit, si sibi a consule negetur, deos hominesque se testes facere invitos et coactos se, ne eadem quae

[1] praesidium Romanus misisset Bekker: praesidium romanus missis et B: praesidio romanus miles esset M.
[2] possit Voss: posset B M.

---

[1] One of the loyal tribes (XXIX. ii. 5).

only two months before his successor Quintus Minucius celebrated his triumph. He too brought with him thirty-four thousand eight hundred pounds of silver and seventy-three thousand coined denarii and two hundred and seventy-eight thousand pieces of Oscan silver. B.C. 195

XI. Meanwhile in Spain the consul was encamped not far from Emporiae. Thither came from Bilistages, chieftain of the Ilergetes,[1] three ambassadors, one of whom was his son, complaining that their strongholds were being besieged and that there was no hope of offering resistance unless the Roman sent aid; three thousand soldiers were sufficient, and if so great a force arrived, the enemy would not await them. To this the consul replied that he was indeed moved both by their danger and their fear; but he had by no means enough troops, since a great number of the enemy was close at hand and he expected every day to have to meet them in pitched battle (he had no idea how soon), to allow him safely to weaken himself by dividing his army. When the ambassadors heard this, they wept and threw themselves at the consul's feet, and begged him not to abandon them in such a crisis: where would they turn, rejected by the Romans? They had no allies, no other hope anywhere in the world. They might have escaped the existing danger if they had been willing to violate their pledges and unite with the rest, but no threats and no prospects of danger had moved them, since they hoped to have a sufficient help and assistance in the Romans. If this were not the case, and they were refused by the consul, they called gods and men to witness that unwilling and under compulsion, to avoid the fate which the

A.U.C. 559

Saguntini passi sint patiantur, defecturos et cum ceteris potius Hispanis quam solos perituros esse.

XII. Et illo quidem die sic sine responso dimissi. Consulem nocte quae insecuta est anceps cura agitare; 2 nolle deserere socios, nolle minuere exercitum, quod aut moram sibi ad dimicandum aut in dimicando 3 periculum adferre posset. Stat sententia non minuere copias, ne quid interim hostes inferant ignominiae; sociis spem pro re ostentandam censet; 4 saepe vana pro veris, maxime in bello, valuisse, et credentem se aliquid auxilii habere, perinde atque haberet, ipsa fiducia et sperando atque audendo 5 servatum. Postero die legatis respondet,[1] quamquam vereatur ne suas vires aliis eas commodando minuat, tamen se illorum temporis ac periculi magis 6 quam sui rationem habere. Denuntiari militum parti tertiae ex omnibus cohortibus iubet, ut cibum quem in naves imponant mature coquant navesque 7 in diem tertium expediri.[2] Duos ex legatis Bilistagi atque Ilergetibus nuntiare ea iubet; filium reguli comiter habendo et muneribus apud se retinet. 8 Legati non ante profecti quam impositos in naves milites viderunt; id pro haud dubio iam nuntiantes non suos modo sed etiam hostes fama Romani auxilii adventantis impleverunt.

XIII. Consul, ubi satis quod in speciem fuit

[1] respondet Siesbye: respondit B M.
[2] expediri Perizonius: expediri iussit B.

Saguntines suffered, they would join the rebellion and perish with the rest of the Spaniards rather than alone. B.C. 195

XII. And on that day they were dismissed thus, unanswered. During the night which followed, a double care distressed the consul: he was unwilling to abandon his allies, unwilling to weaken his army, an action which might either delay his engaging or cause danger in the fight. His decision not to weaken his forces remained unchanged, lest he suffer the disgrace of defeat at the hands of the enemy; he determined to offer to the allies hope instead of actuality: often, and especially in war, appearances have had the effect of realities, and the man who believes that help is at hand acts as if he really had it, and by this very confidence, which inspires both hope and daring, is saved. On the following day he answered the ambassadors that, although he feared that he would diminish his own strength by lending part of it to them, yet he was paying regard to their emergency and peril rather than to himself. He ordered warning to be given to one-third of the soldiers of each cohort to cook food in good season and put it on board ship, and the ships to be made ready for sailing the third day. He directed two of the ambassadors to take this news to Bilistages and the Ilergetes; the chief's son he kept with him, persuading him with kindly treatment and with gifts. The ambassadors did not leave until they saw the soldiers marching on board the ships; reporting this as unquestioned fact, they filled not only their own people but also the enemy with the news of the approaching Roman aid.

XIII. The consul, when enough of a show had ostentatum est, revocari ex navibus milites iubet; 2 ipse, cum iam id tempus anni appeteret quo geri res possent, castra hiberna tria milia passuum ab Emporiis posuit. Inde per occasiones nunc hac parte nunc illa, modico praesidio castris relicto praedatum 3 milites in hostium agros ducebat. Nocte ferme proficiscebantur, ut et quam longissime a castris procederent et inopinantes opprimerent. Et exercebat ea res novos milites et hostium magna vis excipiebatur; nec iam egredi extra munimenta 4 castellorum audebant. Ubi satis ad hunc modum[1] et suorum et hostium animos est expertus, convocari tribunos praefectosque et equites omnes et cen- 5 turiones iussit. "Tempus" inquit "quod saepe optastis venit, quo vobis potestas fieret virtutem vestram ostendendi. Adhuc praedonum magis quam bel- 6 lantium militastis more; nunc iusta pugna hostes cum hostibus conferetis manus; non agros inde 7 populari sed urbium opes exhaurire licebit. Patres nostri, cum in Hispania[2] Carthaginiensium et imperatores et[3] exercitus essent, ipsi nullum in ea militem haberent, tamen addi hoc in foedere voluerunt, ut 8 imperii sui Hiberus fluvius esset finis; nunc cum duo praetores, cum consul, cum tres exercitus Romani Hispaniam obtineant, Carthaginiensium decem iam prope annis nemo in his provinciis sit, imperium nobis 9 citra Hiberum amissum est. Hoc armis et virtute

A.U.C. 559

[1] satis ad hunc modum Duker: admodum B: satis admodum ed. Moguntina 1518.
[2] in Hispania edd. vett.: Hispania B.
[3] et Gronovius: ibi et B.

[1] Cato economizes time by combining practice-marches with fighting, and increases the distance covered on each raid by beginning his march during the night.

been given to keep up appearances, ordered the B.C. 195
soldiers to disembark; and he himself, since now the time of the year was drawing near when active operations could be carried on, established a winter camp three miles from Emporiae. Thence as occasion offered, now in this direction and now in that, leaving small guards at the camp, he led the soldiers into the enemy's country to seek plunder. They usually set out at night, so as to march as far as possible from the camp and to take the enemy off their guard. By this means[1] he hardened his recruits and captured a great number of the enemy; no longer did they venture to go outside the fortifications of their stations. When he had in this way sufficiently tested the tempers of his own men and the enemy, he called into conference the tribunes and prefects and all the cavalry and centurions. "The time," he said, "which you have often longed for is at hand, when you will have the opportunity of making display of your courage. So far you have fought more like guerillas than like soldiers; now, foe facing foe, you will meet in regular battle. Henceforth you will be able, not to pillage country districts, but to drain the wealth of cities. Our fathers, when the Carthaginians had both generals and armies in Spain, and they themselves had not a single soldier here, still demanded that it be stated in the treaty that the Ebro river should be the boundary of their empire;[2] now, when there are two praetors, a consul, and three Roman armies stationed in Spain, and for nearly ten years no Carthaginian has been in these provinces, our empire on this side of the Ebro has been lost. This it is your task to recover

[2] See the note on XXXI. vii. 3.

A.U.C. 559

reciperetis oportet et nationem rebellantem magis temere quam constanter bellantem iugum quo se exuit accipere rursus cogatis." In hunc modum maxime adhortatus pronuntiat se nocte ad castra hostium ducturum. Ita ad corpora curanda dimissi.

XIV. Nocte media, cum auspicio operam dedisset, profectus, ut locum quem vellet priusquam hostes sentirent caperet, praeter castra hostium circumducit et prima luce acie instructa sub ipsum vallum tres cohortes mittit. Mirantes barbari ab tergo appa-ruisse Romanum discurrere et ipsi [1] ad arma. Interim consul apud suos " nusquam nisi in virtute spes est, milites," inquit " et ego sedulo ne esset feci. Inter castra nostra et nos medii hostes et ab tergo hostium ager est. Quod pulcherrimum idem tutissimum: in virtute spem positam habere." Sub haec cohortes recipi iubet, ut barbaros simulatione fugae eliceret. Id quod crediderat evenit. Pertimuisse et cedere rati Romanos porta erumpunt et quantum inter castra sua et aciem hostium relictum erat loci armatis complent. Dum trepidant acie instruenda, consul iam paratis ordinatisque omnibus incompositos adgreditur. Equites primos ab utroque cornu in pugnam induxit. Sed in dextro extemplo pulsi cedentesque trepidi etiam pediti terrorem intulere.

[1] et ipsi Duker: ipsi B.

with your arms and your daring, and to compel this nation, which is rather in rebellion rashly than warring with steadiness of purpose, to accept again the yoke which it has thrown off." After encouraging them in about this fashion, he announced that he would lead them against the enemy's camp that night, and so dismissed them to seek rest. B.C. 195

XIV. At midnight, after taking the auspices in due form, he set out, that he might choose the place he wished before the enemy was aware of his coming, led his troops beyond the camp of the enemy, and at daybreak, drawing up his line of battle, he sent three cohorts close to the very rampart. The barbarians, marvelling that the Romans had appeared in their rear, themselves ran to arms. Meanwhile the consul harangued his troops: "Nowhere, soldiers, is there any hope except in your courage, and I have deliberately acted so that there should be none. Between us and our camp is the enemy, and in the rear is the enemy's country. What is most glorious is also the safest: to place our hopes in valour." After this he ordered the cohorts recalled, to draw the enemy out of their camp by the pretence of flight. What he had anticipated occurred. Thinking that the Romans were retreating in terror, they rushed out of the gate and filled with soldiers all the space that was left between the camp and the enemy's battle-line. While they were in the confusion of forming their array, the consul, who had everything already prepared and in order, fell upon them in their disorder. The cavalry was the first to enter the battle on both flanks, but on the right they were at once repulsed, and retiring in fear they even caused a panic among the infantry. When the 7 Quod ubi consul vidit, duas cohortes delectas ab dextro latere hostium circumduci iubet et ab tergo se ostendere priusquam concurrerent peditum acies. 8 Is terror obiectus hosti rem metu Romanorum equitum inclinatam aequavit; tamen adeo turbati erant dextrae alae pedites equitesque ut quosdam consul 9 manu ipse reprenderit verteritque in hostem. Ita et quamdiu missilibus pugnatum est, anceps pugna erat, et iam ab dextra parte, unde terror et fuga 10 coeperat, aegre Romanus restabat; ab sinistro cornu et a fronte urgebantur barbari et cohortes a 11 tergo instantes pavidi respiciebant. Ut emissis soliferreis phalaricisque gladios strinxerunt, tum velut redintegrata est pugna. Non caecis ictibus procul ex improviso vulnerabantur, sed pede collato tota in virtute ac viribus spes erat.

A.U.C. 559

XV. Fessos iam suos consul ex secunda acie subsidiariis cohortibus in pugnam inductis accendit. 2 Nova acies facta; integri recentibus telis fatigatos adorti hostes primum acri impetu velut cuneo perculerunt, deinde dissipatos in fugam averterunt; 3 effuso per agros cursu castra repetebantur. Ubi omnia fuga completa vidit Cato, ipse ad secundam legionem, quae in subsidio posita erat, revehitur et signa prae se ferri plenoque gradu ad castra hostium 4 oppugnanda succedere iubet. Si quis extra ordinem consul observed this, he ordered two picked cohorts B.C. 195 to march around the right flank of the enemy and to show themselves in the rear before the infantry masses clashed. The alarm which thus confronted the enemy equalized the disadvantage caused by the flight of the Roman cavalry; but so greatly had the infantry and cavalry on the right flank been thrown into confusion that the consul himself seized with his hand some of them and turned them around to face the enemy. And so, as long as the fight was being carried on with missiles, the issue was uncertain; on the right, where the panic and flight had begun, the Roman resisted with difficulty, while on the left and in the centre the barbarians were hard pressed and looked back with dread at the cohorts which were coming up in their rear. When they drew their swords after hurling their darts and javelins, then the battle, so to speak, took on new life. For they no longer received unexpected random wounds from a distance, but closing foot to foot put all their hope in courage and in strength.

XV. As his men grew weary, the consul rekindled their spirits by bringing up reserve cohorts from the second line. A new line was established; fresh troops with unused weapons attacked the exhausted enemy and first, with a furious attack in wedge-formation, pushed them back, then scattered them and put them to flight; with headlong speed they made across the fields for camp. When Cato saw everything filled with confusion, he rode back to the second legion, which was in reserve, and ordered it to advance at quickened pace to attack the enemy's camp. If a soldier in too great eagerness got ahead of the rank, he himself rode up between the lines and avidius procurrit, et ipse interequitans sparo percutit et tribunos centurionesque castigare iubet. Iam castra oppugnabantur, saxisque et sudibus et omni genere telorum summovebantur a vallo Romani. Ubi recens admota legio est, tum et oppugnantibus animus crevit et infensius hostes pro vallo pugnabant. Consul omnia oculis perlustrat ut, qua minima vi resistatur, ea parte irrumpat. Ad sinistram portam infrequentes videt; eo secundae legionis principes hastatosque inducit. Non sustinuit impetum eorum statio quae portae apposita erat; et ceteri, postquam intra vallum hostem vident, ipsi castris exuti [1] signa armaque abiciunt. Caeduntur in portis, suomet ipsi agmine in arto haerentes. Secundani terga hostium caedunt, ceteri castra diripiunt. Valerius Antias supra quadraginta milia hostium caesa eo die scribit; Cato ipse, haud sane detrectator laudum suarum, multos caesos ait, numerum non adscribit.

A.U.C. 559

XVI. Tria eo die laudabilia fecisse putatur, unum, quod circumducto exercitu procul navibus suis castrisque, ubi spem nusquam nisi [2] in virtute habe-rent, inter medios hostes proelium commisit; alterum, quod cohortes ab tergo hostibus obiecit; tertium, quod secundam legionem ceteris omnibus effusis ad sequendos hostes pleno gradu sub signis compositam instructamque subire ad portam castrorum iussit.

[1] ipsi castris exuti ed. Moguntina 1518 : ipsi exsutis B.
[2] nusquam nisi Ussing : nisi B.

struck him with his spear-shaft, and ordered the tribunes and centurions to punish him. By this time the camp was being attacked and the Romans driven back from the rampart with stones and poles and every sort of missile. But when the new legion came up, the vigour of the attackers increased, and the enemy fought with greater desperation in defence of their rampart. The consul scanned everything with his gaze, that he might break through wherever the resistance was weakest. He saw that there were few defenders at the left gate, and there he led the principes and hastati of the second legion. The guard which was posted at the gate did not resist their onset; and the rest, seeing the enemy within the fortification, having lost their camp, likewise threw away their standards and arms. They were cut to pieces at the gates, where they were held fast in the narrow passages by their own numbers. The soldiers of the second legion attacked them in the rear, the rest plundered the camp. Valerius Antias relates that more than forty thousand of the enemy fell that day; Cato himself, a man not much inclined to be grudging in his own praise, says that many were killed, but does not give a definite number. B.C. 195

XVI. Three praiseworthy acts he is credited with having performed that day; first, that he had led the army around far from his ships and camp and engaged in the midst of the enemy, where his men had no hope except in their own courage; second, that he had thrown the cohorts against the enemy's rear; third, that he had ordered the second legion, when all the rest were disordered by their pursuit of the enemy, to march up to the gate of the camp at quickened pace but in orderly and disciplined formation under their

A.U.C. 559

3 Nihil deinde a victoria cessatum. Cum receptui signo dato suos [1] spoliis onustos in castra reduxisset, paucis horis noctis ad quietem datis ad praedandum 4 in agros duxit. Effusius, ut sparsis hostibus fuga, praedati sunt. Quae res non minus quam pugna pridie adversa Emporitanos Hispanos accolasque 5 eorum in deditionem compulit. Multi et aliarum civitatium, qui Emporias perfugerant, dediderunt se. Quos omnes appellatos benigne vinoque et cibo 6 curatos domos dimisit. Confestim inde castra movit, et quacumque incedebat agmen legati dedentium 7 civitates suas occurrebant, et cum Tarraconem venit, iam omnis cis Hiberum Hispania perdomita erat, captivique et Romani et socium ac Latini nominis, variis casibus in Hispania oppressi, donum 8 consuli a barbaris reducebantur. Fama deinde vulgatur consulem in Turdetaniam exercitum ducturum et ad devios montanos profectum etiam 9 falso perlatum est. Ad hunc vanum et sine auctore ullo rumorem Bergistanorum civitatis septem castella defecerunt. Eos educto [2] exercitu consul sine 10 memorando proelio in potestatem redegit.[3] Haud ita multo post eidem, regresso Tarraconem consule, priusquam inde quoquam procederet, defecerunt. Iterum subacti; sed non eadem venia victis fuit. Sub corona veniere omnes, ne saepius pacem sollicitarent.

[1] suos ς : suis B : milites M.
[2] eos educto Gronovius : eos deducto B : eo deducto M.
[3] redegit ς : redegat B : redigit M.

[1] There were apparently two districts of this name, one near Saguntum, the other, and more important, near the south-western coast and so outside Cato's province. It is evident, however, from xvii. 1 ff. that a co-ordinated campaign against the latter people was planned.

standards. Later on there was no resting idle after B.C. 195 his victory. When, after giving the signal to retire, he had led his men back to camp laden with booty, he gave them a few hours for rest and led them out to plunder. They ravaged more widely, since the enemy was scattered in flight. This had no less influence than the defeat of the previous day in causing the Spaniards of Emporiae and their neighbours to submit. Many citizens of other states as well, who had taken refuge in Emporiae, surrendered. All of these the consul treated kindly, and after refreshing them with wine and food sent them home. He then speedily moved his camp, and wherever the column went ambassadors met him, surrendering their cities, and by the time he reached Tarraco, all Spain on this side of the Ebro had been subdued, while captives, both Romans and Latins of the confederacy, who had been overtaken by various misfortunes in Spain, were brought in and presented to the consul by the barbarians. Then the story was circulated that the consul meant to lead the army into Turdetania,[1] and it was falsely reported to the mountaineers of the outlying districts that he had already set out. On this idle and unauthenticated rumour seven forts of the Bergistani [2] revolted, but the consul led out his army and reduced them to submission without any battle worth mentioning. A little later, when the consul had returned to Tarraco but before he moved from that place, the same peoples revolted and were again subdued, but the same indulgence was not granted to the conquered. They were all sold at auction, in order to prevent their disturbing the peace too frequently.

[2] This people cannot be located.

A.U.C. 559

XVII. Interim P. Manlius praetor exercitu vetere a Q. Minucio, cui successerat, accepto, adiuncto et Ap. Claudi Neronis ex ulteriore Hispania vetere item 2 exercitu, in Turdetaniam proficiscitur. Omnium Hispanorum maxime imbelles habentur Turdetani; freti tamen multitudine sua obviam ierunt agmini 3 Romano. Eques immissus turbavit extemplo aciem eorum. Pedestre proelium nullius ferme certaminis fuit; milites veteres, periti hostium bellique, haud 4 dubiam pugnam fecerunt. Nec tamen ea pugna debellatum est; decem milia Celtiberum mercede Turduli conducunt alienisque armis parabant bellum. 5 Consul interim rebellione Bergistanorum ictus, ceteras quoque civitates ratus per occasionem idem facturas, arma omnibus cis Hiberum Hispanis adimit. 6 Quam rem adeo aegre passi ut multi mortem sibimet ipsi consciscerent, ferox genus, nullam vitam rati 7 sine armis esse. Quod ubi consuli renuntiatum est, senatores omnium civitatium ad se vocari iussit atque iis " non nostra " inquit " magis quam vestra refert vos non rebellare, si quidem id maiore Hispanorum malo quam exercitus Romani labore semper adhuc 8 factum est. Id ut ne fiat, uno modo arbitror caveri 9 posse, si effectum erit ne possitis rebellare. Volo id quam mollissima via consequi. Vos quoque in ea re consilio me adiuvate. Nullum libentius sequar

---

[1] In XXXIII. xliii. 5–8, Livy says that Manlius was sent to Nearer Spain as adiutor consulis but had troops, including those formerly under Minucius, under his command. His situation was, then, quite irregular, and his operations outside his superior's province of questionable legality, and there may be some confusion with his subsequent appointment to Farther Spain in 182 B.C. (XL. i. 2).

XVII. Meanwhile Publius Manlius the praetor B.C. 195 had taken over the veteran army from Quintus Minucius whom he had succeeded, and uniting with it the army, also made up of veterans, of Appius Claudius Nero from Farther Spain, set out for Turdetania.[1] The Turdetani were considered the least warlike of all the Spaniards, yet, relying on their numbers, they went out to meet the Roman column. The cavalry, sent against them, at once broke their line, and the infantry engagement was almost no battle at all; the veteran soldiers, well acquainted with the enemy and his manner of fighting, rendered the result certain. Yet the war was not ended by that battle: the Turduli hired ten thousand Celtiberi and prepared to carry on the war with the weapons of strangers. The consul meanwhile, alarmed by the rebellion of the Bergistani, and thinking that other states as well would follow their example if occasion offered, disarmed all the Spaniards on this side of the Ebro. This action they took so hard that many committed suicide, a high-spirited people, who thought that life without arms was not worth living. When this was reported to the consul, he ordered the senators of all the states summoned to his presence and addressed them thus: "It is not more to our interest than to yours that you should not rebel, inasmuch as this has always happened with greater misfortune to the Spaniards than trouble to the Roman army. I think that there is only one way to prevent this—to arrange matters so that you will not be able to rebel. I wish to accomplish this in the gentlest possible manner. Do you, then, aid me with your advice on this matter. I shall follow no counsel more gladly than that which you your-

A.U.C. 559

10 quam quod vosmet ipsi attuleritis." Tacentibus spatium se ad deliberandum dierum paucorum dare
11 dixit. Cum revocati secundo quoque concilio tacuissent, uno die muris omnium dirutis, ad eos qui nondum parebant profectus, ut in quamque regionem venerat, omnes qui circa incolebant populos in deditionem 12 accepit. Segesticam tantum, gravem atque opulentam civitatem, vineis et pluteis cepit.

XVIII. Eo maiorem habebat difficultatem in subigendis hostibus quam qui primi venerant in Hispaniam, quod ad illos taedio imperii Cartha-
2 giniensium Hispani deficiebant, huic ex usurpata libertate in servitutem velut adserendi erant; et ita mota omnia accepit, ut alii in armis essent, alii obsidione ad defectionem cogerentur nec, nisi in tempore subventum foret, ultra sustentaturi fuerint.
3 Sed in consule ea vis animi atque ingenii fuit ut omnia maxima minimaque per se adiret atque ageret
4 nec cogitaret modo imperaretque, quae in rem essent, sed pleraque ipse per se transigeret nec in quemquam omnium gravius severiusque quam in semet ipsum
5 imperium exerceret, parsimonia et vigiliis et labore cum ultimis militum certaret nec quicquam in exercitu suo praecipui praeter honorem atque imperium haberet.

XIX. Difficilius bellum in Turdetania praetori P. Manlio Celtiberi mercede exciti ab hostibus,

---

[1] In servitutem adserere is the technical legal phrase for trying to establish in court the fact that one is owner of a slave (III. xliv. 5).

selves shall give me." When they were silent, he B.C. 195 said that he would give them a space of a few days for reflection. When they were recalled, and had kept silent at the second council also, on one day he destroyed the walls of all the towns and proceeded against those who were not yet submissive, and as he passed through region after region, he accepted the surrender of all the neighbouring states. Segestica alone, an important and rich city, he captured with sheds and mantlets.

XVIII. He had the greater difficulty in reducing the enemy than those who had first gone to Spain, because the Spaniards transferred their allegiance to his predecessors through weariness of the authority of the Carthaginians, but in his case the task was, so to speak, to claim them as slaves [1] after they had had a taste of liberty; and everything was in such commotion that some were in arms, some were being compelled by siege to join the uprising, and, unless prompt assistance were sent them, would not be able to hold out longer. But in the consul there was such vigour of mind and character that he attended to and performed all business, great and small, and he not only planned and gave orders for what was advantageous, but himself executed most of them; he exercised sterner and severer discipline over no one in all the army than over himself, and in frugality and vigilance and exertion he vied with the lowest of his soldiers, and except for his rank and his authority he enjoyed no distinction as compared with the rest of the army.

XIX. The Celtiberi who had been hired by the enemy, as has been said before, made the war in Turdetania more difficult for the praetor Publius

A.U.C. 559

sicut ante dictum est, faciebant. Itaque eo consul
2 accersitus litteris praetoris legiones duxit. Ubi eo venit, castra separatim Celtiberi et Turdetani habebant. Cum Turdetanis extemplo levia proelia incursantes in stationes eorum Romani facere semperque victores ex quamvis temere coepto
3 certamine abire. Ad Celtiberos in colloquium tribunos militum ire consul atque iis trium condicionum
4 electionem ferre iubet, primam, si transire ad Romanos velint et duplex stipendium accipere quam
5 quantum a Turdetanis pepigissent; alteram, si domos abire, publica fide accepta, nihil eam rem noxiae futuram quod hostibus se Romanorum 6 iunxissent; tertiam, si utique bellum placeat, diem locumque constituant ubi secum armis decernant.
7 A Celtiberis dies ad consultandum petita. Concilium immixtis Turdetanis habitum magno cum
8 tumultu; eo minus decerni quicquam potuit. Cum incerta bellum an pax cum Celtiberis essent, commeatus tamen haud secus quam in pace ex agris castellisque hostium Romani portabant, deni saepe munimenta eorum, velut communi pacto commercio, 9 privatis indutiis ingredientes. Consul ubi hostes ad pugnam elicere nequit, primum praedatum sub signis aliquot expeditas cohortes in agrum integrae regionis
10 ducit, deinde audito Saguntiae Celtiberum omnes sarcinas impedimentaque relicta, eo pergit ducere ad oppugnandum. Postquam nulla moventur re, Manlius. Therefore the consul, summoned by a message from the praetor, led his legions there. When he arrived, the Celtiberi and the Turdetani were in separate camps. With the Turdetani the Romans immediately began to skirmish, attacking their outguards, and they always came off victorious, no matter how rashly they had attacked. The consul ordered some of the military tribunes to go to confer with the Celtiberi and to offer them their choice of three proposals: first, if they wished to come over to the Roman side and receive twice the pay they had agreed to accept from the Turdetani; second, if they wished to go home after receiving a public pledge that the fact of their having joined the enemies of Rome should not cause them any damage; third, if battle was their desire under any conditions, that they should name a time and place for an armed settlement with him. The Celtiberi asked for time to consider the proposals. A council was held, at which the Turdetani crowded in, causing great excitement; for that reason a decision was impossible. Although it was uncertain whether their relation with the Celtiberi was one of war or peace, the Romans, nevertheless, just as if it were a time of peace, were bringing provisions from the farms and strongholds, often going in squads of ten into their fortifications under private truces, as if the right of trade had been officially recognized. When the consul failed to draw the enemy out to battle, he first sent certain light-armed cohorts out to ravage the fields of a region hitherto unattacked, then, hearing that the baggage and equipment of the Celtiberi was all at Saguntia, he proceeded to attack that town. When he found that nothing would B.C. 195

A.U.C. 559

persoluto stipendio non suis modo sed etiam praetoris militibus relictoque omni exercitu in castris praetoris ipse cum septem cohortibus ad Hiberum est regressus.

XX. Ea tam exigua manu oppida aliquot cepit. Defecere ad eum Sedetani, Ausetani, Suessetani. 2 Lacetanos, deviam et silvestrem gentem, cum insita feritas continebat in armis, tum conscientia, dum consul exercitusque Turdulo bello esset [1] occupatus, 3 depopulatorum subitis incursionibus sociorum. Igitur ad oppidum eorum oppugnandum consul ducit non Romanas modo cohortes sed iuventutem etiam merito 4 infensorum iis sociorum. Oppidum longum, in latitudinem haudquaquam tantundem patens habebant. Quadringentos inde ferme passus constituit 5 signa. Ibi delectarum cohortium stationem relinquens praecepit iis ne se ex eo loco ante moverent quam ipse ad eos venisset; ceteras copias ad ulteriorem partem urbis circumducit. Maximum ex omnibus auxiliis numerum Suessetanae iuventutis habebat; eos ad murum oppugnandum subire iubet. 6 Quorum ubi arma signaque Lacetani cognovere, memores quam saepe in agro eorum impune persultassent, quotiens ipsos signis collatis fudissent fugassentque, patefacta repente porta universi in 7 eos erumpunt. Vix clamorem eorum, nedum impetum, Suessetani tulere. Quod postquam, sicut 8 futurum ratus erat, consul fieri etiam vidit, equo citato subter murum hostium ad cohortes avehitur

[1] esset Madvig: est B M.

---

[1] The troops were usually paid only once during a campaign, usually at the end of the season.

provoke them to battle, he paid[1] not only his own B.C. 195 soldiers but those of the praetor and with seven cohorts (the rest being left in the praetor's camp) returned to the Ebro.

XX. With this small force he captured several towns. The Sedetani, the Ausetani, and the Suessetani came over to him. The Lacetani, a remote and forest-dwelling race, were kept under arms, partly by their native savageness, partly by their consciousness of having pillaged the allies in sudden raids while the consul and the army were engaged in the campaign in Turdetania. Therefore the consul led to the attack upon their citadel not only the Roman cohorts but the young men of the allies, who were justly incensed at them. Their town was long, but was not extensive in breadth in proportion. He halted at a distance of about four hundred paces from it. There he left a guard of chosen cohorts, ordering them not to stir from that place until he came to them in person; the rest of the troops he led to the farther side of the town. The largest contingent among all his auxiliaries was furnished by the young men of the Suessetani; these he ordered to assault the wall. When the Lacetani recognized their arms and standards, and recalled how often they had offered them insults with impunity in their own lands and how often they had routed them and put them to flight in pitched battle, they suddenly threw open the gate and attacked them in a body. The Suessetani scarcely waited for them to raise the shout, much less for them to charge. When the consul saw that this was turning out as he had expected it would, he put spurs to his horse and rode off under the enemy's wall to the

A.U.C. 559

atque eas arreptas, effusis omnibus ad sequendos
9 Suessetanos, qua silentium ac solitudo erat in urbem inducit priusque omnia cepit quam se reciperent Lacetani. Mox ipsos nihil praeter arma habentes in deditionem accepit.

XXI. Confestim inde victor ad Bergium castrum ducit. Receptaculum id maxime praedonum erat, et inde incursiones in agros pacatos provinciae eius
2 fiebant. Transfugit inde ad consulem princeps Bergistanus et purgare se ac populares coepit: non esse in manu ipsis rem publicam; praedones receptos
3 totum suae potestatis id castrum fecisse. Consul eum domum redire conficta aliqua probabili cur
4 afuisset causa iussit; cum se muros subisse cerneret intentosque praedones ad tuenda moenia esse, tum uti cum suae factionis hominibus meminisset arcem
5 occupare. Id uti praeceperat factum; repente anceps terror hinc muros ascendentibus Romanis, illinc arce capta barbaros circumvasit. Huius potitus loci consul eos qui arcem tenuerant liberos esse cum
6 cognatis suaque habere iussit, Bergistanos ceteros quaestori ut venderet imperavit, de praedonibus
7 supplicium sumpsit. Pacata provincia vectigalia magna instituit ex ferrariis argentariisque quibus
8 tum institutis locupletior in dies provincia fuit. Ob cohorts, and bringing them into action, since the B.C. 195 enemy had all scattered to pursue the Suessetani, he led them into the city on the side where all was silence and solitude and was in complete control before the Lacetani returned. Having nothing left to them but their arms, they presently surrendered.

XXI. The conqueror then quickly led his troops to the fort of Bergium. This was now primarily a nest of robbers, and from it raids were being made on the pacified districts of this province. A leader of the Bergistani escaped from it to the consul and began to apologize for himself and his fellow-citizens: their own state was not under their control, he said; the robbers, once admitted to the town, had brought it completely under their own dominion. The consul directed him to go back home, having provided himself with a plausible explanation for his absence; when he should see the Romans approaching the walls and the robbers intent on defending the fortifications, he, with the men of his own party, would remember to seize the citadel. This was done according to instructions; suddenly a double terror gripped the barbarians, as on one side the Romans were climbing the walls and on the other the citadel had been taken. The consul took possession of the place and ordered the men who had occupied the citadel and their relatives to be free, and to enjoy possession of their property, and, directing the quaestor to sell the other Bergistani, he put the robbers to death. Having restored order in the province, he arranged for the collection of large revenues from the iron and silver mines, and as a result of the regulations made at that time the wealth of the province increased every day.

A.U.C. 559

has res gestas in Hispania supplicationem in triduum patres decreverunt.

XXII. Eadem aestate alter consul L. Valerius Flaccus in Gallia cum Boiorum manu propter Litanam
2 silvam signis collatis secundo proelio conflixit. Octo milia Gallorum caesa traduntur; ceteri omisso
3 bello in vicos suos atque agros dilapsi. Consul reliquum aestatis circa Padum Placentiae et Cremonae exercitum habuit restituitque quae in iis oppidis bello diruta fuerant.
4 Cum hic status rerum in Italia Hispaniaque esset, T. Quinctio in Graecia ita hibernis actis ut exceptis Aetolis, quibus nec pro spe victoriae praemia contigerant, nec diu quies placere poterat, universa Graecia simul pacis libertatisque perfruens bonis egregie statu suo gauderet nec magis in bello vir-
5 tutem Romani ducis quam in victoria temperantiam iustitiamque et moderationem miraretur, senatus consultum quo bellum adversus Nabim Lacedae-
6 monium decretum erat adfertur. Quo lecto Quinctius conventum Corinthum omnium sociarum civitatium legationibus in diem certam edicit. Ad quam ubi frequentes undique principes convenerunt, ita uti ne [1] Aetoli quidem abessent, tali oratione est usus:
7 "Bellum adversus Philippum non magis communi animo consilioque Romani et Graeci gesserunt quam

[1] uti ne Kreyssig: ut in ea B.

---

[1] The sources for the foregoing account of the Spanish campaign are the annalists and, probably, Cato himself. To what extent the language and style of the passage have been influenced by Cato's own work has not been determined. With xxii. 4 Polybius becomes Livy's main source.

[2] In XXXIII. xlv. 3 Livy says that the decision was left

By reason of these achievements in Spain the Fathers B.C. 194 decreed a thanksgiving for three days.[1]

XXII. During the same summer the other consul, Lucius Valerius Flaccus, engaged in pitched battle with a force of the Boi near the forest of Litana and defeated them. Eight thousand of the Gauls are said to have fallen; the rest gave up the war and scattered to their villages and fields. For the rest of the summer the consul kept his army at Placentia and Cremona, in the neighbourhood of the Po, and rebuilt the parts of those cities which had been destroyed in the war.

While this was the state of affairs in Italy and Spain, Titus Quinctius had spent the winter in Greece in such a fashion that, with the exception of the Aetolians, who had neither gained rewards of victory in proportion to their hopes nor proved able to be long satisfied with quiet, all Greece, enjoying to the full the blessings of peace and liberty combined, was happy in its condition, and admired the Roman commander's bravery in war no more than his self-control, justice, and moderation after victory, and at this time the decree of the senate which declared war against Nabis the Lacedaemonian was delivered to him.[2] When he had read this decree, Quinctius announced a council, to be held at Corinth on a designated day, and made up of delegations from all the allied states. When the prominent men in great numbers had come from all quarters to this meeting, not even the Aetolians being unrepresented, he addressed them as follows: "The war against Philip was waged by the Romans and Greeks with feelings in the hands of Quinctius, and the following narrative is based on that assumption.

A.U.C. 559

8 utrique suas causas belli habuerunt. Nam et Romanorum amicitiam nunc Carthaginienses hostes 9 eorum iuvando, nunc hic sociis nostris oppugnandis violaverat et in vos talis fuit ut nobis, etiam si nostrarum oblivisceremur iniuriarum, vestrae iniuriae satis digna causa belli fuerit. Hodierna consultatio 10 tota ex vobis pendet. Refero enim ad vos utrum Argos, sicut scitis ipsi, ab Nabide occupatos pati 11 velitis sub dicione eius esse, an aequum censeatis nobilissimam vetustissimamque civitatem, in media Graecia sitam, repeti in libertatem et eodem statu quo ceteras urbes Peloponnesi et Graeciae esse. 12 Haec consultatio, ut videtis, tota de re pertinente ad vos est; Romanos nihil contingit, nisi quatenus liberatae Graeciae unius civitatis servitus non plenam 13 nec integram gloriam esse sinit. Ceterum, si vos nec cura eius civitatis nec exemplum nec periculum movet, ne serpat latius contagio eius mali, nos aequi bonique facimus. De hac re vos consulo, staturus eo quod plures censueritis."

XXIII. Post orationem Romani imperatoris per- 2 censeri aliorum sententiae coeptae sunt. Cum legatus Atheniensium quantum poterat gratiis agendis Romanorum in Graeciam merita extulisset, 3 " imploratos [1] adversus Philippum tulisse opem, non rogatos ultro adversus tyrannum Nabim offerre and aims no less common than their several reasons B.C. 195 for entering the war. For he had violated his friendship with the Romans, now by aiding their enemies the Carthaginians, now by attacking our allies in this country, and towards you he conducted himself in such a way that your wrongs, even if we did not remember our own injuries, were a sufficiently good reason why we should take up the quarrel. To-day's decision depends entirely on you. I lay before you the question whether you wish to permit Argos, which, as you know, has been seized by Nabis, to remain under his control, or whether you think it proper that this most famous and ancient city, situated in the heart of Greece, should be restored to liberty and enjoy the same condition as the other cities of the Peloponnesus and Greece. This question, as you see, is one which is altogether your concern; it does not touch the Romans at all, except in so far as the slavery of one city of liberated Greece does not permit their fame to be perfect and complete. But if no concern for that city nor the example thus set nor the danger that the contagion of that evil may spread affects you, that is, so far as we are concerned, well and good. I ask your opinions on this matter, and shall abide by whatever decision the majority of you shall reach."

[1] imploratos Voss: imploratos auxilium B.

XXIII. After this speech from the Roman commander, they began to ascertain the views of the others. When the Athenian ambassador had, to the extent of his capacity, and with effusive thanks, extolled the Romans' services to Greece, saying that "when appealed to they had given aid against Philip, and were of their own accord and without an appeal offering assistance against Nabis," and had auxilium" indignatusque esset haec tanta merita sermonibus tamen aliquorum carpi futura calumniantium, cum fateri potius praeteritorum gratiam deberent, apparebat incessi Aetolos. Igitur Alexander, princeps gentis, invectus primum in Athenienses, libertatis quondam duces et auctores, adsentationis propriae gratia communem causam prodentes, questus deinde[1] Achaeos, Philippi quondam milites, ad postremum inclinata fortuna eius transfugas, et Corinthum recepisse et id agere ut Argos habeant, Aetolos, primos hostes Philippi, semper socios Romanorum, pactos in foedere suas urbes agrosque fore devicto Philippo, fraudari Echino et Pharsalo, insimulavit fraudis Romanos quod vano titulo libertatis ostentato Chalcidem et Demetriadem praesidiis tenerent, qui Philippo cunctanti deducere inde praesidia obicere semper soliti sint[2] "numquam, donec Demetrias Chalcisque et Corinthus tenerentur, liberam Graeciam fore," postremo quia manendi in Graecia retinendique exercitus Argos et Nabim causam facerent. Deportarent legiones in Italiam; Aetolos polliceri aut condicionibus et voluntate sua Nabim praesidium Argis deducturum aut vi atque armis coacturos in potestate consentientis Graeciae esse.

A.U.C. 559

[1] deinde Aldus: deinde est B.
[2] sint: sunt B M.

[1] See XXXIII. xiii. 7–13 and the notes.

lamented that these services, great as they were, B.C. 198 were nevertheless criticized in the talk of certain persons who threw out dark hints about the future, though they should rather be confessing their gratitude for the past, it was clear that he was attacking the Aetolians. Therefore Alexander, a leading man of that people, assailed first the Athenians, once the leaders and champions of liberty, now the betrayers of the common cause from their desire to win a place for themselves by adulation, then he complained that the Achaeans, the one-time soldiers of Philip, then finally deserters from him as his fortunes declined, had regained Corinth and in addition were trying to obtain Argos, while the Aetolians, foes to Philip from the beginning, allies to the Romans at all times, although they had agreed in the treaty [1] that the cities and fields were to be theirs when Philip was defeated, were being cheated out of Echinus and Pharsalus; he also charged the Romans with deceit, in that, while they held out the empty name of liberty, they were holding with their garrisons Chalcis and Demetrias, despite the fact that they had been wont to object, when Philip hesitated to withdraw his troops from these towns, that "while Demetrias and Chalcis and Corinth were in his hands, Greece would never be free," and finally, in that they were making Argos and Nabis an excuse for remaining in Greece and keeping their army there. Let them, he said, transport their legions to Italy; adding that the Aetolians promised either that Nabis would withdraw his garrison from Argos voluntarily and under terms imposed by them, or that they would compel him by force of arms to yield to the will of united Greece.

A.U.C. 559

XXIV. Haec vaniloquentia primum Aristaenum, 2 praetorem Achaeorum, excitavit. "Ne istuc" inquit "Iuppiter optimus maximus sirit Iunoque regina, cuius in tutela Argi sunt, ut illa civitas inter tyrannum Lacedaemonium et latrones Aetolos praemium sit posita in eo discrimine ut miserius a vobis recipiatur 3 quam ab illo capta est. Mare interiectum ab istis praedonibus non tuetur nos, T. Quincti; quid si in media Peloponneso arcem sibi fecerint futurum nobis est? Linguam tantum Graecorum habent, sicut 4 speciem hominum; moribus ritibusque efferatioribus quam ulli barbari, immo quam immanes beluae vivunt. Itaque vos rogamus, Romani, ut et ab Nabide Argos reciperetis et ita res Graeciae constituatis ut ab latrocinio quoque Aetolorum satis 5 pacata haec relinquatis." Romanus, cunctis undique increpantibus Aetolos, responsurum se fuisse iis dixit, nisi ita infensos omnes in eos videret ut sedandi 6 potius quam irritandi essent. Contentum itaque opinione ea quae de Romanis Aetolisque esset, referre se dixit quid de Nabidis bello placeret, nisi 7 redderet Achaeis Argos. Cum omnes bellum decressent, auxilia ut pro viribus suis quaeque civitates mitterent est hortatus. Ad Aetolos legatum etiam misit, magis ut nudaret animos, id quod evenit, quam spe impetrari posse.

XXV. Tribunis militum ut exercitum ab Elatia

---

[1] Iuno Acraea or Iuno Argiva may be meant; cf. XXXII. xxiii. 10. Iuno Regina was more specifically a Roman divinity, as is Iuppiter Optimus Maximus, but is not out of place on the lips of an Argive who was under the protection of Iuno.

XXIV. This boastful speech first provoked Aristae- B.C. 195 nus, praetor of the Achaeans, to speak: "May Jupiter Optimus Maximus and Queen Juno,[1] under whose protection Argos is, forbid that that city be the prize to be contended for by the Spartan tyrant and the Aetolian robbers, in such a critical moment that its recovery by you would be a greater misery than its possession by him. The sea that lies between does not protect us from those brigands, Titus Quinctius; what will become of us if they establish their citadel in the heart of the Peloponnesus? They have only the tongue of Greeks, as they have only the shape of men; they live under rules and practices more savage than any barbarians, yes, than any wild beasts. Therefore we beg you, Romans, both to recover Argos from Nabis and to establish the affairs of Greece in such a way as to leave us well protected from the brigandage of the Aetolians as well." When men from all sides were uniting in censuring the Aetolians, the Roman said that he would have answered them, did he not see that all men were so enraged at them that they required to be soothed rather than provoked. He said that he was content with the opinions expressed about the Romans and the Aetolians, and therefore put the question what they would do about a war against Nabis if he would not give Argos back to the Achaeans. When a unanimous decree for war had been passed, he urged them that each state should send auxiliaries in proportion to its strength. He even sent an ambassador to the Aetolians, more for the purpose of laying bare their intentions (and in this he succeeded) than from the hope that he could gain their adherence.

XXV. He ordered the tribunes of the soldiers to

A.U.C. 559

2 arcesserent imperavit. Per eosdem dies et Antiochi legatis de societate agentibus respondit nihil se absentibus decem legatis sententiae habere; Romam
3 eundum ad senatum iis esse. Ipse copias adductas ab Elatia ducere Argos pergit; atque ei circa Cleonas Aristaenus praetor cum decem milibus Achaeorum, equitibus mille occurrit, et haud procul inde iunctis
4 exercitibus posuerunt castra. Postero die in campum Argivorum descenderunt et quattuor ferme milia
5 ab Argis locum castris capiunt. Praefectus praesidii Laconum erat Pythagoras, gener idem tyranni et uxoris eius frater, qui sub adventum Romanorum et utrasque arces—nam duas habent Argi—et loca alia quae aut opportuna aut suspecta erant validis prae-
6 sidiis firmavit; sed inter haec agenda pavorem iniectum adventu Romanorum dissimulare haudquaquam poterat; et ad externum terrorem intestina
7 etiam seditio accessit. Damocles erat Argius, adulescens maioris animi quam consilii, qui primo, iureiurando interposito, de praesidio expellendo cum idoneis conlocutus, dum vires adicere coniurationi
8 studet, incautior fidei aestimator fuit. Conloquentem eum cum suis satelles a praefecto missus cum accerseret, sensit proditum consilium esse hortatusque
9 est [1] coniuratos qui aderant, ut potius quam extorti morerentur, arma secum caperent. Atque ita cum

[1] hortatusque est Kreyssig: hortatusque B.

---

[1] Elatia was the regular winter headquarters of Flamininus; cf. XXXIII. xxvii. 5.

[2] Nabis had married Apega, probably the sister of Pythagoras (XXXII. xl. 10–11; Polyb. XVIII. xvii.; cf. XIII. vii); Pythagoras in turn had married the daughter of Nabis.

summon the army from Elatia.[1] About this time, B.C. 195 too, ambassadors from Antiochus arrived to discuss an alliance, but received the reply that he had nothing to say in the absence of the ten commissioners; it would be necessary for them to go to Rome and apply to the senate. He then proceeded to lead the assembled forces from Elatia towards Argos, and in the vicinity of Cleonae Aristaenus the praetor met him with ten thousand Achaean infantry and one thousand cavalry, and uniting their forces they encamped a short distance away. The next day they marched down into the plain of the Argives and selected for their camp a position about four miles from Argos. The commander of the Spartan garrison was Pythagoras, at once the son-in-law and brother-in-law of the tyrant,[2] and at the approach of the Romans he posted strong guards on both citadels (for Argos has two citadels) and likewise on other places that were favourably situated or open to attack; but while he was taking this action he could not conceal the fear which the coming of the Romans caused, and on top of the danger from outside there was also a mutiny within. There was an Argive named Damocles, a young man of greater spirit than discretion, who, after exchanging oaths, began conferring with suitable persons regarding expelling the garrison, and, in his desire to add strength to his conspiracy, proved to be too careless in his estimation of fidelity. When an agent sent by the prefect summoned him as he was talking to one of his party, he perceived that the plot had been betrayed and urged the conspirators who were with him to join him in armed resistance rather than perish under torture. And so with a few of his friends he rushed

A.U.C. 559 paucis in forum pergit ire clamitans ut qui salvam rem publicam vellent auctorem et ducem se libertatis
10 sequerentur. Haud sane movit quemquam, quia nihil usquam spei propinquae, nedum satis firmi 11 praesidii cernebant. Haec vociferantem eum Lacedaemonii circumventum cum suis interfecerunt.
12 Comprensi deinde quidam et alii. Ex iis occisi plures, pauci in custodiam coniecti; multi [1] proxima nocte funibus per murum demissi ad Romanos perfugerunt.

XXVI. Quinctius adfirmantibus iis, si ad portas
2 exercitus Romanus fuisset, non sine effectu futurum eum motum fuisse et, si propius castra admoverentur, non quieturos Argivos, misit expeditos pedites equitesque, qui circa Cylarabim—gymnasium id est minus
3 trecentos passus ab urbe—cum erumpentibus a porta Lacedaemoniis proelium commiserunt atque eos haud magno certamine compulerunt in urbem. Et castra eo ipso loco ubi pugnatum erat imperator
4 Romanus posuit. Diem inde unum in speculis fuit, si quid novi motus oreretur; postquam oppressam metu civitatem vidit advocat consilium de oppug-
5 nandis Argis. Omnium principum Graeciae praeter Aristaenum eadem sententia erat, cum causa belli non alia esset, inde potissimum ordiendum bellum.[2]
6 Quinctio id nequaquam placebat, et Aristaenum contra omnium consensum disserentem cum haud
7 dubia approbatione audivit; et ipse adiecit, cum pro

[1] multi Ascensius: om. B.
[2] ordiendum bellum ed. Frobeniana 1535: ordiendi belli B: ordiundi bellum M.

into the forum, crying out that all who wished the B.C. 195 safety of the state should follow him as the sponsor and leader of freedom. He roused almost no one, since they saw no immediate prospect of success anywhere, and not even any considerable material strength. As he was uttering such appeals, the Lacedaemonians surrounded him and his party and put them to death. Then some of the others were arrested, and most of these were executed, a few imprisoned. During the following night many let themselves down over the wall by means of ropes and took refuge with the Romans.

XXVI. When these men assured him that if the Roman army had been at the gates the uprising would not have been so futile, and that the Argives would not remain quiet if he moved his camp nearer the city, Quinctius sent the light infantry and cavalry, who engaged with a party of Lacedaemonians who rushed out of the gate near Cylarabis—a gymnasium less than three hundred paces from the city—and without great effort drove them back into the town. Then the Roman general placed his camp on the spot where the battle had occurred. He spent the next day watching to see if any new disturbance would arise; when he saw that the state had been overawed he called a council to consider laying siege to Argos. The opinion of all the Greek chieftains except Aristaenus was the same, that since there was no other cause for the war than that city, the war should by preference begin there. Quinctius was by no means of the same opinion, and he listened with unmistakable approval to the argument of Aristaenus, which was opposed to this generally held view; and he even asked what, since the war had

A.U.C. 559

Argivis adversus tyrannum bellum susceptum sit, quid minus conveniens esse quam omisso hoste Argos 8 oppugnari? Se vero caput belli Lacedaemonem et tyrannum petiturum. Et dimisso consilio frumentatum expeditas cohortes misit. Quod maturi erat circa, demessum et convectum est; viride, ne hostes mox haberent, protritum et corruptum.
9 Castra deinde movit et Parthenio superato monte praeter Tegeam tertio die ad Caryas posuit castra. Ibi priusquam hostium intraret agrum sociorum
10 auxilia expectavit. Venerunt Macedones a Philippo mille et quingenti et Thessalorum equites quadringenti. Nec iam auxilia, quorum adfatim erat, sed commeatus finitimis urbibus imperati morabantur 11 Romanum. Navales quoque magnae copiae conveniebant; iam ab Leucade L. Quinctius quadraginta navibus venerat, iam Rhodiae duodeviginti tectae naves, iam Eumenes rex circa Cycladas insulas erat cum decem tectis navibus, triginta lembis mixtisque aliis minoris formae navigiis.
12 Ipsorum quoque Lacedaemoniorum exules permulti, tyrannorum iniuria pulsi, spe reciperandae patriae in 13 castra Romana convenerunt. Multi autem erant, iam per aliquot aetates, ex quo tyranni tenebant 14 Lacedaemonem, alii ab aliis expulsi. Princeps erat exulum Agesipolis, cuius iure gentis regnum Lacedaemone erat, pulsus infans ab Lycurgo tyranno post

---

[1] The next sentence reveals the exaggeration of the statement: Cleomenes was tyrant during the period 235–221 B.C. (Polyb. II. xlvii).

been undertaken for the sake of the Argives and against the tyrant, was less consistent than to let the enemy alone and attack Argos? For his part, he would seek the main objective of the war, Sparta and the tyrant. Accordingly he dismissed the council and sent light cohorts out to forage. The ripe grain was harvested and brought into camp; the unripe was trampled down and destroyed, to prevent the enemy from enjoying it later. Then he moved his camp and crossing Mount Parthenius and passing Tegea he encamped on the third day near Caryae. There, before he entered the enemy's country he waited for the auxiliaries of the allies. Fifteen hundred Macedonians came from Philip and four hundred Thessalian cavalry. It was no longer auxiliaries, of whom there were plenty, that delayed the Roman commander, but the supplies that the neighbouring states had been ordered to contribute. Also, great fleets were assembling: Lucius Quinctius had now arrived from Leucas with forty ships, together with eighteen warships of the Rhodians, and King Eumenes was off the Cyclades islands with ten warships, thirty cruisers and with them other vessels of smaller size. Many exiles of the Lacedaemonians, driven out by the misdeeds of the tyrants, also came to the Roman camp in the hope of being restored to their homes. There were many who had been driven out by one tyrant or another, through the several generations[1] which had elapsed since tyrants first got control of Sparta. The chief of the exiles was Agesipolis, to whom the throne of Lacedaemon belonged by right of birth, who had been exiled in his childhood by the tyrant Lycurgus after the death of Cleomenes, B.C. 195

A.U.C. 559 mortem Cleomenis, qui primus tyrannus Lacedaemone fuit.

XXVII. Cum terra marique tantum belli circumstaret tyrannum, et prope nulla spes esset vere suas hostiumque aestimanti vires, non tamen omisit bellum, sed a Creta mille delectos iuventutis eorum excivit, cum mille iam haberet, et tria milia mercenariorum militum, decem milia popularium cum castellanis agrestibus in armis habuit et fossa valloque urbem communivit; et ne quid intestini motus oreretur, metu et acerbitate poenarum tenebat animos quoniam ut salvum vellent tyrannum sperare non poterat. Cum suspectos quosdam civium haberet, eductis in campum omnibus copiis—Dromon ipsi vocant—positis armis ad contionem vocari iubet Lacedaemonios atque eorum contioni satellites armatos circumdedit; et pauca praefatus, cur sibi omnia timenti caventique ignoscendum in tali tempore foret, et ipsorum referre si quos suspectos status praesens rerum faceret, prohiberi potius ne quid moliri possint quam puniri molientes; itaque quosdam se in custodia habiturum donec ea quae instet tempestas praetereat; hostibus repulsis, a quibus, si modo proditio intestina satis caveatur, minus periculi esse, extemplo eos emissurum; sub who had been the first to hold the tyranny in Sparta. B.C. 195

XXVII. When so great a war on land and sea was threatening the tyrant, though on a true estimate of his own strength and that of the enemy he could see almost no hope of success, he nevertheless did not neglect his preparations for war, but summoned from Crete a thousand of their chosen youths, in addition to a thousand who were already with him; he had also in his force three thousand mercenaries and ten thousand of his own countrymen along with the rural guards, and he fortified the city with a moat and rampart. To prevent any internal disorder, he held the people in check with terror and severe punishments, since he could not hope that they would wish well to a tyrant. Since he entertained suspicions regarding certain citizens, he led out his entire force into a plain—they call it Dromos —and stacking arms bade the Spartans to be summoned to a meeting and surrounded the gathering with armed guards. Then he made some brief opening remarks, showing why he should be pardoned in such an emergency, when he feared everything and guarded against everything, and that it was to their own interest, if the present state of affairs made him suspect certain citizens, that these persons should be prevented from making any attempt upon him rather than punished for making the attempt; he would accordingly hold certain persons under guard until the storm which was threatening should pass; when the enemy was driven off—and there was less danger from them if only internal treachery could be prevented—he would at once release them; after this he ordered the

A.U.C. 559 haec citari nomina octoginta ferme principum iuventutis iussit atque eos, ut quisque ad nomen responderat, in custodiam tradidit; nocte insequenti 9 omnes interfecti. Ilotarum deinde quidam—hi sunt iam inde antiquitus castellani, agreste genus—transfugere voluisse insimulati per omnes vicos sub verberibus acti necantur. Hoc terrore obstipuerant multitudinis animi ab omni conatu novorum con- 10 siliorum. Intra munitiones copias continebat, nec parem se ratus, si dimicare acie vellet, et urbem relinquere tam suspensis, et incertis omnium animis metuens.

XXVIII. Quinctius satis iam omnibus paratis profectus ab stativis die altero ad Sellasiam super Oenunta fluvium pervenit, quo in loco Antigonus, Macedonum rex, cum Cleomene, Lacedaemoniorum 2 tyranno, signis collatis dimicasse dicebatur. Inde cum audisset descensum difficilis et artae viae esse, brevi per montes circuitu praemissis qui munirent viam, lato satis et patenti limite ad Eurotam amnem, 3 sub ipsis prope fluentem moenibus, pervenit. Ubi castra metantes Romanos Quinctiumque ipsum cum equitibus atque expeditis praegressum auxiliares tyranni adorti in terrorem ac tumultum coniecerunt nihil tale expectantes, quia nemo iis obvius toto itinere 4 fuerat, ac velut pacato agro transierant. Aliquamdiu peditibus equites, equitibus pedites vocantinames of about eighty of the most prominent young men to be read, and each one, as he answered to his name, was turned over to the guards; during the next night he put them all to death. Then some of the Ilotae,[1] a rural people, who had been country-dwellers from remote antiquity, were charged with trying to desert, driven with whips through all the streets, and put to death. By thus inspiring fear he stunned the minds of the crowd and prevented any attempt at revolution. He kept his troops within the walls, thinking himself unequal to the enemy, if he should dare to risk a battle, and fearing to leave the city while all men's minds were in such suspense and uncertainty. B.C. 195

[1] Probably a variant on the more familiar Helots.

XXVIII. Quinctius had now made adequate preparations and had left his base and on the second day arrived at Sellasia above the Oenus river, at which place it was said that Antigonus, king of the Macedonians, had contended in pitched battle with Cleomenes, the tyrant of the Lacedaemonians. Having learned that the descent was through a difficult and narrow pass, he sent men ahead to build a road over a short bypass over the mountains, and came by a sufficiently wide and open way to the river Eurotas, which flows almost under the very walls of the city. When the Romans were laying out their camp and Quinctius himself with the cavalry and light infantry had gone on ahead, the auxiliary forces of the tyrant attacked and threw them into panic and disorder, since they anticipated no such event, because no enemy had shown himself on their entire march and they had passed through an apparently peaceful country. For a time there was confusion as the cavalry called to the infantry and the infantry

A.U.C. 559

bus, cum in se cuique minimum fiduciae esset, trepidatum est; tandem signa legionum super- 5 venerunt et, cum primi agminis cohortes inductae in proelium essent, qui modo terrori fuerant, trepi- 6 dantes in urbem compulsi sunt. Romani, cum tantum a muro recessissent ut extra ictum teli essent, acie derecta [1] paulisper steterunt; postquam nemo 7 hostium contra exibat, redierunt in castra. Postero die Quinctius prope flumen praeter urbem sub ipsas Menelai montis radices ducere copias instructas pergit; primae legionariae cohortes ibant, levis 8 armatura et equites agmen cogebant. Nabis intra murum instructos paratosque sub signis habebat mercennarios milites, in quibus omnis fiducia erat, 9 ut ab tergo hostem adgrederetur. Postquam extremum agmen praeteriit, tum ab oppido, eodem quo pridie eruperant, tumultu pluribus simul locis 10 erumpunt. Ap. Claudius agmen cogebat; qui ad id quod futurum erat, ne inopinatum accideret, praeparatis suorum animis signa extemplo convertit 11 totumque in hostem agmen circumegit. Itaque, velut rectae acies concurrissent, iustum aliquamdiu proelium fuit; tandem Nabidis milites in fugam inclinarunt; quae minus infesta ac [2] trepida fuisset, ni Achaei locorum prudentes institissent. Ii et caedem ingentem ediderunt et dispersos passim fuga plerosque armis exuerunt. Quinctius prope Amyclas 12 posuit castra; unde cum perpopulatus omnia cir-

[1] derecta Bessler: decreta B: erecta M.
[2] infesta ac M. Müller: ac M: om. B.

---

[1] The word rectae (literally "straight") in this context appears to mean the orderly alinement of a force drawn up to the cavalry, since each lacked confidence in itself; B.C. 195

finally, the standards of the legions came up, and when the leading cohorts of the column were thrown into the fight, those who had a moment before been a cause of terror were driven in panic into the city. The Romans retired so far from the wall that they were beyond spear-range, and forming their line waited for a while; when no enemy came out against them, they retired to the camp. The next day Quinctius began to lead his troops in array along the river and past the city to the foot of Mount Menelaus; at the head marched the legionary cohorts and the light infantry and the cavalry formed the rear-guard. Inside the wall Nabis had formed and made ready his mercenaries, in whom he placed most confidence, to attack the enemy in the rear. When the tail of the column had passed, they burst from the town through several gates at once, with the same fury as the day before. Appius Claudius was bringing up the rear; he had prepared the minds of his men for what was likely to occur, lest it catch them unawares, and he at once faced about and presented a solid front to the enemy. So, just as if organized[1] battle-lines had met, there was a regular battle for a while; at length the soldiers of Nabis turned in flight; and this would have been less hazardous and dangerous if the Achaeans, who knew the ground, had not pressed them hard. They caused great slaughter and disarmed many of them as they scattered in flight in every direction. Quinctius encamped near Amyclae, and from that base he laid waste all the well-populated and pleasant

[1] for battle, and stands in contrast with the column, the formation adopted on the march.

A.U.C. 559

cumiecta urbi frequentis et amoeni agri loca esset, nullo iam hostium porta excedente castra movit ad fluvium Eurotam. Inde vallem Taygeto subiectam agrosque ad mare pertinentes evastat.

XXIX. Eodem fere tempore L. Quinctius maritimae orae oppida partim voluntate, partim metu 2 aut vi recepit. Certior deinde factus Gytheum oppidum omnium maritimarum rerum Lacedaemoniis receptaculum esse nec procul a mari castra Romana 3 abesse, omnibus id copiis adgredi constituit. Erat eo tempore valida urbs, et multitudine civium inco- 4 larumque et omni bellico apparatu instructa. In tempore Quinctio rem haud facilem adgredienti rex Eumenes et classis Rhodiorum supervenerunt. 5 Ingens multitudo navalium sociorum e tribus contracta classibus intra paucos dies omnia quae ad oppugnationem urbis terra marique munitae facienda 6 opera erant effecit. Iam testudinibus admotis murus subruebatur, iam arietibus quatiebatur. Itaque una crebris ictibus eversa est turris quodque 7 circa muri erat casu eius prostratum; et Romani simul a portu, unde aditus planior erat, ut distenderent ab apertiore loco hostes, simul per pate- 8 factum ruina iter irrumpere conabantur. Nec multum afuit quin qua intenderant penetrarent; sed tardavit impetum eorum spes obiecta dedendae 9 urbis, mox deinde eadem turbata. Dexagoridas country districts which surrounded the city, and B.C. 195 when no enemy now left the gates he moved his camp to the river Eurotas. Next he devastated the valley that lies below Taygetus and the fields that stretched towards the sea.

XXIX. At about the same time Lucius Quinctius received the surrender of the towns on the coast, some by their own choice, some from fear or as a result of attack. Then, having learned that the town of Gytheum was the Lacedaemonians' storehouse of naval supplies of all kinds and that the Roman camp was not far from the sea, he determined to attack the town with his whole force. It was at that time a strongly fortified place, well supplied with large numbers of citizens and immigrants and with all military equipment. At an opportune moment for Quinctius, who was undertaking a difficult task, King Eumenes and the Rhodian fleet appeared. A huge crowd of naval allies, assembled from the three fleets, within a few days made ready all the engines necessary for the siege of a city strongly fortified by land and sea. Soon mantlets were brought up and the wall was being undermined and shaken by battering-rams. So one tower was overthrown by the repeated blows, and the adjacent wall was ruined by its fall; and the Romans attempted at once to force their way in from the harbour side, whence the approach was more level, to distract the enemy's attention from the more exposed place, and also through the breach made by the falling of the wall. Nor were they far from winning to the place they sought, but their attack was slowed up by the hope held out to them, but soon after found delusive, that the city would capitulate. Dexagoridas and Gorgopas et Gorgopas pari imperio praeerant urbi. Dexagoridas miserat ad legatum Romanum traditurum 10 se urbem; et cum ad eam rem tempus et ratio convenisset, a Gorgopa proditor interficitur, intentiusque ab uno urbs defendebatur. Et difficilior facta oppugnatio erat ni T. Quinctius cum quattuor 11 milibus delectorum militum supervenisset. Is cum supercilio haud procul distantis tumuli ab urbe instructam aciem ostendisset, et ex altera parte L. Quinctius ab operibus suis terra marique instaret, 12 tum vero desperatio Gorgopan quoque coegit id

A.U.C. 559

13 consilii quod in altero morte vindicaverat capere, et pactus ut abducere inde milites quos praesidii causa 14 habebat liceret, tradidit Quinctio urbem. Priusquam Gytheum traderetur, Pythagoras, praefectus Argis relictus, tradita custodia urbis Timocrati Pellenensi cum mille mercennariis militibus et duobus milibus Argivorum Lacedaemonem ad Nabim venit.

XXX. Nabis sicut primo adventu Romanae classis et traditione oppidorum maritimae orae conterritus
2 erat, sic parva spe cum acquievisset Gytheo ab suis retento, postquam id quoque traditum Romanis audivit esse et,[1] cum ab terra omnibus circa hostilibus
3 nihil spei esset, a mari quoque toto se interclusum, cedendum fortunae ratus caduceatorem primum in castra misit ad explorandum si paterentur legatos were in command of the city, with equal authority. B.C. 195

[1] esse et Drakenborch: esse B.

Dexagoridas had sent word to the Roman lieutenant that he would give up the city, and when the time and method of procedure had been agreed upon, the traitor was slain by Gorgopas and the city was more vigorously defended by him alone. And the continuance of the siege would have been more difficult if Titus Quinctius had not come up with four thousand picked troops. When he had revealed his line of battle, drawn up on the brow of a hill no great distance from the city, and on the other side Lucius Quinctius was pressing the assault from his works on land and sea, then despair compelled Gorgopas too to adopt the plan which he had punished with death in another's case, and bargaining that he should be permitted to lead away the soldiers whom he had had as a garrison, he surrendered the city to Quinctius. Before Gytheum was surrendered, Pythagoras, the prefect who had been left at Argos, turned over the guardianship of the city to Timocrates of Pellene and with a thousand mercenaries and two thousand Argives joined Nabis in Lacedaemon.

XXX. Although Nabis had been greatly alarmed at the approach of the Roman fleet and the surrender of the coast towns, yet he had rested on a slender hope as long as Gytheum was held by his troops; when he learned that it too had been given over to the Romans and that, while on land there was no hope, all the country being in the hands of the enemy, he was entirely cut off from the sea as well, considering that he must yield to fortune, he first sent a herald to the camp to find out whether they would permit ambassadors to be sent to them.

A.U.C. 559

4 ad se mitti. Qua impetrata re Pythagoras ad imperatorem venit nullis cum aliis mandatis quam ut 5 tyranno colloqui cum imperatore liceret. Consilio advocato cum omnes dandum colloquium censuissent, 6 dies locusque constituitur. In mediae regionis tumulos modicis copiis sequentibus cum venissent, relictis ibi in statione conspecta utrimque cohortibus 7 Nabis cum delectis custodibus corporis, Quinctius cum fratre et Eumene rege et Sosila Rhodio et Aristaeno, Achaeorum praetore, tribunisque militum paucis descendit.

XXXI. Ibi permisso seu [1] dicere prius seu audire mallet, ita coepit tyrannus: "Si ipse per me, T. Quincti vosque qui adestis, causam excogitare cur mihi aut indixissetis bellum aut inferretis possem, 2 tacitus eventum fortunae meae expectassem; nunc imperare animo nequivi [2] quin, priusquam perirem, cur periturus essem scirem. Et hercules, si tales 3 essetis quales esse Carthaginienses fama est, apud quos nihil societatis fides sancti haberet, in me quoque vobis quid faceretis minus pensi esse non mirarer; 4 nunc cum vos intueor, Romanos esse video, qui rerum divinarum foedera, humanarum fidem socialem 5 sanctissimam habeatis; cum me ipse respexi, eum me [3] esse spero, cui et publice, sicut ceteris Lacedaemoniis, vobiscum vetustissimum foedus sit et meo

[1] seu Duker: ut seu B.
[2] nequivi ed. Frobeniana 1535: nequeo B.
[3] eum me Siesbye: eum B.

[1] The exactness of this statement cannot be verified. There seems to be no record of an earlier treaty, yet in 205 B.C. (XXIX. xii. 14) Nabis is mentioned as an ally. The negotiations of 197 B.C. (XXXII. xxxix. 10–xl. 4) make no mention of such an alliance.

When this was granted Pythagoras came to the commander with no other message than that the tyrant be granted an interview with the general. When a council was summoned and all agreed that an interview should be granted, a time and place were appointed. They arrived with moderate escorts at some hills in the intervening country, and both parties, leaving their cohorts on guard in plain sight, came down to the meeting-place, Nabis with a picked body-guard, Quinctius with his brother, King Eumenes, Sosilas the Rhodian, Aristaenus, praetor of the Achaeans, and a few military tribunes. B.C. 195

XXXI. When the tyrant had been given the option of speaking first or of listening, he began thus: "If, Titus Quinctius and you others who are present, I had been able to discover for myself any reason why you should have declared or should now be waging war upon me, I should have waited in silence for the decision as to my fate; but as it is, I have been unable to control my curiosity to know, before I perish, why I am to perish. And, by Hercules, if you were such men as the Carthaginians are reputed to be, among whom no sanctity attaches to a pledge of alliance, as regards myself too I should not wonder that you take little thought as to how you are acting; but now, as I look at you, I see that you are Romans, men who hold treaties to be the most sacred of divinely-established institutions, and a pledge to be the most sacred of human ties. When I look at myself, I hope that I see myself as one who, as a member of the state, in common with the other Lacedaemonians, has enjoyed a most ancient treaty [1] with you, and who on his own account and in his own person has recently,

A.U.C. 559

nomine privatim amicitia ac societas, nuper Philippi
6 bello renovata. At enim ego eam violavi et everti
7 quod Argivorum civitatem teneo. Quo modo hoc tuear? Re an tempore? Res mihi duplicem defensionem praebet; nam et ipsis vocantibus ac tradentibus urbem eam accepi, non occupavi, et accepi cum Philippi partium, non in vestra societate
8 esset. Tempus autem eo me liberat quod, cum iam Argos tenerem, societas mihi vobiscum convenit et ut vobis mitterem ad bellum auxilia, non ut Argis
9 praesidium deducerem, pepigistis. At hercule in ea controversia quae de Argis est, superior sum et aequitate rei, quod non vestram urbem, sed hostium, 10 quod volentem, non vi coactam, accepi, et vestra confessione, quod in condicionibus societatis Argos 11 mihi reliquistis; ceterum nomen tyranni et facta me premunt, quod servos ad libertatem voco, quod in 12 agros inopem plebem deduco. De nomine hoc respondere possum, me, qualiscumque sum, eundem esse qui fui cum tu ipse mecum, T. Quincti, societatem 13 pepigisti. Tum me regem appellari a vobis memini nunc tyrannum vocari video. Itaque, si ego nomen imperii mutassem, mihi meae inconstantiae, cum 14 vos mutetis, vobis vestrae reddenda ratio est. Quod during the war with Philip, renewed this friendship B.C. 198 and alliance. But, you say, I have violated and overturned it because I hold the city of Argos. How shall I defend myself against this charge? By the aid of the facts or by consideration of the time? The facts give me a double defence: first, when the citizens themselves invited me and turned the city over to me, I accepted it, not seized it; second, I received it when the city belonged to Philip's faction and was not in league with you. The time likewise acquits me of that charge, since the alliance between you and me was arranged at a time when I was already in possession of Argos, and your stipulation was that I should send you assistance for the war, not that I should withdraw my garrison from Argos. But, by Hercules, in the dispute which concerns Argos, I come out the victor both by the justice of my case, because I received a city which belonged not to you but to the enemy, received it by its own act and not through compulsion; and by your own admission, since by the terms of our alliance you left Argos in my hands. But my title of tyrant and my behaviour argue against me, because I summon slaves to the enjoyment of freedom and establish the needy commons upon the soil. As to my title, I can give this reply, that, whatever I am, I was the same when you yourself, Titus Quinctius, made the alliance with me. At that time I recall that you saluted me as king; at this time I see that I am called tyrant. Therefore, if I had changed the title of my office, I should have to explain my inconsistency; since you are changing it, you must give reason for your own. As to the fact that I have ad multitudinem servis liberatis auctam et egentibus divisum agrum attinet, possum quidem et in hoc me 15 iure temporis tutari: iam feceram haec, qualiacumque sunt, cum societatem mecum pepigistis et 16 auxilia in bello adversus Philippum accepistis; sed si nunc ea fecissem, non dico ' quid in eo vos laesissem aut vestram amicitiam violassem? ' sed illud, me more 17 atque instituto maiorum fecisse. Nolite ad vestras leges atque instituta exigere ea quae Lacedaemone fiunt. Nihil comparare singula necesse est. Vos a censu equitem, a censu peditem legitis, et paucos excellere opibus, plebem subiectam esse illis vultis;

A.U.C. 559

18 noster legum lator non in paucorum manu rem publicam esse voluit, quem vos senatum appellatis, nec excellere unum aut alterum ordinem in civitate, sed per aequationem fortunae ac[1] dignitatis fore credidit ut multi essent qui arma pro patria ferrent.
19 Pluribus me ipse egisse quam pro patria[2] sermonis brevitate fateor; et breviter peroratum esse potuit, nihil me, postquam vobiscum institui amicitiam, cur eius vos paeniteret commisisse."

XXXII. Ad haec imperator Romanus: " Amicitia
2 et societas nobis nulla tecum, sed cum Pelope, rege Lacedaemoniorum iusto ac legitimo, facta est, cuius ius tyranni quoque, qui postea per vim tenuerunt

[1] ac ed. Frobeniana 1535: ad B.
[2] patria Madvig: patrio B.

---

[1] This was the basis of the constitution of Servius Tullius. The exactness of these statements regarding Roman and Spartan legislation need not be examined for this purpose.

[2] The senators, who generally belonged in the higher census-classes.

[3] Lycurgus.

increased population by freeing slaves and have dis- B.C. 195
tributed land to the poor, I can defend myself against this charge by the plea of the time as I did before: I had already done all this, such as it is, at the time when you arranged the alliance with me and accepted my aid in the war against Philip; but if I had just recently done this, I should not ask, 'What harm have I done you in this way, or how have I broken the treaty?' but merely say that I had acted according to the tradition and custom of our ancestors. Do not weigh what is done in Lacedaemon on the scales of your own laws and institutions. It is unnecessary to make a detailed comparison. You choose your cavalry and your infantry according to their census-ratings,[1] and you desire that a few[2] should excel in wealth and that the commons should be under their control; our law-giver[3] ordained that the state should not be in the hands of the few, whom you call the senate, and that no one order should predominate in the state, but he believed that by equalizing wealth and rank it would come to pass that there would be many to bear arms for the country. I admit that I have spoken at greater length than suits the traditional brevity of our speech;[4] and I might have summed up briefly by stating that since I entered upon my friendship with you, I have done nothing to make you regret it."

XXXII. The Roman commander responded thus: "We have never made any treaty of friendship and alliance with you, but with Pelops, the lawful and legitimate king of the Spartans, whose rights the tyrants, who afterwards exercised violent sway in

[4] The Spartans were traditionally "laconic."

A.U.C. 559

Lacedaemone imperium, quia nos[1] bella nunc Punica, nunc Gallica, nunc alia ex aliis occupaverant, usurparunt, sicut tu quoque hoc Macedonico bello
3 fecisti. Nam quid minus conveniret quam eos qui pro libertate Graeciae adversus Philippum gereremus bellum cum tyranno instituere amicitiam? Et tyranno qui umquam fuit saevissimo et violentissimo
4 in suos? Nobis vero, etiam si Argos nec cepisses per fraudem nec teneres, liberantibus omnem Graeciam Lacedaemon quoque vindicanda in antiquam libertatem erat atque in leges suas, quarum modo tamquam
5 aemulus Lycurgi mentionem fecisti. An, ut ab Iaso et Bargyliis praesidia Philippi deducantur, curae erit nobis; Argos et Lacedaemonem, duas clarissimas urbes, lumina quondam Graeciae, sub pedibus tuis relinquemus, quae titulum nobis
6 liberatae Graeciae servientes deforment? At enim cum Philippo Argivi senserunt. Remittimus hoc tibi, ne nostram vicem irascaris. Satis compertum habemus duorum aut summum trium in ea re, non 7 civitatis culpam esse, tam hercule quam in te tuoque praesidio accersendo accipiendoque in arcem nihil
8 est[2] publico consilio actum. Thessalos et Phocenses et Locrenses consensu omnium scimus partium Philippi fuisse; tamen cum cetera liberavimus Graecia; quid tandem censes in Argivis, qui insontes
9 publici consilii sint, facturos? Servorum ad libertatem vocatorum et egentibus hominibus agri divisi

[1] nos H. J. Müller: eos B M. [2] est Hertz: siin B: sit ς.

[1] These statements cannot be verified, and Pelops cannot be positively identified.

[2] Rome's protection of remote towns is mentioned to present a sharp contrast with what follows.

[3] Nabis' indignation at Argos provokes an ironical reply.

Sparta, since we were kept busy by wars, now with B.C. 195
Carthage, now with Gaul, now with one state after another, had usurped, just as you too have done during this recent Macedonian war.[1] What would be less consistent than for a people that was fighting against Philip for the liberation of Greece to make a treaty of friendship with a tyrant? And a treaty with a tyrant the most savage and lawless that ever lived? Even if you had neither taken Argos through fraud nor continued to hold it in the same way, we should be compelled, while we were setting all Greece free, to restore Sparta as well to its ancient liberty and its laws, which you have mentioned as if you were an imitator of Lycurgus. It will be our responsibility that Philip's garrisons are withdrawn from Iasus and Bargyliae;[2] shall we leave Argos and Lacedaemon, two most celebrated cities, once the lights of Greece, under your feet, that their slavery may tarnish our glory as liberators of Greece? But, you say, the Argives were on the side of Philip. We do not at all ask you to be indignant with them on our account.[3] We have convincing proof that the blame for this rests on two or at most three men, not on the state, just as, by Hercules, when you, Nabis, with your garrison were invited and received into the citadel, nothing was done with official sanction. We know that the people of Thessaly and Phocis and Locris joined the party of Philip with the general approval of those peoples; nevertheless, we have set them free along with the rest of Greece; what then do you think we shall do in the case of the Argives, who are innocent of any official decision? You said that we were charging you with inviting slaves to crimina tibi obici dicebas, non quidem nec ipsa mediocria; sed quid ista sunt prae iis quae a te tuisque cotidie alia super alia facinora eduntur? 10 Exhibe liberam contionem vel Argis vel Lacedaemone, si audire iuvat vera dominationis impotentis- 11 simae crimina. Ut alia omnia vetustiora omittam, quam caedem Argis Pythagoras iste, gener tuus, paene in oculis meis edidit? Quam tu ipse, cum iam 12 prope in finibus Lacedaemoniorum essem? Age dum, quos in contione comprehensos omnibus audientibus civibus tuis te in custodia habiturum esse pronuntiasti, iube vinctos produci: miseri 13 parentes, quos falso lugent, vivere sciant. At enim, ut iam ita sint haec, quid ad vos, Romani? Hoc tu dicas liberantibus Graeciam? Hoc iis qui, ut liberare possent, mare traiecerunt, terra marique 14 gesserunt bellum? Vos tamen, inquis, vestramque amicitiam ac societatem proprie non violavi. Quotiens vis te id arguam fecisse? Sed nolo pluribus; 15 summam rem complectar. Quibus igitur rebus amicitia violatur? Nempe his maxime duabus, si socios meos pro hostibus habeas, si cum hostibus te 16 coniungas. Utrumque a te factum est; nam et Messenen, uno atque eodem iure foederis quo et Lacedaemonem in amicitiam nostram acceptam, socius ipse sociam nobis urbem vi atque armis

A.U.C. 559

[1] Nabis captured Messene in 201 B.C. (Polyb. XVI. xiii). Both Nabis and Messene were included on the side of Rome in the treaty with Philip in 205 B.C. (xxix. xii. 14).

become free and dividing the land among poor B.C. 195 men, nor are these trivial accusations; but what are they in comparison with the crimes which are every day committed in endless succession by you and your followers? Hold a free assembly in either Argos or Lacedaemon, if you want to hear true accusations against a most lawless despotism. To pass over all other crimes of more distant date, what a slaughter did that Pythagoras, your son-in-law, cause at Argos almost under my eyes? Of what were you yourself guilty, at a time when I was practically on the frontiers of the Spartans? Come, bid those men be led out in chains whom you arrested in the assembly and announced in the hearing of all your fellow-citizens that you would hold in confinement: let their wretched parents see that those whom they are mourning without cause are alive. But, you say, granting now that all this is so, how does this concern you, O Romans? Can you say that to the deliverers of Greece? Can you say that to men who have crossed the sea and waged war on land and sea that they might accomplish this liberation? Yet you say, I have not personally violated your friendship and alliance. In how many instances do you want me to prove that you have done so? I shall not be long, but shall sum up the whole matter. In what ways, then, is friendship violated? Chiefly, no doubt, in these two ways: if you treat my allies as enemies, and if you associate yourself with my enemies. Both of these things you have done; for, in the first place, Messene, a city received into our friendship under one and the same treaty as Sparta, a city that was our ally, you, also our ally, captured by force of arms;[1] in

A.U.C. 559

17 cepisti et cum Philippo, hoste nostro, non societatem solum sed, si diis placet, adfinitatem etiam per 18 Philoclen, praefectum eius, pepigisti et ut[1] bellum adversus nos gerens mare circa Maleum infestum navibus piraticis fecisti et plures prope cives Romanos
19 quam Philippus cepisti atque occidisti, tutiorque Macedoniae ora quam promunturium Maleae commeatus ad exercitus nostros portantibus navibus
20 fuit. Proinde parce, sis, fidem ac iura societatis iactare et omissa populari oratione tamquam tyrannus et hostis loquere."

XXXIII. Sub haec Aristaenus nunc monere Nabim, nunc etiam orare ut, dum liceret, dum occasio esset,
2 sibi ac fortunis suis consuleret; referre deinde nominatim tyrannos civitatium finitimarum coepit, qui deposito imperio restitutaque libertate suis non tutam modo sed etiam honoratam inter cives senectu-
3 tem egissent. His dictis in vicem auditisque nox prope diremit colloquium. Postero die Nabis Argis se cedere ac deducere praesidium, quando ita Romanis placeret, et captivos et perfugas redditurum
4 dixit; aliud si quid postularent, scriptum ut ederent
5 petiit, ut deliberare cum amicis posset. Ita et tyranno tempus datum ad consultandum est, et Quinctius etiam sociorum etiam principibus adhibitis
6 habuit consilium. Maximae partis sententia erat perseverandum in bello esse et tollendum tyrannum;

[1] et ut Duker: et B.

the second place, you arranged not only an alliance with Philip, our enemy, but also (Heaven help us!) a personal relationship through the intervention of his prefect Philocles, and, just as if you were making regular war upon us, you rendered the sea around Malea dangerous with your pirate ships, and you captured and killed more Roman citizens, almost, than Philip did, and the coast of Macedonia was safer than the promontory of Malea for the ships that were transporting supplies for our armies. Cease then, if you please, to utter fine-sounding words about loyalty and treaty obligations, and dropping your popular style speak as a tyrant and an enemy." B.C. 195

XXXIII. After this Aristaenus began first to advise Nabis and then to plead with him, while he was in a position to do so and while there was opportunity, to consider his own interests and prospects, and then to recall by name the tyrants of the neighbouring states who had laid down their authority and restored liberty to their subjects and so had passed not only a secure but also an honourable old age among their fellow-citizens. After this interchange of speeches, the approach of night broke up the conference. The next day Nabis agreed to withdraw from Argos and lead away his garrison, since this was the Romans' pleasure, and to give back the prisoners and deserters; if they had further demands, he requested that they deliver them in writing, that he might discuss them with his friends. So an interval was granted the tyrant for his deliberations, and Quinctius also held a council to which he summoned the chiefs of the allies. The opinion of the majority was that they should continue the war and get rid of the tyrant; never numquam aliter tutam libertatem Graeciae fore;

A.U.C. 559

7 satius multo fuisse non moveri bellum adversus eum
8 quam omitti motum; et ipsum velut comprobata dominatione firmiorem futurum auctore iniusti imperii adsumpto populo Romano et exemplo multos in aliis civitatibus ad insidiandum libertati civium
9 suorum incitaturum. Ipsius imperatoris animus ad pacem inclinatior erat. Videbat enim compulso intra moenia hoste nihil praeter obsidionem restare, eam
10 autem ancipitem [1] fore et diuturnam; non enim Gytheum, quod ipsum tamen traditum, non expugnatum esset, sed Lacedaemonem, validissimam
11 urbem viris armisque, oppugnaturos. Unam spem fuisse, si qua admoventibus exercitum dissensio inter ipsos ac seditio excitari posset; cum signa portis
12 prope inferri cernerent, neminem se movisse. Adiciebat et cum Antiocho infidam pacem Villium legatum inde redeuntem nuntiare; multo maioribus quam ante terrestribus navalibusque copiis in Europam
13 eum transisse. Si occupasset obsidio Lacedaemonis exercitum, quibus aliis copiis adversus regem tam 14 validum ac potentem bellum gesturos? Haec propalam dicebat; illa tacita suberat cura, ne novus consul Graeciam provinciam sortiretur et inchoata belli victoria successori tradenda esset.

[1] ancipitem M. Müller: om. B.

under other conditions would the liberty of Greece be assured; it would have been much better not to have begun the war against him than to discontinue it when once begun; and he, having obtained a quasi-approval of his despotism, would be more firmly established for having won the sanction of the Roman people for his unjust rule, and by his example would prompt many in other states to plot against the freedom of their citizens. The mind of the commander himself was more inclined towards peace. For he saw that with the enemy driven inside his fortifications nothing remained but a siege, but the siege would be of uncertain issue and long duration, since they would invest, not Gytheum (and this, besides, had been surrendered, not captured), but Lacedaemon, a city exceedingly powerful in men and arms. There had been, he continued, one real hope, if dissension and insurrection among the Spartans themselves could have been begun while they were bringing up the army; when they saw the standards almost carried into the gates, no one had stirred. He added that Villius, the ambassador, had reported on his return that the peace with Antiochus could not be depended upon, and that he had crossed into Europe with far greater military and naval forces than before. If the siege of Sparta, he asked, kept the army busy, with what other troops would they conduct the war against a king so mighty and powerful? Such was his spoken argument; unexpressed was another anxiety, that a new consul might obtain the province of Greece from the lots, and that he might be compelled to hand over to a successor an incomplete victory in the war. B.C. 195

A.U.C. 559

XXXIV. Cum adversus tendendo nihil moveret socios, simulando se transire in eorum sententiam omnes in adsensum consilii sui traduxit. "Bene vertat," inquit "obsideamus Lacedaemonem quando ita placet; illud modo ne fallat: cum [1] res tam lenta quam ipsi scitis, oppugnatio urbium sit et obsidentibus prius saepe quam obsessis taedium adferat, iam nunc hoc ita proponere vos animis oportet, hibernandum circa Lacedaemonis moenia esse. Quae mora si laborem tantum ac periculum haberet, ut et animis et corporibus ad sustinenda ea parati essetis hortarer vos; nunc impensa quoque magna eget in opera, in machinationes et tormenta quibus tanta urbs oppugnanda est, in commeatus vobis nobisque in hiemem expediendos. Itaque, ne aut repente trepidetis aut rem inchoatam turpiter destituatis, scribendum ante vestris civitatibus censeo explorandumque quid quaeque animi, quid virium habeat. Auxiliorum satis superque habeo; sed quo plures sumus pluribus rebus egebimus. Nihil iam praeter nudum solum ager hostium habet. Ad hoc hiems accedet ad comportandum ex longinquo difficilis." Haec oratio primum animos omnium ad respicienda sua [2] cuiusque [3] domestica mala convertit, segnitiam, invidiam et obtrectationem domi manentium adversus militantes, libertatem difficilem ad consensum, inopiam publicam, malignitatem conferendi ex privato. Versis itaque subito voluntatibus faceret

[1] cum Madvig: ceterum cum B.
[2] sua Ussing: om. B.
[3] cuiusque H. J. Müller: cuique B.

XXXIV. When by arguing on the other side he B.C. 195 produced no effect among the allies, by pretending to go over to their opinion he brought all into agreement with his plan. "May success attend us," he said, "and let us lay siege to Sparta, since that is your will: but do not be deceived about this: since the siege of cities is a slow business, as you know, which often exhausts the patience of the besiegers sooner than that of the besieged, you ought even now to hold this prospect before your minds, that we must winter around the walls of Lacedaemon. If this delay involved merely toil and danger, I should urge you to prepare both minds and bodies to resist them; but now it demands much money also, for siege-works, for engines and artillery with which we must attack so strong a town, and for the purchase of provisions for you and us against the winter. Therefore, to prevent any sudden fear or a disgraceful abandonment of an unfinished enterprise, I propose that you should write to your states in advance, to ascertain what is the temper and what the strength of each. Of troops to aid me, I have enough and more; but the more numerous we are, the more supplies we shall require. The enemy's country already offers nothing but the naked soil. Besides, winter will soon be here, making it difficult to transport supplies from a distance." This speech at once directed the minds of all to thoughts of the domestic difficulties of each, the sloth, the ill-will, and the jealousy of those who stayed at home towards the soldiers in the field, the liberty that made agreement difficult, the public poverty, the unwillingness to make contributions from private funds. Their inclinations accordingly suffered a sudden change, quod e re publica populi Romani sociorumque esse crederet imperatori permiserunt.

A.U.C. 559

XXXV. Inde Quinctius adhibitis legatis tantum 2 tribunisque militum condiciones in quas pax cum tyranno fieret has conscripsit: sex mensium indutiae ut essent Nabidi Romanisque et Eumeni regi et Rhodiis; legatos extemplo mitterent Romam T. Quinctius et Nabis, ut pax ex auctoritate senatus 3 confirmaretur; et qua die scriptae condiciones pacis editae Nabidi forent, ea dies ut indutiarum principium esset, et ut ex ea die intra decimum diem ab Argis ceterisque oppidis quae in Argivorum agro essent praesidia omnia deducerentur vacuaque et libera 4 traderentur Romanis, et ne quod inde mancipium regium publicumve aut privatum educeretur, si qua ante educta forent dominis recte restituerentur; 5 naves quas civitatibus maritimis ademisset redderet neve ipse navem ullam praeter duos lembos, qui non plus quam sedecim remis agerentur, haberet; 6 perfugas et captivos omnibus sociis populi Romani civitatibus redderet et Messeniis omnia quae com- 7 parerent quaeque domini cognossent; exulibus quoque Lacedaemoniis liberos coniuges restitueret, quae earum viros sequi voluissent, invita ne qua 8 exulis comes esset; mercennariorum militum Nabidis, and they granted authority to the commander to do what he considered consistent with the general interest of the Roman people and the allies. B.C. 195

[1] I.e. Eumenes.

XXXV. Quinctius then summoned only his lieutenants and the tribunes of the soldiers, and wrote down the terms on which peace should be made with the tyrant: that there should be a truce of six months between Nabis and the Romans, King Eumenes, and the Rhodians; that Titus Quinctius and Nabis should at once send ambassadors to Rome, that the peace might be ratified by the authority of the senate; that the day on which the written conditions of peace should be delivered to Nabis should be the beginning of the armistice, and that ten days from that time the garrisons should be withdrawn from Argos and the other towns in Argive territory, and that they be handed over to the Romans, empty and free of troops, and that no slave, whether belonging to the king [1] or to the state or to a private individual, should be removed, and if any had been previously removed they should be duly returned to their owners; that he should give back the ships which he had taken from the cities on the sea, and that he should not have any ship except two small vessels which were propelled by not more than sixteen oars; that he should restore the fugitives and captives to all the cities allied with the Roman people and to the Messenians all the property which could be found and which the owners could identify; that he should likewise return to the Lacedaemonian exiles their children and their wives who were willing to attend their husbands, provided that no wife should against her will follow a husband into exile; that all property should be duly restored

A.U.C. 559 qui aut in civitates suas aut ad Romanos transissent, 9 iis res suae omnes recte redderentur; in Creta insula ne quam urbem haberet; quas habuisset, redderet Romanis; ne quam societatem cum ullo Cretensium aut quoquam alio institueret neu bellum gereret; 10 civitatibus omnibus, quasque ipse [1] restituisset quaeque se suaque in fidem ac dicionem populi Romani tradidissent, omnia praesidia deduceret seque ipse 11 suosque ab iis abstineret; ne quod oppidum neu quod castellum in suo alienove agro conderet; obsides, ea ita futura, daret quinque, quos imperatori Romano placuisset, et filium in iis suum, et talenta centum argenti in praesenti et quinquaginta talenta in singulos annos per annos octo.

XXXVI. Haec conscripta castris propius urbem 2 motis Lacedaemonem mittuntur. Nec sane quicquam eorum satis placebat tyranno, nisi quod praeter spem reducendorum exulum mentio nulla facta erat; maxime autem omnium ea res offendebat, quod et naves et maritimae civitates ademptae erant. 3 Fuerat autem ei magno fructui mare, omnem oram a Maleo [2] praedatoriis navibus infestam habenti; iuventutem praeterea civitatium earum ad supplementum longe optimi generis militum habebat. 4 Has condiciones quamquam ipse in secreto volutaverat cum amicis, vulgo tamen omnes fama fereto the mercenary soldiers of Nabis who had deserted B.C. 195 either to their own states or to the Romans; that he should retain possession of no town in Crete, and those which he had held he should turn over to the Romans; that he should form no alliance with any people of the Cretans or anyone else, and should wage no war with them; that from all the cities, both those which he had given up and those which had put themselves and their possessions under the protection and control of the Roman people, he should withdraw his garrisons and should keep himself and his troops away from them; that he should found no city or fort on his own or another's territory; that he should give five hostages that these conditions should be observed, such as were satisfactory to the Roman commander, and among them his son, and should pay one hundred talents of silver immediately and fifty talents per year for eight years.

[1] ipse Bekker: et ipse B.
[2] a Maleo ed. Frobeniana 1535: maleo B.

XXXVI. These articles were reduced to writing and delivered to Lacedaemon, the camp having been moved nearer to the town. Nothing in them was really pleasing to the tyrant, except that, contrary to his expectations, no mention was made of any restoration of the exiles; but the most offensive clause was that which deprived him of the ships and the cities on the coast. The sea, indeed, had been of great profit to him, since his pirate boats had attacked the whole coast from the promontory of Malea; besides, he found the soldiers of these cities made by far the best kind of fighting men. Although he had discussed these conditions with his advisers in secret, nevertheless everyone was discussing them in common talk, since it is the nature bant, vanis, ut ad ceteram fidem, sic ad secreta tegenda satellitum regiorum ingeniis. Non tam omnia universi quam ea quae ad quemque pertinerent singuli carpebant. Qui exulum coniuges in matrimonio habebant aut ex bonis eorum aliquid possederant, tamquam amissuri, non reddituri, indignabantur. Servis liberatis a tyranno non irrita modo futura libertas, sed multo foedior quam fuisset ante, servitus, redeuntibus in iratorum dominorum potestatem ante oculos obversabatur. Mercennarii milites et pretia militiae casura in pace aegre ferebant et reditum sibi nullum in civitates videbant, infensas non tyrannis magis quam satellitibus eorum.

A.U.C. 559

XXXVII. Haec inter se primo in circulis [1] serentes fremere; deinde subito ad arma discurrerunt. Quo tumultu cum per se satis irritatam multitudinem cerneret tyrannus, contionem advocari iussit. Ubi cum ea quae imperarentur ab Romanis exposuisset et graviora atque indigniora quaedam falso adfinxisset, et ad singula nunc ab universis nunc a partibus contionis acclamaretur, interrogavit quid se respondere ad ea aut quid facere vellet. Prope una voce omnes nihil responderi et bellum geri iusserunt; et pro se quisque, qualia multitudo solet, bonum animum habere et bene sperare iubentes, fortes of the courtiers of kings to be untrustworthy in all respects, but especially for keeping secrets. People generally did not criticize the terms as a whole so much as individuals found fault with those that concerned themselves. Those who had married the wives of exiles, or had possessed themselves of parts of their property, mourned as if they were to be robbed, and were not to restore the property of others. Before the eyes of the slaves who had been freed by the tyrant was the vision not only of their vainly-gained liberty but of a slavery much more grievous than before, since they were returned to the authority of angered masters. The mercenaries saw with regret that the rewards of service would diminish in peace, and they likewise knew that they could not return to their own states, which were not more opposed to tyrants than to their servants. B.C. 195

[1] in circulis ed. Moguntina 1518 : circulos B.

XXXVII. At first they made these complaints as they discussed the terms in their own gatherings; then suddenly they ran to arms. When the tyrant perceived that the people had of their own accord become angry enough, he ordered an assembly summoned. When he had explained there the demands made by the Romans, and had falsely represented some of them as more burdensome and unjust than they actually were, and when each point was received with signs of disapproval, now from the whole assembly, now from one part or another, he asked what answer they wanted him to give and what they wished him to do. Almost unanimously they bade him give no answer but to continue the war, and each one individually, as a crowd is wont to do, counselled him to be of good cheer and good hope, reminding him that fortune favoured

A.U.C. 559

5 fortunam adiuvare aiebant. His vocibus incitatus tyrannus et Antiochum Aetolosque adiuturos pronuntiat, et sibi ad obsidionem sustinendam copiarum
6 adfatim esse. Exciderat pacis mentio ex omnium animis et in stationes non ultra quieturi discurrunt. Paucorum excursio lacessentium et emissa iacula extemplo et [1] Romanis dubitationem quin bellandum
7 esset exemerunt. Levia inde proelia per quadriduum primum sine ullo satis certo eventu commissa;
8 quinto die prope iusta pugna adeo paventes in oppidum Lacedaemonii compulsi sunt, ut quidam milites Romani terga fugientium caedentes per intermissa, ut tunc erant, moenia urbem intrarint.

XXXVIII. Et tunc quidem Quinctius satis eo terrore coercitis excursionibus hostium nihil praeter ipsius oppugnationem urbis superesse ratus, missis qui omnes navales socios a Gytheo accerserent, ipse interim cum tribunis militum ad visendum urbis
2 situm moenia circumvehitur. Fuerat quondam sine muro Sparta; tyranni nuper locis patentibus planisque obiecerant murum; altiora loca et difficilia aditu stationibus armatorum pro munimento obiectis
3 tutabantur. Ubi satis omnia inspexit, corona oppugnandum ratus omnibus copiis—erant autem Romanorum sociorumque, simul peditum equitumque, simul terrestrium ac navalium copiarum, ad quinqua-
4 ginta milia hominum—urbem cinxit. Alii scalas,

[1] et ζ: qui et B.

[1] The fortification of Sparta is differently dated by other ancient writers.

the brave. Inspired by such speeches, the tyrant B.C. 195 announced that he would have the support of Antiochus and the Aetolians, and that he had abundant strength to withstand the siege. All thoughts of peace had gone from their minds and they rushed to their posts, unable to remain quiet longer. The sally of a few skirmishers and the weapons which they hurled at once removed from the Romans any doubt that the war would go on. For the first four days there were only minor engagements with no very certain result; on the fifth day, in a regular battle, the Lacedaemonians were driven back into the town in such confusion that some of the Romans, as they were cutting down the fugitives, entered the city through the gaps which at that time existed in the wall.

XXXVIII. And for the time Quinctius, having put a stop to the enemy's raids by reason of the alarm he had given them, and thinking that there was no alternative to the investment of the city, sent messengers to bring up the marines from Gytheum, and himself with the tribunes of the soldiers rode around the walls to reconnoitre the city's position. Sparta had at one time been without a wall; the tyrants had recently constructed a wall in the open and flat places;[1] the higher ground and that difficult to approach was defended by guards of soldiers instead of a fortification. When he had made a sufficiently complete reconnaissance, thinking that he should attack from an encircling line, he stationed around the city his whole force—there were altogether, Romans and allies, foot and horse, soldiers and marines, about fifty thousand men. Some bore ladders, others torches, others alii ignem, alii alia, quibus non oppugnarent modo sed etiam terrerent, portabant. Iussi sublato clamore subire undique omnes, ut, qua primum occurrerent quave opem ferrent, ad omnia simul paventes 5 Lacedaemonii ignorarent. Quod roboris in exercitu erat trifariam divisum; parte una a Phoebeo, altera a Dictynneo, tertia ab eo loco quem Heptagonias appellant—omnia autem haec aperta sine muro loca 6 sunt—adgredi iubet. Cum tantus undique terror urbem circumvasisset, primo tyrannus et ad clamores repentinos et ad nuntios trepidos motus, ut quisque maxime laboraret locus, aut ipse occurrebat aut 7 aliquos mittebat; deinde circumfuso undique pavore ita obtorpuit ut nec dicere quod in rem esset nec audire posset nec inops modo consilii sed vix mentis compos esset.

A.U.C. 559

XXXIX. Romanos primo sustinebant in angustiis Lacedaemonii, ternaeque acies tempore uno locis diversis pugnabant; deinde crescente certamine 2 nequaquam erat proelium par. Missilibus enim Lacedaemonii pugnabant, a quibus se et magnitudine scuti perfacile Romanus tuebatur miles, et 3 quod alii vani, alii leves admodum ictus erant. Nam propter angustias loci confertamque turbam non modo ad emittenda cum procursu, quo plurimum concitantur, tela spatium habebant, sed ne ut de 4 gradu quidem libero ac stabili conarentur. Itaque ex adverso missa tela nulla in corporibus, rara in other things, with which to attack and likewise to cause terror. The main body of his army he formed in three columns: his order was to attack with one on the side of the Phoebeum, with the second at the Dictynneum, with the third in the quarter which they call Heptagoniae —all these were open places without walls. The city being thus encircled on every side with terror, the tyrant at first, actively attending to the sudden shouts and the panic-stricken messages, just as each spot was in greatest straits, either went to meet the enemy in person or despatched assistance; later on, as the confusion increased on all sides, he was so benumbed by terror that he was unable either to order what was appropriate or to hear the reports, and not only lost his power of judgment but was almost bereft of reason. B.C. 195

XXXIX. At first the Lacedaemonians held up the Roman attack in the narrow approaches, and the three lines were fighting in different places at the same time; then, as the fighting grew more severe, the battle was by no means equal. For the Spartans were fighting with long-distance weapons, from which the Roman soldier protected himself with great ease, partly by the size of his shield, partly because some javelins missed their mark and others fell only lightly. For on account of the limited space and the throngs of soldiers, they not only had no room from which to hurl them on the run, which gives them the greatest momentum, but they lacked even room to try to throw them from an unimpeded and solid footing. Consequently, of the weapons hurled from directly opposite none pierced the

A.U.C. 559

5 scutis haerebant; ab circumstantibus ex superioribus locis vulnerati quidam sunt; mox progressos iam etiam ex tectis non tela modo sed tegulae quoque 6 inopinantes perculerunt. Sublatis deinde supra capita scutis continuatisque ita inter se, ut non modo ad caecos ictus sed ne ad inserendum quidem ex propinquo telum loci quicquam esset, testudine facta 7 subibant. Et primae angustiae paulisper sua hostiumque refertae turba tenuerunt; postquam in patentiorem viam urbis paulatim urgentes hostem processere, non ultra vis eorum atque impetus 8 sustineri poterant. Cum terga vertissent Lacedaemonii et fuga effusa superiora peterent loca, Nabis quidem, ut capta urbe trepidans, quanam ipse 9 evaderet circumspectabat; Pythagoras cum ad cetera animo officioque ducis fungebatur, tum vero unus ne caperetur urbs causa fuit; succendi enim 10 aedificia proxima muro iussit. Quae cum momento temporis arsissent, ut adiuvantibus ignem, qui alias ad exstinguendum opem ferre solent, ruere in 11 Romanos tecta, nec tegularum modo fragmenta sed etiam ambusta tigna ad armatos pervenire et flamma late fundi, fumus terrorem etiam maiorem quam 12 periculum facere. Itaque et qui extra urbem erant Romanorum, tum maxime impetum facientes, re-bodies, and few even the shields; some of the B.C. 198

Romans were wounded by troops on their flanks who occupied the higher ground; presently, as they advanced, some unexpected wounds were suffered from spears and even tiles hurled from the house-tops. Then they held their shields above their heads and fitted them so closely together that no space was left for random shots or even for the insertion of a javelin from near at hand, and having formed their testudo they forced their way forward. The first narrow streets they entered, crowded with their own troops and those of the enemy, delayed them for a while; after they came out into the wider avenues of the city, gradually driving back the enemy, the violence of their assault could not be resisted longer. When the Lacedaemonians had turned to flee, and in headlong flight were seeking the higher ground, Nabis too, trembling as if the city had been taken, looked about him for a way to escape; Pythagoras not only displayed the courage and performed the functions of a commander in other respects, but was, moreover, the sole reason why the city was not captured, for he ordered the buildings nearest the wall to be set on fire. When these had flamed up in an instant, and the men who ordinarily would be accustomed to bring aid to put out the fire were helping it to burn more fiercely, the roofs were collapsing upon the Romans, and not only pieces of tile but half-burned beams were falling upon the soldiers and flames were shooting far out, while the smoke too was creating greater terror than danger. And so those of the Romans who were outside the city and were just at that moment making their most violent attack,

A.U.C. 559

cessere a muro, et qui iam intraverant, ne incendio ab tergo oriente intercluderentur ab suis, receperunt 13 sese; et Quinctius, postquam quid rei esset vidit, receptui canere iussit. Ita iam capta prope urbe revocati in castra redierunt.

XL. Quinctius plus ex timore hostium quam ex re ipsa spei nactus, per triduum insequens territavit eos, nunc proeliis lacessendo, nunc operibus inter-
2 saepiendo quaedam, ne exitus ad fugam esset. His comminationibus compulsus tyrannus Pythagoram rursus oratorem misit; quem Quinctius primo aspernatus excedere castris iussit, dein suppliciter orantem
3 advolutumque genibus tandem audivit. Prima oratio fuit omnia permittentis arbitrio Romanorum;
4 dein cum ea velut vana et sine effectu nihil proficeret, eo deducta est res ut iis condicionibus quas ex scripto paucis ante diebus editae erant indutiae fierent, pecuniaque et obsides accepti.
5 Dum oppugnatur tyrannus, Argivi, nuntiis aliis super[1] alios adferentibus tantum non iam captam
6 Lacedaemonem esse erecti et ipsi, simul eo quod Pythagoras cum parte validissima praesidii excesserat, contempta paucitate eorum qui in arce erant, duce Archippo quodam praesidium expulerunt;
7 Timocratem Pellenensem, quia clementer prae-

[1] super P. R. Müller: prope super B.

[1] Livy here uses orator in its original sense.

retired from the wall, and likewise those who had already entered, lest they be cut off from their own men by the fire which was rising in their rear, fell back, and Quinctius, when he saw what the situation was, ordered the signal sounded for a retirement. And so, when they had almost captured the city they were recalled and returned to their camp. B.C. 195

XL. Quinctius found more cause for hope in the enemy's panic than in the actual success he had gained, and for three days following kept them in a state of terror, sometimes harrying them with assaults, sometimes blocking open spaces with siege-works, that no way might be left open for escape. Under the pressure of these repeated threats the tyrant again sent Pythagoras to plead for him,[1] but Quinctius at first scornfully ordered him to be expelled from the camp, but later, when he begged like a suppliant and threw himself at his feet, he at length granted him an audience. The beginning of his speech was an offer of complete submission to the decision of the Romans, but when this accomplished nothing, being held to be idle and unavailing, matters were then brought to this point that a truce should be concluded on the basis of the terms which had been delivered in writing a few days before, and the money and hostages were received.

While the tyrant was being besieged, the Argives, when man after man brought the news that Lacedaemon was all but captured, themselves took heart, for the additional reason that Pythagoras had departed with the strongest contingent of the garrison, and making light of the few who were in the citadel, they chose one Archippus as leader and drove out the garrison; as for Timocrates of Pellene, fuerat, vivum fide data emiserunt. Huic laetitiae Quinctius supervenit pace data tyranno dimissisque ab Lacedaemone Eumene et Rhodiis et L. Quinctio fratre ad classem.

A.U.C. 559

XLI. Laeta civitas celeberrimum festorum dierum ac nobile ludicrum Nemeorum, die stata propter belli mala praetermissum, in adventum Romani exercitus ducisque indixerunt praefeceruntque ludis 2 ipsum imperatorem. Multa erant quae gaudium cumularent: reducti cives ab Lacedaemone erant, quos nuper Pythagoras quosque ante Nabis abduxe- 3 rat; redierant qui post compertam a Pythagora coniurationem et caede iam coepta effugerant; libertatem ex longo intervallo libertatisque auctores Romanos, quibus causa bellandi cum tyranno ipsi fuissent, cernebant. Testata quoque ipso Nemeorum 4 die voce praeconis libertas est Argivorum. Achaeis quantum restituti Argi in commune Achaiae concilium laetitiae adferebant, tantum serva Lacedaemon relicta et lateri adhaerens tyrannus non 5 sincerum gaudium praebebant; Aetoli vero eam rem omnibus conciliis lacerare: cum Philippo non ante desitum bellari quam omnibus excederet 6 Graeciae urbibus; tyranno relictam Lacedaemonem; regem autem legitimum, qui in Romanis fuerit

---

[1] See xxv. 7–12 above.

[2] Argos had come under the control of Philip in 198 B.C. (XXXII. xxv. 11) and Livy exaggerates somewhat, as he frequently does.

because he had ruled them with kindness, they B.C. 195 allowed him to leave alive under a safeguard. In the midst of their rejoicing Quinctius came to them, having granted peace to the tyrant and sent away from Lacedaemon Eumenes and the Rhodians and his brother Lucius Quinctius to the fleet.

XLI. The most popular of the festivals, the famous spectacle of the Nemean Games, which had been omitted at the usual time because of the misfortunes of war, was now, on the arrival of the Roman army and commander, proclaimed by the joyful citizens, who had chosen the general himself to preside at the games. There were many things which added to their joy: those of their countrymen had been brought back from Lacedaemon, who had been taken there by Pythagoras recently and by Nabis earlier; the men had come back who had escaped after the discovery of the conspiracy [1] by Pythagoras and after the executions had begun; they saw liberty recovered after a long interval,[2] and they beheld the authors of that liberty,—the Romans, whose cause for warring with the tyrant they had themselves been. Moreover, the freedom of the Argives was proclaimed by the voice of the herald on the very day of the Nemean Games. As regards the Achaeans, whatever joy the restoration of Argos to the common council of Achaea brought to them was rendered incomplete to the same degree by the fact that Lacedaemon was left enslaved, with the tyrant close at hand; the Aetolians, too, attacked the position of affairs at all their meetings: with Philip, they said, there had been no cessation from war until he had evacuated all the cities of Greece; Sparta was abandoned to the tyrant, and its legal king, though

A.U.C. 559

castris, ceterosque nobilissimos cives in exilio vic-7 turos; Nabidis dominationis satellitem factum populum Romanum. Quinctius ab Argis Elatiam, unde ad bellum Spartanum profectus erat, copias reduxit.

8 Sunt qui non ex oppido proficiscentem bellum
9 gessisse tyrannum tradant, sed castris adversus Romana positis castra diuque cunctatum, quia Aetolorum auxilia expectasset, coactum ad extremum acie confligere impetu in pabulatores suos a Romanis 10 facto; eo proelio victum castrisque exutum pacem petisse, cum cecidissent quattuordecim milia militum, capta plus quattuor milia essent.

XLII. Eodem fere tempore et a T. Quinctio de rebus ad Lacedaemonem gestis et a M. Porcio consule ex Hispania litterae adlatae. Utriusque nomine in dies ternos supplicatio ab senatu decreta
2 est. L. Valerius consul, cum post fusos circa Litanam
3 silvam Boios quietam provinciam habuisset, comitiorum causa Romam rediit et creavit consules P. Cornelium Scipionem Africanum iterum et Ti. Sempronium Longum. Horum patres primo anno 4 secundi Punici belli consules fuerant. Praetoria inde comitia habita; creati P. Cornelius Scipio et duo Cn. Cornelii, Merenda et Blasio, et Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus et Sex. Digitius et T. Iuventius Thalna. Comitiis perfectis consul in provinciam rediit.

---

[1] These are obviously the Roman annalists, whose variant account Livy prefixes to the narrative of western affairs which follows. His source for the war with Nabis was a portion of Polybius which is now lost.

[2] Cato's thanksgiving has already been reported in xxi. 8 above.

in the Roman camp, and other citizens of the highest station, would live in exile; the Roman army had become the ready agent of Nabis' despotism. From Argos Quinctius led his troops back to Elatia, whence he had set out to the Spartan war. B.C. 195

There are some[1] who say that the tyrant fought the war, not by making sallies from the town, but by placing his camp face to face with the Roman, and that after long delay, because he was waiting for aid from the Aetolians, he was in the end compelled to fight in battle array when the Romans attacked his foragers; defeated in that battle and expelled from his camp, he asked for peace, after fourteen thousand of his men had been killed and more than four thousand captured.

XLII. At about the same time letters arrived both from Titus Quinctius, narrating what had happened before Lacedaemon, and from Marcus Porcius the consul, from Spain. Thanksgivings of three days each were decreed by the senate in the names of both.[2] Lucius Valerius the consul, having enjoyed peace in his province after the defeat of the Boi near the forest of Litana, returned to Rome to hold the elections, and announced the choice of Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus (for the second time) and Tiberius Sempronius Longus. Their fathers had been consuls in the first year of the Second Punic War. Next the praetorian elections were held; the choice fell on Publius Cornelius Scipio, Gnaeus Cornelius Merenda and Gnaeus Cornelius Blasio, Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus, Sextus Digitius, and Titus Iuventius Thalna. After the elections were over the consul returned to the province.

A.U.C. 559

5 Novum ius eo anno a Ferentinatibus temptatum, ut Latini qui in coloniam Romanam nomina dedissent
6 cives Romani essent. Puteolos Salernumque et Buxentum adscripti coloni qui nomina dederunt, et cum ob id se pro civibus Romanis ferrent, senatus iudicavit non esse eos cives Romanos.

A.U.C. 560

XLIII. Principio anni quo P. Scipio Africanus iterum et Ti. Sempronius Longus consules fuerunt, 2 legati Nabidis tyranni Romam venerunt. Iis extra urbem in aede Apollinis senatus datus est. Pax quae cum T. Quinctio convenisset ut rata esset petierunt impetraruntque.
3 De provinciis cum relatum esset, senatus frequens in eam sententiam ibat ut, quoniam in Hispania et Macedonia debellatum foret, consulibus ambobus
4 Italia provincia esset. Scipio satis esse Italiae unum consulem censebat; alteri Macedoniam decernendam esse. Bellum grave ab Antiocho imminere. Iam ipsum sua sponte in Europam transgressum; quid
5 deinde facturum censerent, cum hinc Aetoli, haud dubie hostes, vocarent ad bellum, illinc Hannibal, Romanis cladibus insignis imperator, stimularet?
6 Dum de provinciis consulum disceptatur, praetores
7 sortiti sunt; Cn. Domitio urbana iurisdictio, T.

---

[1] These colonies were founded in 197 B.C. (XXXII. xxix. 3).

[2] The Ferentinates had the status of socii Latini nominis; the other colonies mentioned consisted of cives Romani (xlv. 1 below). The senate's decision establishes the principle that Roman citizenship can not be acquired by Latins by enrolment in Roman colonies, although Roman citizens could acquire Latin status by enrolment in Latin colonies.

This year the people of Ferentinum tried to secure B.C. 195
a new privilege, to wit, that Latins who had registered as applicants for membership in a Roman colony should be Roman citizens. For such of them as had given in their names were enrolled as colonists of Puteoli, Salernum, and Buxentum,[1] and since they had on that account conducted themselves as Roman citizens, the senate gave judgment that they were not Roman citizens.[2]

XLIII. In the beginning of the year in which B.C. 191
Publius Scipio Africanus (for the second time) and Tiberius Sempronius Longus were consuls, the ambassadors of the tyrant Nabis came to Rome. An audience before the senate was granted them outside the City in the temple of Apollo. They requested that the peace which had been agreed upon with Titus Quinctius be ratified, and this was granted to them.

When the question of the provinces was brought up, a full meeting of the senate adopted a proposal that, since the wars in Spain and Macedonia had been finished, both consuls should have Italy as their province. Scipio was of the opinion that one consul sufficed for Italy and that Macedonia should be decreed to the other. His arguments were that a great war was threatened by Antiochus, who had already and without provocation crossed into Europe; what did they think he would do then, with the Aetolians, avowed enemies, on one side calling him to the war, and on the other Hannibal, a general distinguished for his defeats of the Romans, urging him on? While the debate about the consular provinces was in progress, the praetors cast lots; the city jurisdiction fell to Gnaeus Domitius, that

A.U.C. 560

Iuventio peregrina evenit, P. Cornelio Hispania ulterior, Sex. Digitio citerior, duobus Cn. Corneliis Blasioni Sicilia, Merendae Sardinia. In Macedoniam
8 novum exercitum transportari non placuit, eum qui esset ibi reduci in Italiam a Quinctio ac dimitti; item eum exercitum dimitti qui cum M. Porcio Catone in 9 Hispania esset; consulibus ambobus Italiam provinciam esse, et duas urbanas scribere eos legiones, ut dimissis quos senatus censuisset exercitibus octo omnino Romanae legiones essent.

XLIV. Ver sacrum factum erat priore anno, M.
2 Porcio et L. Valerio consulibus. Id cum P. Licinius pontifex non esse recte factum collegio primum, deinde ex auctoritate collegii patribus renuntiasset, de integro faciendum arbitratu pontificum censuerunt ludosque magnos, qui una voti essent, tanta pecunia
3 quanta adsoleret faciendos; ver sacrum videri pecus quod natum esset inter kal. Martias et pridie kal. Maias P. Cornelio et Ti. Sempronio consulibus.
4 Censorum inde comitia sunt habita. Creati censores Sex. Aelius Paetus et C. Cornelius Cethegus. Principem senatus [1] P. Scipionem consulem, quem et priores censores legerant, legerunt. Tres omnino senatores, neminem curuli honore usum, prae-

[1] senatus ed. Mediolanensis 1505 : senatum B M.

---

[1] See XXXIII. xliv. 2 and the note.

[2] See XXII. x. 7.

[3] The princeps senatus was usually chosen from the senators who had held the censorship. He was the first of the senators to be called upon to give his vote.

[4] This fact was not mentioned in XXXII. vii. 2, where the previous censorship was reported. Scipio himself was one of the censors in 199 B.C.

[5] This constituted exclusion from the senate.

between citizens and aliens to Titus Iuventius, B.C. 194
Farther Spain to Publius Cornelius, Nearer Spain to Sextus Digitius, Sicily to Gnaeus Cornelius Blasio and Sardinia to Merenda. It was decided that a new army should not be taken over to Macedonia and that the troops who were there should be brought back by Titus Quinctius and demobilized; likewise the army which was with Marcus Porcius Cato in Spain should be disbanded; that both consuls should have Italy as province and should enrol two city legions, so that after the discharge of those prescribed by the senate there should be in all eight Roman legions.

XLIV. The "sacred spring" had been celebrated in the previous year, during the consulship of Marcus Porcius and Lucius Valerius.[1] Since Publius Licinius the pontiff had announced, first to the college, and then, by the direction of the college, to the senate, that this had not been properly performed, the Fathers voted that it should be celebrated anew under the supervision of the pontiffs, and that the Great Games, which had been vowed at the same time,[2] should be performed with the customary appropriation of the necessary funds; the "sacred spring" was defined as including all the animals born between the Calends of March and the day preceding the Calends of May in the consulship of Publius Cornelius and Tiberius Sempronius.

The election of censors was then held, and Sextus Aelius Paetus and Gaius Cornelius Cethegus were chosen. As princeps senatus[3] they made the consul Publius Scipio their choice, who had been the choice of the previous censors as well.[4] They passed over[5] only three senators, none of whom had held a curule

A.U.C. 560

5 terierunt. Gratiam quoque ingentem apud eum ordinem pepererunt, quod ludis Romanis aedilibus curulibus imperarunt ut loca senatoria secernerent a populo; nam antea in promiscuo spectabant. Equitibus quoque perpaucis adempti equi, nec in ullum ordinem saevitum. Atrium Libertatis et villa publica ab iisdem refecta amplificataque.

6 Ver sacrum ludique Romani votivi, quos voverat Ser. Sulpicius Galba consul, facti. Cum spectaculo
7 eorum occupati animi hominum essent, Q. Pleminius, qui propter multa in deos hominesque scelera Locris admissa in carcerem coniectus fuerat, comparaverat homines qui pluribus simul locis urbis nocte incendia facerent, ut in consternata nocturno tumultu civitate
8 refringi carcer posset. Ea res indicio consciorum [1] palam facta delataque ad senatum est. Pleminius in inferiorem demissus carcerem est necatusque.

XLV. Coloniae civium Romanorum eo anno deductae sunt Puteolos, Volturnum, Literum, treceni
2 homines in singulas. Item Salernum Buxentumque coloniae civium Romanorum deductae sunt. Deduxere triumviri Ti. Sempronius Longus, qui tum consul erat, M. Servilius, Q. Minucius Thermus.
3 Ager divisus est qui Campanorum fuerat. Sipontum

[1] consciorum ς: consociorum B: sociorum M.

[1] These buildings were used by the censors.

[2] Livy is probably wrong as to the praenomen of Sulpicius, who is probably the consul who, in 200 B.C., vowed games (XXXI. ix. 6–10).

[3] See XXXI. xii. 2 and the note.

[4] This was probably the lower cell of the Mamertine Prison.

[5] See XXXII. xxix. 4.

[6] The apparent meaning is that these colonies were on land which had been taken from the Campanians in punishment for their revolt during the Second Punic War.

office. They won great favour with that order in another way, since at the Roman Games they ordered the curule aediles to separate the senatorial seats from those of the commons; for up to that time the seats from which they watched the games were taken indiscriminately. Very few of the knights were degraded by the taking away of their horses, nor was severity shown towards any rank. The atrium Libertatis and the villa publica[1] were rebuilt and enlarged by the same censors. B.C. 194

The "sacred spring" was celebrated and the votive Roman Games performed according to the vow made by Servius Sulpicius Galba.[2] While men's minds were intent upon this spectacle, Quintus Pleminius,[3] who, on account of the many crimes against gods and men which he had committed at Locri, had been thrown into prison, had arranged that men should at night set fire to the city in several places, so that in a state panic-stricken by the disturbance at night the prison might be broken open. This was revealed by the testimony of his accomplices and was laid before the senate. Pleminius was transferred to the lower prison[4] and put to death.

XLV. Colonies of Roman citizens were that year founded at Puteoli, Volturnum, Liternum, three hundred to each. Also, colonies of Roman citizens were established at Salernum and Buxentum. The triumvirs who established them were Tiberius Sempronius Longus (one of the consuls of the year), Marcus Servilius and Quintus Minucius Thermus.[5] The land which had belonged to the Campanians was divided among them.[6] Likewise at Sipontum, in item in agrum qui Arpinorum fuerat coloniam civium Romanorum alii triumviri, D. Iunius Brutus, M. Baebius Tamphilus, M. Helvius, deduxerunt. Tempsam item et Crotonem coloniae civium Roma-4 norum deductae. Tempsanus ager de Bruttiis captus erat; Brutti Graecos expulerant; Crotonem Graeci

A.U.C. 560

5 habebant. Triumviri Cn. Octavius, L. Aemilius Paulus, C. Laetorius Crotonem, Tempsam L. Cornelius Merula, Q. * *,[1] C. Salonius deduxerunt.
6 Prodigia quoque alia visa eo anno Romae sunt, alia nuntiata. In foro et comitio et Capitolio 7 sanguinis guttae visae sunt. Et terra aliquotiens pluvit et caput Vulcani arsit. Nuntiatum est Nare amni[2] lac fluxisse, pueros ingenuos Arimini sine oculis ac naso, et in Piceno agro non pedes, non 8 manus habentem natum. Ea prodigia ex pontificum decreto procurata. Et sacrificium novemdiale factum est, quod Hadriani nuntiaverant in agro suo lapidibus pluvisse.

XLVI. In Gallia L. Valerius Flaccus proconsul circa Mediolanium cum Gallis Insubribus et Bois, qui Dorulato duce ad concitandos Insubres Padum transgressi erant, signis collatis depugnavit. Decem
2 milia hostium sunt caesa. Per eos dies collega eius M. Porcius Cato ex Hispania triumphavit. Tulit in eo triumpho argenti infecti viginti quinque milia pondo, bigati centum viginti tria milia, Oscensis quingenta quadraginta, auri pondo mille quadrin-

[1] Merula, Q. * * Gelenius: merulaque B: merulaque et M.

[2] Nare amni J. Gronovius: anni B, lacunam indicans.

---

[1] The gender of quingenta shows that milia must be supplied.

territory which had belonged to the Arpini, a colony B.C. 194 of Roman citizens was founded by other triumvirs, Decimus Iunius Brutus, Marcus Baebius Tamphilus, and Marcus Helvius. Colonies of Roman citizens were established at Tempsa and Croton. The land of Tempsa had been taken from the Brutti, who in turn had expelled the Greeks; Croton had been held by the Greeks. The triumvirs for Croton were Gnaeus Octavius, Lucius Aemilius Paulus, and Gaius Laetorius; for Tempsa, Lucius Cornelius Merula, Quintus . . ., and Gaius Salonius.

Also, prodigies that year were both seen at Rome and reported from other places. In the Forum and the comitium and on the Capitoline drops of blood were seen, showers of earth fell several times, and the head of Vulcan burst into flames. It was announced that milk had flowed in the river Nar, that free-born children without eyes or noses had been born at Ariminum, and in the Picene country one without feet or hands. These prodigies were expiated by order of the pontiffs, and a nine-day sacrifice was performed because the Hadriani reported that a shower of stones had fallen in their country.

XLVI. In Gaul the proconsul Lucius Valerius Flaccus, in the vicinity of Milan, fought a pitched battle with the Insubrian Gauls and the Boi, who, led by Dorulatus had crossed the Po to rouse the Insubres to arms, and defeated them. Ten thousand of the enemy fell. About the same time his colleague Marcus Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. He carried in his triumph twenty-five thousand pounds of silver bullion, one hundred and twenty-three thousand silver denarii, five hundred and forty thousand [1] silver coins of Osca, and one thousand four hundred pounds genta. Militibus ex praeda divisit in singulos ducenos septuagenos aeris, triplex equiti.

A.U.C. 560

Ti. Sempronius consul in provinciam profectus in Boiorum primum agrum legiones duxit. Boiorix tum regulus eorum cum duobus fratribus tota gente concitata ad rebellandum castra locis apertis posuit, ut appareret dimicaturos si hostis fines intrasset. Consul ubi quantae copiae, quanta fiducia esset hosti sensit, nuntium ad collegam mittit ut, si videretur ei, maturaret venire: se tergiversando in adventum eius rem extracturum. Quae causa consuli cunctandi, eadem Gallis, praeterquam quod cunctatio hostium animos faciebat, rei maturandae erat ut, priusquam coniungerentur consulum copiae, rem transigerent. Per biduum tamen nihil aliud quam steterunt parati ad pugnandum, si quis contra egrederetur; tertio subiere ad vallum castraque simul ab omni parte adgressi sunt. Consul arma extemplo capere milites iussit; armatos inde paulisper continuit, ut et stolidam fiduciam hosti augeret et disponeret copias, quibus quaeque portis erumperent. Duae legiones duabus principalibus portis signa efferre iussae. Sed in ipso exitu ita conferti obstitere Galli ut clauderent viam. Diu in angustiis pugnatum est; nec dextris magis gladiisque gerebatur res of gold. From the booty, he gave to each of his B.C. 194 soldiers two hundred and seventy asses, and thrice that amount to each trooper.

Tiberius Sempronius the consul proceeded to his province and first invaded the country of the Boi. Boiorix, their chieftain at the time, with his two brothers, had aroused the whole people to revolt and had placed his camp in open country, so that it was clear that they would fight if the enemy entered their territory. When the consul saw how great was their strength and what confidence filled the enemy, he sent word to his colleague that, if he saw fit, he should make haste to arrive: that he, assuming the defensive, would drag matters out until his arrival. The same motive which the consul had for delay was also for the Gauls (not to mention the fact that the enemy's hesitation gave them courage), a reason for acting quickly so as to finish the campaign before the armies of the consuls were united. For two days, however, they did nothing more than stand ready to engage if anyone came out to meet them; on the third day they advanced towards the rampart and attacked the camp on all sides at once. The consul immediately ordered his men to take up arms; then he kept them under arms for a while, that he might increase the foolish confidence of the enemy and arrange his forces by the gates through which they would severally make their sally. Two legions were ordered to march out by the two main gates. But at the actual opening of the gates the Gauls met them in such close array that they blocked the road. For a long time they fought in these confined spaces; it was a matter not so much of hands and swords as of making

A.U.C. 560

quam scutis corporibusque ipsis obnixi urgebant, 11 Romani, ut signa foras efferrent, Galli, ut aut in castra ipsi penetrarent aut exire Romanos pro-
12 hiberent. Nec ante in hanc aut illam partem moveri acies potuerunt quam Q. Victorius primi pili centurio et C. Atinius tribunus militum, quartae hic, ille secundae legionis, rem in asperis proeliis saepe temptatam, signa adempta signiferis in hostes 13 iniecerunt. Dum repetunt enixe signum, priores secundani se porta eiecerunt.

XLVII. Iam hi extra vallum pugnabant quarta legione in porta haerente, cum alius tumultus ex
2 aversa parte castrorum est exortus. In portam quaestoriam irruperant Galli resistentesque pertinacius occiderant L. Postumium quaestorem, cui Tympano fuit cognomen, et M. Atinium et P. Sempronium, praefectos socium, et ducentos ferme
3 milites. Capta ab ea parte castra erant, donec cohors extraordinaria, missa a consule ad tuendam quaestoriam portam, et eos qui intra vallum erant partim occidit, partim expulit castris et irrumpentibus
4 obstitit. Eodem fere tempore et quarta legio cum duabus extraordinariis cohortibus porta erupit. Ita simul tria proelia circa castra locis distantibus erant clamoresque dissoni ad incertos suorum eventus a praesenti certamine animos pugnantium avertebant.

---

[1] The loss of the standard was the worst disaster that could befall them.

[2] This gate, on the side opposite the enemy, was usually called the porta decumana.

[3] With a consular army of two legions there were four cohorts not forming organic parts of the legions and so called extraordinariae. The nearest equivalent in our modern terminology seems to be the one I have employed. Two other such cohorts are mentioned in the next sentence.

their way by pushing against one another with shields and bodies, the Romans trying to force a way out for their standards, the Gauls trying either to enter the camp or to prevent the Romans from leaving it. Nor could the lines be moved in either direction until Quintus Victorius, a senior centurion, and Gaius Atinius, tribune of the soldiers, the latter of the fourth, the former of the second legion, resorting to a device often tried in desperate encounters, snatched the standards from the hands of their bearers and threw them into the midst of the enemy.[1] In their eager struggle to get back their standard, the soldiers of the second legion were the first to force their way through the gate. B.C. 194

XLVII. They were now fighting outside the rampart, the fourth legion being still inside the gate, when a new uproar was heard on the opposite side of the camp. The Gauls had broken through the porta quaestoria[2] and after stubborn resistance had slain the quaestor Lucius Postumius, whose surname was Tympanus, and Marcus Atinius and Publius Sempronius, commanders of allied detachments, and about two hundred of their men. They had gained possession of the camp in that quarter, until an attached[3] cohort, sent by the consul to defend the porta quaestoria, killed some of the Gauls who had entered the camp, drove others outside the rampart, and blocked the entrance against those who were attacking the gate. At almost the same instant the fourth legion with two attached cohorts burst through the gate. So there were three battles at once in different places around the camp, and the confused shouts distracted the minds of the fighters from their own immediate combats to the uncertain fortunes

A.U.C. 560

5 Usque ad meridiem aequis viribus ac prope pari spe pugnatum est. Labor et aestus mollia et fluida corpora Gallorum et minime patientia sitis cum decedere pugna coegisset, in paucos restantes impetum Romani fecerunt fusosque compulerunt in 6 castra. Signum inde receptui ab consule datum est; ad quod pars maior receperunt sese, pars certaminis studio et spe potiundi castris hostium perstitit ad 7 vallum. Eorum paucitate contempta Galli universi ex castris eruperunt; fusi inde Romani, quae imperio consulis noluerant, suo pavore ac terrore castra repetunt. Ita varia hinc atque illinc, nunc fuga 8 nunc victoria fuit; Gallorum tamen ad undecim milia, Romanorum quinque milia sunt occisa. Galli recepere in intima finium sese; consul Placentiam legiones duxit.

XLVIII. Scipionem alii coniuncto exercitu cum collega per Boiorum Ligurumque agros populantem isse, quoad progredi silvae paludesque passae sint, scribunt, alii nulla memorabili gesta re Romam comitiorum causa redisse.

2 Eodem hoc anno T. Quinctius Elatiae, quo in hiberna reduxerat copias, totum hiemis tempus iure dicundo consumpsit mutandisque iis, quae aut ipsius Philippi aut praefectorum eius licentia in civitatibus facta erant, cum suae factionis hominum vires au-of their comrades. Until noon the battle went on B.C. 191 with equal strength and with nearly the same hopes. When fatigue and heat had compelled the Gauls, with their soft and feeble bodies and their small capacity for enduring thirst, to retire from the fight, the Romans charged the few that were left and drove them, broken, to their camp. Thereupon the consul ordered the recall sounded; at this the majority turned back, but part, in their eagerness to fight and their hope of capturing the enemy's camp, pushed on to the rampart. The whole mass of Gauls, in disdain of their small number, rushed out from their camp; the Romans in turn were put to flight and returned to their camp in consequence of their own terror and panic, although they had refused to retire at their commander's order. Thus there were varied fortunes on both sides, now defeat and now victory; yet about eleven thousand of the Gauls fell and five thousand of the Romans. The Gauls retired into the interior of their country, while the consul led his legions to Placentia.

XLVIII. Some say that Scipio united his army with that of his colleague and marched through the territory of the Boi and Ligures, plundering as he went, as far as the forests and marshes permitted, others that without accomplishing anything worth recording, he returned to Rome to hold the elections.

In that same year Titus Quinctius at Elatia, where he had put his troops into winter quarters, spent the entire period of the winter in administering justice and in undoing the arrangements in the cities which had been caused by the arbitrary conduct of Philip and his prefects, since by increasing the power of the men of their own faction they diminished the

a.u.c. 560

3 gendo ius ac libertatem aliorum deprimerent. Veris initio Corinthum conventu edicto venit. Ibi omnium civitatium legationes in contionis modum circumfusas
4 est adlocutus, orsus ab inita primum Romanis amicitia cum Graecorum gente et imperatorum qui ante se
5 in Macedonia fuissent, suisque rebus gestis. Omnia cum approbatione ingenti sunt audita, praeterquam cum ad mentionem Nabidis ventum esset; id minime
6 conveniens liberanti Graeciam videbatur, tyrannum reliquisse non suae solum patriae gravem, sed omnibus circa civitatibus metuendum, haerentem visceribus nobilissimae civitatis.

XLIX. Nec ignarus huius habitus animorum Quinctius, si sine excidio Lacedaemonis fieri potuisset, fatebatur pacis cum tyranno mentionem admitten-
2 dam auribus non fuisse; nunc, cum aliter quam ruina gravissimae[1] civitatis opprimi non posset, satius visum esse tyrannum debilitatum ac totis prope viribus ad nocendum cuiquam ademptis
3 relinqui, quam intermori vehementioribus, quam quae pati posset, remediis civitatem sinere, in ipsa vindicta libertatis perituram. Praeteritorum com-
4 memorationi subiecit, proficisci sibi in Italiam atque
5 omnem exercitum deportare in animo esse; Demetriadis Chalcidisque praesidia intra decimum diem audituros deducta, Acrocorinthum ipsis extemplo videntibus vacuam[2] Achaeis traditurum, ut omnes scirent utrum Romanis an Aetolis mentiri mos esset, privilege and liberty of the rest. In the beginning B.C. 194 of spring he summoned a council and went to Corinth. There he addressed the embassies of all the states, gathered around as for an assembly: he began with the time when the first friendship was instituted between the Romans and the Greek people, and reviewed the achievements of the commanders who had preceded him in Macedonia, and his own. The whole speech was received with great applause, except when mention was made of Nabis; it seemed by no means consistent for the liberator of Greece to have left a tyrant, who was not only a burden to his own country but a source of danger to all the cities in the neighbourhood, clinging to the vitals of a most famous state.

[1] gravissimae ς: grauissima B.
[2] vacuam Ascensius: uacuum B.

XLIX. Quinctius, being aware of their feelings on this point, confessed that had it been possible without the destruction of Sparta, he would never have listened to any suggestion of peace with the tyrant; as it was, since he could not be crushed without causing the ruin of a most powerful state, it had seemed better that the tyrant be left helpless and almost entirely stripped of weapons with which to harm anyone, than to permit the city to be destroyed by remedies too violent to be endured, and to perish in the very act of recovering its liberty. He added to his account of the past, that it was his intention to leave for Italy and take his entire army with him; within ten days they would hear that Demetrias and Chalcis had been evacuated, and Acrocorinthus, under their own eyes, he would turn over to the Achaeans free from troops, that all might know whether the habit of lying belonged to the Romans or the Aetolians, who in all their talk had

A.U.C. 560

6 qui male commissam libertatem populo Romano sermonibus distulerint et mutatos pro Macedonibus
7 Romanos dominos. Sed illis nec quid dicerent nec quid facerent, quicquam umquam pensi fuisse; reliquas, civitates monere ut ex factis,[1] non ex dictis, amicos pensent intellegantque quibus credendum et
8 a quibus cavendum sit. Libertate modice utantur; temperatam eam salubrem et singulis et [2] civitatibus esse, nimiam et aliis gravem et ipsis qui habeant
9 praecipitem et effrenatam esse. Concordiae in civitatibus principes et ordines inter se, et in commune omnes civitates consulerent. Adversus consentientes nec regem quemquam satis validum nec tyrannum
10 fore; discordiam et seditionem omnia opportuna insidiantibus facere, cum pars quae domestico certamine inferior sit externo potius se applicet
11 quam civi cedat. Alienis armis partam, externa fide redditam libertatem sua cura custodirent servarentque, ut populus Romanus dignis datam libertatem ac munus suum bene positum sciret.

L. Has velut parentis voces cum audirent, manare omnibus gaudio lacrimae, adeo ut ipsum quoque
2 confunderent dicentem. Paulisper fremitus approbantium dicta fuit monentiumque aliorum alios ut eas voces velut oraculo missas in pectora animosque

[1] ex factis ς : factis B.
[2] et ed. Frobeniana 1535 : om. B.

spread abroad the story that the cause of liberty B.C. 194 had been unwisely entrusted to the Roman people, and that the Greeks had only changed masters, the Romans for the Macedonians. But these were men who weighed lightly what they said or did; he counselled the other states to judge their friends by their actions, not their words, and to reflect carefully on whom they should trust and against whom they should be on their guard. They should use their liberty with discretion; controlled, it was salutary to individuals and to states; uncontrolled, it was both a burden to others and a source of impetuous and lawless action to its possessors. He advised the leaders in the states and the other orders to strive for harmony among themselves, and all the cities to take measures for the general good. Against men who acted in unison neither king nor tyrant would be strong enough to do harm; strife and dissension furnished every opportunity to plotters, since the party which was defeated in an internal struggle would rather join hands with a foreigner than yield to a countryman. The liberty which had been gained by the arms of others and restored to them by the good faith of aliens, they should keep and guard by their own efforts, that the Roman people might know that liberty had been given to men who deserved it and that their gift had been well bestowed.

L. When they heard these words, as from a father's lips, tears of joy dropped from every eye, so that they even interrupted him in the midst of his speech. For a while there was the murmur of those who approved his words and of those who urged one another to let that utterance sink into the mind and heart as if it had been spoken by an oracle. Then,

A.U.C. 560

3 demitterent. Silentio deinde facto petiit ab iis ut cives Romanos, si qui apud eos in servitute essent, conquisitos intra duos menses mitterent ad se in Thessaliam; ne ipsis quidem honestum esse in 4 liberata terra liberatores eius servire. Omnes acclamarunt gratias se inter cetera etiam ob hoc agere, quod admoniti essent ut tam pio, tam neces-
5 sario officio fungerentur. Ingens numerus erat bello Punico captorum, quos Hannibal, cum ab suis non 6 redimerentur, venum dederat. Multitudinis eorum argumentum sit, quod Polybius scribit centum talentis eam rem Achaeis stetisse, cum quingenos denarios pretium in capita, quod redderetur dominis, statuissent. Mille enim ducentos ea ratione Achaia
7 habuit. Adice nunc pro portione, quot verisimile sit Graeciam totam habuisse.

8 Nondum conventus dimissus erat, cum respiciunt praesidium ab Acrocorintho descendens protinus duci
9 ad portam atque abire. Quorum agmen imperator secutus prosequentibus cunctis, servatorem liberatoremque acclamantibus, salutatis dimissisque iis eadem
10 qua venerat via Elatiam rediit. Inde cum omnibus copiis Ap. Claudium legatum dimittit. Per Thessaliam atque Epirum ducere Oricum iubet atque se ibi opperiri; inde namque in animo esse exercitum 11 in Italiam traicere. Et L. Quinctio fratri, legato et praefecto classis, scribit ut onerarias ex omni Graeciae ora eodem contraheret.

LI. Ipse Chalcidem profectus, deductis non a when they had become silent, he asked them that B.C. 194 any Roman citizens who might be in slavery in their states should be sought out and sent to him in Thessaly; it was unbecoming even for themselves that the liberators should be slaves in the land they had set free. All cried out that they owed him thanks for this too, among other things, because he had reminded them to perform so just and necessary an obligation. There was a great number of them, captives in the Punic War, whom Hannibal had sold when they were not ransomed by their relatives. It is an indication of their number that Polybius writes that this cost the Achaeans one hundred talents, although they had fixed the price per head to be paid to their owners at five hundred denarii. On that basis Achaea had one thousand two hundred. Calculate now, in proportion to this, how many there probably were in all Greece.

The meeting had not been dismissed when they saw the garrison coming down from Acrocorinthus, marching towards the gate, and departing. The commander followed their column with all the assembly attending him and proclaiming him their preserver and liberator, and when he had taken leave of them and dismissed them he returned to Elatia over the same route by which he had come. Thence he sent his lieutenant Appius Claudius away with all his troops, with orders to march through Thessaly and Epirus to Oricum and await him there, for it was his intention to transport the army thence to Italy. He also wrote to his brother Lucius Quinctius, his lieutenant and commander of the fleet, to assemble there transports from all the coast of Greece.

LI. He himself went to Chalcis, withdrawing the

A.U.C. 560

Chalcide solum sed etiam ab Oreo atque Eretria praesidiis, conventum ibi Euboicarum habuit civita-
2 tium admonitosque in quo statu rerum accepisset eos
3 et in quo relinqueret dimisit. Demetriadem inde
4 proficiscitur; deductoque praesidio prosequentibus cunctis, sicut Corinthi et Chalcide, pergit ire in Thessaliam, ubi non liberandae modo civitates erant, sed ex omni colluvione et confusione in aliquam
5 tolerabilem formam redigendae. Nec enim temporum modo vitiis[1] ac violentia et licentia regia turbati erant, sed inquieto etiam ingenio gentis, nec comitia nec conventum nec concilium ullum non per seditionem ac tumultum iam inde a principio ad
6 nostram usque aetatem traducentes. A censu maxime et senatum et iudices legit potentioremque eam partem civitatium fecit cui salva et tranquilla omnia esse magis expediebat.

LII. Ita cum percensuisset Thessaliam, per Epirum
2 Oricum, unde erat traiecturus, venit. Ab Orico copiae omnes Brundisium transportatae. Inde per totam Italiam ad urbem prope triumphantes non minore agmine rerum captarum quam suo prae se
3 acto venerunt. Postquam Romam ventum est, senatus extra urbem Quinctio ad res gestas edisserendas datus est triumphusque meritus ab lubentibus
4 decretus. Triduum triumphavit. Die primo arma,

[1] vitiis Ascensius: diuitiis B.

garrisons not from Chalcis alone but from Oreus and Eretria also, called a council there of the Euboean states and let them go after reminding them in what condition he had found them and in what he was leaving them. From there he proceeded to Demetrias; and having withdrawn the garrison he departed with all the citizens escorting him, as had happened at Corinth and Chalcis, and continued his journey to Thessaly, where there were the states not only to be set free, but also to be brought into some reasonable condition of order after all the chaos and confusion. For they had been thrown into confusion not only by the faults of the times and the king's lawless and violent behaviour, but also by the restless character of the people, which from the earliest times down to the present day has never conducted a meeting or an assembly or a council without dissension and rioting. He chose the senate and magistrates mainly on the basis of property and strove to make that element in the community more influential which found it advantageous to have everything peaceful and quiet. B.C. 194

LII. When he had thus completed the organization of Thessaly, he marched through Epirus to Oricum, whence he planned to set sail. From Oricum all his troops were conveyed across to Brundisium. Thence they proceeded all the way through Italy to Rome in a virtual triumph, the captured articles forming as long a column as the troops which marched ahead of him. When they arrived in Rome, Quinctius was granted an audience with the senate outside the city for the narration of his achievements, and a well-deserved triumph was voted by the eager senators. The triumph lasted tela signaque aerea et marmorea transtulit, plura Philippo adempta quam quae ex civitatibus ceperat; secundo aurum argentumque factum infectumque et signatum. Infecti argenti fuit quadraginta tria milia[1] pondo et ducenta septuaginta, facti vasa multa omnis generis, caelata pleraque, quaedam eximiae artis; et ex aere multa fabrefacta; ad hoc clipea argentea decem. Signati argenti octoginta quattuor milia fuere Atticorum; tetrachma[2] vocant; trium fere denariorum in singulis argenti est pondus. Auri pondo fuit tria milia septingenta quattuordecim et clipeum unum ex auro totum et Philippei nummi aurei quattuordecim milia quingenti quattuordecim. Tertio die coronae aureae, dona civitatium, tralatae centum quattuordecim; et hostiae ductae et ante currum multi nobiles captivi obsidesque, inter quos Demetrius, regis Philippi filius, fuit et Armenes, Nabidis tyranni filius, Lacedaemonius. Ipse deinde Quinctius in urbem est invectus. Secuti currum milites frequentes ut[3] exercitu omni ex provincia deportato. His duceni quinquageni aeris in pedites divisi, duplex centurioni, triplex equiti. Praebuerunt speciem triumpho capitibus rasis secuti qui servitute exempti fuerant.

A.U.C. 560

LIII. Exitu anni huius Q. Aelius[4] Tubero tribunus

[1] quadraginta tria milia Madvig: cf. Plut. Flam. 14: et acto B.
[2] tetrachma Bekker: detrachiã B.
[3] ut Bekker: in B.
[4] Q. Aelius Sigonius: p. aemilius B.

---

[1] The shaven head was a mark of the slavery from which they had been rescued.

three days. On the first day the procession dis- B.C. 194 played the arms, weapons, and statues of bronze and marble, more of which had been captured from Philip than received from the cities of Greece; and on the second day the gold and silver, wrought, unwrought, and minted. Of unwrought silver he had forty-three thousand two hundred and seventy pounds; of wrought silver there were many vases of all varieties, most of them embossed and some of remarkable workmanship; there were besides many fashioned from bronze, and in addition ten shields of silver. Of minted silver there were eighty-four thousand Attic coins called "tetrachma," and the weight of silver in them is about equivalent to three denarii each. There were three thousand seven hundred and fourteen pounds of gold, one shield made completely of gold, and fourteen thousand five hundred and fourteen gold coins with the image of Philip upon them. On the third day one hundred and fourteen golden crowns, gifts from the cities, were carried past; the victims were in the procession, and in front of the chariot there were many noble prisoners and hostages, among whom were Demetrius, the son of King Philip, and the Spartan Armenes, son of the tyrant Nabis. After them Quinctius himself entered the city. Following the chariot were throngs of soldiers, since the whole army had been brought back from the province. Each of these received in the distribution two hundred and fifty asses for the infantry, twice that amount for the centurions, and thrice for the cavalry. A striking sight in the procession was furnished by the prisoners who had been released from slavery, following with shaven heads.[1]

LIII. At the end of this year Quintus Aelius

A.U.C. 560

plebis ex senatus consulto tulit ad plebem plebesque scivit uti duae Latinae coloniae una in Bruttios altera
2 in Thurinum agrum deducerentur. His deducendis triumviri creati, quibus in triennium imperium esset, in Bruttios Q. Naevius, M. Minucius Rufus, M. Furius Crassipes, in Thurinum agrum A. Manlius, Q. Aelius, L. Apustius. Ea bina comitia Cn. Domitius praetor urbanus in Capitolio habuit.
3 Aedes eo anno aliquot dedicatae sunt: una Iunonis Matutae in foro olitorio, vota locataque quadriennio ante a C. Cornelio consule Gallico bello; censor idem
4 dedicavit; altera Fauni; aediles eam biennio ante ex multaticio argento faciendam locarant C. Scribonius et Cn. Domitius, qui praetor urbanus eam
5 dedicavit. Et aedem Fortunae Primigeniae in colle Quirinali dedicavit Q. Marcius Ralla,[1] duumvir ad
6 id ipsum creatus; voverat eam decem annis ante Punico bello P. Sempronius Sophus consul, locaverat
7 idem censor. Et in insula Iovis aedem C. Servilius duumvir dedicavit; vota erat sex annis ante Gallico bello ab L. Furio Purpurione praetore, ab eodem postea consule locata. Haec eo anno acta.

[1] Ralla ed. Frobeniana 1531 : ahala B.

[1] In 197 B.C. (XXXII. xxx. 10) Cornelius vowed a temple to Iuno Sospita. Iuno Matuta seems not to be mentioned elsewhere in classical Latin.

[2] In 204 B.C. (XXIX. xxxvi. 8) P. Sempronius Tuditanus vowed a temple to this Praenestine divinity. Livy's account contains other difficulties, since Tuditanus was censor before he was consul (in 209 B.C.: XXVII. xi. 7), and no P. Sempronius Sophus is known who was consul and censor during this period.

[3] In XXXI. xxi. 12 Furius vows a temple to Diiovis during his praetorship in 200 B.C. In XXXV. xli. 8 Livy says that he vowed one temple to Jupiter while praetor and another while consul, and had both built on the Capitoline.

Tubero, the tribune of the people, on the authority B.C. 194 of the senate, proposed to the people and the assembly voted that two Latin colonies should be founded, one among the Brutti, the other in the country around Thurii. Triumvirs were chosen to establish these colonies, whose authority should continue through three years; for the colony among the Brutti, Quintus Naevius, Marcus Minucius Rufus, and Marcus Furius Crassipes; for the colony in the land of Thurium, Aulus Manlius, Quintus Aelius, and Lucius Apustius. These two elections were conducted by the city praetor Gnaeus Domitius on the Capitoline.

Several temples were dedicated that year: one to Iuno Matuta[1] in the Forum Olitorium, which had been vowed and contracted for four years before in the Gallic war by the consul Gaius Cornelius, who also, while censor, dedicated it; the second to Faunus; two years earlier the contract for its construction out of the money received as fines had been let out by the aediles Gaius Scribonius and Gnaeus Domitius, the latter of whom dedicated it while city praetor. Also, Quintus Marcius Ralla, a duumvir created for this purpose, dedicated a temple to Fortuna Primigenia on the Quirinal hill; Publius Sempronius Sophus the consul had vowed this temple ten years before, during the Punic war, and as censor he had let the contract.[2] Likewise, on the Island, Gaius Servilius the duumvir dedicated a temple to Jupiter; it had been vowed six years before in the Gallic war by the praetor Lucius Furius Purpurio, and contracted for by the same man as consul.[3] These were the events of that year.[4]

[4] This sentence has been misplaced, either by Livy or by a scribe, since the following chapter deals with the same year.

A.U.C. 560

LIV. P. Scipio ex provincia Gallia ad consules subrogandos venit. Comitia consulum fuere, quibus creati sunt L. Cornelius Merula et Q. Minucius
2 Thermus. Postero die creati sunt praetores L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messala, L. Porcius Licinus et C.
3 Flaminius. Megalesia ludos scaenicos A. Atilius Serranus, L. Scribonius Libo aediles curules primi
4 fecerunt. Horum aedilium ludos Romanos primum senatus a populo secretus spectavit praebuitque sermones, sicut omnis novitas solet, aliis tandem,
5 quod multo ante debuerit, tributum existimantibus amplissimo ordini, aliis demptum ex dignitate populi, quicquid maiestati patrum adiectum esset, interpretantibus et omnia discrimina talia, quibus ordines discernerentur, et concordiae et libertatis aequae
6 minuendae esse. Ad quingentesimum quinquagesimum octavum[1] annum in promiscuo spectatum esse; quid repente factum cur immisceri sibi in cavea
7 patres plebem nollent? Cur dives pauperem consessorem fastidiret? Novam, superbam libidinem, ab nullius ante gentis senatu neque desideratam
8 neque institutam. Postremo ipsum quoque Africanum, quod consul auctor eius rei fuisset, paenituisse ferunt. Adeo nihil motum ex antiquo proba-

[1] quinquagesimum octavum Glareanus: octauum B.

[1] These games in honour of the Magna Mater (see iii. 8 above and the note) were celebrated in April.

[2] They had been given for some time in connection with other games (XXXI. iv. 5 and the note).

[3] See xliv. 5 above.

[4] In xliv. 5 above Livy states that this proposal was made by the censors; however, Cicero (de harusp. resp. 24) and Valerius Maximus (IV. v. 1; in II. iv. 3 he attributes it to Scipio Aemilianus) assert that it originated with Scipio.

LIV. Publius Scipio came back from the province of Gaul to choose the new consuls. The consular elections were held, at which Lucius Cornelius Merula and Quintus Minucius Thermus were returned. On the following day the praetors were elected, Lucius Cornelius Scipio, Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, Gaius Scribonius, Marcus Valerius Messala, Lucius Porcius Licinus, and Gaius Flaminius. At the Megalesian Games [1] dramatic performances [2] were for the first time introduced by the curule aediles Aulus Atilius Serranus and Lucius Scribonius Libo. At the Roman Games given by these aediles, the senate for the first time looked on segregated from the common people,[3] and this caused gossip, as every novelty usually does, some thinking that this distinction, which should have been granted long before, was at last bestowed upon a most honourable body; others taking the view that whatever was added to the majesty of the senate was subtracted from the dignity of the commons, and that all such discriminations, which tended to draw the orders apart, were dangerous to impartial harmony and freedom. For five hundred and fifty-eight years, they said, people had looked on from seats chosen at random; what had suddenly happened to make the Fathers unwilling to have the plebeians mingle with them in the crowd, or the rich man scorn the poor man as his neighbour at the show? This was a novel and arrogant caprice, never desired nor practised by the senate of any other people. It is reported that in the end even Africanus had repented that in his consulship he had suggested this innovation.[4] So difficult it is to prove the need of any variation from ancient custom; people always prefer to stand by

B.C. 194

A.U.C. 560 bile est; veteribus, nisi quae usus evidenter arguit, stari malunt.

A.U.C. 561 LV. Principio anni quo L. Cornelius Q. Minucius consules fuerunt, terrae motus ita crebri nuntiabantur ut non rei tantum ipsius sed feriarum quoque ob id 2 indictarum homines taederet; nam neque senatus haberi neque res publica administrari poterat sacrificando expiandoque occupatis consulibus. 3 Postremo decemviris adire libros iussis, ex responso 4 eorum supplicatio per triduum fuit. Coronati ad omnia pulvinaria supplicaverunt, edictumque est ut omnes qui ex una familia essent supplicarent pariter. Item ex auctoritate senatus consules edixerunt ne quis, quo die terrae motu nuntiato feriae indictae 5 essent, eo die alium terrae motum nuntiaret. Provincias deinde consules prius tum praetores sortiti. 6 Cornelio Gallia, Minucio Ligures evenerunt; sortiti praetores C. Scribonius urbanam, M. Valerius peregrinam, L. Cornelius Siciliam, L. Porcius Sardiniam, C. Flaminius Hispaniam citeriorem, M. Fulvius Hispaniam ulteriorem.

LVI. Nihil eo anno belli expectantibus consulibus 2 litterae M. Cinci—praefectus is Pisis erat—adlatae, Ligurum viginti milia armatorum coniuratione per omnia conciliabula universae gentis facta Lunensem the old ways, unless experience convincingly proves B.C. 194 them bad.

LV. In the beginning of this year, the consulship B.C. 193 of Lucius Cornelius and Quintus Minucius, earthquakes were reported with such frequency that people grew tired, not only of the cause itself, but of the ceremonies prescribed on that account; for the senate could not be convened nor public business transacted, since the consuls were busy with sacrifices and rites of expiation. Finally, the decemvirs were directed to consult the Books, and in accordance with their report a three-day period of prayer was ordered. Men with garlands on their heads made supplications at all the couches of the gods, and a decree was published that all who were of one family should offer their prayers collectively. Likewise, on the recommendation of the senate, the consuls proclaimed that on any day on which an earthquake had been reported and rites ordained, no one should report another earthquake. Then the consuls first and afterwards the praetors drew lots for the provinces. Gaul fell to Cornelius, the Ligures to Minucius; the allotment to the praetors gave the city jurisdiction to Gaius Scribonius, that between citizens and aliens to Marcus Valerius, Sicily to Lucius Cornelius, Sardinia to Lucius Porcius, Nearer Spain to Gaius Flaminius, and Farther Spain to Marcus Fulvius.

LVI. Though the consuls expected no war that year, a letter came from Marcus Cincius—he was the prefect at Pisae—announcing that twenty thousand of the Ligures were in arms, had caused a conspiracy to be formed in all the towns of the whole tribe, and had first devastated the fields around Luna and then primum agrum depopulatos, Pisanum deinde finem

A.U.C. 561

3 transgressos omnem oram maris peragrasse. Itaque Minucius consul, cui Ligures provincia evenerat, ex auctoritate senatus in rostra escendit et edixit ut 4 legiones duae urbanae, quae superiore anno con-scriptae essent, post diem decimum Arretii adessent;
in earum locum se duas legiones urbanas scripturum.
5 Item sociis et Latino nomini, magistratibus legatisque eorum, qui milites dare debebant, edixit ut in 6 Capitolio se adirent. Iis quindecim milia peditum et quingentos equites, pro numero cuiusque iuniorum, 7 discripsit et inde ex Capitolio protinus ire ad portam et, ut maturaretur res, proficisci ad dilectum iussit.
8 Fulvio Flaminioque terna milia Romanorum peditum, centeni equites in supplementum et quina milia socium Latini nominis et duceni equites decreti, mandatumque praetoribus ut veteres dimitterent 9 milites cum in provinciam venissent. Cum milites qui in legionibus urbanis erant frequentes tribunos plebei adissent, uti causas cognoscerent eorum, quibus aut emerita stipendia aut morbus causae essent, quo minus militarent, eam rem litterae Ti.
10 Sempronii discusserunt, in quibus scriptum erat Ligurum decem milia in agrum Placentinum venisse et eum usque ad ipsa coloniae moenia et Padi ripas 11 cum caedibus et incendiis perpopulatos esse; Boio-rum quoque gentem ad rebellionem spectare. Ob

---

[1] The allies furnished troops by roster, so that not all of them were called on for men at the same time; usually those nearest the seat of war were selected when there was any freedom of choice.

[2] The levy was divided among the several states in proportion to population, and the consul's list gave to each the numbers of infantry and cavalry to be furnished.

had entered the territory of Pisae and overrun the whole sea-coast. Therefore Minucius, the consul to whom the Ligures had been allotted as his province, on the authorization of the senate mounted the rostra and proclaimed that the two city legions which had been enlisted the previous year should assemble at Arretium the tenth day hence; in their place he would enrol two city legions. Also he sent notice to the allies of the Latin confederacy, that is, to their magistrates and ambassadors, who were under the obligation to furnish soldiers,[1] that they should meet him on the Capitoline. For these he made up a list amounting to fifteen thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry, in accordance with the quota of young men in each state,[2] and ordered them to go straight from the Capitoline to the gate and, in order to expedite the matter, proceed to hold the levy. Fulvius and Flaminius each received three thousand Roman infantry and one hundred cavalry as reinforcements, with five thousand infantry of the allies and the Latin confederacy and two hundred cavalry, and the praetors were instructed to discharge their veterans on their arrival in the province. When numerous soldiers who were in the city legions had appealed to the tribunes of the people to look into the cases of those who had given completed service or illness as bases for claims of exemption from military service, dispatches from Tiberius Sempronius put an end to their attempt: in these he wrote that ten thousand of the Ligures had entered the territory of Placentia and had laid it waste with slaughter and fire up to the very walls of the colony and the banks of the Po; the nation of the Boi was also considering a rebellion. For these reasons the B.C. 193

A.U.C. 561

eas res tumultum esse decrevit senatus; tribunos plebei non placere causas militares cognoscere, quo 12 minus ad edictum conveniretur. Adiecerunt etiam ut socii nominis Latini, qui in exercitu P. Cornelii Ti. Sempronii fuissent et dimissi ab iis consulibus essent ut, ad quam diem L. Cornelius consul edixisset et 13 in quem locum edixisset Etruriae, convenirent, et uti L. Cornelius consul in provinciam proficiscens in oppidis agrisque qua iturus esset, si quos ei videretur milites scriberet armaretque et duceret secum dimittendique ei quos eorum quandoque vellet ius esset.

LVII. Postquam consules dilectu habito profecti in provincias sunt, tum T. Quinctius postulavit ut de iis quae cum decem legatis ipse statuisset senatus audiret eaque, si videretur, auctoritate sua con- 2 firmaret; id eos facilius facturos si legatorum verba, qui ex universa Graecia et magna parte Asiae 3 quique ab regibus venissent, audissent. Eae legationes a C. Scribonio praetore urbano in senatum introductae sunt benigneque omnibus responsum. 4 Cum Antiocho quia longior disceptatio erat, decem legatis, quorum pars aut in Asia aut Lysimachiae 5 apud regem fuerant, delegata est. T. Quinctio mandatum ut adhibitis iis legatorum regis verba audiret

---

[1] Tumultus becomes almost a technical term for uprisings in Gaul; cf., e.g., XXXI. x. 1, 5; xi. 2; xlviii. 7.

senate decreed that a state of civil war[1] existed, and B.C. 193 that it was their pleasure that the tribunes of the people should not investigate the cases of soldiers to prevent their mustering according to the proclamation. They added also that the allies of the Latin confederacy who had been in the army of Publius Cornelius and Tiberius Sempronius and had been discharged by those consuls should assemble on the day and at the place in Etruria which the consul Lucius Cornelius had announced in his proclamation, and that the consul Lucius Cornelius, on his way to the province, should enlist, in the towns and rural districts along his route, whatever soldiers he saw fit, should arm them and lead them with him, and that he should have the privilege of discharging whichever of them he desired and at whatever time.

LVII. After the consuls had conducted their levies and departed to their provinces, Titus Quinctius demanded that the senate should listen to an account of the arrangements which he, in concert with the ten commissioners, had made, and should, if it was their pleasure, ratify them by their vote; they would accomplish this more easily if they would hear the words of the ambassadors who had come from all Greece and a great part of Asia and those who had come from the kings. These embassies were introduced to the senate by the city praetor, Gaius Scribonius, and were accorded a courteous reception. Since the discussion with Antiochus was of longer duration, it was referred to the ten commissioners, part of whom had met the king either in Asia or at Lysimachia. Titus Quinctius was instructed to hear, in the company of the commissioners, what the king's ambassadors had to say, and to make such a reply

A.U.C. 561

responderetque iis, quae ex dignitate atque utilitate
6 populi Romani responderi possent. Menippus et Hegesianax principes regiae legationis erant. Ex iis Menippus ignorare se dixit quidnam perplexi sua legatio haberet, cum simpliciter ad amicitiam
7 petendam iungendamque societatem venissent. Esse autem tria genera foederum, quibus inter se paciscerentur amicitias civitates regesque: unum, cum bello victis dicerentur leges; ubi enim omnia ei qui armis plus posset dedita essent, quae ex iis habere victos quibus multari eos velit, ipsius ius
8 atque arbitrium esse; alterum, cum pares bello aequo foedere in pacem atque amicitiam venirent; tunc enim repeti reddique per conventionem res et, si quarum turbata bello possessio sit, eas aut ex formula iuris antiqui aut ex partis utriusque commodo
9 componi; tertium esse genus cum, qui numquam hostes fuerint, ad amicitiam sociali foedere inter se iungendam coeant; eos neque dicere nec accipere leges;
10 id enim victoris et victi esse. Ex eo genere cum Antiochus esset, mirari se quod Romani aequum censeant leges ei dicere, quas Asiae urbium liberas et immunes, quas stipendiarias esse velint, quas 11 intrare praesidia regia regemque vetent. Cum Philippo enim hoste pacem, non cum Antiocho amico societatis foedus ita sanciendum esse.

to them as was consistent with the dignity and the B.C. 193 interest of the Roman people. Menippus and Hegesianax were the leaders of the king's embassy. On their behalf, Menippus said that he did not see what there was in their embassy that was so difficult, since they had come merely to ask for friendship and conclude an alliance. There were three kinds of treaties, he said, by which states and kings concluded friendships: one, when in time of war terms were imposed upon the conquered; for when everything was surrendered to him who was the more powerful in arms, it is the victor's right and privilege to decide what of the conquered's property he wishes to confiscate; the second, when states that are equally matched in war conclude peace and friendship on terms of equality; under these conditions demands for restitution are made and granted by mutual agreement, and if the ownership of any property has been rendered uncertain by the war, these questions are settled according to the rules of traditional law or the convenience of each party; the third exists when states that have never been at war come together to pledge mutual friendship in a treaty of alliance; neither party gives or accepts conditions; for that happens when a conquering and a conquered party meet. Since Antiochus was in this last class, he wondered on what account the Romans deemed it right to impose terms upon him, prescribing what cities of Asia he was to leave free and independent and what he was to make tributary to him, and what cities they forbade the king's armies and the king to enter. For in that way it was proper to make peace with Philip, an enemy, but not a treaty of alliance with Antiochus, a friend.

A.U.C. 561

LVIII. Ad ea Quinctius: "Quoniam vobis distincte agere libet et genera iungendarum amicitiarum enumerare, ego quoque duas condiciones ponam, extra quas nullam esse regi nuntietis amicitiae cum 2 populo Romano iungendae, unam, si nos nihil quod ad urbes Asiae attinet curare velit, ut et ipse omni 3 Europa abstineat; alteram, si se ille Asiae finibus non contineat et in Europam transcendat, ut et Romanis ius sit Asiae civitatium amicitias et tueri 4 quas habeant et novas complecti." Enimvero id auditu etiam dicere indignum esse Hegesianax, Thraciae et Chersonesi urbibus arceri Antiochum 5 cum,[1] quae Seleucus, proavus eius, Lysimacho rege bello victo et in acie caeso per summum decus parta reliquerit, pari cum laude eadem ab Thracibus possessa, partim armis receperit Antiochus, partim deserta, sicut ipsam Lysimachiam, et revocatis cultoribus frequentaverit et, quae strata ruinis atque incendiis erant, ingentibus impensis aedificaverit. 6 Quid igitur simile esse ex ea possessione, ita parta, ita recuperata, deduci Antiochum, et Romanos abstinere Asia, quae numquam eorum fuerit? 7 Amicitiam expetere Romanorum Antiochum, sed 8 quae impetrata gloriae sibi non pudori sit. Ad haec Quinctius "quando quidem" inquit "honesta pensamus, sicut aut sola aut prima certe pensari

[1] Antiochum cum Madvig: antiochum B.

LVIII. Quinctius replied thus: "Since it is your B.C. 193 pleasure to discuss the matter systematically and to enumerate the different ways of establishing friendships, I shall set forth two conditions without which you may report to the king that there is no way to form a friendship with the Roman people: first, that if he wishes us to have no interest in what concerns the cities of Asia, he too must himself keep entirely out of Europe; second, that if he will not keep himself within the limits of Asia, but crosses into Europe, the Romans too shall have the right both to defend the existing friendships with the cities of Asia and to add new treaties of alliance." It was indeed monstrous, replied Hegesianax, even to listen to a proposal that Antiochus should be excluded from the cities of Thrace and Chersonesus, districts which his forefather Seleucus, when he had defeated King Lysimachus in war and slain him in battle, had most honourably gained and bequeathed to his successors, and part of which, when they had been seized by the Thracians, Antiochus had with equal glory recovered in war, part of which, when abandoned, like Lysimachia itself, he had repopulated by recalling the inhabitants, and which, when destroyed by calamities and fires, he had rebuilt at great expense. What kind of analogy was there then between the two cases, that Antiochus should be ousted from this possession, so acquired and so recovered, and that the Romans should keep out of Asia, which has never been theirs? Antiochus is seeking the friendship of the Romans, but a friendship which when obtained will be a source of honour and not a cause for shame. To this Quinctius responded: "Inasmuch as we are weighing the honourable, as it indeed ought to be decet principi orbis terrarum populo et tanto regi, 9 utrum tandem videtur honestius, liberas velle omnes, quae ubique sunt, Graeciae urbes, an servas et 10 vectigales facere? Si sibi Antiochus pulchrum esse censet, quas urbes proavus belli iure habuerit, avus 11 paterque numquam usurpaverint pro suis, eas repetere in servitutem, et populus Romanus susceptum patrocinium libertatis Graecorum non de- 12 serere fidei constantiaeque suae ducit esse. Sicut a Philippo Graeciam liberavit, ita et ab Antiocho Asiae urbes quae Graii nominis sint, liberare in 13 animo habet. Neque enim in Aeolidem Ioniamque coloniae in servitutem regiam missae sunt, sed stirpis augendae causa gentisque vetustissimae per orbem terrarum propagandae."

A.U.C. 561

LIX. Cum haesitaret Hegesianax nec infitiari posset honestiorem causam libertatis quam servitutis praetexi titulo, " quin mittimus ambages? " inquit P. Sulpicius, qui maximus natu ex decem legatis erat, 2 " alteram ex duabus condicionibus, quae modo diserte a Quinctio latae sunt, legite aut supersedete 3 de amicitia agere." " Nos vero " inquit Menippus " nec volumus nec possumus pacisci quicquam quo regnum Antiochi minuatur."

4 Postero die Quinctius legationes universas Graeciae Asiaeque cum in senatum introduxisset, ut scirent quali animo populus Romanus, quali Antiochus erga civitates Graeciae essent, postulata et regis et considered either the only or at least the first object B.C. 193 of concern to the foremost people of the world and to so great a king, which, pray, seems the more honourable, to wish all the cities of Greece which are found everywhere to be free, or to make them slaves and tributaries? If Antiochus believes it noble for him that the cities which his great-grandfather held by the law of war, but which his grandfather and his father never treated as their property, be reduced to slavery, then the Roman people likewise considers it an obligation, imposed by its loyalty and consistency, not to abandon that championship of the liberty of the Greeks which it has taken upon itself. As it liberated Greece from Philip, so it intends to free from Antiochus the cities of Asia which are of the Greek race. For colonies were not sent out to Aeolis and Ionia to become the slaves of a king, but to increase the population and extend the influence of a most ancient people throughout the world."

LIX. At this Hegesianax hesitated, and could not deny that it was more honourable to go out under the banner of liberty than of slavery, and Publius Sulpicius, the eldest of the ten commissioners, said: "Why not stop beating around the bush? Choose one of the two conditions so clearly stated by Quinctius a while ago, or cease to talk of friendship." "But we," replied Menippus, "have neither the desire nor the authority to make any settlement by which the power of Antiochus will be diminished."

The next day, when Quinctius had brought into the senate all the embassies from Greece and Asia, that they might know what was the attitude of the Roman people and what that of Antiochus towards the cities of Greece, he set forth both the king's

A.U.C. 561

sua exposuit: renuntiarent civitatibus suis populum 5 Romanum, qua virtute quaque fide libertatem eorum a Philippo vindicaverit, eadem ab Antiocho, nisi 6 decedat Europa,[1] vindicaturum. Tum Menippus deprecari et Quinctium et patres institit, ne festi-narent decernere, quo decreto turbaturi orbem 7 terrarum essent; tempus et sibi sumerent et regi ad cogitandum darent; cogitaturum, cum renuntiatae condiciones essent, et impetraturum aliquid aut pacis causa concessurum. Ita integra dilata res est.
8 Legatos mitti ad regem eosdem qui Lysimachiae apud eum fuerant placuit, P. Sulpicium, P. Villium, P. Aelium.

LX. Vixdum hi profecti erant cum a Carthagine legati bellum haud dubie parare Antiochum Hannibale ministro attulerunt inieceruntque curam ne
2 simul et Punicum excitaretur bellum. Hannibal patria profugus pervenerat ad Antiochum, sicut ante dictum est, et erat apud regem in magno honore, nulla alia arte nisi quod volutanti diu consilia de Romano bello nemo aptior super tali re particeps
3 esse sermonis poterat. Sententia eius una atque eadem semper erat, ut in Italia bellum gereretur; 4 Italiam et commeatus et militem praebituram ex-terno hosti; si nihil ibi moveatur liceatque populo Romano viribus et copiis Italiae extra Italiam bellum gerere, neque regem neque gentem ullam parem

[1] Europa edd. vett.: ab europa BM.

---

[1] According to XXXIII. xxxix. 2 the earlier ambassadors were Lentulus, Villius, Terentius and Cornelius. There may have been another embassy which Livy has not mentioned.

demands and his own: he bade them carry word back to their states that with the same courage and the same fidelity with which the Roman people had won their liberty from Philip, they would win it from Antiochus if he did not retire from Europe. Then Menippus began to beg both Quinctius and the Fathers not to make a hasty decision, as a result of which they would throw the whole world into confusion; let them both take for themselves and grant to the king time to consider; that he would be enabled to do so when the terms had been reported to him, and would either win some concession or else yield for the sake of peace. Accordingly the whole matter was postponed. It was decided to send to the king the same ambassadors who had met him at Lysimachia, namely, Publius Sulpicius, Publius Villius, and Publius Aelius.[1] B.C. 193

LX. They had hardly left the city when the ambassadors from Carthage reported that Antiochus was beyond doubt preparing for war with the aid of Hannibal, and created a feeling of anxiety lest a Punic war also was being provoked. Hannibal, an exile from his country, had taken refuge with Antiochus, as has been said before, and was held in great honour by the king, for no other reason than that there could be no more suitable adviser for one who had long been revolving in his mind plans for an attack on Rome. His opinion was always one and the same, that the war should be waged in Italy; Italy would supply both food and soldiers to a foreign enemy; if no disturbance was created there and the Roman people was permitted to use the man-power and the resources of Italy for a war outside of Italy, neither the king nor any people

A.U.C. 561

5 Romanis esse. Sibi centum tectas naves et decem milia peditum, mille equites deposcebat; ea se classe primum Africam petiturum; magno opere confidere et Carthaginienses ad rebellandum ab se compelli
6 posse; si illi cunctentur, se aliqua parte Italiae excitaturum Romanis bellum. Regem cum ceteris omnibus transire in Europam debere et in aliqua parte Graeciae copias continere neque traicientem et, quod in speciem famamque belli satis sit, paratum traicere.

LXI. In hanc sententiam cum adduxisset regem, praeparandos sibi ad id popularium animos ratus litteras, ne quo casu interceptae palam facerent conata,
2 scribere non est ausus; Aristonem quendam Tyrium nanctus Ephesi expertusque[1] sollertiam levioribus ministeriis, partim donis, partim spe praemiorum oneratum, quibus etiam ipse rex adnuerat, Car-
3 thaginem cum mandatis mittit. Edit nomina eorum quibus conventis opus esset; instruit etiam secretis notis, per quas haud dubie agnoscerent sua mandata
4 esse. Hunc Aristonem Carthagine obversantem non prius amici quam inimici Hannibalis, qua de causa
5 venisset, cognoverunt. Et primo in circulis con-
6 viviisque celebrata sermonibus res est; deinde in senatu quidam nihil actum esse dicere exilio Hannibalis si absens quoque novas moliri res et sollicitando animos hominum turbare statum civitatis posset; could be a match for the Romans. He asked for B.C. 193 himself a hundred warships, ten thousand infantry, and a thousand cavalry; with that fleet he would first visit Africa; he had great hopes that the Carthaginians too could be induced by him to revolt; if they hesitated, he would, in some part of Italy, arouse a war against the Romans. The king should cross to Europe with the rest of his army and hold his forces in some part of Greece, not crossing to Italy, yet prepared to cross, which would be sufficient to produce the impression and start the rumour of war.

[1] expertusque ed. Frobeniana 1535: exercitusque B.

LXI. When he had brought the king around to this opinion, and thought that he should prepare the minds of his countrymen for what he was going to do, he did not dare to write a letter lest, if intercepted by any chance, it reveal his designs; he found at Ephesus a Tyrian, Aristo by name, and having tested his resourcefulness on less important errands, he loaded him with gifts and also with the hope of rewards, to which even the king finally gave his assent, and sent him to Carthage with his instructions. He gave him the names of the persons whom he needed to meet, and provided him with secret modes of identification, by means of which they could be assured that the instructions were from him. When this Aristo arrived in Carthage, his reason for coming was discovered as quickly by the enemies of Hannibal as by his friends. And at first the incident was discussed in conversations at social gatherings and at dinners; later, in the senate some said that nothing had been accomplished by the exile of Hannibal if, even when away, he could plot revolution and by stirring up men's minds disturb the security of the state; a 7 Aristonem quendam, Tyrium advenam, instructum mandatis ab Hannibale et rege Antiocho venisse; certos homines cotidie cum eo secreta colloquia serere; in occulto coqui[1] quod mox in omnium 8 perniciem erupturum esset. Conclamare omnes vocari Aristonem debere et quaeri quid venisset, et nisi expromeret cum legatis Romam mitti; satis pro temeritate unius hominis suppliciorum pensum esse; 9 privatos suo periculo peccaturos; rem publicam non extra noxam modo sed etiam extra famam noxae 10 conservandam esse. Vocatus Aristo purgare sese et firmissimo pugnaculo uti, quod litterarum nihil ad 11 quemquam attulisset; ceterum nec causam adventus satis expediebat et in eo maxime haesitabat, quod cum Barcinae solum factionis hominibus collocutum 12 eum arguebant. Orta inde altercatio est aliis pro speculatore comprehendi iam et custodiri iubentibus, 13 aliis negantibus tumultuandi causam esse; mali rem exempli esse de nihilo hospites corripi; idem Carthaginiensibus et Tyri et in aliis emporiis, quo[2] frequenter commeent,[3] eventurum. Dilata eo die 14 res est. Aristo Punico ingenio inter Poenos usus tabellas conscriptas celeberrimo loco super sedem cotidianam magistratuum prima vespera suspendit, ipse de tertia vigilia navem conscendit et profugit.

A.U.C. 561

[1] coqui Crévier: conloqui B.
[2] quo ς: quae B.
[3] commeent ed. Frobeniana 1535: commeant B.

[1] The party of Hannibal; its name was derived from the name of the father of Hannibal, Hamilcar Barca (XXI. ii. 4).

certain Aristo, a stranger from Tyre, had come B.C. 193 equipped with instructions from Hannibal and King Antiochus; every day certain individuals had secret conferences with him; schemes were being concocted in secret which would presently break out in the ruin of the entire community. All exclaimed that Aristo ought to be summoned and asked why he had come, and if he gave no good explanation, he should be sent to Rome in charge of ambassadors; they had already suffered enough punishment for the rashness of one man; private citizens might do wrong at their own risk, but the state should be saved not only from doing wrong but also from the reputation of doing wrong. Aristo when summoned defended himself and made use of the strongest argument for his innocence, that he had brought no written communication to anyone; but he did not make entirely clear the reason why he had come, and was most noticeably at a loss when they charged him with having relations only with men of the Barcine faction.[1] A violent debate then began, some arguing that he should be at once arrested as a spy and held under guard, others saying that there was no cause for measures that suggested martial law; it set a bad precedent to arrest strangers with no convincing proof, and the same treatment would be applied to Carthaginians, not only in Tyre but in other markets which they frequently visited. A decision was not reached that day. Aristo, employing Carthaginian artifice against Carthaginians, as soon as it was dusk hung a written tablet over the place where the magistrates daily held their sessions, in the most crowded part of the city, and in the third watch went on board his ship and escaped. The next day,

A.U.C. 561

15 Postero die cum sufetes ad ius dicendum consedissent, conspectae tabellae demptaeque et lectae. Scriptum erat Aristonem privatim ad neminem, publice ad seniores—ita senatum vocabant—mandata habuisse. 16 Publicato crimine minus intenta de paucis quaestio erat; mitti tamen legatos Romam, qui rem ad consules et senatum deferrent, placuit, simul qui de iniuriis Masinissae quererentur.

LXII. Masinissa postquam et infames Carthaginienses et inter se ipsos discordes sensit,[1] principibus propter colloquia Aristonis senatui, senatu propter 2 indicium eiusdem Aristonis populo suspecto,[2] locum iniuriae esse ratus agrum maritimum eorum et depopulatus est et quasdam urbes vectigales Carthaginiensium sibi coegit stipendium pendere. 3 Emporia vocant eam regionem; ora est minoris Syrtis et agri uberis; una civitas eius Leptis; ea singula in dies talenta vectigal Carthaginiensibus 4 dedit. Hanc tum regionem et totam infestam Masinissa et ex quadam parte dubiae possessionis, 5 sui regni an Carthaginiensium esset, effecerat. Et quia simul ad purganda crimina et questum de se Romam eos ituros comperit, quia et illa onerarent suspicionibus et de iure vectigalium disceptarent, 6 legatos et ipse Romam mittit. Auditi de Tyrio

[1] sensit ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. B.
[2] senatu . . . suspecto ed. Frobeniana 1535: senatum . . suspectum B.

[1] These officials, two in number, corresponded to the consuls at Rome, though etymologically the word is closer to the older title of praetor. The word sufetes seems an attempt to express in Latin characters and sounds the Punic title.

[2] Excavations in this district in recent years have confirmed the general accuracy of Livy's brief description. There is as yet no comprehensive publication.

when the sufetes[1] took their seats to administer justice, the tablet was seen, taken down, and read. Its message was that Aristo had come with a private message for no man, but with a public errand to the elders—so they call their senate. The charge having thus been made general, the investigation of a few men was less vigorously pushed; nevertheless, it was voted that an embassy should be sent to Rome to report the whole affair to the consuls and the senate, and at the same time to complain about the injuries inflicted by Masinissa. B.C. 193

LXII. When Masinissa perceived that the good name of the Carthaginians was tarnished and that they were quarrelling among themselves, the nobles being suspected by the senate on account of their conferences with Aristo, the senate by the people on account of the declaration made by the same Aristo, considering that he had an opportunity to injure them, he both ravaged their coast and compelled certain cities which were dependents of the Carthaginians to pay their tribute to him. They call this district Emporia; it is the coast of the lesser Syrtis and a fertile spot; one of its cities is Leptis, and this paid to the Carthaginians a tribute of one talent per day.[2] At this time Masinissa had endangered this whole region, and, with respect to part of it, had raised a question as to its ownership, whether it belonged to his kingdom or to the Carthaginians. And because he saw that they would go to Rome both to clear themselves and to complain of him, he likewise sent ambassadors to Rome for the double purpose of increasing Roman suspicions of them, by their insinuations, and of setting on foot an argument about the tribute-rights. The Cartha-

A.U.C. 561

advena primum Carthaginienses curam iniecere patribus ne cum Antiocho simul et Poenis bellandum
7 esset. Maxime ea suspicio crimen urgebat quod quem comprensum Romam mitti placuisset nec
8 ipsum nec navem eius custodissent. De agro deinde
9 cum regis legatis disceptari coeptum. Carthaginienses iure finium causam tutabantur, quod intra eos
10 terminos esset quibus P. Scipio victor agrum, qui iuris esset Carthaginiensium, finisset, et confessione regis qui, cum Aphthirem, profugum ex regno suo, cum parte Numidarum vagantem circa Cyrenas persequeretur, precario ab se iter per eum ipsum agrum tamquam haud dubie Carthaginiensium iuris 11 petisset. Numidae et de terminatione Scipionis mentiri eos arguebant et, si quis veram originem iuris exigere vellet, quem proprium agrum Cartha-
12 giniensium in Africa esse? Advenis, quantum secto bovis tergo amplecti loci potuerint, tantum ad urbem communiendam precario datum; quicquid Bursam, sedem suam, excesserint, vi atque iniuria partum 13 habere. Neque eum de quo agitur probare eos posse, non modo semper, ex quo coeperint, sed ne diu quidem possedisse. Per opportunitates nunc

---

[1] Livy's statement in XXX. xxxvii. 2 does not suggest that very precise boundaries had been fixed at this time.

[2] See Virgil, Aeneid, I. 367–368.

[3] The Bursa (cf. βύρσα, "hide") was the citadel of Carthage and, according to Masinissa, the only territory in Africa to which they had any legitimate claim. It included the land encompassed by the bull's hide.

ginians were first given audience, and with their B.C. 193 account of the Tyrian stranger they rendered the Fathers anxious lest they should have to fight with Antiochus and the Carthaginians at the same time. What most weighed against them was a suspicion due to the fact that they had set no guard over the person or ship of a man whom they had decided to arrest and send to Rome. Then the dispute with the king's envoys about the land began. The Carthaginians maintained their case by their boundary-rights, because the district was within the limits which Publius Scipio, when he conquered them, had set for the land which should be under Carthaginian jurisdiction,[1] and by the king's own admission, who, when he was pursuing Aphthir, a fugitive from his country, who was wandering around Cyrene with a party of Numidians, had requested, as a favour from them, a right of way through this very country as if it had without question belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians charged that they were not telling the truth about the limits fixed by Scipio, and asked, if one wanted to determine the real origin of a property-right, what land in Africa was really Carthaginian. Coming there as strangers, they had been granted as a gift, for the purpose of building a city, as much land as they could encompass with the cut-up hide of a bull;[2] to whatever extent they had expanded beyond the limits of the Bursa,[3] their seat, they had land gained by violence and without right. As to the particular tract of land in question, they could not even prove that they had held it for any considerable time, and much less that they had held it continuously from the time they had begun to claim it. As occasion offered, now they and

A.U.C. 561

illos, nunc reges Numidarum usurpasse ius, semperque penes eum possessionem fuisse qui plus armis 14 potuisset. Cuius condicionis res fuerit, priusquam hostes Romanis Carthaginienses, socius atque amicus rex Numidarum esset, eius sinerent esse nec se 15 interponerent quo minus qui posset teneret. Responderi legatis utriusque partis placuit missuros se in Africam qui inter populum Carthaginiensem et 16 regem in re praesenti disceptarent. Missi P. Scipio Africanus et C. Cornelius Cethegus et M. Minucius Rufus audita inspectaque re omnia suspensa[1] neutro
17 inclinatis sententiis reliquere. Id utrum sua sponte fecerint an quia mandatum ita fuerit non tam certum est quam videtur tempori aptum fuisse, integro 18 certamine eos relinqui; nam ni ita esset, unus Scipio, vel notitia rei vel auctoritate, ita de utrisque meritus, finire nutu disceptationem potuisset.

[1] suspensa Bekker: ipensa B.

now the Numidian kings had claimed the right to it, and possession had always remained with the party that was stronger in arms. They asked that the land should remain in the condition in which it was before the Carthaginians became enemies to the Romans and the king of the Numidians their ally and friend and not to interfere to prevent that person from holding the land who was able to do so. It was decided that the envoys of both states should receive the reply that they would send ambassadors to Africa to judge, on the actual ground, between the Carthaginian people and the king. The ambassadors who were sent were Publius Scipio Africanus, Gaius Cornelius Cethegus, and Marcus Minucius Rufus, and after hearing the testimony and inspecting the place they left the matter undecided, without expressing an opinion in favour of either side. Whether they did this of their own accord or because they had been so instructed is not so certain as that this seemed expedient under the circumstances, that the case be left entirely undecided; if this were not the case, Scipio alone, either from his knowledge of the affair or through his personal influence, since he deserved so well of both sides, could have settled the dispute by a nod. B.C. 193

LIBRI XXXIV PERIOCHA

Lex Oppia, quam C. Oppius trib. pl. bello Punico de finiendis matronarum cultibus tulerat, cum magna contentione abrogata est, cum Porcius Cato auctor fuisset ne ea lex aboleretur. Is in Hispaniam profectus bello quod Emporiis orsus est citeriorem Hispaniam pacavit. T. Quinctius Flamininus bellum adversus Lacedaemonios et tyrannum eorum, Nabidem, prospere gestum data his pace qualem ipse volebat liberatisque Argis, qui sub dicione tyranni erant, finit. Res praeterea in Hispania et adversus Boios et Insubres Gallos feliciter gestae referuntur. Senatus tunc primum secretus a populo ludos spectavit. Id ut fieret Sextus Aelius Paetus et C. Cornelius Cethegus censores intervenerunt cum indignatione plebis. Coloniae plures deductae sunt. M. Porcius Cato ex Hispania triumphavit. T. Quinctius Flamininus, qui Philippum, Macedonum regem, et Nabidem, Lacedaemoniorum tyrannum, vicerat Graeciamque omnem liberaverat, ob hoc [1] triduo triumphavit. Legati Carthaginiensium nuntiaverunt Hannibalem qui ad Antiochum confugerat bellum cum eo moliri. Temptaverat autem Hannibal per Aristonem Tyrium sine litteris Carthaginem missum ad bellandum Poenos concitare.

[1] hoc Rossbach: hoc rerum factarum multitudinem codd.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXIV

THE Oppian law, which Gaius Oppius, tribune of the people, had proposed during the Punic war to limit the expenditures of the women, was repealed after great argument, though the principal speech against the abrogation of the law was made by Porcius Cato. He proceeded to Spain and pacified Nearer Spain in a war which broke out at Emporiae. Titus Quinctius Flamininus ended a successful war against the Lacedaemonians and Nabis their tyrant, granting them such a peace as he himself desired, and liberating Argos, which was under the control of the tyrant. In addition, the successes in Spain and against the Boi and the Insubres are recorded. The senate then for the first time watched the games apart from the commons. That this happened was the result of the action of the censors, Sextus Aelius Paetus and Gaius Cornelius Cethegus, and it was attended with great indignation on the part of the plebeians. Several colonies were founded. Marcus Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. Titus Quinctius Flamininus, who had defeated Philip, king of the Macedonians, and Nabis, tyrant of the Lacedaemonians, for this reason celebrated a triumph lasting three days. Ambassadors of the Carthaginians announced that Hannibal, who had fled to Antiochus, was plotting war along with him. Hannibal, moreover, had tried, through Aristo, a Tyrian whom he had sent to Carthage without any written communications, to stir up the Carthaginians to make war.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION BY

EVAN T. SAGE, PH.D.
PROFESSOR OF LATIN AND HEAD OF THE DEPARTMENT OF CLASSICS IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PITTSBURGH

IN THIRTEEN VOLUMES

XI

BOOKS XXXVIII—XXXIX

364 700
39
S. 4

LONDON
WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD
CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS
HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
MCMXXXVI

CONTENTS

PAGE

EDITORS' NOTE vii

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE ix

INTRODUCTORY NOTE xi

BOOK XXXVIII 1

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXVIII 213

BOOK XXXIX 217

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXIX 401

INDEX OF NAMES 405

MAPS—

1. NORTHERN ITALY . . . . . At end

2. GREECE AND ASIA MINOR . . . . . ,,

3. SPAIN . . . . . ,,

4. ASIA MINOR . . . . . ,,

T. LIVI
AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XXXVIII

I. Dum in Asia bellum geritur, ne in Aetolia quidem res quietae fuerant, principio a gente Athamanum orto. Athamania ea tempestate pulso Amynandro sub praefectis [1] Philippi regio tenebatur praesidio, qui superbo atque immodico imperio desiderium Amynandri fecerant. Exulanti tum [2] Amynandro in Aetolia litteris suorum, indicantium statum Athamaniae, spes recuperandi regni facta est. Remissique ab eo nuntiant principibus Argitheam—id enim caput Athamaniae erat—si popularium animos satis perspectos haberet, impetrato ab Aetolis auxilio in Athamaniam se venturum. Non diffidere sibi facile conventurum [3] cum delectis, quod consilium est [4] gentis, et Nicandro praetore. Quos ubi ad omnia

[1] praefectis σ : praefecto B.
[2] exulanti tum σ : exulantium B.
[3] venturum. non diffidere sibi facile conventurum M. Mueller : uenturum *BM*σ.
[4] est Madvig : esset *B*σ.

---

[1] The events here described belong to the previous year.

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XXXVIII

I. While the war in Asia was in progress, there was B.C. 189 no peace in Aetolia either,[1] the trouble having been begun by the Athamanian people. Athamania at that time, after the expulsion of Amynander,[2] was held by royal garrisons under the prefects of Philip, and they, by their arrogant and lawless administration, had created a longing for Amynander. Amynander, who was then an exile in Aetolia, was inspired by the letters of his partisans, who described to him the state of affairs in Athamania, with the hope of recovering his kingdom. His agents, too, sent with his reply to the chiefs at Argithea—for this is the capital of Athamania—announced that if he perceived clearly enough the sentiments of his countrymen he would obtain the aid of the Aetolians and proceed to Athamania. They said that he had no doubt that he would easily come to an agreement with the chosen persons [3] who comprise the council of the people and with the praetor Nicander. When

[2] Cf. XXXVI. xiv. 9.
[3] The apocleti (XXXV. xxxiv. 2, etc.).

paratos esse vidit, certiores suos subinde [1] facit quo die cum exercitu Athamaniam ingressurus esset.
6 Quattuor primo fuerunt coniurati adversus Macedonum praesidium. Hi senos sibi adiutores ad rem gerendam assumpserunt; [2] dein paucitate parum freti, quae [3] celandae rei quam agendae aptior erat, 7 parem priori numerum adiecerunt. Ita duo et quinquaginta facti quadrifariam se diviserunt; pars una Heracleam, altera Tetraphyliam petit, ubi custodia regiae pecuniae esse solita [4] erat, tertia 8 Theudoriam, quarta Argitheam. Ita inter omnes convenit ut primo quieti,[5] velut ad privatam rem agendam venissent, in foro obversarentur; die certa multitudinem omnem [6] convocarent ad praesidia 9 Macedonum arcibus expellenda. Ubi ea dies advenit, et Amynander cum mille Aetolis in finibus erat, ex composito quattuor simul locis praesidia Macedonum expulsa, litteraeque in alias urbes passim dimissae ut vindicarent sese ab impotenti dominatione Philippi et restituerent in patrium ac legitimum 10 regnum. Undique Macedones expelluntur. Theium [7] oppidum litteris a Xenone praefecto praesidii inter-ceptis [8] et arce ab regiis occupata paucos dies obsi-11 dentibus restitit; deinde id quoque traditum

[1] suos subinde H. J. Mueller : subinde B.
[2] assumpserunt σ : consumpserunt B.
[3] quae σ : quod B.
[4] esse solita σ : om. B.
[5] primo quieti edd. vett. : prima quietem B.
[6] omnem σ : omnes B.

he learned that they were ready for any event, B.C. 189 he at once informed his friends on what day he would arrive in Athamania at the head of an army. At first there were four who had conspired against the Macedonian garrison. Each of these chose six assistants to aid in carrying out their plan; then, lacking confidence by reason of their small number, which was better suited to concealment than to action, they added a number equal to that which they had first enlisted. Their number having thus become two and fifty, they divided themselves into four sections; one proceeded to Heraclea, one to Tetraphylia, which was the usual storehouse of the royal wealth, the third to Theudoria, the fourth to Argithea. It had been agreed upon among them all that at first they should move about quietly in the market-place as if they were engaged in transacting private business; that on the appointed day they should summon the whole population to drive the Macedonian garrisons from the citadels. When this day came and Amynander with a thousand Aetolians was at the frontiers, according to agreement the Macedonian garrisons were expelled from the four places at once, and a despatch was sent in all directions to the other towns, summoning them to free themselves from the headstrong rule of Philip and to return to their hereditary and lawful sovereign. On all sides the Macedonians were expelled. The town of Theium, since the despatch had been intercepted by Xeno, the prefect of the garrison, and the citadel had been seized by the king's troops, held out for a few days against the besiegers; finally

[7] Theium edd. vett.: telum $B\sigma$.
[8] interceptis σ: interseptis B.

Amynandro est, et omnis Athamania in potestate erat praeter Athenaeum castellum, finibus Macedoniae subiectum.

II. Philippus audita defectione Athamaniae cum sex milibus armatorum profectus ingenti celeritate Gomphos pervenit. Ibi relicta maiore parte exercitus—neque enim ad tanta itinera sufficerent—cum duobus milibus [1] Athenaeum, quod unum a praesidio suo retentum fuerat, pervenit. Inde proximis temptatis cum facile animadvertisset cetera hostilia esse, Gomphos regressus omnibus copiis simul in Athamaniam redit. Xenonem inde cum mille peditibus praemissum Aethopiam occupare iubet, opportune Argitheae imminentem; quem ubi teneri ab suis locum vidit, ipse circa templum Iovis Acraei posuit castra. Ibi unum diem foeda tempestate retentus, postero die ducere ad Argitheam intendit. Euntibus extemplo apparuere Athamanes in tumulos imminentes viae discurrentes. Ad quorum conspectum constitere prima signa, totoque [2] agmine pavor et trepidatio erat et pro se quisque quidnam futurum esset cogitare, si in valles subiectas rupibus agmen foret demissum. Haec tumultuatio regem cupientem si se sequerentur raptim evadere angustias, revocare primos et eadem qua venerat via referre coegit signa. Athamanes primo ex intervallo quieti sequebantur; postquam Aetoli se coniunxerunt, hos, ut ab tergo agmini instarent, reliquerunt, ipsi ab

[1] milibus $\bar{\text{v}}$: om. B.

[2] signa totoque $\bar{\text{v}}$: signatoque B : concitatoque M.

it also was delivered to Amynander, and all Atha- B.C. 189 mania was in his hands except the fortress of Athenaeum, lying on the borders of Macedonia.

II. Philip, on hearing of the revolt of Athamania, set out with six thousand troops and very quickly arrived at Gomphi. There he left the greater part of his men—for they would not have had strength enough for such hard marching—and with two thousand went on to Athenaeum, which alone had been held by his garrison. Then, when he had quickly learned, by trial of the neighbouring towns, that everything else was unfriendly, he returned to Gomphi and thence, with his whole force united, marched into Athamania. He ordered Xeno to go ahead with a thousand infantry to seize Aethopia, which was favourably situated to threaten Argithea; and when he saw that his men were in possession of the place, he himself encamped near the temple of Jupiter Acraeus. There he was detained for a day by a violent storm, and on the next day began his march toward Argithea. Suddenly as they were advancing the Athamanians appeared, hurrying towards the hills that commanded the road. At the first glimpse of them the advance guard halted and throughout the whole column there was terror and confusion, each for himself considering what would happen if the column were led down into the valleys lying at the foot of the cliffs. This panic compelled the king, who had wished, should his troops follow him, to get through the pass with a rush, to recall the van and retire by the same road by which he had come. The Athamanians at first followed quietly, keeping their distance; after the Aetolians joined them, they left them to harass the column from the 10 lateribus se circumfuderunt, quidam per notas calles breviore via praegressi transitus insedere; tantumque tumultus Macedonibus est iniectum, ut fugae magis effusae quam itineris ordinati modo multis armis

11 virisque relictis flumen traiecerint.[1] Hic finis sequendi fuit. Inde tuto Macedones Gomphos et a 12 Gomphis in Macedoniam redierunt. Athamanes Aetolique Aethopiam ad Xenonem ac mille Mace-
13 donas opprimendos undique concurrerunt. Macedones parum[2] loco freti ab Aethopia in altiorem deruptioremque undique tumulum concessere; quo pluribus ex locis aditu invento expulere eos Atha-
14 manes, dispersosque et per invia atque ignotas rupes iter fugae non expedientis partim ceperunt partim interfecerunt. Multi pavore in derupta praecipitati; perpauci cum Xenone ad regem evaserunt. Postea per indutias sepeliendi caesos potestas facta est.

III. Amynander recuperato[3] regno legatos et Romam ad senatum et ad Scipiones in Asiam, Ephesi post magnum cum Antiocho proelium morantes, 2 misit. Pacem petebat excusabatque sese, quod per Aetolos recuperasset paternum regnum; Philippum incusabat.

[1] traiecerint σ : traiecerunt B.
[2] parum σ : om. B.
[3] recuperato σ : recuperando B.

---

[1] Amynander recognizes the necessity of placating Rome even if he does not admit her virtual protectorate over Greece. His own diplomatic status was somewhat uncertain: he had allied himself with the Aetolians and Antiochus (XXXV. xlvii. 8), and for that reason the Romans had consented to Philip's conquest (XXXVI. xiv. 9). It may be assumed that the return of Amynander would automatically restore Atharear and threw themselves upon the flanks, while B.C. 189

some, going ahead over familiar trails by a shorter route, blocked the crossing; and such great confusion was caused among the Macedonians that in the fashion of a disorderly rout rather than a march under discipline, leaving behind many weapons and men, they crossed the river. This was the end of the pursuit. From that point the Macedonians returned safely to Gomphi and from Gomphi to Macedonia. The Athamanians and Aetolians came from all sides to Aethopia to destroy Xeno and his thousand Macedonians. The Macedonians, distrusting the strength of the place, withdrew from Aethopia to a hill higher and steeper on every side; from this the Athamanians dislodged them, finding ways to scale it in several places, and as they scattered over pathless country and unfamiliar cliffs that offered no aid to flight, part were captured and part killed. Many, panic-stricken, plunged over precipices; a very few with Xeno escaped to the king. Later a truce was made to give them an opportunity to bury their dead.

III. Amynander, having recovered his kingdom, sent ambassadors both to the senate in Rome and to the Scipios in Asia, since they were tarrying in Ephesus after the decisive battle with Antiochus. He asked for peace and defended himself for having recovered his ancestral kingdom through the aid of the Aetolians;[1] he laid the blame on Philip.[2] mania to the status of an Aetolian ally, and that Amynander is trying to escape the dangers of such a position.

[2] These charges must have been based on the character of Philip's government after his conquest (i. 2 above), as no other plausible cause for finding fault with him is apparent.

B.C. 3 Aetoli ex Athamania in Amphilochos profecti
55 sunt et maioris partis voluntate [1] in ius dicionemque 4 totam redegerunt gentem. Amphilochia recepta—nam fuerat quondam Aetolorum—eadem spe in Aperantiam transcenderunt: [2] ea quoque magna ex parte sine certamine in deditionem venit. Dolopes 5 numquam Aetolorum fuerant, Philippi erant. Hi primo ad arma concurrerunt: ceterum postquam Amphilochos cum Aetolis esse fugamque ex Athamania Philippi et caedem praesidii eius accepere, et ipsi 6 a Philippo ad Aetolos deficiunt. Quibus circumiectis gentibus iam undique se a Macedonibus tutos credentibus esse Aetolis fama adfertur Antiochum in Asia victum ab Romanis; nec ita multo post legati ab Roma rediere sine spe pacis Fulviumque consulem 7 nuntiantes cum exercitu iam traiecisse. His territi,[3] prius ab Rhodo et Athenis legationibus excitis, ut per auctoritatem earum civitatium suae preces nuper repudiatae faciliorem aditum ad senatum haberent, principes gentis ad temptandam spem ultimam 8 Romam miserunt, nihil, ne bellum haberent, priusquam paene in conspectu hostis erat, praemeditati.
9 Iam M. Fulvius Apolloniam exercitu traiecto cum

[1] uoluntate σ: uoluntatem B.
[2] Aperantiam transcenderunt σ: om. B.
[3] territi σ: territis B.

[1] Cf. XXXII. xxxiv. 4.

[2] For Philip's recent acquisition of Aperantia and Dolopia, cf. XXXVI. xxxiii. 7. In the latter case it was a re-conquest, since Dolopia had been freed from Macedonian control in 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxxiv. 6).

[3] The embassy had been expelled from Italy: cf. XXXVII. xlix. 5–7.

[4] The appointment of Fulvius to Aetolia was reported at XXXVII. i. 8.

From Athamania the Aetolians moved against B.C. 189
the Amphilochians, and with the consent of the majority brought the whole tribe under their authority and control. Amphilochia having been recovered [1]—for it had once belonged to the Aetolians—they proceeded with the same hope to Aperantia; this state also surrendered, in large measure without resistance. The Dolopians [2] had never been subjects of the Aetolians, but belonged to Philip. At first they rushed to arms, but after they learned that the Amphilochians were with the Aetolians, that Philip had been driven from Athamania and his garrison destroyed, they too went over from Philip to the Aetolians. Having set up these buffer-states and believing that they were now safe from the Macedonians on all sides, the Aetolians received the news that Antiochus had been defeated in Asia by the Romans; and not long afterwards their envoys returned from Rome with no promise of peace,[3] and brought word that the consul Fulvius with the army had already crossed.[4] Terrified by this information, first summoning embassies from Rhodes and Athens,[5] that through the influence of these states their own prayers, though previously rejected, might obtain easier access to the senate, they sent the leading men of the people to Rome to try the last hope of peace, having given no thought to the avoidance of war until the enemy was almost in sight.

Marcus Fulvius had by now transported his army to Apollonia and was consulting with the chiefs of [5] These two states were frequently appealed to as peacemakers; for Rhodes, cf. XXVII. xxx. 4; for Athens, cf. XXXVII. vi. 4, where her intervention for Aetolia the preceding year is recorded.

c. 5 Epirotarum principibus consultabat unde bellum inciperet. Epirotis Ambraciam placebat aggredi, quae
10 tum contribuerat se Aetolis: sive ad tuendam eam venirent Aetoli, apertos circa campos ad dimicandum esse; sive detractarent[1] certamen, oppugnationem 11 fore haud difficilem; nam et copiam in propinquo materiae ad aggeres excitandos et cetera opera esse, et Arethontem, navigabilem amnem, opportunum ad comportanda quae usui sint praeter ipsa moenia fluere, et aestatem aptam rei gerendae adesse. His persuaserunt ut per Epirum duceret.

IV. Consuli ad Ambraciam advenienti magni operis oppugnatio visa est. Ambracia tumulo aspero
2 subiecta est; Perranthem incolae vocant. Urbs, qua murus vergit in campos et flumen, occidentem, arx,
3 quae imposita tumulo est, orientem spectat. Amnis Aretho ex Athamania fluens cadit in sinum maris ab nomine propinquae urbis Ambracium appellatum.
4 Praeterquam quod[2] hinc amnis munit, hinc tumuli, muro quoque firmo saepta erat, patente in circuitu
5 paulo amplius quattuor milia passuum. Fulvius bina a campo castra, modico inter se distantia intervallo, unum castellum loco edito contra arcem
6 obiecit; ea omnia vallo atque fossa ita[3] iungere

[1] detractarent $\bar{r}$: detrectarent B.
[2] quod $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[3] ita ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. B$\bar{r}$.

[1] Livy here seems to think that there were no other Roman forces in Greece at this time, and in this he apparently has the support of Polybius (XXII. ix). However, in XXXVII. ii. 7–8 the propraetor Cornelius was instructed to conduct an army to Aetolia, and in XXXVII. i. 4 the presence of an army there was assumed. Livy has, as often, changed sources without warning. The account of the siege of Ambracia follows Polybius closely.

the Epirotes as to where to begin the campaign.[1] B.C. 189
The advice of the Epirotes was to attack Ambracia, which had at this time joined the Aetolians:[2] if, on the one hand, the Aetolians should come to defend it, there were open plains on which to fight; if, on the other hand, they declined an engagement, the siege would not be difficult; for there was both abundance of material close at hand for building mounds and raising other siege-works, and a navigable river, the Aretho, suitable for the transportation of the necessary supplies, flowed past the very walls, and, moreover, summer was at hand, a season adapted to active operations. By such arguments they induced him to lead the army through Epirus.

IV. When the consul arrived before Ambracia, the siege seemed to him to involve great toil. Ambracia lay at the foot of a rugged hill; the natives call it Perranthes. The city, where the wall turns towards the plains and the river, looks west; the citadel, which is situated on the hill, faces east. The river Aretho, rising in Athamania, empties into the gulf of the sea which is called "the Ambracian" from the name of the neighbouring city. In addition to the fact that the river on one side and the hills on the other defended the city, it was also protected by a strong wall, extending in circumference a little more than four miles. Fulvius established two camps on the side of the plain, separated from one another by a moderate distance, and one redoubt on a high spot facing the citadel; all these he planned so to connect by means of a wall and ditch that no

[2] Ambracia had been the capital of Pyrrhus (cf. v. 2 and ix. 13 below), and had later become a member of the Aetolian League.

parat, ne exitus inclusis ab urbe neve aditus foris ad auxilia intromittenda esset. Ad famam oppugnationis Ambraciae Stratum iam edicto Nicandri 7 praetoris convenerant [1] Aetoli. Inde primo copiis omnibus ad prohibendam obsidionem venire in animo fuerat; dein, postquam urbem iam magna ex parte operibus saeptam viderunt, Epirotarum trans flumen loco plano castra posita esse, dividere copias placuit.
8 Cum mille expeditis Eupolemus Ambraciam profectus per nondum commissa inter se munimenta urbem 9 intravit. Nicandro cum cetera manu primo Epirotarum castra nocte aggredi consilium fuerat haud facili ab Romanis auxilio, quia flumen intererat;
10 dein, periculosum inceptum ratus, ne qua sentirent Romani et regressus [2] inde in tuto non esset, deter-ritus ab hoc consilio ad depopulandam Acarnaniam iter convertit.

V. Consul iam munimentis quibus saepienda [3] urbs erat, iam operibus, quae admovere muris parabat, perfectis quinque simul locis moenia est 2 aggressus. Tria paribus intervallis, faciliore [4] aditu a campo, adversus Pyrrheum quod vocant admovit, unum e regione Aesculapii, unum adversus arcem.
3 Arietibus muros quatiebat; asseribus falcatis detergebat pinnas. Oppidanos primo et ad speciem

[1] conuenerant ζ : conuenerunt B.
[2] regressus ζ : praegressus B.
[3] saepienda ζ : om. B.
[4] faciliore edd. vett. : faciliora $B\zeta$.

---

[1] Probably the palace of Pyrrhus : see the last note.
[2] The falx muralis of Caesar (B.G. III. xiv. 5). This detail, like those which follow, is derived directly from Polybius (XXII. x).

egress from the city might be allowed the besieged B.C. 189
nor ingress from without to a relieving force. At the report of the siege of Ambracia the Aetolians had already assembled at Stratus in response to the edict of the praetor Nicander. It had been their first intention to march from there with their entire force to prevent the siege; then, when they saw that the city was already in large part hemmed in by siege-works, and that the camp of the Epirotes lay on level ground across the river, they decided to divide their forces. Eupolemus with a thousand light-armed troops, setting out for Ambracia, entered the city through the fortifications which had not yet been joined together. It had been the original plan that Nicander, with the rest of the troops, should make a night attack on the camp of the Epirotes, which could not readily be aided by the Romans because the river was between them; later, thinking that there was in the enterprise the danger that the Romans might somehow learn of it and he have no escape to a place of safety, he abandoned that design and turned aside to plunder Acarnania.

V. The consul had by now completed the fortifications by which the town had to be surrounded as well as the siege-engines which he was making ready to move up to the walls, and attacked the ramparts in five places at once. Three of the assaults, equidistant from one another, the approach from the plain being easier, he directed against what they call the "Pyrrheum,"[1] one on the side of the temple of Aesculapius, one against the citadel. He was shaking the walls with battering-rams; he was pulling down the parapets with hooks fixed on poles.[2] The citizens were at first stricken with terror et ad ictus moenium cum terribili sonitu editos[1] 4 pavor ac trepidatio cepit: deinde, ut praeter spem stare muros viderunt, collectis rursus animis in arietes tollenonibus libramenta[2] plumbi aut saxorum stipi-tesve[3] robustos incutiebant; falces ancoris ferreis iniectis in interiorem partem muri trahentes asserem 5 praefringebant; ad hoc eruptionibus et[4] nocturnis in custodias operum et diurnis in stationes ultro terrorem inferebant.

6 In hoc statu res ad Ambraciam cum essent, iam
Aetoli a populatione Acarnaniae Stratum redierant.[5]
Inde Nicander praetor spem nactus solvendae[6] incepto forti obsidionis, Nicodamum quendam cum Aetolis 7 quingentis Ambraciam intromittit. Noctem certam tempusque etiam noctis constituit, quo et illi ab urbe opera hostium[7] quae adversus Pyrrheum erant aggrederentur, et ipse ad castra Romana terrorem faceret, posse ratus ancipiti tumultu et nocte augente 8 pavorem memorabilem rem geri. Et Nicodamus intempesta nocte, cum alias custodias fefellisset, per[8] alias impetu constanti perrupisset,[9] superato brachio in urbem penetrat, animique aliquantum[10] ad omnia audenda et spei obsessis adiecit et, simul constituta nox venit, ex composito repente opera 9 est aggressus. Id inceptum conatu quam effectu

[1] editos edd. vett.: editus $B\bar{r}$.
[2] libramenta $\bar{r}$: libramento B.
[3] stipitesue $\bar{r}$: stipites B.
[4] et ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. $B\bar{r}$.
[5] redierant $\bar{r}$: redierunt B.
[6] soluendae $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[7] hostium $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[8] per $\bar{r}$: et per B.
[9] perrupisset Crévier: erupisset et B: erupisset $\bar{r}$.
[10] aliquantum $\bar{r}$: aliquantulum B.

and confusion both at the sight and at the blows which struck the walls with fearful din; then, when they saw the walls still standing, contrary to expectations, they recovered their courage and with the aid of cranes they dropped on the rams masses of lead or stone or stout logs; seizing the wall-hooks with grappling-irons they pulled them inside the walls and broke off the poles; besides, by sallies conducted both by night against the guards of the engines and by day against the outposts they did their part in spreading terror. B.C. 189

While matters before Ambracia were in this state, the Aetolians had now returned to Stratus from the devastation of Acarnania. Then the praetor Nicander, conceiving the hope of raising the siege by a bold stroke, sent a certain Nicodamus with five hundred Aetolians into Ambracia. He appointed a certain night and even an hour of the night when both the troops from the city should attack the enemy's siege-works which faced the Pyrrheum and he himself should cause a panic in the Roman camp, thinking that something memorable could be accomplished by an attack from two directions and with night adding to the terror. And Nicodamus, on a stormy night, after eluding some pickets and forcing his way past others by a resolute attack, crossed one branch of the wall [1] and entered the town, thereby inspiring in the besieged no small degree of courage for any deed of daring and of hope, and as soon as the appointed night arrived, according to the agreement, he suddenly attacked the siege-works. This venture was more serious in its purpose than in gravius fuit, quia nulla ab exteriore parte vis admota est,[1] seu metu deterrito praetore Aetolorum, seu quia potius visum est Amphilochis nuper receptis ferre opem, quos Perseus, Philippi filius, missus ad Dolopiam Amphilochosque recipiendos,[2] summa vi oppugnabat.

[1] This was probably a low rampart connecting two of the Roman strong points.

VI. Tribus locis, sicut ante dictum est, ad Pyrrheum opera Romana erant, quae omnia simul, sed nec apparatu nec vi simili, Aetoli aggressi sunt: alii cum ardentibus facibus, alii stuppam picemque et malleolos ferentes, tota collucente flammis acie, advenere. Multos primo impetu custodes oppresserunt: dein, postquam clamor tumultusque in castra est perlatus datumque a consule signum, arma capiunt et omnibus portis ad opem ferendam effunduntur. Ferro ignique gesta res; ab duobus irrito incepto, cum temptassent magis quam inissent certamen, Aetoli abscesserunt: atrox pugna[3] in unum inclinaverat locum. Ibi diversis partibus duo duces Eupolemus et Nicodamus pugnantes hortabantur et prope certa fovebant spe iam Nicandrum ex composito adfore et terga hostium invasurum. Haec res aliquamdiu animos pugnantium sustinuit: ceterum, postquam nullum ex composito signum a suis accipiebant et crescere numerum hostium cernebant, destituti[4] segnius instare; postremo re omissa iam vix tuto receptu fugientes in urbem compelluntur,

[1] est σ: om. B.
[2] recipiendos σ: om. B.
[3] pugna σ: om. B.
[4] destituti σ: destitutis B.

its result, since no attack was made from outside, B.C. 189 whether because the Aetolian praetor was prevented by fear or because it seemed better to assist the Amphilochians who had just been recovered and whom Perseus, the son of Philip, sent to regain control of Dolopia and the Amphilochians, was attacking with the greatest vigour.

VI. There were Roman works, as has been said before, in three places facing the Pyrrheum, all of which the Aetolians attacked at once, but not with the same equipment or violence: some advanced with flaming torches, others carrying tow and pitch and firebrands, the whole battle-line gleaming with flames. They cut down many of the guards at the first attack; then, when the shouting and the din were heard in the camp and the signal was given by the consul, the Romans seized their arms and from all the gates hastened to the rescue. The battle raged with steel and fire; in two places the Aetolians retired without accomplishing anything, after trying rather than actually beginning an engagement; the severe fighting had concentrated in one place. There in different quarters the two captains Eupolemus and Nicodamus were urging on the fighters and encouraging them with the almost certain hope that Nicander would soon be there according to agreement and would take the enemy in the rear. This assurance kept up for a considerable time the spirits of the fighters; but when they received no signal from their comrades according to the agreement and they perceived that the number of the enemy was increasing, being thus left unsupported, they pressed on less vigorously; finally, abandoning their effort, their retreat being by now scarcely safe, they were driven back into the city parte operum incensa et pluribus aliquanto, quam ab ipsis [1] ceciderant, interfectis. Quodsi ex composito acta res fuisset, haud dubium erat expugnari una utique parte opera cum magna caede hostium

8 potuisse. Ambracienses quique intus erant Aetoli non ab eius solum noctis incepto recessere, sed in reliquum quoque tempus velut proditi ab suis
9 segniores ad pericula erant. Iam nemo eruptionibus, ut ante, in stationes hostium, sed dispositi per muros et turres ex tuto pugnabant.

VII. Perseus ubi adesse [2] Aetolos audivit, omissa obsidione urbis, quam oppugnabat, depopulatus tantum agros Amphilochia excessit atque in Mace-
2 doniam redit. Et Aetolos inde avocavit populatio maritimae orae. Pleuratus, Illyriorum rex, cum sexaginta lembis Corinthium sinum invectus adiunctis Achaeorum quae Patris erant navibus maritima
3 Aetoliae vastabat.[3] Adversus quos mille Aetoli missi, quacumque se classis circumegerat per litorum am-4 fractus, brevioribus semitis occurrebant. Et Romani ad Ambraciam pluribus locis quatiendo arietibus muros aliquantum urbis nudaverant, nec tamen
5 penetrare in urbem poterant; nam et pari celeritate novus pro diruto murus obiciebatur, et armati ruinis
6 superstantes instar munimenti erant. Itaque cum

[1] ab ipsis M. Mueller: ipsis $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[2] adesse $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[3] uastabat $\bar{\sigma}$: uastabant B.

---

[1] This use of ab ipsis (which is itself an emendation) is somewhat unusual, but the interpretation here given seems to be required.
[2] Cf. XXXIII. xxxiv. 11.

in flight, after they had burned part of the siege-works and killed a considerably larger number of the enemy than they had themselves lost.[1] But if the plan had been carried out according to the agreement there was no doubt that in one place at least the works could have been taken with heavy loss to the enemy. The Ambraciots and the Aetolians who were inside the city not only gave up their attempt for that night, but for the future too, feeling that they had been deserted by their friends, they were more reluctant to face dangers. Henceforth no one took part in sallies, as before, against the outguards of the enemy, but posting themselves along the walls and towers they fought in safety. B.C. 189

VII. When Perseus learned that the Aetolians were approaching, he abandoned the siege of the city he was investing and, merely plundering the fields, withdrew from Amphilochia and returned to Macedonia. The Aetolians too were called away from there by the devastation of their sea-coast. Pleuratus,[2] the king of the Illyrians, sailed into the Corinthian gulf with sixty cruisers and joining the ships of the Achaeans which were at Patrae was laying waste the coast districts of Aetolia. A thousand Aetolians sent against them, wherever the fleet went, following the indentations of the shore-line, would travel by shorter routes and meet them. Also the Romans before Ambracia, by battering at the walls with rams, had to a great extent laid bare the town, but nevertheless could not force their way into it; for with equal speed a new wall was thrown up to replace what had been destroyed and armed men, standing on the ruins, served as a fortification. Accordingly, since visibly applied force was not aperta vi parum procederet consuli res, cuniculum occultum vineis ante contecto[1] loco agere instituit;[2] et aliquamdiu, cum[3] dies noctesque in opere essent, non solum sub terra fodientes sed egerentes etiam 7 humum fefellere hostem. Cumulus repente terrae eminens index operis oppidanis fuit, pavidique ne iam subrutis muris facta in urbem via esset, fossam intra murum e regione eius operis quod vineis con-

8 tectum erat ducere instituunt. Cuius ubi ad tantam altitudinem quantae esse solum infimum cuniculi poterat pervenerunt, silentio facto[4] pluribus locis
9 aure admota sonitum fodientium captabant. Quem ubi acceperunt, aperiunt rectam in cuniculum viam, nec fuit magni operis; momento enim ad inane[5] suspenso fulturis[6] ab hostibus muro pervenerunt.
10 Ibi commissis operibus, cum e fossa in cuniculum pateret iter, primo ipsis ferramentis, quibus in opere usi erant, deinde celeriter armati etiam subeuntes occultam sub terra ediderunt pugnam; segnior deinde ea facta est intersaepientibus cuniculum, ubi vellent, nunc ciliciis praetentis nunc foribus raptim obiectis.
11 Nova etiam haud magni operis adversus eos qui in cuniculo erant excogitata res. Dolium a fundo

[1] contecto $\bar{\gamma}$: collecto B.
[2] instituit $\bar{\gamma}$: statuit B.
[3] cum $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[4] facto $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[5] inane $\bar{\gamma}$: inanem B.
[6] fulturis ed. Frobeniana 1535 : furculis B$\bar{\gamma}$.

[1] The apparent meaning is that the trench of the defenders ran at right angles to the assumed direction of the tunnel. Polybius (XXII. xi) describes the trench as parallel to the city-wall.

progressing well for the consul, he determined to dig B.C. 189 secretly a tunnel in a place formerly covered by his sheds, and for a considerable period, although the work was in progress day and night, not only the men digging beneath the ground but also those who were carrying out the earth went unnoticed by the enemy. Suddenly a rising mound of earth betrayed the work to the townspeople, and, fearing that the walls had already been undermined and a way opened into the city, they began to dig a ditch inside the wall in the direction of that work which had been covered by the sheds.[1] When they came to a depth as great as the bottom of the tunnel could have, they remained silent, and placing their ears against the walls in several places they caught the sound of the diggers. When they heard this they opened a way straight into the tunnel, nor was this a difficult task; for in a moment they came into the open space where the enemy was supporting the roof on props. The works joining there, as the way was open from the trench to the tunnel, they began to fight, at first with the same tools which they had used in the work, then quickly armed men too came up and engaged in a hidden battle underground; later this fighting became more desultory, since they blocked the tunnel wherever they wished, now with curtains[2] stretched across, now with hastily constructed doors.[3] A new device as well, and one easy of execution, was thought out against the Romans who were in the tunnel. They prepared a cask pierced at the [2] Literally, garments made of the hair of goats.

[3] Polybius (l.c.) says that both sides protected themselves with shields (θυρέους), and it has been suggested that Livy confused this word with θύρας, "doors."

pertusum, qua[1] fistula modica inseri posset, et ferream fistulam operculumque dolii[2] ferreum, et ipsum pluribus locis perforatum, fecerunt. Hoc tenui pluma completum dolium ore in cuniculum 12 verso posuerunt. Per operculi foramina praelongae hastae, quas sarisas vocant, ad summovendos hostes eminebant. Scintillam levem ignis inditam plumae folle fabrili ad caput fistulae imposito flando accende-
13 runt. Inde non solum magna vis fumi sed acrior etiam foedo quodam odore ex adusta pluma cum totum cuniculum complesset, vix durare quisquam intus poterat.

VIII. Cum in hoc statu ad Ambraciam res esset, legati ab Aetolis Phaeneas et Damoteles cum liberis mandatis decreto gentis ad consulem venerunt. Nam praetor eorum, cum alia parte Ambraciam
2 oppugnari cerneret, alia infestam oram navibus hostium esse, alia Amphilochos Dolopiamque[3] a Macedonibus vastari, nec Aetolos ad tria simul diversa bella occursantes sufficere, convocato concilio Aetoliae principes quid agendum esset consuluit.
3 Omnium eo sententiae decurrerunt, ut pax si posset aequis,[4] si minus tolerandis condicionibus peteretur;
4 Antiochi fiducia bellum susceptum; Antiocho terra marique superato et prope extra orbem terrae ultra

[1] qua $\bar{r}$: quasi B. [2] dolii $\bar{r}$: dolium B.
[3] Dolopiamque edd. vett. : dolophiam B : dolopiam $\bar{r}$.
[4] aequis $\bar{r}$: aequius B.

[1] Livy for some reason omits certain picturesque details given by Polybius (l.c.), but otherwise follows him closely. Smoking out an enemy in mine-warfare was a recognized device (Aeneas Tacticus 37), but we need not consider this an example of the early use of chemicals for military purposes: cf. Lamer's review of Vatter, "Giftgase und Gasschutz" (Stuttgart, 1934), in Phil. Woch. 55, 1935, 202–204.

bottom, where a pipe of moderate size could be B.C. 189 inserted, and likewise an iron pipe and an iron lid for the cask, this lid too being perforated in several places. This cask, filled with light feathers, they placed in the entrance facing the tunnel. They fixed in the holes in the lid the very long spears which they call "sarisae," so as to keep the enemy at a distance. A light spark of flame, placed among the feathers, they fanned by blowing with a smith's bellows placed at the mouth of the pipe. Then, since smoke, not merely abundant in quantity, but, even more, unendurable by reason of the vile stench from the burning feathers, had filled the whole tunnel, scarcely anyone was able to remain within it.[1]

VIII. While affairs were in this condition at Ambracia,[2] Phaeneas and Damoteles came to the consul as ambassadors from the Aetolians, with full power to act, by decree of the people. For their praetor, when he saw that on one side Ambracia was undergoing siege, that on another the sea-coast was endangered by the enemy's ships, that on a third the Amphilochians and Dolopia were being plundered by the Macedonians, and that the Aetolians, rushing here and there to three different wars at the same time, could not hold out, called a council and laid before the chiefs of Aetolia the question of what should be done. The opinions of all tended in this direction—that peace should be sought, on fair terms if possible, if not, on endurable terms: they argued that they had begun the war because of their reliance on Antiochus; when Antiochus was beaten on land and sea and driven virtually beyond the bounds of the u.c. 565 iuga Tauri exacto quam spem esse sustinendi belli? Phaeneas et Damoteles quod e re[1] Aetolorum, ut in tali casu, fideque sua esse censerent, agerent; quod enim sibi consilium aut cuius rei electionem a fortuna relictam? Cum his mandatis legati missi orare consulem ut parceret urbi, misereretur gentis quondam sociae, nolle dicere iniuriis, miseriis certe coactae insanire; non plus mali meritos Aetolos Antiochi bello quam boni ante, cum adversus Philippum bellatum sit, fecisse; nec tum large gratiam relatam sibi, nec nunc immodice poenam iniungi debere. Ad ea consul respondit magis saepe quam vere umquam[2] Aetolos pacem petere. Imitarentur Antiochum in petenda pace, quem in bellum traxissent; non paucis urbibus eum, de quarum libertate certatum sit, sed omni Asia cis Taurum montem, opimo regno, excessisse.[3] Aetolos nisi inermes de pace agentes non auditurum se; arma illis prius equosque omnes tradendos esse, deinde mille talentum argenti[4] populo Romano dandum, cuius summae dimidium praesens numeretur, si pacem habere vellent. Ad ea adiecturum etiam in foedus esse ut eosdem quos populus Romanus amicos atque hostes habeant.

[2] The embassy mentioned in XXXVII. xlix (cf. iii. 6 above) is ignored in the following account.

[1] e re σ: de re B. [2] uere umquam σ: om. B.
[3] excessisse σ: excepisse B. [4] argenti σ: om. B.

---

[1] It should be noted that this discussion makes no progress towards peace. It was one of the stock grievances of the Aetolians that their services against Philip had been inadequately recognized and rewarded, and this position they still maintain. The final demands of Fulvius are repetitions of those made by Rome in the futile negotiations of 190 B.C. (XXXVII. i. 5), although nothing had been said before about Aetolian disarmament as a condition of peace.

earth, to the other side of the ridges of Taurus, what B.C. 189 hope was there of continuing the war? Phaeneas and Damoteles, they said, should do what they judged consistent with the best interests of the Aetolians, considering the straits they were in, and with their own sense of loyalty; for what plan that they could adopt or what choice of action was left them by fortune? The envoys, sent with these instructions, begged the consul to spare the city and to have compassion on a people, once his ally, now driven to the point of madness, they would not say by their wrongs but at least by their misfortunes: the Aetolians had not deserved to suffer any ill fortune, by reason of the war with Antiochus, outweighing the good service which they had rendered previously when they had fought against Philip; neither had liberal gratitude been shown them then nor should excessive punishment be imposed upon them now. To this the consul replied that the Aetolians ever sought peace frequently rather than sincerely. In their plea for peace they should follow the example of Antiochus, whom they had enticed into the war; he had withdrawn not from a few towns about whose liberty there was a question, but from the whole rich land of Asia on this side of the Taurus mountains. He would not, he said, listen to the Aetolians treating for peace unless they were disarmed; they must first turn over their weapons and all their horses, then pay a thousand talents of silver to the Roman people, of which sum half must be paid at once if they wanted to have peace. He would, besides, add this clause to the treaty—that they should regard as friends and enemies the same persons whom the Romans so regarded.[1]

.c. IX. Adversus quae legati, et quia gravia erant, et
5 quia suorum animos indomitos ac mutabiles noverant, nullo reddito responso domum regressi sunt, ut etiam atque etiam quid agendum esset re integra praetorem
2 et principes consulerent. Clamore et iurgio excepti, quam diu rem traherent, qualemcumque pacem referre iussi, cum redirent Ambraciam, Acarnanum insidiis prope viam positis, cum quibus bellum erat, circumventi Thyrreum custodiendi deducuntur.
3 Haec mora iniecta est paci, cum iam Atheniensium Rhodiorumque legati, qui ad deprecandum pro iis
4 venerant, apud consulem essent. Amynander quoque Athamanum rex fide accepta venerat in castra Romana, magis pro Ambracia urbe, ubi maiorem partem temporis exulaverat, quam pro Aetolis
5 sollicitus. Per hos certior factus consul de casu legatorum adduci eos a Thyrreo iussit; quorum
6 post adventum agi coeptum est de pace. Amynander, quod sui maxime operis erat, impigre agebat,
7 ut Ambracienses compelleret ad deditionem. Ad id [1] cum per colloquia principum succedens murum parum proficeret, postremo consulis permissu [2] ingressus urbem partim consilio partim precibus evicit,
8 ut permitterent se Romanis. Et Aetolos C. Valerius, Laevini filius, qui cum ea gente primum amicitiam pepigerat, consulis frater matre eadem genitus,

[1] Ad id M. Mueller: id B.
[2] permissu r: promissu B.

---

[1] Cf. XXXI. iii. 3, etc.; for the treaty of 211 B.C., XXVI. xxiv. 8.

IX. To these proposals, both because they were severe and because the ambassadors knew that the tempers of their people were fierce and changeable, they made no reply but returned home, that they might again and again consult the praetor and the chiefs as to what was to be done while they were still uncommitted to a decision. They were received with abusive shouts, being asked how long they would drag things out, and were ordered to bring back any sort of peace whatsoever, but when they were returning to Ambracia they were caught in an ambush set beside the road by the Acarnanians, with whom they were at war, and were taken to Thyrreum for confinement. This caused a delay to the peace, although ambassadors of the Athenians and the Rhodians, who had come to intercede for them, were now with the consul. Amynander also, the king of the Athamanians, had come to the Roman camp under a safeguard, more concerned for the city of Ambracia, where he had spent the greater part of his exile, than for the Aetolians. Being informed by them of the misfortune of the ambassadors, the consul ordered them to be brought from Thyrreum; after their arrival the discussion of peace began. Amynander, since this was his particular mission, laboured earnestly to induce the Ambraciots to surrender. When he met with little success in this, approaching the walls and conferring with the chiefs, finally, by permission of the consul, he entered the city, and partly by advice and partly by entreaty he prevailed upon them to entrust themselves to the Romans. The Aetolians too received notable assistance from Gaius Valerius, the son of Laevinus,[1] who had concluded the first treaty of friendship with that people, Gaius being the brother of the consul and B.C. 189

c.c. 9 egregie adiuvit. Ambracienses prius pacti, ut 55 Aetolorum auxiliares sine fraude emitterent, aperuerunt portas. Dein Aetolis condiciones pacis dictae :[1] quingenta Euboica ut darent talenta, ex quibus ducenta praesentia, trecenta per annos sex pensionibus aequis; captivos perfugasque redderent Ro-
10 manis; urbem ne quam formulae sui iuris facerent, quae post id tempus, quo T. Quinctius traiecisset in Graeciam, aut vi capta ab Romanis esset [2] aut voluntate in amicitiam venisset: Cephallania insula ut
11 extra ius foederis esset. Haec quamquam spe ipsorum alii quanto leviora erant, petentibus Aetolis
12 ut ad concilium referrent, permissum est. Parva disceptatio de urbibus tenuit, quae cum sui iuris aliquando fuissent, avelli velut a corpore suo aegre patiebantur; ad unum omnes tamen accipi pacem 13 iusserunt. Ambracienses coronam auream consuli centum et quinquaginta pondo dederunt. Signa aenea marmoraeque et tabulae pictae, quibus ornatior Ambracia, quia regia ibi Pyrrhi fuerat,[3]

[1] Dein Aetolis condiciones pacis dictae H. J. Mueller: dein $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[2] esset $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[3] fuerat $\bar{\sigma}$: fuerant B.

---

[1] Her name is unknown. She had apparently married Laevinus after the death of the elder Fulvius, since Polybius (XXII. xii) speaks of Gaius as a young man. Cf. Münzer, Röm. Adelsparteien (Stuttgart, 1920), 210.
[2] Cf. XXXVII. xlv. 14 and the note.
[3] This island, like Zacynthos (XXXVI. xxxi–xxxii), now had a strategic value for the Romans, and, since it did not born of the same mother.[1] The Ambraciots, having B.C. 189 first bargained that the Aetolian auxiliaries should be released in safety, opened their gates. Then terms of peace were given to the Aetolians: they were to pay five hundred Euboean [2] talents, two hundred of these at once and three hundred in equal instalments through six years; they were to restore the prisoners and deserters to the Romans; they were to bring under their jurisdiction no city which since the time when Titus Quinctius had crossed to Greece had either been captured by force by the Romans or had voluntarily entered into friendship with them; the island of Cephallania [3] was to be outside the scope of the treaty.[4] Although these terms were much lighter than they had anticipated, the request of the Aetolians that they should submit them to their council was granted. There was a brief dispute about the cities, since they took it hard that towns which had once been under their control should be torn, as it were, from their body, yet all unanimously agreed that the peace should be accepted. The Ambraciots presented the consul with a golden crown of one hundred and fifty pounds' weight.[5] The bronze and marble statues and the paintings with which Ambracia was more lavishly adorned than the other cities of this region, because the palace of Pyrrhus had been come under either class of communities just mentioned, is excepted. It had belonged to Aetolia.

[4] These conditions are essentially those given by Polybius (XXII. xiii).

[5] Polybius (l.c.) says practically the same thing, although he seems to use στέφανος to mean any sort of complimentary present. In XXXIX. v. 14 Livy says that Fulvius displayed in his triumph golden crowns weighing one hundred and twelve pounds.

quam ceterae regionis eius urbes erant, sublata omnia 14 avectaque; nihil praeterea tactum violatumve.

X. Profectus ab Ambracia consul in mediterranea Aetoliae ad Argos Amphilochium—viginti duo milia ab Ambracia abest [1]—castra posuit. Eo tandem legati Aetoli, mirante consule quod morarentur,[2]
2 venerunt. Inde, postquam approbasse pacem concilium Aetolorum accepit, iussis proficisci Romam ad senatum permissoque ut et Rhodii et Athenienses deprecatores irent dato, qui simul cum iis proficisceretur, C. Valerio fratre ipse in Cephallaniam
3 traiecit. Praeoccupatas aures animosque principum Romae criminibus Philippi invenerunt, qui per legatos, per litteras Dolopas Amphilochosque et Athamaniam erepta [3] sibi querens, praesidiaque sua postremo filium etiam Persea ex Amphilochis pulsum, averterat senatum ab audiendis precibus eorum.
4 Rhodii tamen et Athenienses cum silentio auditi sunt. Atheniensis legatus Leon Hicesiae filius
5 eloquentia etiam dicitur movisse; qui vulgata similitudine, mari tranquillo quod ventis concitaretur aequiperando multitudinem Aetolorum, usus, cum in fide Romanae societatis mansissent, insita gentis
6 tranquillitate quiesse eos aiebat; postquam flare ab Asia Thoas et Dicaearchus, ab Europa Menestas et Damocritus coepissent, tum illam tempestatem

[1] abest ed. Frobeniana 1531 : est B^{2}.
[2] morarentur ^{2} : moraretur B.
[3] erepta ^{2} : ereptas B.

---

[1] Fulvius was later severely criticized for his treatment of Ambracia : cf. xliii. 5 below, and his defence in XXXIX. iv. 11–12. Polybius does not mention this, and Livy may there, were all removed and carried away; nothing B.C. 189 else was touched or harmed.[1]

X. Leaving Ambracia for the interior of Aetolia, the consul encamped near Amphilochian Argos, it being twenty-two miles from Ambracia. There finally the Aetolian ambassadors came while the consul was wondering why they were delaying. Then, when he learned that the council of the Aetolians had approved the peace, having ordered them to go to the senate in Rome and having given permission to both the Rhodians and the Athenians to go with them as intercessors, and appointed his brother Gaius Valerius to accompany them, he himself crossed to Cephallania. The ambassadors found that the ears and minds of the leading men at Rome had already been filled by the allegations of Philip, who, through envoys, through letters, complaining that the Dolopians, the Amphilochians and Athamania had been snatched from him and that his garrisons and finally even his son Perseus had been driven off from the Amphilochians, had made the senate disinclined to hear their petitions. Nevertheless, the Rhodians and the Athenians were listened to in silence. The Athenian ambassador Leon, the son of Hicesias, is said to have created something of an impression by his eloquence; employing the familiar simile of a calm sea which is disturbed by the winds, likening to it the Aetolian populace, he said that as long as they had remained faithful to the Roman alliance they had been quiet with the natural calmness of the race; after Thoas and Dicaearchus began to blow from Asia and Menestas and Damocritus from Europe, then coortam, quae ad Antiochum eos sicuti in scopulum intulisset.

[1] have inferred it from the later debate as to the triumph of Fulvius.

XI. Diu iactati Aetoli tandem, ut[1] condiciones pacis convenirent, effecerunt. Fuerunt autem hae.[2] "Imperium maiestatemque populi Romani gens Aetolorum conservato sine dolo malo; ne quem exercitum, qui adversus socios amicosque eorum ducetur, per fines suos transire sinito, neve ulla ope iuvato; hostes eosdem habeto quos populus Romanus, armaque in eos ferto, bellumque pariter gerito; perfugas fugitivos captivos reddito Romanis sociisque, praeterquam si qui capti, cum domos redissent, iterum capti sunt, aut si qui eo tempore ex iis capti sunt qui tum hostes erant Romanis, cum intra praesidia Romana Aetoli essent; aliorum qui comparebunt intra dies centum Corcyraeorum magistratibus sine dolo malo tradantur; qui non comparebunt, quando quisque eorum primum inventus erit, reddatur; obsides quad-

[1] ut ed. Frobeniana 1535 : ut ad $B\bar{r}$.
[2] hae $\bar{r}$: haec B.

---

[1] Polybius (XXII. xiv) quotes this speech at greater length and with more direct application. However, he credits the speech to Damis, and a philosopher of that name is said to have been at some time a resident of Athens. The corruption in the text of Polybius at this point probably makes it impossible to explain the variation in names between Livy and Polybius.

The mischief-makers named were mainly responsible, according to both Livy and Polybius, for the Aetolian alliance with Antiochus: cf. the Index to Volume X.

[2] The terms here given are in essence those given by Polybius (XXII. xv). The formal beginning appears to be that regularly employed in foedera non aequa, i.e. treaties between a politically superior and a politically inferior state. It is thus interpreted by Cicero (Balb. 35).

that storm had arisen which had dashed them upon Antiochus as upon a rock.[1] B.C. 189

XI. After long agitation the Aetolians finally succeeded in obtaining an agreement on the terms of peace. These were the conditions:[2] "The people of the Aetolians shall uphold the sovereignty and dignity of the Roman people without fraud;[3] they shall permit no army which is being led against the allies and friends of the Romans to cross their borders and shall aid such an army in no way; they shall regard as enemies the same persons whom the Romans so regard, shall take up arms against them and make war upon them in company with the Romans; they shall restore deserters, runaways and captives to the Romans and their allies, except such prisoners as were captured a second time after they had returned to their homes, or such as were captured from those who were enemies to the Romans at that time when the Aetolians were associated with the Roman forces,[4] and any of the others who shall be discovered within one hundred days to the magistrates[5] of the Corcyraeans without fraud; those who shall not be discovered shall be turned over as soon as each of them is found; they shall deliver

[3] Dolus malus is technical and legal; its implication is the intent to injure or deceive another.

[4] The second class of exceptions apparently includes citizens of Rome and allied states who were in arms against their native cities during the period of the active Aetolian alliance with Rome in the Second Macedonian War. But neither the meaning nor the purpose of the clause is entirely clear.

[5] Polybius (l.c.) says merely τῷ ἄρχοντι, meaning, probably, a Roman prefect in Corcyra. Livy seems to misunderstand, and there seems to be no point in the demand that these persons be handed over to native magistrates in Corcyra.

raginta arbitratu consulis Romanis dato [1] ne minores 7 duodecim annorum neu maiores quadraginta, obses ne esto praetor, praefectus equitum, scriba publicus, neu quis qui ante obses fuit apud Romanos; Cephallania 8 extra pacis leges esto." De pecuniae summa quam penderent pensionibusque eius nihil ex eo, quod cum consule convenerat, mutatum; pro argento si aurum dare mallent, darent,[2] convenit, dum pro argenteis 9 decem aureus unus valeret. "Quae urbes, qui agri, qui homines Aetolorum iuris aliquando fuerunt, qui eorum T. Quinctio Cn. Domitio consulibus postve eos consules aut armis subacti aut voluntate in dicionem populi Romani venerunt, ne quem [3] eorum Aetoli recepisse velint; Oeniadae cum urbe agrisque [4] Acarnanum sunto." His legibus foedus ictum cum Aetolis est.

XII. Eadem non aestate solum, sed etiam iisdem prope diebus quibus haec a M. Fulvio consule in Aetolia gesta sunt, consul alter Cn. Manlius in Gallograecia bellum gessit, quod nunc ordiri pergam.
2 Vere primo Ephesum consul venit, acceptisque copiis ab L. Scipione et exercitu lustrato contionem apud

[1] dato ⊐ : dando B.
[2] darent ⊐ : om. B.
[3] ne quem ed. Frobeniana 1535 : neque B⊐.
[4] recepisse velint; Oeniadae cum urbe agrisque ed. Frobeniana 1535 : recepissent uel in aetolia x urbes agrosque (sic) B⊐.

---

[1] Polybius (l.c.) states the equivalence in terms of minae, preserving the ratio of 10 : 1, and adds certain details as to the financial settlement.

[2] Livy and Polybius (l.c.) agree on these names, but one or the other name is nevertheless wrong. The colleague of T. Flamininus in the consulship was Sex. Aelius Paetus to the Romans forty hostages, acceptable to the B.C. 189 consul, none younger than twelve years nor older than forty, provided that no hostage shall be a praetor, a commander of cavalry, a public secretary, or one who has previously been a hostage at Rome; Cephallania shall be excepted from the terms of peace." Regarding the sum of money which they were to pay and the instalments thereof, no change was made in the conditions proposed by the consul; "if in place of silver they propose to pay gold, let them do so," it was agreed, "provided that one gold piece shall be the equivalent of ten pieces of silver.[1] Whatever cities, whatever districts, whatever persons have at any time been under the jurisdiction of the Aetolians and have, in the consulship of Titus Quinctius and Gnaeus Domitius or after that consulship,[2] either been conquered by arms or submitted voluntarily to the control of the Roman people, none of these shall the Aetolians essay to recover; the Oeniadae with their city and lands shall belong to the Acarnanians." On these conditions the treaty with the Aetolians was concluded.

XII. Not merely in the same summer, but even practically during the same days when Marcus Fulvius the consul was thus engaged in Aetolia, the other consul Gnaeus Manlius in Gallograecia waged the war which I shall now proceed to describe. The consul arrived in Ephesus in the beginning of spring, and, having taken over the troops from Lucius Scipio (XXXII. viii. 1), while Domitius was consul in 192 B.C. with L. Flamininus (XXXV. x. 10). Titus was named in the corresponding section of the consul's proposals (ix. 10 above), but it is possible that the senate made this particular condition easier by changing the date from 198 B.C. to 192 B.C.

c. 3 milites habuit, qua collaudata virtute eorum, quod cum Antiocho uno proelio debellassent, adhortatus eos ad[1] novum cum Gallis suscipiendum bellum, 4 qui et auxiliis iuvissent Antiochum et adeo[2] indomita haberent ingenia ut nequiquam Antiochus emotus[3] ultra iuga Tauri montis esset, nisi frange-rentur opes Gallorum, de se quoque pauca, nec falsa 5 nec immodica, adiecit. Laeti milites cum frequenti adsensu consulem audiverunt, partem virium Antio-chi fuisse Gallos credentes; rege superato nullum momentum in solis per se Gallorum copiis fore.
6 Eumenen haud in tempore abesse—Romae tum erat —credere consul, gnarum locorum hominumque, et 7 cuius interesset frangi Gallorum opes. Attalum igitur fratrem eius accersit a Pergamo, hortatusque ad capessendum secum bellum pollicentem suam suorumque operam domum ad comparandum di-8 mittit. Paucos post dies profecto ab Epheso con-suli ad Magnesiam occurrit Attalus cum mille peditibus equitibusque quingentis, Athenaeo fratre[4] iusso cum ceteris copiis subsequi, commendata iis custodia Pergami quos fratri regnoque fidos[5] credebat.
9 Consul collaudato iuvene cum omnibus copiis ad

[1] ad ed. Frobeniana 1531 : eum B : om. σ.
[2] adeo σ : ante B.
[3] emotus σ : semotus B : amotus M.
[4] athenaeo fratre σ : athene fratre eius B.
[5] fidos σ : eius fidos B.

---

[1] By sacrifice to possible hostile spirits; cf. XXXVI. xlii. 2, etc.

[2] The praetorship of Manlius in Sicily (XXXIII. xliii. 5) had been undistinguished, and it is not easy to see the basis for his eulogy of himself. He probably dwelt upon the exploits of earlier Manlii against Gauls, as he does in xvii. 8–9 below.

and purified [1] the army, he delivered a speech to the soldiers in which he gave great praise to their valour because they had ended the war with Antiochus by a single battle, and urged them to undertake a new war with the Gauls, who had not only aided Antiochus with auxiliaries but possessed spirits so untamable that the expulsion of Antiochus beyond the ridges of the Taurus mountains would be in vain unless the power of the Gauls were broken, while as regards himself also he added brief remarks, neither false nor exaggerated.[2] The joyous soldiers listened to the consul with great applause, believing that the Gauls had been only a part of the forces of Antiochus; after the defeat of the king there would be no strength in the Gauls alone and by themselves. The consul believed that Eumenes was away at an unsuitable time—he was then in Rome [3]—as he was familiar with the country and the people and as it was to his interest that the power of the Gauls should be broken.[4] Manlius therefore summoned Eumenes' brother Attalus from Pergamum and urged him to join in the prosecution of the war, and on receiving the promise of the co-operation of himself and his countrymen sent him home to make preparations. A few days later, when the consul left Ephesus for Magnesia, Attalus met him with a thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry, having directed his brother Athenaeus to follow with the rest of the army and having entrusted the guardianship of Pergamum to those men whom he deemed loyal to his brother and the throne. The consul, praising the young man, marched with the B.C. 189

[3] Cf. XXXVII. lii. 1.

[4] Pergamum and the Gauls were traditional enemies: xvi. 14 below.

Maeandrum progressus castra posuit, quia [1] vado superari amnis non poterat et contrahendae naves erant ad exercitum traiciendum. Transgressi Maeandrum ad Hieran [2] Comen pervenerunt.

XIII. Fanum ibi augustum Apollinis et oraculum; sortes versibus haud inconditis dare vates dicuntur.[3] Hinc alteris castris ad Harpasum flumen ventum est, quo legati ab Alabandis venerunt, ut castellum, quod ab ipsis nuper descisset, aut auctoritate aut armis [4] cogeret iura antiqua pati. Eodem et Athenaeus, Eumenis et Attali frater, cum Cretense Leuso [5] et Corrago Macedone venit: mille pedites mixtarum gentium et trecentos equites secum adduxerunt. Consul tribuno militum misso cum modica manu castellum [6] vi cepit, captum Alabandensibus reddit.[7] Ipse nihil via degressus ad Antiochiam super Maeandrum amnem posuit castra. Huius amnis fontes Celaenis oriuntur. Celaenae urbs caput quondam Phrygiae fuit; migratum inde haud procul veteribus Celaenis, novaeque urbi Apameae nomen inditum ab Apama sorore Seleuci regis. Et Marsyas amnis, haud procul a Maeandri fontibus oriens, in Maeandrum cadit, famaque ita tenet Celaenis Marsyan cum Apolline tibiarum cantu certasse. Maeander ex arce summa Celaenarum [8]

[1] quia σ : qua B.
[2] ad Hieran ed. Frobeniana 1531 : phileram M : ad σ : om. B.
[3] dicuntur σ : dicunt B.
[4] armis σ : om. B.
[5] Leuso edd. vett. : lento B.
[6] cum mod. ma. cas. σ : cas. cum mod. ma. B.
[7] reddit ed. Frobeniana 1535 : redit B : reddidit σ.
[8] celenarum σ : caele atrum B.

entire force to the Meander and encamped, because B.C. 189 the river could not be crossed by fording and boats had to be collected to ferry the army across. After crossing the Meander they advanced to Hiera Comê.

XIII. There was at this place a venerable shrine of Apollo and an oracle; the priests, it is said, give the responses in verses not without polish. On the second day's march from here they came to the Harpasus river, where ambassadors from Alabanda came with the request that he would compel, either by authority or by armed force, a stronghold which had recently revolted from them to accept its ancient status. There also came Athenaeus, the brother of Eumenes and Attalus, with Leusus the Cretan and Corragus the Macedonian; they brought with them a thousand infantry of different nationalities and three hundred cavalry. The consul, sending a tribune of the soldiers with a force of moderate size, took the stronghold by storm and having captured it turned it over to the people of Alabanda. He himself, not leaving the direct road, pitched camp at Antiochia on the Meander river. The sources of this river spring from Celaenae. The city of Celaenae was once the capital of Phrygia; thence there was a migration to a place not far from old Celaenae, and to the new town was given the name of Apamea, from Apama, the sister of King Seleucus.[1] The Marsyas river also, rising not far from the sources of the Meander, empties into the Meander, and the story runs thus, that at Celaenae Marsyas contended with Apollo in playing on the pipes.[2] The Meander, rising on top of the citadel of Celaenae and flowing through the centre

[1] Apama was actually the wife, not the sister, of Seleucus.
[2] Cf. the similar statements of Xenophon (Anab. I. ii. 7–8).

ortus, media urbe decurrens, per Caras primum deinde Ionas in sinum maris editur qui [1] inter Prienen et 8 Miletum est. Ad Antiochiam in castra consulis Seleucus, Antiochi filius,[2] ex foedere icto cum Scipione
9 ad frumentum exercitui dandum venit. Parva disceptatio de Attali auxiliaribus orta est, quod Romano tantum militi pactum Antiochum ut daretur frumen-
10 tum Seleucus dicebat.[3] Discussa ea quoque est constantia consulis, qui misso tribuno edixit ne Romani milites acciperent priusquam Attali auxilia
11 accepissent. Inde ad Gordiutichos quod vocant processum est. Ex eo loco ad Tabas tertiis castris perventum. In finibus Pisidarum posita urbs est, in ea parte quae vergit ad Pamphylium mare. Integris viribus [4] regionis eius feroces ad bellandum
12 habebat viros. Tum quoque equites in agmen Romanum eruptione facta haud modice [5] primo impetu turbavere: deinde ut apparuit nec numero se [6] nec virtute pares esse, in urbem [7] compulsi veniam
13 erroris petebant, dedere urbem parati. Quinque

[1] editur qui σ: edituri quod B.
[2] filius σ: frater B.
[3] Seleucus dicebat σ: ut seleucus ducebat B.
[4] uiribus σ: urbibus B.
[5] modice σ: modico B.
[6] se σ: om. B.
[7] in urbem σ: deinde B.

---

[1] The provisions of the treaty as given by Livy (XXXVII. xlv: cf. lv) say nothing of any such obligation, nor does Polybius mention it. In xxxvii. 7 below Livy again speaks of grain (and now money) owed under the treaty. It may have been taken for granted that Antiochus owed supplies to the Romans until the treaty was formally ratified.

[2] Many of the place-names in the following sections are doubtful, some by reason of corruptions in the text, some, of the city, then first through Carian and later B.C. 189

Ionian territory, empties into the gulf of the sea which lies between Prienê and Miletus. At Antiochia, Seleucus, the son of Antiochus, came to the consul's camp to furnish the grain to the army in accordance with the treaty [1] made with Scipio. There was a short argument regarding the auxiliaries of Attalus, since Seleucus maintained that Antiochus had bargained to supply grain to the Roman soldiers only. This too was ended by the firmness of the consul, who sent a tribune with the order that no Roman soldiers should receive any grain until the auxiliaries of Attalus should have had their share. Thence he marched to the place called Gordiutichi.[2] From there they came on the third march to Tabae. The city lies on the borders of the Pisidians, on the side which faces the Pamphylian sea. Since the strength of the region was unimpaired, its men were fierce in warfare. At this time too the cavalry, charging the Roman column, threw it at first into no small degree of confusion; then, when it became evident that they were equal in neither numbers nor courage, when driven back into the town they begged pardon for their mistake and were ready to surrender the city. The consul exacted of them twenty-five talents probably, because Livy did not understand his sources, while others are not mentioned elsewhere. I have been content in general to repeat the names as they are found in the Latin text I have followed, realizing that beyond question many of them are wrong.

The route of the Romans can be followed more easily on the map than through notes. As one traces their course one wonders whether their dominating motive, in selecting the line of march, was the topography of the country, the desire to come to grips with the Galatians as soon as possible, or the profits which quickly began to come in. (See Map 3.)

et viginti talenta argenti et decem milia medimnum tritici imperata: ita in deditionem accepti.

XIV. Tertio inde die ad Casum amnem perventum; inde profecti Erizam urbem primo impetu ce-
2 perunt. Ad Thabusion castellum imminens flumini Indo ventum est, cui fecerat nomen Indus ab ele-
3 phanto deiectus. Haud procul a Cibyra aberant, nec legatio ulla a Moagete, tyranno civitatis eius, homine ad omnia infido atque importuno, veniebat.
4 Ad temptandum eius animum C. Helvium [1] cum quattuor milibus peditum et quingentis [2] equitibus consul praemittit. Huic agmini iam fines ingredienti legati occurrerunt nuntiantes paratum esse tyran-
5 num [3] imperata facere; orabant ut pacatus fines iniret cohiberetque a populatione agri militem, et in
6 corona aurea quindecim talenta adferebant. Helvius integros [4] a populatione agros servaturum pollicitus
7 ire ad consulem legatos iussit. Quibus eadem referentibus consul "neque Romani" inquit "bonae voluntatis ullum signum erga nos tyranni habemus, et ipsum talem esse inter omnes constat ut de poena eius magis quam de amicitia nobis [5] cogitandum sit."
8 Perturbati hac voce legati nihil aliud [6] petere quam ut coronam acciperet veniendique ad eum tyranno potestatem et copiam loquendi ac purgandi se
9 faceret. Permissu consulis postero die in castra

[1] Helvium ed. Frobeniana 1535 : muluium B.
[2] quingentis σ : .x. B.
[3] tyrannum σ : tyranni B.
[4] integros σ : om. B.
[5] nobis σ : om. B.
[6] aliud σ : om. B.

[1] Livy generally uses the Latin term modius in reference to quantities of grain (XXXI. xix. 2, etc.); here he more appropriately uses the Greek measure. The medimnus was the approximate equivalent of six modii.

of silver and ten thousand medimni[1] of wheat; on these terms they were received in surrender. B.C. 189

XIV. On the third day from there they came to the Casus river; on their departure thence they took the town of Eriza at the first assault. They came next to Thabusium, a fortress overlooking the Indus river, which derived its name from an Indian[2] who fell from his elephant. They were not far from Cibyra, and no embassy was coming from Moagetes, tyrant of that city, a man faithless and hard to deal with in every way. To test his attitude, the consul sent Gaius Helvius ahead with four thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry. As this column was crossing the frontier ambassadors met them, bringing word that the tyrant was ready to do their bidding; they begged that he would enter their country peacefully and brought him fifteen talents in the form of a golden crown.[3] Helvius, promising to keep the farms safe from pillage, ordered the ambassadors to go to the consul. When they delivered the same message, the consul said, "We Romans have no indication of the good-will of the tyrant towards us, and it is well known to all that he is such a person that we must think about punishing him rather than cultivating his friendship."[4] Dismayed by this speech, the ambassadors asked nothing else than that he accept the crown and give the tyrant the opportunity to come to him, to speak and to defend himself. With the permission of the consul the tyrant the next day came

[2] Presumably the driver of the elephant: cf. Polybius I. xl; III. xlvi.

[3] Cf. ix. 13 above and the note.

[4] The characterization resembles that of Polybius (XXII. xvii).

tyrannus venit, vestitus comitatusque vix ad privati modice locupletis habitum, et oratio fuit summissa et infracta, extenuantis opes suas urbiumque suae 10 dicionis egestatem querentis. Erant autem sub eo[1] praeter Cibyram Sylleum et ad Limnen quae appellatur. Ex his, ut se suosque spoliaret, quinque et viginti talenta se confecturum, prope ut diffidens pol-
11 licebatur. "Enimvero" inquit consul "ferri iam ludificatio ista non potest. Parum est non erubuisse absentem, cum per legatos frustrareris nos; praesens 12 quoque in eadem perstas impudentia. Quinque et viginti talenta tyrannidem tuam exhaurient? Quingenta ergo talenta nisi triduo numeras, popula-
13 tionem in agris, obsidionem in urbe expecta." Hac denuntiatione conterritus perstare[2] tamen in perti-
14 naci simulatione inopiae. Et paulatim illiberali adiectione nunc per cavillationem, nunc precibus et simulatis lacrimis ad centum talenta est perductus. Adiecta decem milia medimnum frumenti. Haec omnia intra sex dies exacta.

XV. A Cibyra per agros Sindensium exercitus ductus, transgressusque Caularem amnem posuit
2 castra. Postero die et praeter Caralitin paludem agmen ductum; ad Madamprum manserunt. Inde progredientibus ab Lago, proxima urbe, metu
3 incolae fugerunt;[3] vacuum hominibus et refertum rerum omnium copia oppidum diripuerunt. Inde ad Lysis fluminis fontes, postero die ad Cobula-
4 tum amnem progressi. Termessenses eo tempore

[1] sub eo σ : om. B.
[2] conterritus perstare σ : perterritus instare B.
[3] incolae fugerunt σ : uincula effugerunt B.

[1] Polybius (XXII. xviii) calls it Colobatus.

to the camp, clothed and attended in a style inferior B.C. 189 to that of a private person of moderate wealth, and his speech was humble and incoherent, the speech of a man who belittled his own station and lamented the poverty of the cities under his control. Now there were under him, in addition to Cibyra, Sylleum and a city which they call ad Limnen. From them, by robbing himself and his subjects, he promised, though hesitatingly, to raise twenty-five talents. "Come, come," replied the consul, "this trifling cannot be endured. It is not enough that you did not blush when, remaining away, you mocked us through your ambassadors; even when here you persist in the same shamelessness. Will five-and-twenty talents drain your tyranny dry? Very well, unless you pay five hundred talents in three days, look forward to the devastation of your lands and the siege of your city." Though terrified by this threat he nevertheless persisted in his stubborn pretence of poverty. And little by little by grudging concessions, now amid much quibbling, now with prayers and feigned tears, he was worked up to the point of paying one hundred talents. Ten thousand medimni of grain were added. All this was collected within six days.

XV. From Cibyra the army was led through the territory of the people of Sinda and crossing the Caulares river went into camp. The next day they marched along the marsh of Caralitis; they encamped near Madamprus. As they advanced from there the inhabitants fled in terror from the neighbouring town of Lagum; empty of men and filled with abundance of all things, the town was sacked. Thence they moved to the sources of the Lysis river and next day to the Cobulatus river.[1] Troops from Termessus

c. Isiondensium arcem urbe capta oppugnabant. Inclusi, cum alia spes auxilii nulla esset, legatos ad consulem 5 orantes opem miserunt: cum coniugibus ac liberis in arce inclusos se mortem in dies, aut ferro [1] aut fame patiendam, expectare. Volenti consuli causa in 6 Pamphyliam devertendi [2] oblata est. Adveniens obsidione Isiondenses exemit; Termesso pacem dedit quinquaginta talentis argenti acceptis; item 7 Aspendiis ceterisque Pamphyliae populis. Ex Pamphylia rediens ad fluvium Taurum primo die, postero ad Xylinen quam vocant Comen posuit castra. Profectus inde continentibus itineribus ad Cormasa 8 urbem pervenit. Darsa proxima urbs erat; eam metu incolarum desertam, plenam omnium rerum copia invenit. Progredienti praeter paludes legati 9 ab Lysinoe dedentes civitatem venerunt. Inde in agrum Sagalassenum, uberem fertilemque omni genere frugum, ventum est. Colunt Pisidae, longe optimi bello regionis eius. Cum ea res animos fecit [3] tum agri fecunditas et multitudo hominum et situs 10 inter paucas munitae urbis. Consul, quia nulla legatio ad finem praesto fuerat, praedatum in agros misit. Tum demum fracta pertinacia est ut ferri 11 agique res suas viderunt: legatis missis pacti quinquaginta talentis et viginti milibus medimnum 12 tritici, viginti hordei, pacem impetraverunt. Progressus inde ad Rhotrinos fontes ad vicum, quem

[1] ferro ⁊ : om. B.
[2] devertendi Drakenborch : reuertendi B⁊ : diuertendi M.
[3] fecit aut facit ⁊ : om. B.

[1] The sites in this sentence cannot be placed, but Manlius has clearly turned north towards his proper route into Galatia.

were at that time besieging the citadel of the Isiondenses after capturing the town. The besieged, since there was no other hope of relief, sent envoys to the consul asking aid: shut up in the citadel with their wives and children, they were expecting death day by day, to be suffered by either the sword or starvation. Thus the eager consul was offered an occasion to turn aside into Pamphylia. By his arrival he rescued the Isiondenses from siege; on payment of fifty talents of silver he granted peace to Termessus; he did the same for the Aspendians and other peoples of Pamphylia. Returning from Pamphylia, he encamped the first day on the river Taurus, the next at what they call Xylines Comê.[1] Advancing from there by continuous marches he came to the city of Cormasa. Darsa is the nearest town; this he found deserted by the inhabitants through fear, but full of all sorts of supplies. As he marched along the marshes ambassadors came from Lysinoë surrendering their city. Then they entered the country of the Sagalassenes, rich and abounding in all kinds of crops. Pisidians inhabit it, by far the best warriors in this region. This circumstance gave them courage, as well as the fertility of the soil and their large population and the situation of their fortified town in a land where such strongholds were few. Since no embassy met him at the frontier, the consul sent out parties to plunder the fields. Then at last their stubbornness was broken when they saw their property being carried and driven away; sending ambassadors and agreeing to pay fifty talents, twenty thousand medimni of wheat and as many of barley, they obtained peace. Then he proceeded to the Rhotrine s›rings nd encamped at a village which they call B.C. 189

c. Acoridos Comen vocant, posuit castra. Eo Seleucus
13 ab Apamea postero die venit. Aegros inde et inutilia impedimenta cum Apameam dimisisset, ducibus itinerum ab Seleuco acceptis profectus eo die in Metropolitanum campum, postero die Dynias Phry-
14 giae processit. Inde Synnada venit, metu omnibus circa oppidis desertis. Quorum praeda [1] iam grave agmen trahens vix quinque milium die toto itinere perfecto ad Beudos, quod vetus appellant, pervenit.
15 Ad Anabura inde, et altero die ad Alandri fontes, tertio ad Abbassium posuit castra. Ibi plures dies stativa habuit, quia perventum erat ad Tolostobogiorum fines.

XVI. Galli, magna hominum vis, seu inopia agri seu praedae spe, nullam gentem, per quam ituri essent, parem armis rati, Brenno duce in Dardanos
2 pervenerunt. Ibi seditio orta est; ad viginti milia hominum cum Lonorio ac Lutario regulis secessione
3 facta a Brenno in Thraeciam iter avertunt. Ubi cum resistentibus pugnando, pacem petentibus stipendium imponendo Byzantium cum pervenissent, aliquamdiu oram Propontidis, vectigales habendo
4 regionis eius urbes, obtinuerunt. Cupido inde eos in Asiam transeundi, audientes ex propinquo quanta

[1] quorum praeda ꝛ : om. B.

---

[1] Both places and names are uncertain.

[2] The names of the Galatian tribes to which Manlius has now come are quite uncertain. I have given them in the forms used in the text.

The defective condition of the text of Polybius deprives us of the opportunity to test the relation between Polybius and Livy in their accounts of the anabasis of Manlius. A war-diary or other special source may be suspected for both.

[3] Livy here digresses to describe the migration of the Gauls to Asia Minor in 278 B.C.

Acoridos Comê.[1] Thither the next day Seleucus came from Apamea. When he had sent back from there to Apamea the sick and his unserviceable equipment, receiving from Seleucus guides for the march, he came that day into the country of Metropolis and the following day to Dyniae in Phrygia. From there he marched to Synnada, all the towns in the neighbourhood being deserted through fear. Dragging after him a column which was now overloaded with their booty and barely accomplishing a march of five miles in a whole day, he arrived at Beudi, which they call "the Old." Next he reached Anabura and the following day the sources of the Alander, and the third he encamped at Abbassius. There he maintained his camp for many days because he had come to the frontiers of the Tolostobogii.[2] B.C. 189

XVI. The Gauls,[3] a vast horde of men, whether moved by shortage of land or hope of plunder, feeling assured that no people through which they would pass was their match in war, under the leadership of Brennus came into the country of the Dardanians.[4] There strife broke out among them; about twenty thousand men, with Lonorius and Lutarius as their chiefs, seceded from Brennus and turned aside into Thrace. There, when they had penetrated as far as Byzantium, contending against those who resisted and imposing tribute upon those who sought peace, they occupied for a considerable time the coast of the Propontis, holding as tributaries the cities of the district. Then the desire of crossing into Asia seized them, as they heard from their [4] Livy omits to mention the visit to Greece and the attack on Delphi (xlviii. 2 below; XL. lviii. 3).

.c. ubertas eius terrae esset, cepit; et Lysimachia
5 fraude capta Chersonesoque omni armis possessa ad
5 Hellespontum descenderunt. Ibi vero exiguo divisam [1] freto cernentibus Asiam multo magis animi ad transeundum accensi; nuntiosque ad Antipatrum praefectum eius orae de transitu mittebant. Quae res cum lentius spe ipsorum traheretur, alia rursus 6 nova inter regulos seditio orta est. Lonorius retro unde venerat cum maiore parte hominum repetit Byzantium; Lutarius Macedonibus per speciem legationis ab Antipatro ad speculandum missis duas tectas naves et tres lembos adimit. Iis alios atque alios dies noctesque travehendo [2] intra paucos dies 7 omnes copias traicit.[3] Haud ita multo post Lonorius adiuvante Nicomede Bithyniae rege a By-8 zantio transmisit. Coeunt deinde in unum rursus Galli et auxilia Nicomedi dant adversus Ziboetam, 9 tenentem partem Bithyniae, gerenti bellum. Atque eorum maxime opera devictus Ziboeta est, Bithyniaque omnis in dicionem Nicomedis concessit.
Profecti ex Bithynia in Asiam processerunt. Non plus ex viginti milibus hominum quam decem armata 10 erant. Tamen tantum terroris omnibus quae cis Taurum incolunt gentibus iniecerunt, ut quas adissent quasque non adissent, pariter ultimae 11 propinquis, imperio parerent. Postremo cum tres essent gentes, Tolostobogii Trocmi Tectosages, in [1] diuisam $\bar{r}$: diuisis B.

[2] noctesque trauehendo $\bar{r}$: noctemque trahendo B.
[3] traicit Weissenborn: traiecit B$\bar{r}$.

---

[1] Nicomedes and Ziboetas were brothers, sons of the elder Ziboetas, the first king of Bithynia.

neighbours how rich was this land; and having taken B.C. 189 Lysimachia by treachery and occupied the whole Chersonesus by force of arms they came down to the Hellespont. There, as they saw Asia separated from them by a narrow strait, their souls were even more inflamed with the desire to cross, and they sent messengers to Antipater, the prefect of this coast, regarding the crossing. When this negotiation was dragging out longer than they had expected, another new revolt broke out between the chiefs. Lonorius with the larger part of the men went back to Byzantium whence he had come; Lutarius, when Macedonians were sent by Antipater to spy, under cover of being an embassy, took from them two decked ships and three cruisers. Using these as ferry-boats day after day and night after night, within a few days he transported his entire force. Only a little later Lonorius, with the aid of Nicomedes,[1] king of Bithynia, crossed from Byzantium. Then the Gauls were once more united and aided Nicomedes in the war he was waging against Ziboetas, who held the greater part of Bithynia. And, principally as a result of their assistance, Ziboetas was conquered and all Bithynia acknowledged the sovereignty of Nicomedes. Setting out from Bithynia they made their way into Asia. Of their twenty thousand men, not more than ten thousand were armed. Nevertheless, they inspired such terror in all the peoples who dwell on this side of the Taurus, those whom they approached and those whom they did not approach, that the most distant and the nearest alike obeyed their orders. Finally, since there were three tribes, the Tolostobogii, the Trocmi, and the Tectosages, they split tres partes, qua cuique populorum suorum vectigalis 12 Asia esset, diviserunt. Trocmis Hellesponti ora data; Tolostobogii Aeolida atque Ioniam, Tectosages mediterranea Asiae sortiti sunt. Et sti-13 pendium tota cis Taurum Asia exigebant, sedem autem ipsi sibi circa Halyn flumen cepere. Tantusque terror eorum nominis erat, multitudine etiam magna subole aucta, ut Syriae quoque ad postremum 14 reges stipendium dare non abnuerent. Primus Asiam incolentium abnuit Attalus, pater regis Eumenis; audacique incepto praeter opinionem omnium adfuit fortuna, et signis collatis superior fuit. Non tamen ita infregit animos eorum ut absis-15 terent imperio; eaedem opes usque[1] ad bellum Antiochi cum Romanis manserunt. Tum quoque, pulso Antiocho, magnam spem habuerunt, quia procul mari incolerent, Romanum exercitum ad se non[2] perventurum.

XVII. Cum hoc hoste, tam terribili omnibus re-gionis eius, quia bellum gerendum erat, pro contione milites in hunc maxime modum adlocutus est consul:
2 " Non me praeterit, milites, omnium quae Asiam
3 colunt gentium Gallos fama belli praestare. Inter mitissimum genus hominum ferox natio pervagata bello prope orbem terrarum sedem cepit. Procera

[1] eaedem opes usque σ : aedem ophesusque B.
[2] ad se non σ : ad senatum B.

---

[1] Their territory was called Galatia, comprising parts of Phrygia and Cappadocia.

[2] The Seleucid kingdom was weakened by internal dissension and wars with Egypt, but may not have paid tribute regularly.

[3] Cf. XXXIII. xxi. 3.

up into three divisions, according to the states of Asia which each held as tributaries. To the Trocmi the coast of the Hellespont was assigned; the Tolostobogii received by the lot Aeolis and Ionia, the Tectosages the interior parts of Asia. And they exacted tribute from all Asia on this side of the Taurus, but established their own dwellings along the river Halys.[1] And so great was the terror of their name, their numbers being also enlarged by great natural increase, that in the end even the kings of Syria [2] did not refuse to pay them tribute. Attalus, the father of King Eumenes, was the first of the inhabitants of Asia to refuse, and his bold step, contrary to the expectation of all, was aided by fortune and he worsted the Gauls in pitched battle.[3] Yet he did not cow them so thoroughly that they refrained from exercising their power;[4] their strength remained the same until the war between Antiochus and the Romans. Even then, after the defeat of Antiochus, they entertained great hopes that, since they lived far from the sea, the Roman army would not march against them. B.C. 189

XVII. Since war was to be waged with this enemy, so terrible to all the inhabitants of this region, the consul summoned an assembly and addressed the soldiers in about this fashion: "It does not escape me, soldiers, that of all the peoples who inhabit Asia the Gauls stand first in reputation for war. Among peoples of the most unwarlike sort this fierce tribe, travelling up and down in war, has almost made the world its residence. Tall bodies, long

[4] The displays of power which Livy has in mind were probably raids and demands for tribute. Possibly, however, imperium should be understood in a geographical sense.

corpora, promissae et rutilatae comae, vasta scuta,
4 praelongi gladii: ad hoc cantus ineuntium proelium
5 et ululatus et tripudia, et quatientium scuta in patrium quendam modum horrendus armorum crepitus, omnia de industria composita ad terrorem. Sed haec, quibus insolita atque insueta sunt, Graeci et Phryges et Cares timeant: Romanis Gallici tumultus
6 assueti, etiam vanitates notae sunt. Semel primo congressu ad Alliam eos olim fugerunt maiores nostri:[1] ex eo tempore per ducentos iam annos pecorum in modum consternatos caedunt fugantque, et plures prope de Gallis triumphi quam de toto orbe terrarum acti sunt. Iam usu hoc cognitum
7 est: si primum impetum quem, fervido ingenio et caeca ira effundunt, sustinueris, fluunt sudore et lassitudine membra, labant arma: mollia corpora, molles, ubi ira consedit, animos sol pulvis sitis ut
8 ferrum non admoveas prosternunt. Non legionibus legiones eorum solum experti sumus, sed vir unus cum viro congrediendo T. Manlius, M. Valerius quantum Gallicam rabiem vinceret[2] Romana virtus
9 docuerunt. Iam M. Manlius unus agmine scandentes in Capitolium detrusit Gallos. Et illis maioribus nostris cum haud dubiis Gallis, in sua terra genitis,

[1] ad Alliam eos olim fugerunt maiores nostri Modius: ad alia olim fugerunt maiores nostros B: ad alliam eos olim fuderunt maiores uestri M: ad alliam olim fuderunt maiores nostros F.

[2] uinceret F: om. B.

---

[1] Tumultus, which became almost technical for uprisings in Gaul (XXXI. x. 1, etc.), is here used in a different sense, as a summary of what has just preceded.

reddish hair, huge shields, very long swords; in addition, songs as they go into battle and yells and leapings and the dreadful din of arms as they clash shields according to some ancestral custom—all these are deliberately used to terrify their foes. But let Greeks and Phrygians and Carians fear these things to which they are unused and unaccustomed; to Romans Gallic riotings [1] are familiar and their vain displays too are well known. Once, when we first met them at the Allia,[2] our ancestors long ago fled before them; from that time now for two hundred years, terrified like animals they are slain and routed, and more triumphs, almost, have been celebrated over the Gauls than over all the world. This has now been learned by experience: if you bear up under their first onset, into which they rush with glowing enthusiasm and blind passion, their limbs grow lax with sweat and weariness, their weapons fall from their hands; their soft bodies, their soft souls (when passion subsides) are overcome by sun, dust, thirst, so that they cannot use their arms. Not only when matched legion to legion have we learned this, but when fighting man to man alone. Titus Manlius, Marcus Valerius have shown how far Roman valour surpasses Gallic madness. Then Marcus Manlius alone thrust down the Gauls as they climbed in close array to the Capitoline.[3] And those forefathers of ours had to do with true Gauls, born in their own B.C. 189

[2] The river which was the scene of the defeat which led to the capture of Rome (traditionally dated 390 B.C.); cf. V. xxxvii.–xxxix.

[3] The three Romans named were famous for their exploits against the Gauls. The consul is quite willing to have the fact recalled that two of the three were members of his own gens.

res erat: hi iam degeneres sunt, mixti, et Gallo-10 graeci vere, quod appellantur; sicut in frugibus pecudibusque non tantum semina ad servandam indolem valent, quantum terrae proprietas caelique 11 sub quo aluntur mutat.[1] Macedones, qui Alex-andriam in Aegypto, qui Seleuciam ac Babyloniam, quique alias sparsas per orbem terrarum colonias habent, in Syros Parthos Aegyptios degenerarunt; 12 Massilia, inter Gallos sita, traxit aliquantum ab
accolis animorum; Tarentinis quid ex Spartana 13 dura illa et horrida disciplina mansit? Est[2] gene-rosius, in sua[3] quidquid sede gignitur; insitum alienae terrae in id quo[4] alitur, natura vertente se, degenerat.[5] Phrygas igitur Gallicis oneratos armis, sicut in acie Antiochi cecidistis,[6] victos victores, cae-14 detis. Magis vereor ne parum inde gloriae, quam 15 ne nimium belli sit. Attalus eos rex saepe fudit fugavitque. Nolite existimare beluas tantum recens[7] captas feritatem illam silvestrem primo servare, dein, cum diu manibus humanis aluntur, mitescere, in hominum feritate mulcenda non eandem naturam 16 esse. Eosdemne hos[8] creditis esse, qui patres eorum avique fuerunt? Extorres inopia agrorum profecti domo per asperrimam Illyrici oram, Paeo-niam inde et Thraeciam pugnando cum ferocissimis

[1] mutat $\bar{r}$: mutant B.
[2] Est Weissenborn: om. B$\bar{r}$.
[3] in sua $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[4] quo ed. Parisina 1513: quod B$\bar{r}$.
[5] natura uertente se degenerat $\bar{r}$: natam uertentes B.
[6] cecidistis $\bar{r}$: cedetis B.
[7] recens Ascensius: recentis B: recentes $\bar{r}$.
[8] hos $\bar{r}$: hostes B.

[1] The characterization given by the Rhodians (XXXVII. liv. 21–22) is quite different and probably more accurate.

land; these now are degenerates, of mixed race, and B.C. 189 really Gallogrecians, as they are named; just as, in the case of plants and animals, the seeds have less power to maintain their natural quality than the character of the soil and climate in which they live has power to change it. The Macedonians who hold Alexandria in Egypt, who hold Seleucia and Babylonia and other colonies scattered throughout the world, have degenerated into Syrians, Parthians, Egyptians; Massilia,[1] situated among the Gauls, has acquired something of the disposition of its neighbours; what have the Tarentines retained of that stern and dreadful Spartan discipline? Whatever grows in its own soil has greater excellence; transplanted to another soil, its nature being modified to suit that in which it grows, it loses its virtue. It is Phrygians,[2] therefore, burdened with the weapons of Gauls, whom, even as you slew them in the battle-line of Antiochus, you will slay, victorious over the vanquished. I am afraid that there will be too little of glory rather than too much of war. King Attalus has often repulsed and routed them. Do not think that it is only beasts which when newly caught first retain that fierceness of their forest life, and then, when long fed by the hands of men, grow tame, but that in moderating the ferocity of men nature does not do the same. Do you believe that these are the same men that their fathers and their grandfathers were? Exiles on account of the poverty of the land, they left home, travelling through the most inhospitable land of Illyricum, then Paeonia and Thrace, fighting with the fiercest tribes, and seized

[2] The Phrygians of Livy's time were proverbially effeminate: cf., e.g., Virgil, Aen. IV. 215–216.

17 gentibus emensi, has terras ceperunt. Duratos eos tot malis exasperatosque accepit terra, quae copia omnium rerum saginaret. Uberrimo agro, mitissimo caelo, clementibus accolarum ingeniis omnis illa,
18 cum qua venerant, mansuefacta est feritas. Vobis mehercule, Martiis viris, cavenda ac fugienda quam primum amoenitas est Asiae: tantum hae peregrinae voluptates ad extinguendum vigorem animorum possunt; tantum[1] contagio disciplinae
19 morisque accolarum valet. Hoc tamen feliciter evenit, quod sicut vim adversus vos nequaquam, ita famam apud Graecos parem illi antiquae obtinent, 20 cum qua venerunt, bellique gloriam victores eandem inter socios habebitis, quam si servantes antiquum specimen animorum Gallos vicissetis."

XVIII. Contione dimissa missisque ad Eposognatum legatis, qui unus ex regulis et in Eumenis manserat amicitia[2] et negaverat Antiocho adversus Romanos auxilia, castra movit. Primo die ad Alandrum flumen, postero ad vicum quem vocant
2 Tyscon ventum. Eo legati Oroandensium cum venissent amicitiam petentes, ducenta talenta his sunt imperata, precantibusque[3] ut domum renun-
3 tiarent potestas facta. Ducere inde exercitum consul ad Pliten intendit; deinde ad Alyattos castra posita. Eo missi ad Eposognatum redierunt, et

[1] tantum ed. Frobeniana 1535 : quantum $B\sigma$.
[2] amicitia σ : inamicitia B.
[3] precantibusque σ : precantibus B.

---

[1] Such philosophizing seems hardly consistent with the character of Manlius and doubtfully appropriate to the occasion. Perhaps Livy wishes to prepare the reader for his analysis of Asiatic influence in XXXIX. i. and elsewhere, these lands. Toughened and hardened by so many misfortunes, they were received by a land which could stuff them with its abundance of all things. In a land most rich, under a sky most kindly, among natives mild in disposition, all that fierceness with which they came has grown gentle. You, by Hercules, being men of Mars, must escape and avoid as soon as possible the pleasantness of Asia: such power have these foreign delights to destroy the vigour of the soul; such influence does contact with the habits and character of the natives exert.[1] Yet this turns out well in this respect—that, while their strength against you is vain, still their reputation among the Greeks is the same as that of old, which they had when they came, and you will win, as victors, the same military glory among our allies as if you had conquered Gauls who had preserved their ancient type of courage." B.C. 189

XVIII. Dismissing the meeting and sending envoys to Eposognatus, who alone of the chiefs had both remained loyal to Eumenes and refused to aid Antiochus against the Romans, he moved his camp. The first day he marched to the Alander river, the second to the village which they call Tyscon. When ambassadors from the people of Oroanda had come there asking friendship, he demanded of them two hundred talents and granted them permission to report this at home. Then the consul proceeded to lead the army towards Plitê; next he encamped at Alyatti. There the messengers sent to Eposognatus returned, accompanied by ambassadors of legati reguli orantes ne Tectosagis bellum inferret; ipsum [1] in eam gentem iturum Eposognatum per- 4 suasurumque [2] ut imperata faciant. Data venia regulo, duci inde exercitus per Axylon quam vocant terram coeptus. Ab re nomen habet: non ligni modo quicquam, sed ne spinas quidem aut ullum aliud alimentum fert ignis; fimo bubulo pro lignis 5 utuntur. Ad Cuballum, Gallograeciae castellum, castra habentibus Romanis apparuere cum magno tumultu hostium equites, nec turbarunt tantum Romanas stationes repente invecti [3] sed quosdam 6 etiam occiderunt. Qui tumultus cum in castra perlatus esset, effusus repente omnibus portis equitatus Romanus fudit fugavitque Gallos et aliquot 7 fugientes occidit. Inde consul, ut qui iam ad hostes perventum cerneret, explorato deinde et cum cura coacto agmine procedebat. Et continentibus itineribus cum ad Sangarium flumen venisset, pontem, quia 8 vado nusquam transitus erat, facere instituit. Sangarius ex Adoreo monte per Phrygiam fluens miscetur ad Bithyniam Tymbri fluvio: inde maior iam geminatis aquis per Bithyniam fertur et in Propontidem sese [4] effundit, non tamen tam magnitudine memorabilis, quam piscium accolis ingentem 9 vim praebet. Transgressis ponte perfecto flumen praeter ripam euntibus Galli Matris Magnae [5] a

[1] especially since he holds Manlius responsible for the enervation of his own soldiers and indirectly of Rome. If Polybius had a corresponding speech it is, unfortunately, lost.

[1] ipsum $\bar{\sigma}$: et ipsum B.
[2] persuasurumque $\bar{\sigma}$: peruasurumque B.
[3] inuecti $\bar{\sigma}$: inuectis B.
[4] propontidem sese $\bar{\sigma}$: proponti dense se B.
[5] magnae $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.

---

[1] Assuming with Livy that Axylon is a Greek word, it means "woodless."

that chief, who asked him not to make war upon the Tectosagi; Eposognatus himself, they said, would go to that tribe and persuade them to do what was ordered. Granting this favour to the chief, he began to lead the army through the district which is called Axylon. It derives its name from the fact: it not only produces no wood at all but not even thorns or any other food for fire; they use cow-dung in place of wood.[1] While the Romans were encamped near Cuballum, a fortress of Galatia, the enemy's cavalry appeared with great uproar, and not only threw the Roman outguards into confusion by their unexpected attack, but even killed some men. When this disorder was reported in the camp, the Roman cavalry, pouring in haste from all the gates, repulsed and routed the Gauls and killed a considerable number in their flight. Thenceforth the consul, since he realized that he had now encountered the enemy, marched with scouts sent in advance and his column carefully formed. And when, marching without interruption, he had reached the Sangarius river, he determined to build a bridge, since there was nowhere a way to cross it by fording. The Sangarius river, flowing from Mount Adoreus through Phrygia, is joined near Bithynia by the river Thymbres; thence, enlarged by the doubling of its waters, it flows through Bithynia and discharges into the Propontis,[2] being, however, not so remarkable for its size as because it furnishes the inhabitants with vast quantities of fish. When they had finished the bridge and crossed the river and were marching along the bank, Galli of the Great Mother from Pessinus B.C. 189

[2] The river actually empties into the Euxine sea. It is now the Sakaria.

Pessinunte occurrere cum insignibus suis, vaticinantes fanatico carmine deam Romanis viam belli et 10 victoriam dare imperiumque eius regionis. Accipere se omen cum dixisset consul, castra eo ipso loco 11 posuit. Postero die ad Gordium pervenit. Id haud magnum quidem oppidum est, sed plus quam mediterraneum celebre et frequens emporium.
12 Tria maria pari ferme distantia intervallo habet, ad Hellespontum, ad Sinopen, et alterius orae litora [1] qua Cilices maritimi colunt; multarum magnarumque praeterea gentium fines contingit,[2] quarum commercium in eum maxime locum mutui usus con-
13 traxere. Id tum desertum fuga incolarum oppidum, refertum idem copia rerum omnium invenerunt.
14 Ibi stativa habentibus legati ab Eposognato venerunt nuntiantes profectum eum ad regulos Gallorum 15 nihil aequi impetrasse; ex [3] campestribus vicis agrisque frequentes demigrare et cum [4] coniugibus ac liberis, quae ferre atque agere possint, prae se agentes portantesque Olympum montem petere, ut inde armis locorumque situ sese tueantur.

XIX. Certiora postea Oroandensium legati attulerunt, Tolostobogiorum civitatem Olympum montem [5] cepisse; diversos Tectosagos alium montem,
2 Magaba qui dicatur, petisse; Trocmos coniugibus ac

[1] litora σ : litore B. [2] contingit σ : om. B.
[3] ex σ : om. B.
[4] cum σ : om. B.
[5] montem σ : om. B.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVII. ix. 9. The Magna Mater had been brought to Rome from Pessinus (XXIX. xi. 7, etc.). The Galli were eunuchs devoted to her service.

met them,[1] wearing their ritual ornaments and B.C. 189 prophesying in their frenzied chants that the goddess was granting to the Romans the way of war and victory and dominion over this region. The consul said that he accepted the omen and encamped on that very spot. Next day he moved to Gordium. This is not indeed a large town, but is a market visited and frequented more than is usually the case with an inland city. It has three seas about equidistant from it, the Hellespont, the sea at Sinope and the shores of the opposite sea where the Cilicians of the coast dwell; besides, it adjoins the borders of several strong states, and their mutual needs concentrated their intercourse at this place especially. At this time the Romans found it deserted by the flight of the inhabitants, but likewise filled with abundance of all things. While he was maintaining a base there, ambassadors from Eposognatus came reporting that his visit to the chiefs of the Gauls had won no fair response; from the villages and farms in the plains they were moving in large numbers, accompanied by their wives and children, driving ahead of them and carrying what they could carry and drive,[2] and were making for the Olympus mountain, that thence they might maintain themselves by arms and by the situation of the place.

XIX. Later the ambassadors from the people of Oroanda brought surer news, that the tribe of the Tolostobogii had occupied the Olympus range; that the Tectosagi, separated from them, had made for another mountain which was called Magaba; that the Trocmi had left their wives and children among

[2] This combination of verbs is usually used of booty being removed by an enemy: so in xv. 10 above.

c. liberis apud Tectosagos depositis armatorum agmine [1] 5 Tolostobogiis statuisse auxilium ferre. Erant autem tunc trium populorum reguli Ortiago et Combolo-3 marus et Gaulotus. Iis haec maxime ratio belli sumendi fuerat, quod cum montes editissimos regionis eius tenerent, convectis omnibus quae ad usum quamvis longi temporis sufficerent, taedio se fati-4 gaturos hostem censebant: nam neque ausuros per tam ardua atque iniqua loca subire eos et, si conarentur, vel parva manu prohiberi aut deturbari posse, nec quietos in radicibus montium gelidorum sedentes 5 frigus aut inopiam laturos. Ac cum ipsa altitudo locorum eos tutaretur, fossam quoque et alia muni-menta verticibus iis quos insederant circumiecere.
6 Minima apparatus missilium telorum cura fuit, quod saxa adfatim praebituram asperitatem ipsam locorum credebant.

XX. Consul quia non comminus pugnam sed procul locis oppugnandis futuram praeceperat animo, ingentem vim pilorum, velitarium hastarum, sagittarum glandesque et modicorum qui funda mitti 2 possent lapidum [2] paraverat, instructusque mis-silium apparatu ad Olympum montem ducit et a 3 quinque ferme milibus castra locat. Postero die cum quadringentis equitibus et Attalo progressum eum ad naturam montis situmque Gallicorum cas-trorum visendum equites hostium, duplex numerus, effusi [3] e castris, in fugam averterunt; occisi quoque

[1] agmine γ : agmen B.
[2] mitti possent lapidum ed. Frobeniana 1535 : lapidum possent B : mitti lapidum possent γ.
[3] effusi Kreyssig : effusus B.

the Tectosagi and with their armed forces on the B.C. 189
march had decided to aid the Tolostobogii. The chiefs of these three tribes at this time were Ortiago and Combolomarus and Gaulotus. They had adopted this plan particularly for conducting the war—that, when they had occupied the highest peaks in the region, conveying everything there which would be sufficient for their use over however long a period, they would wear down the enemy by exhaustion; for, they were convinced, the Romans would neither venture to climb over such steep and difficult ground, and, if they did attempt it, they could be stopped even by a small force or pushed back, nor would they sit quietly at the foot of cold mountains and endure chill and hunger. And, although the very height of the place was a defence, they also threw a ditch and other fortifications around the summits which they had occupied. They took little forethought for a supply of missile weapons, because they believed that the very roughness of the terrain would furnish stones in abundance.

XX. The consul, because he had foreseen, as a result of reflection, that the fighting would not be done hand to hand but by making attacks from a distance, had prepared a vast quantity of javelins, skirmishers' spears, arrows, bullets and stones of moderate size which could be thrown from slings, and equipped with this supply of missiles he led the army towards the Olympus mountain and encamped about five miles away. The next day, taking Attalus and four hundred cavalry, he set out to survey the character of the mountain and the situation of the Gallic camp, but the cavalry of the enemy, in double his number, rushing out of the camp put him to flight; a few

4 pauci fugientium, vulnerati plures. Tertio die cum omnibus ad loca exploranda profectus, quia nemo hostium extra munimenta processit, tuto circumvectus montem, animadvertit meridiana regione terrenos et placide acclives ad quendam finem colles 5 esse, a septentrione arduas et rectas prope rupes, atque omnibus ferme aliis inviis itinera tria esse, unum medio monte, qua terrena erant, duo difficilia ab hiberno solis ortu et ab aestivo occasu. Haec contemplatus eo die sub ipsis radicibus posuit castra; 6 postero, sacrificio facto, cum primis hostiis litasset, trifariam exercitum divisum ducere ad hostem pergit.
7 Ipse cum maxima parte copiarum, qua aequissimum aditum praebebat mons, ascendit; L. Manlium fratrem ab hiberno ortu, quoad loca patiantur et tuto 8 possit, subire iubet; si qua periculosa et praerupta occurrant, non pugnare cum iniquitate locorum neque inexsuperabilibus vim adferre, sed obliquo 9 monte ad se declinare et suo agmini coniungi; C.
Helvium cum tertia parte circuire sensim per infima montis, deinde ab occasu aestivo erigere agmen.
Et Attali auxilia trifariam aequo numero divisit,
10 secum esse ipsum iuvenem iussit. Equitatum cum

[1] Roughly, the south-east and north-west sides.
[2] It was regarded as especially propitious if the entrails of the first animals sacrificed gave favourable omens: cf. XXXVI. i. 3.

were killed in the flight, a larger number wounded. B.C. 189
The third day he proceeded with his entire force to reconnoitre the ground, and, because no one of the enemy came out beyond the fortifications, he rode in safety around the mountain, and observed that on the southern side the hills were covered with earth and sloped gently up to a certain point, that on the north there were steep and almost perpendicular cliffs, and that although almost everything else was impassable there were three roads, one in the centre of the mountain, where it was covered with soil, two difficult, on the side of the winter rising of the sun and of its summer setting.[1] Having inspected them, he encamped that day at the very base; the following day, having offered sacrifice and obtained favourable omens from the first victims,[2] he divided the army into three columns and began the advance against the enemy. He himself, with the largest part of the forces, made the ascent where the mountain offered the most gradual slope; he directed his brother Lucius Manlius to move forward on the side of the winter rising, as far as the terrain permitted and as he could go in safety; if any dangerous and steep places confronted him he was not to contend against the unfavourable character of the ground or struggle with insuperable obstacles, but to turn aside crosswise over the mountain towards the consul and join his column; his orders to Gaius Helvius, commanding the third contingent, were to go slowly around the base of the mountain and then climb up on the side of the summer setting. The auxiliaries of Attalus he also divided into three sections, and ordered the young man himself to attend him. The cavalry with the elephantis in proxima tumulis planitie reliquit; edictum praefectis ut intenti quid[1] ubique geratur animadvertant opemque ferre quo postulet res possint.

XXI. Galli ab[2] duobus lateribus satis fidentes invia esse, ab ea parte quae in meridiem vergeret, ut armis clauderent viam, quattuor milia fere armatorum ad tumulum imminentem viae minus mille passuum a castris occupandum mittunt,[3] eo se 2 rati veluti castello iter impedituros. Quod ubi Romani viderunt, expediunt sese ad pugnam. Ante signa modico intervallo velites eunt et ab Attalo Cretenses sagittarii et funditores et Tralli et Thraeces; 3 signa peditum, ut per arduum, leni gradu ducuntur, ita prae se habentium scuta ut missilia tantum vita- 4 rent, pede collato non viderentur pugnaturi. Missilibus ex intervallo loci proelium commissum est, primo par, Gallos loco adiuvante, Romanos varietate et copia telorum; procedente certamine nihil iam aequi erat. Scuta longa ceterum ad amplitudinem corporum parum lata, et ea ipsa plana, male[4] 5 tegebant Gallos. Nec tela iam alia habebant

[1] quid σ: quod B.
[2] ab σ: et ab B.
[3] mittunt σ: mittit B.
[4] plana male σ: plana B.

---

[1] On the return of Manlius to Rome his critics, Furius and Aemilius, savagely assailed him, partly on account of his conduct of this campaign (xlv–xlvi below). A less prejudiced examination of his tactical dispositions, while recognizing that his advance up the mountain in the face of the enemy was contrary to Roman practice and, under normal circumstances, too rash, judges him entitled to considerable praise as a tactician (cf. Pauly-Wissowa, XIV. col. 1219).

elephants he left in the plain close to the hills; his orders to the prefects were to observe alertly what went on in every quarter and to render assistance wherever the situation should demand it.[1] B.C. 189

XXI. The Gauls, being quite confident that their position could not be approached from the two flanks, in order to block with arms the road on the side which faces the south, sent about four thousand armed men to hold a hill overlooking the road and less than a mile from the camp, thinking that from this, as from a redoubt, they would hinder the approach. When the Romans perceived this they prepared for battle. A moderate distance in front of the standards marched the skirmishers[2] and Cretan archers and slingers furnished by Attalus and the Trallianians and Thracians; the standards of the infantry, moving over difficult ground, proceeded at a slow rate, the men holding their shields before them so as only to ward off missiles, whilst they did not seem disposed to fight at close quarters. The discharge of missiles from a distance began the fighting, which at first was even, the Gauls having the advantage of position, the Romans of variety and a plentiful supply of weapons; as the battle continued there was no longer any equality. Their shields, long, but not wide enough for the size of their bodies and, moreover, flat,[3] offered poor protection to the Gauls. They had at this time no other

[2] The velites were usually advance parties thrown out by the legions as a screen; in this case they seem to have been independent units under their own commanders, but the grammar of the sentence is not clear.

[3] The Roman shield presented a convex surface to the enemy and so deflected weapons more successfully.

praeter gladios, quorum, cum manum [1] hostis non con-6 sereret, nullus usus erat. Saxis nec modicis, ut quae non praeparassent, sed quod cuique temere trepidanti ad manum venisset, ut insueti, nec arte [2] nec 7 viribus adiuvantes ictum, utebantur. Sagittis glande iaculis incauti ab [3] omni parte configebantur [4] nec quid agerent, ira et pavore occaecatis animis, cernebant et erant deprensi genere pugnae in quod 8 minime apti sunt. Nam quemadmodum comminus, ubi [5] in vicem pati et inferre vulnera licet, accendit ira animos eorum, ita ubi ex occulto et procul levibus telis vulnerantur, nec quo ruant caeco impetu habent,[6] velut ferae transfixae in suos temere 9 incurrunt. Detegebat [7] vulnera eorum, quod nudi pugnant, et sunt fusa et candida corpora, ut quae numquam nisi in pugna nudentur; ita et plus sanguinis ex multa carne fundebatur et foediores patebant plagae et candor corporum magis sanguine atro 10 maculabatur.[8] Sed non tam patentibus plagis moventur; interdum insecta cute, ubi latior quam altior plaga est, etiam gloriosius se pugnare putant; 11 iidem, cum aculeus sagittae aut [9] glandis abditae introrsus tenui vulnere in speciem urit, et scrutantes qua evellant [10] telum non sequitur, tum in rabiem et

[1] manum $\bar{r}$: manu B. [2] nec arte $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[3] ab ed. Frobeniana 1535 : et ab B$\bar{r}$.
[4] configebantur $\bar{r}$: conficiebantur B.
[5] ubi $\bar{r}$: sub B. [6] habent $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[7] detegebat $\bar{r}$: detegebant B.
[8] maculabatur $\bar{r}$: maculatur B.
[9] aut $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[10] qua evellant Perizonius : quae uellent B : quae uellant $\bar{r}$.

[1] The Gauls were not devotees of the exercise in the open air which tanned the Romans.

weapons than their swords, for which there was no use, since the enemy did not meet them in hand-to-hand conflict. Stones—but not of suitable size, since they had made no preparations in advance, but took each what happened to come to his hand in his hasty search—they did use, but like men untrained in their employment, with neither skill nor strength to add effectiveness to the blow. Arrows, sling-bullets, darts, coming from all sides wounded them unexpectedly, nor did they see what to do, as their minds were blinded by rage and fear, and they were involved in a kind of battle for which they were very ill-adapted. For, as in hand-to-hand fighting, where they can receive and inflict wounds in turn, passion inflames their minds, so when they are struck by light weapons, coming from unseen and distant sources, and when they have no place at which they can charge with blind violence, like wounded animals they rush headlong upon their own friends. The fact that they fight naked makes their wounds conspicuous and their bodies are fleshy and white, as is natural, since they are never uncovered except in battle;[1] so that both more blood flowed from their abundant flesh and the wounds stood out to view more fearfully and the whiteness of their skins was more stained by the black blood. But they are not much disturbed by open wounds; indeed, sometimes they cut away the skin, when the gash is broad rather than deep, and think that thus they gain greater glory in the fight; the same men, when the sting of an arrow or of a bullet that has buried itself in the flesh torments them, having caused a wound small to look at, and, as they search for a way to extract the missile, it does not come out, turning B.C. 189 pudorem tam parvae perimentis[1] versi pestis prosternunt corpora humi, sic[2] tum passim pro-12 cumbebant; alii[3] ruentes in hostem undique configebantur et, cum comminus venerant, gladiis a 13 velitibus trucidabantur. Hic miles tripedalem parmam habet et in dextera hastas quibus eminus utitur; gladio Hispaniensi est cinctus; quodsi pede collato pugnandum est,[4] translatis in laevam hastis

14 stringit gladium. Pauci iam supererant Gallorum, qui, postquam ab levi armatura superatos se viderunt et instare legionum signa, effusa fuga castra repetunt pavoris et tumultus iam plena, ut ubi feminae pue-
15 rique et alia imbellis turba permixta esset. Romanos victores deserti fuga hostium acceperunt tumuli.

XXII. Sub idem tempus L. Manlius[5] et C. Helvius, cum, quoad viam colles obliqui dederunt, escendissent, postquam ad invia ventum est, flexere iter in 2 partem montis, quae una habebat iter, et sequi consulis agmen[6] modico uterque intervallo velut ex composito coeperunt, quod primo optimum factu
3 fuisset, in id necessitate ipsa compulsi; subsidia enim

[1] perimentis $\bar{r}$: prementis B.
[2] humi sic edd. vett.: humi sicut $M\bar{r}$.
[3] procumbebant; alii M. Mueller: procumbebant alii $B\bar{r}$.
[4] est $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[5] l. manlius $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[6] agmen edd. vett.: agmen l. manlius c. heluius $B\bar{r}$.

---

[1] It would be interesting to know the source of this highly realistic and picturesque description of the manners of the Gauls in battle. One thinks of the apparent relish with which the source which Livy followed in XXXI. xxxiv. 4 described the wounds suffered by Philip's cavalry in an engagement with Roman cavalry, and wonders whether the same person is responsible for the originals of the two passages.

[2] According to XXVI. iv. 4 each man carried seven javelins.

to madness and shame at being destroyed by so small a thing, throw their bodies upon the ground. So in this instance they lay prostrate here and there; some, rushing against the enemy, were wounded from every side, and when they had come to close quarters they were slain by the swords of the skirmishers.[1] This type of soldier carries a three-foot shield and, in his right hand, javelins[2] which he uses at long range; he is also equipped with a Spanish sabre;[3] if he is compelled to fight hand to hand, he shifts his javelins to his left hand and draws his sword. By now there were few of the Gauls surviving, and they, when they saw themselves defeated by the light troops and that the legionary standards were drawing near, in headlong flight sought their camp, which was already full of panic and confusion, as the women and children and the rest of the unarmed crowd were gathered there. The victorious Romans took possession of the hills abandoned by the flight of the enemy. B.C. 189

XXII. About the same time Lucius Manlius and Gaius Helvius, when they had marched up as far as the slopes of the hill admitted of progress, after they had reached the impassable places changed their direction towards that part of the mountain which alone offered a road, and began to follow the consul's column, each at a moderate distance as if by agreement, being compelled by necessity itself to do what would from the first have been the best thing to do;[4]

[3] If Livy speaks with technical accuracy, this was the heavy weapon, adapted to cutting, carried by Roman cavalry; the infantry sword, which was short and adapted to both cutting and thrusting, is called gladius Hispanus: cf. XXXI. xxxiv. 4 and the note.

[4] The implied criticism is perhaps that of Polybius, whose account of the battle has been lost.

in talibus iniquitatibus locorum maximo saepe usui fuerunt,[1] ut primis forte deturbatis secundi et tegant pulsos et integri pugnam excipiant. Consul, postquam ad tumulos ab levi armatura captos prima signa legionum pervenerunt.[2] respirare et conquiescere paulisper militem iubet; simul strata per tumulos corpora Gallorum ostentat et, cum levis armatura proelium tale ediderit, quid ab legionibus, quid ab iustis armis, quid ab animis fortissimorum militum expectari? Castra illis capienda esse, in quae compulsus ab levi armatura hostis trepidet. Praecedere tamen iubet levem armaturam, quae, cum staret agmen, colligendis per tumulos telis ut missilia sufficerent, haud segne id ipsum tempus consumpserat. Iam castris appropinquabant; et Galli, ne parum se munimenta sua tegerent, armati pro vallo constiterant. Obruti deinde omni genere telorum cum, quo plures atque densiores erant, eo minus vani quicquam intercideret teli,[3] intra vallum momento temporis compelluntur stationibus tantum firmis ad ipsos aditus portarum relictis. In multitudinem compulsam in castra vis ingens missilium telorum coniciebatur, et vulnerari multos clamor permixtus mulierum atque puerorum ploratibus significabat.

[1] fuerunt ed. Frobeniana 1535 : fuerant BM^{2}.
[2] peruenerunt ^{2} : uenerunt B.
[3] teli ^{2} : om. B.

for reserves have often, on such unfavourable terrains, B.C. 189 been of the greatest service, that when the leading troops have perhaps been thrown into disorder the reserves may both shield the defeated and, being themselves fresh, take up the fight. When the leading standards of the legions came to the hills which had been captured by the light troops, the consul ordered the men to take breath and to rest for a little while; at the same time he called their attention to the corpses of Gauls strewn over the hills and asked them what, when light-armed troops had worked such havoc in the fight, was to be expected of the legions, what of regular weapons, what of soldiers of the stoutest hearts? Their camp, he said, remained to be taken, into which the enemy had been driven in confusion by the light troops. Nevertheless, he ordered the light-armed men to lead the advance, and they, while the column was halted, had spent the time by no means idly, in collecting the weapons over the hills, that the supply of missiles might suffice. Now they were approaching the camp, and the Gauls, lest their fortifications should offer them too little shelter, had taken post under arms in front of the rampart. Then they were overwhelmed by missiles of every kind, and the more numerous and the more crowded together they were, the less did any weapon fall without effect, so that in an instant they were driven back within the rampart, leaving only strong guards at the actual gates of the fortifications. A vast quantity of missile weapons was discharged at the throng which had been driven inside the camp, and the shouts mingled with the wails of women and children showed that many were wounded. Against the troops who had

.c. 9 In eos qui portas stationibus suis clauserant, legionum
5 antesignani pila coniecerunt. Iis vero non vulnerabantur, sed transverberatis scutis plerique inter se conserti haerebant; nec diutius impetum Romanorum sustinuerunt.

XXIII. Patentibus iam portis, priusquam irrumperent victores, fuga e castris Gallorum in omnes partes facta est. Ruunt caeci per vias per invia; nulla praecipitia saxa, nullae rupes obstant;[1] nihil
2 praeter hostem metuunt; itaque plerique praecipites per vastam altitudinem prolapsi aut debilitati exanimantur. Consul captis castris direptione praedaque abstinet militem; sequi pro se quemque et
3 instare et perculsis pavorem addere iubet. Supervenit et alterum cum L. Manlio agmen; nec eos castra intrare sinit; protinus ad persequendos hostes mittit, et ipse paulo post tradita captivorum custodia tribunis militum sequitur, debellatum ratus, si in illo
4 pavore quam plurimi caesi forent aut capti. Egresso consule C. Helvius cum tertio agmine advenit, nec continere suos ab direptione castrorum valuit, praedaque eorum, iniquissima sorte, qui pugnae non interfuerant, facta est.[2] Equites diu ignari et
5 pugnae et victoriae suorum steterunt; deinde et ipsi, quantum equis subire poterant, sparsos fuga Gallos circa radices montis consectati cecidere aut

[1] obstant Σ : om. B.
[2] facta est Σ : om. B.

---

[1] The Gauls stood with shields overlapping, and a spear which struck near the edge might fasten two of them together. Caesar (B. G. I. xxv. 3) describes more clearly a similar occurrence.

blocked the gates at which they were posted, the B.C. 189 antesignani of the legions hurled their spears. The men indeed were not injured by them, but their shields in many cases were pierced and fastened together,[1] nor did they longer resist the attack of the Romans.

XXIII. The gates being now open, before the victors could break in, the Gauls began to flee from the camp in all directions. They rushed blindly along the roads and where there were no roads; no steep rocks, no cliffs, held them back; they feared nothing but the enemy; accordingly many were killed, falling headlong or slipping in weariness over tremendous precipices. The consul, having taken the camp, kept his soldiers from spoil and pillage; he ordered them each to follow as best he could, press the pursuit and increase the panic of the fugitives. The second column, under Lucius Manlius, also came up; he did not permit his men to enter the camp, but sent them at once to pursue the enemy, and he himself followed a little later, having entrusted the guarding of the prisoners to the tribunes of the soldiers, being convinced that the war was over if the largest possible number was killed or captured in that rout. When the consul had gone, Gaius Helvius arrived with the third column and was unable to prevent his men from plundering the camp, and the booty, by a most unjust decree of fate, fell into the hands of men who had had no part in the battle. The cavalry, knowing nothing for a long time of either the battle or the victory of their comrades, remained stationary; later they too, with all the speed of which their horses were capable, pursuing the Gauls as they scattered in flight around the c 6 cepere. Numerus interfectorum haud facile iniri potuit, quia late per omnes amfractus montium 7 fugaque et caedes fuit, et magna pars rupibus inviis in profundae altitudinis convalles [1] delapsa est, pars 8 in silvis vepribusque occisa. Claudius, qui bis pugnatum in Olympo monte scribit, ad quadraginta milia hominum auctor est caesa, Valerius Antias, qui magis immodicus in numero augendo esse solet, non 9 plus decem milia. Numerus captivorum haud dubie milia quadraginta [2] explevit, quia omnis generis aetatisque turbam secum traxerant demigrantium 10 magis quam in bellum euntium modo. Consul armis hostium in uno concrematis cumulo ceteram praedam conferre omnes iussit, et aut vendidit, quod eius in publicum redigendum erat, aut cum cura ut quam 11 aequissima esset per milites divisit. Laudati quoque pro contione omnes sunt, donatique pro merito quisque, ante omnes Attalus summo ceterorum assensu; nam singularis eius iuvenis cum virtus et industria in omnibus laboribus periculisque tum modestia etiam fuerat.

[1] conualles $\bar{\sigma}$: ualles B. [2] quadraginta $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.

---

[1] Manlius himself (xlvii. 6 below) says that he captured and killed more than forty thousand of the enemy, and Orosius (IV. xx: he credits the victory to the other consul Fulvius) says that forty thousand were killed. Appian, however (Syr. xlii). asserts that there were forty thousand prisoners and that the slain could not be counted. Perhaps the official report of Manlius was used by Claudius.

[2] The vividness of the preceding narrative gives rise to a question as to its sources. Valerius Antias and Claudius are quoted, and in the preceding note I suggest that the latter may have used the official report of Manlius. For some reason or other the Galatian campaign attracted an unusual amount of attention: Hannibal is said to have base of the mountain, killed and captured them. The B.C. 189 number of casualties could not easily be calculated because the flight and slaughter went on far and wide over all the outlying parts of the mountains, and a great number fell from the pathless cliffs into valleys of enormous depth, and some were killed in the forests and thickets. Claudius, who writes that there were two battles on the Olympus mountain, asserts that about forty thousand men were slain;[1] Valerius Antias, who is usually more unrestrained in exaggerating numbers, says that not more than ten thousand fell. The number of prisoners without doubt brought the total up to forty thousand, because they had brought with them their whole population of every class and age, like a people in migration rather than setting out to war. The consul, having burned all the weapons of the enemy in one pile, ordered all his troops to bring in the rest of the booty and either sold that part of the booty which it was his duty to convert to public use or carefully distributed it to the soldiers so as to secure the greatest possible measure of equity. Also before an assembly he praised everyone according to his merits, and Attalus before all, with the complete approval of the rest; for the young man had displayed not only remarkable courage and diligence amid all the toils and dangers, but also modesty of behaviour.[2] written an account of it (Nepos, Hann. xiii. 2), but there is no trace of this. In the note to xv. 5 above I mentioned the generally accepted assumption that Livy had access to a diary of some participant in the campaign: Mommsen once suggested (Röm. Forsch. II. 538 ff.) that he was Polybius, but this has not been taken seriously. Whether the sanguinophile source of chap. xxi (see the note to xxi. 12 above) was one of those already mentioned cannot be determined.

XXIV. Supererat bellum integrum cum Tectosagis. Ad eos profectus consul tertiis castris Ancyram, nobilem in illis locis urbem,[1] pervenit, unde
2 hostes paulo plus decem milia aberant. Ubi cum stativa essent, facinus memorabile a captiva factum est. Orgiagontis reguli uxor forma eximia custodiebatur inter plures captivos;[2] cui custodiae cen-
3 turio praeerat et libidinis et avaritiae militaris. Is primo animum temptavit: quem cum abhorrentem a voluntario videret stupro, corpori, quod servum
4 fortuna erat, vim fecit. Deinde ad leniendam indignitatem iniuriae spem reditus ad suos mulieri facit, et ne eam quidem, ut amans, gratuitam. Certo auri pondere pactus, ne quem suorum conscium haberet, ipsi permittit ut quem vellet unum ex captivis
5 nuntium ad suos mitteret. Locum prope flumen constituit, quo duo ne[3] plus necessarii[4] captivae cum auro venirent nocte insequenti ad eam acci-
6 piendam. Forte ipsius mulieris servus inter captivos eiusdem custodiae erat. Hunc nuntium primis
7 tenebris extra stationes centurio educit. Nocte insequenti et duo necessarii mulieris ad constitutum
8 locum et centurio cum captiva venit. Ubi cum aurum ostenderent, quod summam talenti Attici

[1] urbem σ : in urbem B.
[2] captiuos σ : om. B.
[3] quo duo ne σ : om., spat. rel., B.
[4] necessarii σ : necessia B.

---

[1] This city (modern Angora) was important enough later to have the Res Gestae of Augustus (Monumentum Ancyranum) set up there.
[2] Polybius and others give her name as Chiomara.

XXIV. There remained an entirely new war with B.C. 189 the Tectosagi. Setting out against them the consul came on the third day of marching to Ancyra, a famous city in that region,[1] from which the enemy was a little more than ten miles distant. While they were established in camp there, a memorable deed was done by a captive woman. The wife[2] of the chieftain Orgiago,[3] a woman of surpassing beauty, was held under guard among a large number of prisoners; the commander of the guard was a centurion, characterized by both the lust and the greed of the soldier. At first he tried her disposition; when he found it shrinking from voluntary fornication, he did violence to her body, which fortune had made a slave. Then, to quiet her indignation at the injury, he held out to the woman the hope of a return to her own people, but not even that, as a lover might have done, did he grant her for nothing. Having stipulated for a definite quantity of gold, to avoid taking one of his own men as an accomplice, he allowed the woman herself to send as a messenger to her people whomsoever of the prisoners she should choose. He designated a spot near the river to which not more than two of the kinsmen of the captive were to come with the money the following night to receive her. It happened that one of the woman's own slaves was among the prisoners under the same guard. This man, as messenger, the centurion at nightfall conducted beyond the line of sentinels. The following night both the two kinsmen of the woman and the centurion with the prisoner came to the appointed place. While they were displaying the money, which was to amount to an Attic

[3] Probably identical with Ortiago of xix. 2 above.

—tanti enim pepigerat—expleret, mulier lingua sua stringerent ferrum et centurionem pensantem aurum occiderent imperavit. Iugulati praecisum caput ipsa involutum veste ferens ad virum Orgiagontem, qui ab Olympo domum refugerat, pervenit; quem priusquam [1] complecteretur, caput centurionis ante pedes eius abiecit, mirantique cuiusnam id caput hominis aut quod id facinus haudquaquam mulieris esset, et iniuriam corporis [2] et ultionem violatae per vim pudicitiae confessa viro est aliaque, ut traditur, sanctitate et gravitate vitae huius matronalis facinoris decus ad ultimum conservavit.

XXV. Ancyram in stativa oratores Tectosagum ad consulem venerunt petentes, ne ante ab Ancyra castra moveret quam collocutus cum suis regibus esset: nullas condiciones pacis iis non bello fore potiores. Tempus [3] in posterum diem constituitur locusque, qui medius maxime inter castra Gallorum et Ancyram est visus. Quo cum consul ad tempus cum praesidio quingentorum equitum venisset nec ullo Gallorum ibi viso regressus in castra esset, oratores idem redeunt, excusantes religione obiecta venire reges non posse; principes gentis, per quos aeque res transigi posset, venturos. Consul se quoque Attalum missurum dixit. Ad hoc colloquium utrimque ventum est. Trecentos equites

[1] priusquam Σ: prius B.
[2] et iniuriam corporis Σ: om. B. [3] tempus Σ: om. B.

[1] Practically the same story is told by Polybius (XXII. xxi), Plutarch (Mul. Virt. 43), Valerius Maximus (VI. i. ext. 2) and Florus (I. xxvii. 6). All probably came from the same ultimate source (the diary mentioned above?), although Plutarch quotes as from Polybius an item not now found in Polybius' own version.

talent—for so great had been the sum agreed upon B.C. 189
—the woman in her own language ordered them to draw sword and kill the centurion as he was weighing the money. When they had slit his throat and cut off his head, the woman herself wrapped it in her garment and carried it on her return to her husband Orgiago, who had escaped home from Olympus; before she embraced him she dropped at his feet the head of the centurion, and, when he wondered whose head this was and what this act meant, so unlike that of a woman, she confessed to her husband the violence done to her person and the vengeance exacted for her forcibly violated chastity, and, as the story goes, by the purity and dignity of her life in other respects maintained to the end the glory won by a deed that marked her as a true matron.[1]

XXV. Ambassadors from the Tectosages came to the consul at his base at Ancyra, requesting that he should not move from Ancyra until he had conferred with their chiefs: there were no terms of peace which would not be preferable in their sight to war. The time fixed was for the next day and the place one which seemed approximately half-way between the camp of the Gauls and Ancyra. When the consul had come there at the designated time, attended by a guard of five hundred cavalry, and had returned to his camp without having seen any Gaul there, the same ambassadors returned, apologizing that their chiefs could not come by reason of religious objection; the leading men of the tribe, they said, through whom the business could equally well be transacted, would come. The consul said that he too would send a representative, namely, Attalus. Both parties attended this conference. When Attalus praesidii causa cum adduxisset, iactatae[1] sunt pacis[2] condiciones; finis rei quia absentibus ducibus imponi non poterat, convenit uti consul regesque eo loco postero die congrederentur. Frustratio Gallorum eo spectabat, primum ut tererent tempus, donec res suas quibus periclitari nolebant cum coniugibus et liberis trans Halyn flumen traicerent, deinde quod ipsi consuli, parum cauto adversus colloquii[3] fraudem, insidiabantur. Mille ad eam rem ex omni numero audaciae expertae delegerunt equites; et successisset fraudi ni pro iure gentium, cuius violandi consilium initum erat, stetisset fortuna. Pabulatores lignatoresque Romani in eam partem in qua colloquium futurum erat ducti sunt,[4] tutius id futurum tribunis ratis, quia consulis praesidium et ipsum pro statione habituri erant hosti oppositum: suam tamen alteram stationem propius castra sescentorum equitum posuerunt. Consul, affirmante Attalo venturos reges et transigi rem posse, profectus e castris, cum eodem quo[5] antea praesidio equitum quinque milia fere processisset nec multum a constituto loco abesset, repente concitatis equis cum impetu hostili videt Gallos venientes. Constituit agmen, et[6] expedire tela animosque equitibus iussis primo constanter initium pugnae

[1] iactatae J. F. Gronovius: iactae $B\sigma$: actae M.
[2] pacis σ: om. B.
[3] colloquii σ: consilii B.
[4] ducti sunt σ: om. B.
[5] quo σ: quod B.
[6] et σ: om. B.

Attalus had brought up with him a bodyguard of three hundred cavalry, terms of peace were discussed; since a conclusion to the matter could not be reached in the absence of the principals, it was agreed that the consul and the chiefs should meet in that place the following day. The evasiveness of the Gauls had this purpose: first, that they might waste time until they could transport their property, which they did not wish to jeopardize, together with their wives and children, across the river Halys; second, that they were plotting against the consul himself, who had not been sufficiently on guard against treachery at the conference. For this purpose they chose from their entire number a thousand cavalry of tried boldness; and success would have attended their treachery had not fortune stood on the side of the law of nations which they had planned to violate. The Roman foragers and wood-gatherers were led in the direction in which the conference was to be held, the tribunes thinking that this would be safer, since they would have between them and the enemy the consul's bodyguard, placed as a sort of outpost for them; nevertheless, they posted another outguard of their own, consisting of six hundred cavalry, nearer the camp. The consul, on the assurance of Attalus that the chiefs would come and that the business could be settled, set out from camp with the same guard of cavalry as before, and, when he had gone about five miles and was not far from the appointed place, suddenly he saw the Gauls coming, their horses at full gallop, and with the air of enemies. He halted his column, and, ordering the troopers to prepare arms and, minds for the combat, at first he stoutly received the onset of the attack and did not B.C. 189

excepit [1] nec cessit; dein, cum praegravaret multitudo, cedere sensim nihil confusis turmarum ordinibus 13 coepit; postremo, cum iam plus in mora periculi quam in ordinibus conservandis [2] praesidii esset, omnes passim in fugam effusi sunt. Tum vero instare dissipatis Galli [3] et caedere; magnaque pars oppressa foret ni statio pabulatorum, sescenti equites, 14 occurrissent. Ii procul clamore pavido suorum audito cum tela equosque expedissent, integri pro-
15 fligatam pugnam acceperunt. Itaque versa extemplo fortuna est, versus a victis in victores terror. Et primo impetu fusi Galli sunt, et ex agris concurrebant pabulatores, et undique obvius hostis Gallis erat, ut ne fugam quidem tutam aut facilem haberent, quia recentibus equis Romani fessos sequebantur.
16 Pauci ergo effugerunt; captus est nemo; maior multo pars per fidem violati colloquii [4] poenas morte luerunt. Romani ardentibus ira [5] animis postero die omnibus copiis ad hostem perveniunt.

XXVI. Biduum natura montis per se ipsum exploranda ne quid ignoti esset absumpsit [6] consul; tertio die, cum auspicio operam dedisset, deinde immolasset, in quattuor partes divisas copias educit,
2 duas, ut medio monte duceret, duas ab lateribus, ut
3 adversus cornua Gallorum erigeret. Hostium quod roboris erat, Tectosagi et Trocmi, mediam tenebant

[1] excepit Perizonius: cepit B: accepit $\bar{\sigma}$.
[2] conseruandis $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[3] Galli $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[4] colloquii $\bar{\sigma}$: eloquii B.
[5] ira ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. B$\bar{\sigma}$.
[6] absumpsit $\bar{\sigma}$: assumpsit B.

---

[1] Cf. xix. 1 above.

give way; then, when the weight of numbers was bearing him down, he began to retire gradually, preserving the formation of his troops; finally, when there was now more danger in delay than protection in maintaining the formation, all scattered in random flight. Then indeed the Gauls began to pursue and kill the scattered cavalry; and a great part of them would have been destroyed had not the outpost of the foragers, the six hundred cavalry, come up to them. When they had heard from afar the terrified shouts of their comrades and had made ready their weapons and horses, they came upon the rout with their force still fresh. So straightway fortune changed and the panic changed sides, from the vanquished to the victors. And at the first attack the Gauls were routed and the foragers flocked in from the fields and foes faced the Gauls from every side, so that they did not find even flight either easy or safe, since the Romans with fresh horses were pursuing the weary. And so few then escaped; no one was taken prisoner; by far the greatest part paid with their lives the penalty for breaking the faith of a conference. The Romans, their hearts on fire with wrath, advanced the next day with their whole strength against the enemy. B.C. 189

XXVI. The consul spent two days in exploring for himself the character of the mountain,[1] that nothing might be unfamiliar to him; on the third day, after giving his attention to the auspices and then offering sacrifice, he divided his army into four columns and led them out, planning to lead two up the central part of the mountain and to send two from the sides to oppose the flanks of the Gauls. The Tectosagi and the Trocmi, who constituted the aciem, milia hominum quinquaginta; equitatum, quia equorum nullus erat inter inaequales[1] rupes usus, ad pedes deductum, decem milia hominum, ab

4 dextro locaverunt cornu: Ariarathis Cappadoces et Morzi auxiliares in laevo quattuor ferme milium numerum explebant. Consul, sicut in Olympo monte, prima in acie locata levi armatura, telorum omnis generis ut aeque magna vis ad manum esset,
5 curavit. Ubi appropinquarunt,[2] omnia eadem utrimque quae fuerant in priore proelio erant praeter animos et victoribus ab re secunda auctos et hostibus
6 fractos,[3] quia, etsi non ipsi victi erant, suae gentis hominum cladem pro sua ducebant. Itaque a paribus initiis coepta res eundem exitum habuit.
7 Velut nubes levium telorum coniecta obruit aciem Gallorum. Nec aut procurrere quisquam ab ordinibus suis, ne nudarent[4] undique corpus ad ictus, audebant, et stantes quo densiores erant hoc plura, velut destinatum petentibus, vulnera accipiebant.
8 Consul iam per se turbatis si legionum signa ostendisset, versuros extemplo in fugam omnes ratus receptis inter ordines velitibus et alia turba auxiliorum aciem promovit.

XXVII. Galli et memoria Tolostobogiorum cladis territi et inhaerentia corporibus gerentes tela fessique

[1] inaequales σ : aequales B.
[2] appropinquarunt σ : appro (sic, in fine paginae) B.
[3] fractos σ : om. B.
[4] nudarent σ : nudaret B.

[1] A Paphlagonian prince.

strength of the enemy, held the centre of their line B.C. 189 with fifty thousand men; the cavalry, being dismounted since there was no use for horses on the rough cliffs, and numbering ten thousand men, they placed on their right flank; the Cappadocians of Ariarathes and the auxiliaries of Morzius [1] on the left flank amounted to about four thousand men. The consul, as at the Olympus mountain, placed the light-armed troops in the van and made provision that there might be at hand an equally large supply of every kind of weapon. When they approached, everything was the same on both sides as in the former battle except courage, which was increased in the victors by reason of their success and diminished in the enemy because, while they themselves had not been conquered, they considered as their own the disaster suffered by men of their own race. And so from like beginnings the affair had the same end. The discharge of a veritable cloud of light missiles overwhelmed the line of the Gauls. No one dared to rush forward from their ranks lest he expose his body to wounds from all sides, and, standing fast, the more closely they were crowded together the more wounds they received, the attackers aiming, so to speak, at a target. The consul, thinking that if he disclosed the standards of the legions to an enemy already disorganized on its own account they would all at once turn to flight, received within his ranks the skirmishers and the rest of the throng of auxiliaries and moved forward his battle-line.

XXVII. The Gauls, terrified as they were by the recollection of the defeat of the Tolostobogii, carrying weapons fixed in their bodies and wearied both by

c. 5 et stando et[1] vulneribus ne primum quidem impetum
2 et clamorem Romanorum tulerunt. Fuga ad castra inclinavit; sed pauci intra munimenta sese recepere; pars maior dextra laevaque praelati qua quemque
3 impetus tulit fugerunt.[2] Victores usque ad castra secuti ceciderunt terga; deinde in castris[3] cupiditate
4 praedae haeserunt, nec sequebatur quisquam. In cornibus Galli diutius steterunt quia serius ad eos perventum est; ceterum ne primum quidem[4]
5 coniectum telorum tulerunt. Consul, quia ingressos in castra ab direptione abstrahere non poterat, eos qui in cornibus fuerant protinus ad sequendos hostes
6 misit. Per aliquantum spatium secuti non plus tamen octo milia hominum in fuga—nam pugna nulla fuit—ceciderunt; reliqui flumen Halyn
7 traiecerunt. Romanorum pars magna ea nocte in castris hostium mansit; ceteros in sua castra consul reduxit. Postero die captivos praedamque recensuit, quae tanta fuit quantam[5] avidissima rapiendi gens, cum cis montem Taurum omnia armis per multos
8 annos tenuisset, coacervare potuit. Galli ex dissipata passim fuga in unum locum congregati, magna pars saucii aut[6] inermes, nudati omnibus rebus, 9 oratores de pace ad consulem miserunt. Eos Manlius Ephesum venire iussit; ipse—iam enim medium autumni erat—locis gelidis propinquitate Tauri montis excedere properans victorem exercitum in hiberna maritimae orae reduxit.

[1] et $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[2] fugerunt $\bar{\gamma}$: fuerunt B.
[3] in castris $\bar{\gamma}$: castris B.
[4] quidem $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[5] quantam ed. Frobeniana 1531 : quanta $B\bar{\gamma}$.
[6] saucii aut ed. Frobeniana 1535 : saucia ut $B\bar{\gamma}$.

[1] It is improbable that the Taurus mountain could have much effect on the climate of Galatia.

standing and by wounds, did not endure even the B.C. 189 first assault and shout of the Romans. Their flight was directed towards their camp, but few found their way within the ramparts; the majority was carried past to right and left and fled wherever the course of each led. The victors, cutting them down from behind, followed as far as the camp; then they remained in the camp in their greed for plunder, nor did anyone pursue. On the flanks the Gauls stood firm longer because the attack was slower to reach them; but they did not endure even the first volley of weapons. Since the consul was unable to tear away from their plundering the troops who had entered the camp, he at once sent those who had been on the flanks to pursue the enemy. Although they followed for a considerable distance, they did not kill more than eight thousand men in the flight, for there was no battle; the rest crossed the river Halys. A large part of the Romans stayed that night in the camp of the enemy; the consul led the rest back to their own camp. The next day he surveyed the prisoners and booty, which was as great as a people most greedy for plunder could amass after holding under armed control for many years everything on this side of the Taurus mountain. The Gauls, assembling in one place after their scattered and disorderly flight, most of them being wounded or unarmed, stripped of everything, sent ambassadors to the consul concerning peace. Manlius ordered them to come to Ephesus; he himself—for it was now mid-autumn—was in haste to get away from the cold regions in the neighbourhood of the Taurus mountain [1] and led the victorious army back into winter quarters on the sea coast.

B.C. 165

XXVIII. Dum haec in Asia geruntur, in ceteris provinciis tranquillae res fuerunt. Censores Romae T. Quinctius Flamininus et M. Claudius Marcellus
2 senatum legerunt;[1] princeps in senatu tertium lectus P. Scipio Africanus; quattuor soli[2] praeteriti sunt, nemo curuli usus honore. Et in[3] equitatu recensen-
3 do mitis admodum censura fuit. Substructionem super Aequimelium in Capitolio et viam silice sternendam a porta Capena ad Martis locaverunt.
4 Campani ubi censerentur senatum consuluerunt; decretum uti Romae censerentur. Aquae ingentes eo anno fuerunt; Tiberis duodeciens campum Martium planaque urbis inundavit.
5 Ab Cn. Manlio consule bello in Asia cum Gallis perfecto, alter consul M. Fulvius perdomitis Aetolis cum traiecisset in Cephallaniam, circa civitates insulae misit percontatum utrum se dedere Romanis
6 an belli fortunam experiri mallent. Metus ad omnes valuit, ne deditionem recusarent. Obsides inde

[1] legerunt Modius : perlegerunt $B\bar{r}$: elegerunt M.
[2] soli $\bar{r}$: solis B. [3] et in $\bar{r}$: et B.

---

[1] Livy now enumerates briefly events in Rome during the period occupied by the Aetolian and Galatian campaigns. The narrative thus supplements that of XXXVII. lii–lviii incl.

[2] Cf. XXXIV. xliv. 4 and the note. Scipio had received this distinction in 199 B.C. (when he had been one of the censors) and in 194 B.C.

[3] The censors performed the function of revising the list of equites and removing from the list such individuals as the facts as they found them warranted.

[4] Neither the meaning of the word nor the situation of the place is quite certain, although if it was near the vicus Iugarius

XXVIII. While this was going on in Asia things were quiet in the other provinces. At Rome [1] the censors Titus Quinctius Flamininus and Marcus Claudius Marcellus chose the senate; as princeps senatus [2] Publius Scipio Africanus was chosen for the third time; only four senators were passed over, none of whom had held curule office. In the review of the equites [3] also the censorship was quite lenient. Contracts were let for the building of a substructure above the Aequimelium [4] on the Capitoline and for the paving with flint of the road from the Porta Capena to the temple of Mars.[5] The Campanians asked the senate for a decision as to where they should be listed by the censors; it was decreed that they should be listed in Rome.[6] There were great floods that year; the Tiber on twelve occasions overflowed the Campus Martius and the level districts of the city. B.C. 189

The war with the Gauls in Asia having been finished by the consul Gnaeus Manlius, the other consul, Marcus Fulvius, after conquering the Aetolians, crossed to Cephallania [7] and sent agents around the island to inquire of the cities whether they preferred to surrender themselves to the Romans or to try the fortune of war. Fear prevailed upon all of them not to refuse submission. Hostages were then requisithe work may have been necessitated by the landslide of 192 B.C. (XXXV. xxi. 6).

[5] This temple lay between a mile and two miles outside the Porta Capena on the Via Appia.

[6] These were probably Campanians who had been driven from their homes during the Second Punic War and had settled in other parts of Italy. They were not, however, citizens of the towns in which they resided, and the censors could not take cognizance of them there.

[7] Cf. ix. 10 above and the note.

imperatos pro viribus inopes populi. . . .[1] vicenos
.c. 5 autem Cranii[2] et Palenses et Samaei dederunt.[3] 7 Insperata pax Cephallaniae adfulserat, cum repente una civitas, incertum quam ob causam, Samaei 8 desciverunt. Quia opportuno loco urbs posita esset, timuisse se aiebant ne demigrare cogerentur ab Romanis. Ceterum ipsine sibi eum finxerint metum et timore vano quietum excitaverint[4] malum, an iactata[5] sermonibus res apud Romanos perlata ad 9 eos sit, nihil comperti est, nisi quod datis iam ob-sidibus repente portas clauserunt et ne suorum quidem precibus—miserat enim sub muros consul ad temptandam misericordiam parentium popolari-10 umque—desistere ab incepto voluerunt.[6] Oppugnari deinde, postquam nihil pacati respondebatur, coepta urbs est. Apparatum omnem tormentorum machina-rumque travectum ab Ambraciae oppugnatione habe-11 bat, et opera quae facienda erant impigre milites per-fecerunt. Duobus igitur locis admoti arietes quatie-bant muros.

XXIX. Nec ab Samaeis quicquam quo aut opera aut hostis arceri posset[7] praetermissum est. Duabus
2 tamen maxime resistebant rebus, una,[8] interiorem

[1] probabilem emendationem huius loci mendosi, multis frustra temptatis, non invenerunt viri docti.
[2] Cranii Sigonius : grannoni $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[3] dederunt $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[4] excitaverint edd. vett. : excitauerunt $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[5] iactata $\bar{\sigma}$: iactatos B.
[6] uoluerunt $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[7] posset $\bar{\sigma}$: possit B.
[8] una $\bar{\sigma}$: unam B.

---

[1] The text is hopelessly corrupt, and I have not indicated the lacuna in the translation. It is uncertain whether pro viribus goes with imperatos, with inopes, as I have translated tioned and supplied by the cities, poor in proportion B.C. 189 to their strength, twenty each by the Cranians, the Palensians and the Sameans.[1] The radiance of unexpected peace had shone upon Cephallania when suddenly one city, the Sameans, it is uncertain for what reason, revolted. Because the city enjoyed a strategic position, they said that they were afraid that they would be compelled by the Romans to move away. But whether they had invented this alarm for themselves and in baseless terror had roused a sleeping evil, or the subject had been discussed by the Romans and reported to them, nothing has been ascertained, except that when they had already given hostages they suddenly closed their gates and not even in response to the prayers of their own people—for the consul had sent some of them to the foot of the walls to stir up pity for their parents and fellow-countrymen—were they willing to abandon their undertaking. Then, when their replies showed no pacific intent, the siege of the city began. He had all the equipment of artillery and siege-engines transferred from the siege of Ambracia, and what works had to be constructed the soldiers zealously undertook. Accordingly, the battering-rams were moved up in two places and the walls attacked.

XXIX. Nor was any measure overlooked by the Sameans by which either the works or the enemy could be interfered with. Nevertheless, their resistance depended mainly upon two things; first, the it, or with something omitted. Moreover, the fourth city on the island (Thuc. II. xxx. 2; Plin. N.H. IV. 54) is not mentioned. Finally, the number of hostages is very large (cf. xi. 6 above), which ill accords with inopes, unless the interpretation here given of pro viribus inopes is accepted.

c. 5 semper iuxta validum pro diruto novum obstruentes murum, altera, eruptionibus subitis nunc in opera hostium nunc in stationes; et plerumque his proeliis 3 superiores erant. Una ad coercendos inventa, haud magna memoratu, res est. Centum funditores ab 4 Aegio et Patris et Dymis acciti. A pueris ii more quodam [1] gentis saxis globosis, quibus ferme harenae immixtis strata litora sunt, funda mare apertum 5 incessentes exercebantur. Itaque longius [2] certiusque et validiore ictu quam Baliaris funditor eo telo 6 usi sunt. Et est non simplicis habenae, ut Baliarica aliarumque gentium funda, sed triplex scutale, crebris [3] suturis duratum, ne fluxa habena volutetur in iactu glans, sed librata cum sederit, velut nervo missa 7 excutiatur. Coronas modici circuli magno ex intervallo loci adsueti traicere non capita solum hostium vulnerabant, sed quem locum destinassent oris. 8 Hae fundae Samaeos cohibuerunt, ne tam crebro neve [4] tam audacter erumperent, adeo ut precarentur ex muris Achaeos ut [5] parumper abscederent et se cum Romanis stationibus pugnantes quiete spectarent. 9 Quattuor menses obsidionem Same sustinuit. Cum ex paucis cotidie aliqui eorum caderent aut vulnerarentur, et qui supererant fessi et corporibus

[1] quodam σ : quondam B.
[2] longius B (ex corr.) σ : longiore B.
[3] scutale crebris σ : scuta lecebris B.
[4] neue σ : nec B.
[5] ut σ : om. B.

---

[1] The corresponding passage in Polybius is lost, and the source of this description is uncertain. A somewhat similar account is found in XLII. lxv. 10, but it does not seem from either that Livy entirely understood what he was describing.

continuous construction of a strong new wall on the B.C. 189 inside, adjoining the wall that was destroyed; second, their sudden sallies, now against the enemy's siege-works, now against his outguards; and generally in these battles they had the advantage. One device was found to hold them in check, though trivial to mention. A hundred slingers were recruited from Aegium and Patrae and Dymae. These peoples were trained from boyhood, in accordance with a tradition of the race, in hurling with a sling at the open sea the round stones which, mingled with the sand, generally strew the coasts. In consequence they use this weapon at longer range, with greater accuracy and with more powerful effect than the Balearic slinger. Moreover, the sling is not composed of a single strap, like those of the Baleares and other peoples, but the bullet-carrier is triple, strengthened with numerous seams, that the missile may not fly out at random, from the pliancy of the strap at the moment of discharge, but, seated firmly while being whirled, may be shot out as if from a bow-string.[1] Having been trained to shoot through rings of moderate circumference from long distances, they would wound not merely the heads of their enemies but any part of the face at which they might have aimed. These slings prevented the Sameans from making sallies so frequently or so boldly, to such an extent that from the walls they begged the Achaeans[2] to withdraw for a while and in quiet to watch them fighting with the Roman outguards. For four months Same underwent the siege. Since every day some of their small number were killed or wounded and those who remained were wearied

[2] i.e. the slingers.

10 et animis essent, Romani nocte per arcem quam Cyneatidem vocant—nam urbs in mare devexa in occidentem vergit—muro superato in forum perve-
11 nerunt. Samaei postquam captam partem urbis ab hostibus senserunt, cum coniugibus ac liberis in maiorem refugerunt arcem. Inde postero die dediti direpta urbe sub corona omnes venierunt.

XXX. Consul compositis rebus Cephallaniae, praesidio Samae imposito, in Peloponnesum iam diu accersentibus Aegiensibus maxime ac Lacedae-
2 moniis traiecit. Aegium a principio Achaici concilii semper conventus gentis indicti sunt, seu dignitati
3 urbis id seu loci opportunitati [1] datum est. Hunc morem Philopoemen eo primum anno labefactare conatus legem parabat ferre, ut in omnibus civitatibus quae Achaici concilii essent in vicem conventus
4 agerentur. Et sub adventum consulis damiurgis civitatium, qui summus est magistratus, Aegium evocantibus Philopoemen—praetor tum erat—Argos
5 conventum edixit. Quo cum appareret omnes ferme conventuros, consul quoque, quamquam Aegiensium favebat causae, Argos venit; ubi cum disceptatio fuisset, et rem inclinatam cerneret, incepto destitit.
6 Lacedaemonii deinde eum in sua certamina averte-

[1] opportunitati $\bar{r}$: opportunitate B.

---

[1] Cf. XXXII. xxii. 2 and the note.

[2] His fifth term in this office began in the autumn of 189 B.C. Livy habitually uses the Latin word praetor for the chief magistrate of foreign states: cf. XXXI. xxiv. 6 and the note.

in both body and mind, the Romans at night, by way B.C. 189 of the citadel which they call Cyneatis—for the city slopes towards the sea and faces west—crossed the wall and entered the market-place. When the Sameans realized that part of the city had been captured by the enemy, they took refuge with their wives and children in the larger citadel. Then the next day the city was plundered and all who had surrendered were sold as slaves.

XXX. The consul, having arranged matters in Cephallania and stationed a garrison at Same, crossed to the Peloponnesus, whither the Aegians especially and the Lacedaemonians had long been summoning him. From the beginning of the Achaean League the meetings of the assembly had all been called for Aegium, whether this was a tribute to the importance of the city or the convenience of the place. This custom Philopoemen, in this year for the first time, was trying to break down, and was preparing to propose a law that the meetings should be held in all the cities which belonged to the Achaean League in rotation. And at the approach of the consul, when the damiurgi of the cities (they are the chief magistrates)[1] called the meeting at Aegium, Philopoemen —he was then praetor[2]—summoned it at Argos. When it was clear that almost all would assemble there, the consul, although he favoured the cause of the Aegians, also went to Argos; when the argument had begun there and he saw that the Aegian case was weaker, he gave up his purpose.[3] Then the Lacedaemonians diverted his attention to their own runt. Sollicitam eam civitatem exules maxime habebant, quorum magna pars in maritimis Laconicae orae castellis, quae omnis adempta erat,[1] habitabant. 7 Id aegre patientes Lacedaemonii, ut aliqua liberum ad mare haberent aditum, si quando Romam aliove quo mitterent legatos, simul ut emporium et receptaculum peregrinis mercibus ad necessarios usus esset, nocte adorti vicum maritimum nomine Lan[2] 8 improviso occupaverunt. Vicani quique ibi exules habitabant primo inopinata re territi sunt; deinde sub lucem congregati levi certamine expulerunt 9 Lacedaemonios.[3] Terror tamen omnem maritimam oram pervasit, legatosque communiter et castella omnia vicique et exules, quibus ibi domicilia erant, ad Achaeos miserunt.

[3] Fulvius had evidently intended to oppose the proposal of Philopoemen at the meeting.

XXXI. Philopoemen praetor, iam inde ab initio exulum causae amicus,[4] et auctor semper Achaeis minuendi opes et auctoritatem Lacedaemoniorum, 2 concilium querentibus dedit, decretumque referente, eo factum est, cum in[5] fidem Achaeorum tutelamque T. Quinctius et Romani Laconicae orae castella

[1] adempta erat ed. Frobeniana 1535: ademptae erant B: adepti erant ⊐.
[2] Lan ed. Frobeniana 1535: lamin B⊐.
[3] lacedaemonios ⊐: om. B.
[4] amicus ed. Frobeniana 1535: et amicus B⊐.
[5] cum in ⊐: ut in B.

---

[1] In 195 B.C. Flamininus had concluded a treaty with Nabis, tyrant of Lacedaemon, in which it was provided, among other things, that Nabis should surrender his holdings on the coast (XXXIV. xxxv–xxxvi); the Achaean League had assumed, without explicit authority, so far as the evidence shows, the enforcement of this provision when, in 192 B.C., Nabis had undertaken to obtain an outlet to the sea (XXXV. xxv–xxx). After the assassination of Nabis by the Aetolians quarrels.[1] The state was kept in anxiety especially by the exiles, a great part of whom lived in the fortresses along the Laconian sea coast, all of which had been taken away from Sparta. The Lacedaemonians, angered at this, in order that somehow they might possess free access to the sea, if ever they sent ambassadors to Rome or elsewhere, and at the same time that they might have a market and a place for the storage of foreign merchandise for necessary purposes, made an unexpected night attack on the coast town of Las and captured it. The townspeople and the exiles who lived there were at first terrified by this unlooked-for event; then, assembling at daybreak, with a slight effort they expelled the Lacedaemonians. Nevertheless, the panic spread to the whole sea coast, and all the forts and villages and the exiles whose residences were there sent a joint embassy to the Achaeans. B.C. 189

XXXI. The praetor Philopoemen, who had from the very beginning championed the cause of the exiles and had always urged the Achaeans to diminish the power and influence of the Lacedaemonians, gave the complainants an audience before the council, and on his motion a decree was passed that, whereas Titus Quinctius and the Romans had put the fortresses and villages of the Laconian coast under the protection and guardianship of the Achaeans, and whereas,

[1] in the same year, Philopoemen had taken Lacedaemon into the Achaean League (XXXV. xxxvii. 2), where its status was somewhat uncertain. Philopoemen's own policy was definitely anti-Laconian, and the unsettled question of the banished Spartan aristocrats was a continual problem (XXXVI. xxxv. 7). Livy now recounts the history of Achaean–Spartan relations from this time to the holding of the council at which Fulvius was present.

et vicos tradidissent et, cum abstinere iis ex foedere Lacedaemonii deberent, Las [1] vicus oppugnatus esset, caedesque ibi facta, qui eius rei auctores adfinesque essent, nisi dederentur Achaeis, violatum videri
3 foedus. Ad exposcendos eos legati extemplo Lacedaemonem missi sunt. Id imperium adeo superbum et indignum Lacedaemoniis visum est [2] ut, si antiqua civitatis fortuna esset, haud dubie arma extemplo
4 capturi fuerint. Maxime autem consternavit eos metus, si semel primis imperiis oboediendo iugum accepissent,[3] ne, id quod iam diu moliretur Philo-5 poemen, exulibus Lacedaemonem traderet. Furentes igitur ira triginta hominibus ex factione, cum qua consiliorum aliqua societas Philopoemeni atque exulibus erat, interfectis decreverunt renuntiandam societatem Achaeis legatosque extemplo Cephallaniam mittendos, qui consuli M. Fulvio quique Romanis Lacedaemonem dederent orarentque eum, 6 ut veniret in Peloponnesum ad urbem Lacedaemonem in fidem dicionemque populi Romani accipiendam.

XXXII. Id ubi legati ad Achaeos rettulerunt, omnium civitatium quae eius concilii erant consensu bellum Lacedaemoniis indictum est. Ne extemplo
2 gereretur hiems impediit; incursionibus tamen parvis, latrocinii magis quam belli modo, non terra

[1] Las ed. Frobeniana 1535: lace B^{2}.
[2] est π: om. B.
[3] accepissent π: accepisset B.

---

[1] The motion as quoted by Livy has the verbal characteristics of the actual decree. The treaty referred to was with the Romans, not the Achaeans, and the moral and legal right of the latter to enforce it is not unquestioned.
[2] This must be the winter of 189–188 B.C. The details of although under the treaty the Lacedaemonians were under obligations to let them alone, the village of Las had been attacked and men had been killed there, therefore, unless those who had been principals in and accessories to this act should be surrendered to the Achaeans, the treaty should be deemed to have been violated.[1] Messengers were at once sent to Lacedaemon to demand them. This demand seemed to the Lacedaemonians so insolent and unmerited that if the ancient fortune of the state had continued they would without doubt have immediately taken up arms. The principal cause of the terror which struck them was that, if they once accepted the yoke by obedience to these first commands, Philopoemen would turn Lacedaemon over to the exiles, as he had long been planning. Mad with wrath, then, they killed thirty men of the faction with which Philopoemen and the exiles had shared any other plans, and decreed that the alliance with the Achaeans should be broken off and that ambassadors should at once be sent to Cephallania to surrender Lacedaemon to the consul Marcus Fulvius and the Romans and to implore him to come to the Peloponnesus to receive the city of Lacedaemon under the good faith and protection of the Roman people. B.C. 189

XXXII. When the ambassadors reported this to the Achaeans, with the approval of all the cities which were represented at that council, war was declared upon the Lacedaemonians. Winter[2] prevented the immediate prosecution of the war; nevertheless, their territories were devastated by small raids, more like brigandage than war, not the chronology are obscure, but the siege of Same must have lasted well into the autumn.

tantum sed etiam navibus a mari fines eorum vastati.
3 Hic tumultus consulem Peloponnesum adduxit, iussuque eius Elin concilio indicto Lacedaemonii ad
4 disceptandum acciti. Magna ibi non disceptatio modo sed altercatio fuit, cui consul, cum alia satis ambitiose partem utramque fovendo incerta respondisset, una denuntiatione ut bello abstinerent, donec Romam ad senatum legatos misissent,[1] finem
5 imposuit. Utrimque legatio missa Romam est. Exules quoque Lacedaemoniorum suam causam
6 legationemque Achaeis iniunxerunt. Diophanes et Lycortas, Megalopolitani ambo, principes legationis Achaeorum fuerunt qui, dissidentes in re publica, tum quoque minime inter se convenientes orationes
7 habuerunt. Diophanes senatui disceptationem omnium rerum permittebat: eos optime controversias inter Achaeos ac Lacedaemonios finituros esse;
8 Lycortas ex praeceptis Philopoemenis postulabat ut Achaeis ex foedere ac legibus suis quae decressent agere liceret, libertatemque sibi illibatam, cuius ipsi 9 auctores essent, praestarent. Magnae auctoritatis apud Romanos tum gens Achaeorum erat; novari tamen nihil de Lacedaemoniis placebat. Ceterum responsum ita perplexum fuit ut et Achaei sibi de 10 Lacedaemone permissum acciperent, et Lacedae-

[1] misissent σ: om. B.

[1] The senate probably intended that the Lacedaemonians should remain members of the Achaean League and that their surrender to Fulvius should be ignored. It seems a fair inference that the Achaeans were not to interfere, as Philopoemen proposed to do, in local Spartan affairs. But Roman fondness for sententiousness in legislation made this decree unpardonably vague, considering the gravity of the situation, and one is tempted to conclude that the senate did not really grasp the arguments and was not greatly interested.

only on land but also by ships from the sea. This B.C. 189 disturbance brought the consul to the Peloponnesus; and by his order a council was called at Elis and the Lacedaemonians summoned to take part in the debate. Not only a lively debate took place there but also a violent quarrel, to which the consul, although in other respects, favouring both sides in a spirit of conciliation, he had given ambiguous replies, put an end by the one peremptory demand that they should refrain from war until they had sent ambassadors to the senate in Rome. Both sides sent embassies to Rome. The Lacedaemonian exiles also entrusted their case and their representation to the Achaeans. Diophanes and Lycortas, both from Megalopolis, were chiefs of the Achaean delegation, and they, opposed as they were to one another on public questions generally, at this time also delivered speeches quite inconsistent with one another. Diophanes was for entrusting to the senate the adjudication of all questions: they, he said, would best settle the disputes between the Achaeans and the Lacedaemonians; Lycortas, acting on the instructions of Philopoemen, demanded that the Achaeans be permitted to carry out whatever they had decreed in accordance with the treaty and their own laws, and that the Romans should grant them, unabridged, the freedom of which they themselves were the source. The people of the Achaeans at that time had great influence with the Romans; nevertheless, it was decreed that no change should be made in the status of the Lacedaemonians.[1] The reply, however, was so ambiguous that both the Achaeans accepted it as a concession of freedom of action regarding Lacedaemon and the Lacedaemonmonii non omnia concessa iis interpretarentur. Hac potestate immodice Achaei ac superbe usi sunt. Philopoemeni continuatur magistratus.

XXXIII. Qui veris initio exercitu indicto castra in finibus Lacedaemoniorum posuit, legatos deinde misit ad deposcendos auctores defectionis, et civitatem in pace futuram si id fecisset pollicentes et illos nihil indicta causa passuros. Silentium prae metu ceterorum fuit; quos nominatim depoposcerat, ipsi se ituros professi sunt, fide accepta a legatis vim abfuturam,[1] donec causam dixissent. Ierunt etiam alii illustres viri, et advocati privatis et quia pertinere causam eorum ad rem publicam censebant. Numquam alias exules Lacedaemoniorum Achaei secum adduxerant in fines, quia nihil aeque alienaturum animos civitatis videbatur; tunc exercitus totius prope antesignani exules erant. Hi venientibus Lacedaemoniis ad portam castrorum agmine facto occurrerunt; et primo lacessere iurgiis, deinde, altercatione orta, cum accenderentur irae,[2] ferocissimi exulum impetum in Lacedaemonios fecerunt. Cum illi deos et fidem legatorum testarentur, et legati et praetor summovere turbam et protegere Lacedaemonios vinclaque iam quosdam inicientes arcere.[3]

[1] uim abfuturam $\bar{r}$: futuram (post spat. rel.) B.
[2] irae $\bar{r}$: ira B. [3] arcere Weissenborn : arceret B$\bar{r}$.

[1] Elections were normally held in the autumn, and Philopoemen may have been chosen for his sixth term before the embassy to Rome.

[2] The introductory relative gives some support to the view that chap. xxxiii should begin with Hac or with Philopoemeni above. I have retained the division of the Teubner text.

[3] At this time the Achaeans were deliberately trying to provoke the Lacedaemonians to violence.

ians interpreted it as not granting the Achaeans full authority. This power the Achaeans employed unrestrainedly and tyrannically. Philopoemen was re-elected to the chief magistracy.[1] B.C. 189

XXXIII. He[2] at the beginning of spring called out the army and encamped within the borders of the Lacedaemonians, and then sent ambassadors to demand the men responsible for the revolt and to promise that the state should be at peace if they did this and that those men should suffer no injury without the opportunity to plead their cause in court. The rest kept silent from fear; those whom he had demanded by name declared that they would go on receipt from the ambassadors of a guaranty that they should suffer no violence until they had pleaded their cause. Other well-known men also went with them, both to support them as private citizens and because they knew that their case affected the public interest. Under no other circumstances had the Achaeans taken Lacedaemonian exiles with them to the frontiers,[3] because it was obvious that nothing would offend so much the feelings of the state; on this occasion practically the whole of the advance troops of the army consisted of exiles. They formed in a body and met the Lacedaemonians as they came to the gates of the camp; and at first they assailed them with insults and then, as a quarrel broke out and passions were aroused, the most impetuous of the exiles attacked the Lacedaemonians. When they appealed to the gods and the pledges of the ambassadors, both the ambassadors and the praetor were trying to push the mob aside and to protect the Lacedaemonians and to restrain some who were already binding them with chains. The crowd grew as the

B.C. 165 8 Crescebat tumultu concitato turba; et Achaei ad
9 spectaculum primo concurrebant; deinde vociferantibus exulibus quae passi forent et orantibus opem affirmantibusque simul numquam talem occasionem habituros si eam praetermisissent; foedus, quod in Capitolio, quod Olympiae, quod in arce Athenis
10 sacratum fuisset, irritum per illos esse; priusquam alio de integro foedere obligarentur, noxios puniendos esse, accensa his vocibus multitudo ad vocem unius, qui ut ferirent inclamavit, saxa coniecit. Atque ita decem septem, quibus vincula per tumultum iniecta 11 erant, interfecti sunt. Sexaginta tres postero die comprehensi, a quibus praetor vim arcuerat,[1] non quia salvos vellet sed quia perire causa indicta nolebat, obiecti[2] multitudini iratae, cum aversis[3] auribus pauca locuti essent, damnati omnes et traditi sunt ad supplicium.

XXXIV. Hoc metu iniecto Lacedaemoniis imperatum primum uti muros diruerent; deinde ut omnes externi auxiliares, qui mercede apud tyrannos
2 militassent, terra Laconica excederent; tum uti quae servitia tyranni liberassent—ea magna multitudo erat—ante diem certam abirent; qui ibi mansissent, eos prendendi abducendi vendendi Achaeis ius esset;

[1] arcuerat σ : arguerat B.
[2] obiecti σ : obiecta B.
[3] aversis edd. vett. : aduersis $B\sigma$.

[1] Their exact meaning is uncertain.

excitement increased; and first the Achaeans rushed B.C. 189 up to see the sight; then the exiles began bitterly to proclaim what they had suffered and to beg for aid, at the same time asserting that they would never have such an opportunity if they let this one slip; the treaty, they said, which had been ratified with religious sanction on the Capitoline, at Olympia, and on the Acropolis at Athens, had been made void by those men;[1] before they were bound anew by another treaty they urged that the guilty should be punished. Then the multitude, inflamed by these words, at the call of one man, who shouted out that they should strike, began to throw stones. And so seventeen of those who had been put into chains in the excitement were killed.[2] The next day sixty-three were arrested whom the praetor had protected against violence, not because he was concerned for their safety but because he did not wish them to be killed without pleading their cause, becoming the victims of an angry mob, and when they had spoken briefly to hostile ears all were condemned and handed over for execution.

XXXIV. Fear having been thus inspired in the Lacedaemonians, it was first ordered that they should destroy their walls; then, that all the foreign auxiliaries who had served under the tyrants for pay should leave Laconian territory; next, that the slaves whom the tyrants had freed[3]—their number was large—should depart before a designated day; if any of them remained the Achaeans were to have the right to seize, carry off and sell them; then, that

[2] This affair was too ingeniously explained by Lycortas in 184 B.C. (XXXIX. xxxvi. 9–16).

[3] Nabis defended this policy in XXXIV. xxxi. 14–18.

c. 3 Lycurgi leges moresque abrogarent, Achaeorum 5 adsuescerent legibus institutisque: ita unius eos corporis fore et de omnibus rebus facilius consensuros.
4 Nihil oboedientius fecerunt quam ut muros diruerent,
5 nec aegrius passi sunt quam exules reduci. Decretum Tegeae in concilio communi Achaeorum de restituen-6 dis iis factum est; et mentione illata externos auxiliares dimissos ac Lacedaemoniis adscriptos—ita enim vocabant qui ab tyrannis liberati erant—urbe excessisse et in [1] agros dilapsos,[2] priusquam dimitteretur exercitus, ire praetorem cum expeditis et comprehendere id genus hominum et vendere iure 7 praedae placuit. Multi comprehensi venierunt.
Porticus ex ea pecunia Megalopoli permissu [3]
8 Achaeorum refecta est quam Lacedaemonii diruerant.
Et ager Belbinates, quem iniuria tyranni Lacedaemoniorum possederant, restitutus eidem civitati ex decreto vetere Achaeorum, quod factum erat Philippo 9 Amyntae filio regnante. Per haec velut enervata civitas Lacedaemoniorum diu Achaeis obnoxia fuit;
nulla tamen res tanto erat damno quam disciplina

[1] et in Ussing: in B^{2}.
[2] dilapsos π: dilapsus B.
[3] permissu π: persensu B.

---

[1] The traditional Spartan constitution had been preserved when Sparta was taken into the Achaean League in 192 B.C. (XXXV. xxxvii. 2). The apparent purpose of the Achaeans at this time was to weaken their military power, although their pretext has a fairer sound.

[2] They were supposed to have been built by the tyrants (XXXIV. xxxviii. 2).

they should annul the laws and customs of Lycurgus[1] and adjust themselves to the laws and institutions of the Achaeans: thus, they said, they would all become one body and would agree more readily on all matters. They obeyed no command more willingly than the order to tear down their walls,[2] nor were they more reluctant to accept any than the one which required that the exiles be restored. The decree for their restoration was passed at Tegea in the common council of the Achaeans,[3] and when the report was submitted that the foreign auxiliaries had been discharged and that the newly-registered Lacedaemonians—for so they called the men who had been set free by the tyrants—had left the city and had scattered through the country, they ordered the praetor, before the army was dismissed, to go with the light-armed troops and arrest men of this category and sell them under the law governing booty. Many were arrested and sold. Out of this money, with the permission of the Achaeans, they rebuilt a portico at Megalopolis which the Lacedaemonians had destroyed. Also the ager Belbinates,[4] which had been wrongfully seized by the tyrants of the Lacedaemonians, was given back to that state under an old decree of the Achaeans which had been passed while Philip, the son of Amyntas, was on the throne.[5] The Lacedaemonian state, thus, so to speak, emasculated, was long at the mercy of the Achaeans; yet nothing did them so much injury as the subversion of the discipline B.C. 189

[3] Since these men had been banished as a result of party strife, their restoration practically assured the progressive weakening of Lacedaemon by internal political conflict.

[4] Probably the territory of the town of Belemina in Tripolis.

[5] This Philip was the father of Alexander the Great.

Lycurgi, cui per octingentos annos adsuerant, sublata.

XXXV. A concilio, ubi ad consulem inter Achaeos Lacedaemoniosque disceptatum est, M. Fulvius, quia iam in exitu annus erat, comitiorum causa profectus Romam creavit consules M. Valerium Messalam et C. Livium Salinatorem, cum[1] M. Aemilium Lepidum inimicum eo quoque anno petentem deiecisset.[2] Praetores inde creati Q. Marcius Philippus M. Claudius Marcellus C. Stertinius C. Atinius P. Claudius Pulcher L. Manlius Acidinus. Comitiis perfectis consulem M. Fulvium in provinciam et ad exercitum redire placuit, eique et collegae Cn. Manlio imperium in annum prorogatum est. Eo anno in aede Herculis signum[3] dei ipsius ex decemvirorum responso, et seiuges in Capitolio aurati a P.[4] Cornelio positi; consulem dedisse inscriptum est. Et duodecim clipea aurata ab aedilibus curulibus P. Claudio Pulchro et Ser. Sulpicio Galba sunt posita ex pecunia qua frumentarios ob annonam compressam damnarunt; et aedilis plebi Q. Fulvius Flaccus duo

[1] cum ed. Frobeniana 1535 : om. B$\bar{r}$.
[2] deiecisset ed. Frobeniana 1535 : decessisset B : decessisse $\bar{r}$.
[3] signum $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[4] a P. Sigonius : ab cn. B$\bar{r}$.

---

[1] The numeral cannot be taken too literally, although it is used again in XXXIX. xxxvii. 5 (in the speech of Lycortas).

[2] Livy omits to say how the case was decided. The events described in the preceding chapters (see the note to xxx. 6 above) must all have antedated this meeting, although the chronology is badly confused.

[3] Lepidus had been defeated the preceding year (XXXVII. xlvii. 7).

of Lycurgus to which they had been accustomed for eight hundred years.[1] B.C. 18

XXXV. From the council at which the case of the Achaeans and the Lacedaemonians had been argued before the consul,[2] Marcus Fulvius, since his year was now near its end, set out for Rome to hold the elections and announced the selection as consuls of Marcus Valerius Messala and Gaius Livius Salinator, when he had secured the defeat of his personal foe, Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, who was a candidate that year also.[3] Next the praetors were elected; Quintus Marcius Philippus, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, Gaius Stertinius, Gaius Atinius, Publius Claudius Pulcher, and Lucius Manlius Acidinus. When the elections were over it was decided that the consul Marcus Fulvius should return to the province and the army, and for him and for his colleague Gnaeus Manlius the imperium was prolonged for one year. In that year in the temple of Hercules a statue of the divinity himself was installed in accordance with a decree of the decemvirs, and a six-horse chariot of gold was set up on the Capitoline by Publius Cornelius;[4] the inscription read that "one who had been consul had dedicated it."[5] Also twelve gilded shields were set up by the curule aediles, Publius Claudius Pulcher and Servius Sulpicius Galba, out of the money which they had condemned the grain-dealers to pay for hoarding the grain-supply; likewise the plebeian aedile, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, [4] Probably Scipio Nasica.

[5] The use of consul in such inscriptions would not mean that the donor was consul at the time of the dedication, but merely that he had held the office. The inscription may have existed in Livy's time.

signa aurata uno reo damnato—nam separatim accusaverant [1]—posuit; collega eius A. Caecilius neminem condemnavit. Ludi Romani ter, plebei quinquiens toti instaurati.

7 M. Valerius Messala inde et C. Livius Salinator consulatum idibus Martiis cum inissent, de re publica deque provinciis et exercitibus senatum
8 consuluerunt. De Aetolia et Asia nihil mutatum est; consulibus alteri Pisae cum Liguribus, alteri
9 Gallia provincia decreta est. Comparare inter se aut sortiri iussi et novos exercitus, binas legiones, scribere et ut sociis [2] Latini nominis quina dena milia peditum imperarent et mille et ducentos equites.
10 Messalae Ligures, Salinatori obtigit Gallia. Praetores inde sortiti sunt: M. Claudio urbana, P. Claudio peregrina iurisdictio evenit; Q. Marcius Siciliam, C. Stertinius Sardiniam, L. Manlius Hispaniam citeriorem, C. Atinius ulteriorem est sortitus.

XXXVI. De exercitibus ita placuit: ex Gallia legiones quae sub C. Laelio fuerant ad M. Tuccium
2 propraetorem in Bruttios traduci, et qui in Sicilia esset dimitti exercitum, et classem quae ibi esset
3 Romam reduceret M. Sempronius propraetor. Hispaniis singulae legiones quae tum in iis provinciis erant decretae,[3] et ut terna milia peditum, ducenos equites ambo praetores in supplementum sociis

[1] accusaverant ed. Moguntina: accusati erant Bσ: accusauerunt M.
[2] sociis σ: socii B. [3] decretae σ: decreta B.

---

[1] The aediles usually acted in unison.
[2] The meaning must be that each consul was to have six hundred cavalry. The ratio of cavalry to infantry fluctuates so much that emendation of distributive numerals (twelve hundred cavalry for each) is not justified.

after convicting only one defendant—for they had B.C. 18 prosecuted independently[1]—dedicated two gilded statues; his colleague Aulus Caecilius condemned no one. The Roman Games in their entirety were repeated three times, the Plebeian Games five times.

Then, when Marcus Valerius Messala and Gaius B.C. 188
Livius Salinator had been inaugurated as consuls on the Ides of March, they consulted the senate regarding the general policy and regarding the provinces and armies. No change was made respecting Aetolia and Asia; to one consul was assigned Pisa together with the Ligurians, to the other Gaul, as their provinces. They were directed to arrange between them or to cast lots and to enroll new armies of two legions each and to requisition from the allies of the Latin confederacy fifteen thousand infantry for each and twelve hundred cavalry.[2] The lot gave to Messala the Ligurians and to Salinator Gaul. Then the praetors cast lots: Marcus Claudius received the jurisdiction between citizens and Publius Claudius that between citizens and aliens; Quintus Marcius Sicily, Gaius Stertinius Sardinia, Lucius Manlius Nearer Spain and Gaius Atinius Farther Spain.

XXXVI. Regarding the armies, this was the decision: the legions from Gaul, which had been under the command of Gaius Laelius, to be transferred to Marcus Tuccius the propraetor for service among the Brutti, the army which was in Sicily to be brought home, and the fleet which was there to be conducted to Rome by Marcus Sempronius the propraetor. For the Spains the single legions which were then in those provinces were decreed, and the praetors were allowed to enlist as reinforcements from the allies and to transport with them each three thousand

4 imperarent secumque transportarent. Priusquam in provincias novi magistratus proficiscerentur, supplicatio triduum pro collegio decemvirorum imperata fuit in omnibus compitis, quod luce inter horam tertiam ferme et quartam tenebrae obortae fuerant. Et novemdiale sacrificium indictum est, quod in Aventino lapidibus pluvisset.

5 Campani, cum eos ex senatus consulto quod priore anno factum erat censores Romae censeri coegissent—nam antea incertum fuerat[1] ubi censerentur—petierunt ut sibi cives Romanas ducere uxores
6 liceret et, si qui prius duxissent,[2] ut habere eas et nati ante eam diem uti iusti sibi liberi heredesque
7 essent. Utraque res impetrata. De Formianis Fundanisque municipibus et Arpinatibus C. Valerius Tappo tribunus plebis promulgavit ut iis suffragii latio—nam antea sine suffragio habuerant[3] civitatem—
8 esset. Huic rogationi quattuor tribuni plebis,[4] quia non ex auctoritate senatus ferretur, cum intercederent, edocti populi esse, non senatus, ius suffragium quibus velit impertire, destiterunt incepto.

[1] fuerat $\bar{r}$: erat B. [2] duxissent $\bar{r}$: dixissent B.
[3] habuerant $\bar{r}$: habuerunt B. [4] plebis $\bar{r}$: om. B.

---

[1] This eclipse has been dated July 17, 188 B.C. (corrected calendar).

[2] Cf. xxviii. 4 above.

[3] This would grant them, retroactively, conubium, a right characteristic of Roman citizenship.

[4] The municipia in general enjoyed only the private rights (commercium and conubium) of Roman citizens: Livy describes their status as civitas sine suffragio. This incident illustrates the gradual promotion of the municipia to full civic rights.

[5] Measures intended for an assembly were ordinarily, but not necessarily, submitted first to the senate, and those infantry and two hundred cavalry. Before the new magistrates departed for their provinces a three-day period of prayer was proclaimed in the name of the college of decemvirs at all the street-corner shrines because in the day-time, between about the third and fourth hours, darkness had covered everything.[1] Also a nine-day sacrifice was decreed because (so it was said) there had been a shower of stones on the Aventine. B.C. 188

The Campanians,[2] since, according to the decree which had been passed the year before, the censors compelled them to be assessed at Rome—for previously it had been uncertain where they should be assessed—requested that they should be permitted to take Roman citizens as wives, that any who had already married Roman citizens should be allowed to keep them, and that children born before this day should be legitimate, free, and capable of inheriting from their fathers.[3] Both requests were granted. Respecting the residents in the municipalities[4] of Formiae, Fundi and Arpinum, Gaius Valerius Tappo, tribune of the people, proposed that the right to vote—for previously the citizenship without the right to vote had belonged to them—should be conferred upon them. When four tribunes of the people vetoed this bill, on the ground that it was not proposed with the sanction[5] of the senate, and they were informed that it was the prerogative of the assembly, not the senate, to bestow the franchise upon whomsoever it desired, they gave up the effort. The bill was passed which the senate favoured received its auctoritas. In this instance the assembly seems to assert its legislative independence of the senate, but Livy's habit of abbreviating his accounts of constitutional debates complicates the problem.

9 Rogatio perlata est ut in Aemilia tribu Formiani et Fundani, in[1] Cornelia Arpinates ferrent; atque in his tribubus[2] tum primum ex Valerio plebiscito censi 10 sunt. M. Claudius Marcellus censor sorte[3] superato T. Quinctio lustrum condidit. Censa sunt civium capita $\overline{\text{CCLVIII}}$ CCCXVIII. Lustro perfecto consules in provincias profecti sunt.

XXXVII. Hieme ea qua haec Romae gesta sunt, ad Cn. Manlium consulem primum, dein[4] pro consule, hibernantem in Asia, legationes undique ex omnibus civitatibus gentibusque, quae cis Taurum montem
2 incolunt, conveniebant. Et ut clarior nobiliorque victoria Romanis de rege Antiocho fuit quam de Gallis, ita laetior sociis erat de Gallis quam de
3 Antiocho. Tolerabilior regia servitus fuerat quam feritas immanium barbarorum incertusque in dies terror, quo velut tempestas eos populantes inferret.[5]
4 Itaque, ut quibus libertas Antiocho pulso, pax Gallis domitis data esset, non gratulatum modo venerant sed coronas etiam aureas pro suis quaeque facultatibus
5 attulerant. Et ab Antiocho legati et ab ipsis Gallis, ut pacis leges dicerentur, et ab Ariarathe rege Cappadocum venerunt ad veniam petendam luendamque pecunia noxam, quod auxiliis Antiochum iuvisset.[6]

[1] et fundani in σ : om. B.
[2] tribubus σ : tribus B.
[3] sorte σ : om. B.
[4] dein σ : deinde in B.
[5] inferret σ : inferet B.
[6] iuuisset σ : iuuissent B.

---

[1] The Aemilia and Cornelia were two of the local tribes (ultimately thirty-five in number) to which all Roman citizens were assigned.

[2] Cf. XXXV. ix. 2 and the first note.

[3] Cf. XXXV. ix. 2 and the second note, and the Periocha of this Book.

with the provision that the people of Formiae and Fundi should vote in the tribe called Aemilia and the Arpinates in the Cornelia; and in these tribes they were then for the first time registered under the Valerian plebiscite.[1] Marcus Claudius Marcellus the censor, having been victorious over Titus Quinctius at the drawing of lots, closed the lustrum.[2] The number of citizens shown by the census was two hundred and fifty-eight thousand three hundred and eighteen.[3] The lustrum having been closed, the consuls set out for their provinces. B.C. 188

XXXVII. During the winter in which these events occurred in Rome, Gnaeus Manlius, who was wintering in Asia, first as consul, then as proconsul, received embassies from all quarters, from all the cities and tribes which live on this side of the Taurus mountain. And while the Roman victory over King Antiochus had been more glorious and more splendid than that over the Gauls, yet the victory over the Gauls afforded the allies more satisfaction than that over Antiochus. The slavery imposed by the king was more endurable than the ferocity of the rude barbarians and the constant and uncertain fear as to when a storm, so to speak, would bring down upon them the marauding Gauls. Accordingly, since from the overthrow of Antiochus they had received liberty and peace from the defeat of the Gauls, they had not only come to offer congratulations but had brought golden crowns, each in proportion to his ability. Also ambassadors came from Antiochus, and from the Gauls themselves, asking that terms of peace should be stated, and from King Ariarathes of Cappadocia, to ask pardon and to wash away with money his guilt in that he had aided Antiochus with auxiliaries.

6 Huic sescenta talenta argenti sunt imperata; Gallis responsum, cum Eumenes rex venisset, tum daturum iis leges.[1] Civitatium legationes cum benignis responsis, laetiores etiam quam venerant, dimissae. 7 Antiochi legati pecuniam in Pamphyliam frumentumque ex pacto cum L. Scipione foedere iussi advehere; 8 eo se cum exercitu venturum. Principio deinde veris lustrato exercitu profectus die octavo Apameam venit. Ibi triduum stativis habitis, tertiis rursus ab Apamea castris in Pamphyliam, quo pecuniam frumen- 9 tumque regios convehere iusserat, pervenit. Duo milia et quingenta[2] talenta argenti accepta Apameam deportantur; frumentum exercitui dividitur. Inde ad Pergam ducit, quae una in iis locis regio tenebatur 10 praesidio. Appropinquanti praefectus praesidii obvius fuit, triginta dierum tempus petens ut regem 11 Antiochum de urbe tradenda consuleret. Dato tempore ad eam diem praesidio decessum est.[3] A Perga L. Manlio fratre cum quattuor milibus militum Oroanda[4] ad reliquum pecuniae ex eo quod pepigerant exigendum misso, ipse, quia Eumenem regem et decem legatos ab Roma Ephesum audierat venisse, iussis sequi Antiochi legatis Apameam exercitum reduxit.

XXXVIII. Ibi ex decem legatorum sententia foedus in haec verba fere cum Antiocho[5] conscriptum

[1] leges ed. Frobeniana 1535: legem *B*ϝ.
[2] Duo milia et quingenta Rubens: mille et quinquaginta *B*ϝ.
[3] praesidio decessum est ed. Frobeniana 1535: decessit praesidio et *B*ϝ.
[4] oroanda ϝ: om., spat. rel., B.
[5] cum antiocho ϝ: om. B.

[1] Polybius (XXII. xxvi) says that the commander had received no instructions from Antiochus to evacuate the town.

Six hundred talents of silver were demanded of him; B.C. 18
the Gauls were told that when King Eumenes had arrived he would give them terms. The embassies from the cities were sent away with gracious responses and in an even happier mood than when they had come. The envoys of Antiochus were directed to bring to Pamphylia the money and grain agreed upon in the treaty concluded with Lucius Scipio; the consul and the army would come there. Then at the beginning of spring, having purified the army, he set out and reached Apamea on the eighth day. Having spent three days in camp there, in three more marches from Apamea he arrived in Pamphylia, where he had ordered the king's agents to bring the money and grain. Two thousand five hundred talents of silver were received and conveyed to Apamea; the grain was distributed to the army. Then he led the troops towards Perga, which alone in this district was held by a royal garrison.[1] As he approached the commander of the garrison met him, asking for a truce of thirty days in order that he might consult King Antiochus about surrendering the city. The time having been granted for that period, the garrison withdrew. From Perga he sent his brother Lucius Manlius with four thousand men to Oroanda to collect the balance of the money which they had agreed to pay,[2] and he himself, since he had heard that King Eumenes and the ten commissioners had arrived in Ephesus from Rome, ordered the envoys of Antiochus to follow and led the army back to Apamea.

XXXVIII. There in accordance with the decision of the ten commissioners the treaty with Antiochus

[2] Cf. xviii. 2 above.

2 est: " Amicitia regi Antiocho cum populo Romano his legibus et condicionibus esto: ne quem exercitum, qui cum populo Romano sociisve bellum gesturus erit, rex per fines regni sui eorumve qui sub dicione eius erunt transire sinito, neu commeatu neu [1] qua alia 3 ope iuvato; idem Romani sociique Antiocho et iis qui sub imperio eius erunt praestent. Belli gerendi ius Antiocho ne esto cum illis qui insulas colunt neve 4 in Europam transeundi. Excedito [2] urbibus agris vicis castellis cis Taurum montem usque ad Halyn [3] amnem, et a valle [4] Tauri usque ad iuga qua in 5 Lycaoniam vergit. Ne qua praeter [5] arma efferto [6]

[1] neu $\bar{r}$: nec B.
[2] excedito $\bar{r}$: expedito B.
[3] Halyn Budaeus: tanaim B, fortasse rectius: accaym, accayn, canym, achanim $\bar{r}$: Taurum Mommsen; de loco toto uid. quae Anglice scripsi.
[4] a ualle $\bar{r}$: ea ualle B: ab ea valle Viereck, fortasse rectius.
[5] praeter Perizonius: om. B$\bar{r}$.
[6] efferto $\bar{r}$: et ferto B.

---

[1] In XXXVII. lv–lvi the appointment of this commission was recorded and their functions stated as the adjustment of such details as could be considered only on the ground. There are certain changes in the treaty as stated below and certain discrepancies between it and the text as given by Polybius (XXII. xxvii).

[2] The crucial part of this sentence is lost from the text of Polybius and the MSS. of Livy offer a variety of readings. No combination of emendations has been found which pays due regard to the readings of the Livy MSS. and also gives a definite and easily recognizable boundary. I have therefore translated the text as it is printed in the latest Weissenborn–Mueller revision, although I may have given to Tauri a construction differing from theirs. I have chosen this course with full appreciation of the difficulties involved, some of which it seems proper to discuss briefly. The reference to the Halys river seems inappropriate unless it was the intention of the treaty-makers to dispose also of the terri-was drafted in about this language:[1] "There shall be friendship between King Antiochus and the Roman people on these conditions and terms: the king shall permit no army which shall purpose to wage war with the Roman people or its allies to march through the territories of his kingdom or of his allies, and he shall not aid them with grain or with any other form of assistance; the Romans and their allies shall guarantee the same to Antiochus and to those who are under his control. Antiochus shall have no right to wage war upon those peoples who inhabit the islands nor to cross to Europe. He shall withdraw from the cities, lands, villages and strongholds on this side of the Taurus mountain as far as the Halys river and from the valley as far as the ridges of Taurus where it slopes down into Lycaonia.[2] He shall carry B.C. 188 tories brought to notice by the defeat of the Gauls. But no Tanaïs river is known and a Taurus river must be imaginatively identified. (Livy mentions a river of this name in xv. 7 above, but even if he is correct the position he gives it is wrong.) Furthermore, no natural boundary is provided between the crest of the Taurus range and the Halys river (I presume that this means the portion of the river above the point where it turns north-west near the Cappadocian–Cilician frontier). If a Tanaïs river could be plausibly identified north of the Taurus range, I should be inclined to read . . . cis Taurum montem usque ad Tanaim amnem, et ab ea valle Tauri usque ad iuga . . . ("on this side of the Taurus mountain as far as the river Tanaïs and from the valley of this river as far as the crest of Taurus"), although the order in which these geographical points are mentioned seems unnatural. It seems hardly necessary to establish an eastern frontier for Asia. For reviews of recent discussion of these questions see the Bericht on Livy by Rau and that on Greek History by Lenschau in Jahresbericht über die Fortschritte der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, 242, 1934, esp. p. 87, and 244, 1934, esp. pp. 120–121, respectively, and Map 3 in this volume.

c.c. 66

ex iis oppidis agris castellisque quibus excedat; si qua extulit quo quaeque [1] oportebit recte restituito. 6 Ne militem neu quem alium ex regno Eumenis recipito. Si qui earum urbium cives quae regno abscedunt cum rege Antiocho intraque fines regni eius sunt, Apameam omnes ante diem certam re- 7 deunto; qui ex regno Antiochi apud Romanos sociosque sunt. iis ius abeundi manendique esto; servos seu fugitivos seu bello captos, seu quis liber captus aut transfuga erit, reddito Romanis sociisque. 8 Elephantos tradito omnes neque alios parato. Tradito et naves longas armamentaque earum, neu plures quam decem naves tectas neve plures quam . . . naves actuarias,[2] nulla quarum plus quam [3] triginta remis agatur, habeto, neve monerem [4] belli 9 causa quod ipse illaturus erit. Ne navigato citra Calycadnum neu Sarpedonium promunturia, extra quam si qua navis pecuniam [5] in [6] stipendium aut 10 legatos aut obsides portabit. Milites mercede conducendi ex iis gentibus quae sub dicione populi Romani sunt Antiocho regi ius ne esto, ne voluntarios 11 quidem recipiendi. Rhodiorum sociorumve quae

[1] quo quaeque Perizonius: quae quoque $B\tau$.

[2] decem naves tectas neve plures quam * naves actuarias Madvig: .X. naues $B\tau$: decem naues actuarias M.

[3] quam τ: quam in B.

[4] monerem Madvig: minore ea B: minorem ex M: minorem ea et monerem ea τ.

[5] pecuniam τ: pecunias B.

[6] in Madvig: om. $B\tau$.

---

[1] The MSS. of Livy provide for decem naves actuarias only. Polybius, however, allows ten decked ships, and it seems necessary then to assume the loss of some words, including a numeral for actuarias. For the sake of simplicity, away nothing but his weapons from these towns, B.C. 18 lands and fortresses from which he is withdrawing; if he has removed anything, he shall duly restore it to the place in which each item belongs. He shall harbour no soldier or other person from the kingdom of Eumenes. If any citizens of those cities which are separating from his kingdom are with King Antiochus and within the borders of his kingdom, they shall all return to Apamea before a designated day; whatever persons from the kingdom of Antiochus are with the Romans or their allies shall have the right to depart or to remain; slaves, whether fugitives or prisoners of war, and whatever freemen there are, whether prisoners of war or deserters, he shall turn over to the Romans and their allies. He shall surrender all his elephants and shall acquire no more. He shall surrender also his warships and their rigging, and he shall have not more than ten decked ships nor more than ten merchant vessels,[1] nor shall any of these be propelled by more than thirty oars, nor shall he have a ship of one bank for a war in which he himself shall be the aggressor. He shall not sail beyond the promontories of Calycadnus and Sarpedon, unless a ship is carrying payments of tribute or ambassadors or hostages. King Antiochus shall not be authorized to hire soldiers from those peoples which are under the control of the Roman people, nor even to accept volunteers therefrom. If the Rhodians or the allies

I have assumed in the translation, though I have not ventured to include it in the text, that this numeral was decem: anything is a guess, since Polybius mentions neither the actuariae nor the moneris. The restriction on moneres should apply equally to such actuariae as could easily be adapted to military uses, so that there may be more corruption in both Livy and Polybius than has been recognized.

aedes aedificiaque intra fines regni Antiochi sunt, quo iure ante bellum fuerunt, eo Rhodiorum sociorum-12 ve sunto; si quae pecuniae debentur, earum exactio esto; si quid ablatum est, id conquirendi cognoscendi repetendique item ius esto. Si quas urbes quas tradi oportet ii tenent, quibus Antiochus dedit, et ex iis praesidia deducito, utique recte tradantur,[1] curato.
13 Argenti probi talenta Attica duodecim milia dato intra duodecim annos pensionibus aequis—talentum ne minus pondo[2] octoginta[3] Romanis ponderibus pendat—et tritici quingenta quadraginta milia 14 modium. Eumeni regi talenta trecenta quinquaginta intra quinquennium dato, et pro frumento quod aestimatione fit talenta centum viginti septem.
15 Obsides Romanis viginti dato et triennio mutato, ne minores octonum denum annorum neu maiores 16 quinum quadragenum. Si qui sociorum populi Romani ultro bellum inferent[4] Antiocho, vim vi arcendi ius esto, dum ne quam urbem aut belli iure 17 teneat aut in amicitiam accipiat. Controversias inter se iure ac iudicio disceptanto,[5] aut, si utrisque place-

[1] tradantur $\bar{\gamma}$: tradatur B.
[2] pondo $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[3] octoginta $\bar{\gamma}$: LLXXX B.
[4] inferent $\bar{\gamma}$: inferrent B.
[5] disceptanto J. F. Gronovius : disceptent $B\bar{\gamma}$.

---

[1] These provisions are probably included to protect existing rights of individuals under private law.

[2] The demand of Scipio (XXXVII. xlv. 14) was expressed in the equivalent Euboean currency. One-fifth of the sum had already been paid, and this clause mentions only the instalments still due.

[3] Polybius (XXII. xxvi) gives the figure more exactly as one hundred and twenty-seven talents and twelve hundred own any houses or buildings within the boundaries of B.C. 188

the kingdom of Antiochus, they shall belong to the Rhodians or the allies on the same basis as before the war; if any moneys are due, the right to collect them shall exist; if anything has been taken away, the right shall likewise exist to search for, identify and recover it.[1] If any cities which should be surrendered are held by persons to whom Antiochus has entrusted them, he shall withdraw his garrisons from them and shall see that they are duly surrendered. He shall pay twelve thousand Attic talents [2] of tested silver within twelve years in equal instalments—with the proviso that the talent shall not weigh less than eighty Roman pounds—and five hundred and forty thousand modii of wheat. He shall pay to King Eumenes three hundred and fifty talents within five years, and in commutation for the grain, on his own valuation, one hundred and twenty-seven talents.[3] He shall give the Romans twenty hostages and shall change them triennially, provided that none of them shall be younger than eighteen years nor older than forty-five years. If any of the allies of the Roman people shall without provocation make war upon Antiochus, he shall have the right to oppose force with force, provided that he shall neither hold any city under the law of war nor receive any into friendship. They shall settle disputes between them by law and legal formula,[4] or, if both states shall desire, by war."

and eight drachmae, adding that Antiochus had proposed and Eumenes had agreed to accept this sum in full payment. In XXXVII. xlv. 16 Scipio had insisted on the payment of the grain which was due to Attalus, but both parties have now agreed on compensation in cash.

[4] The clause is borrowed from the Roman ius civile.

B.C. 18 bit, bello." De Hannibale Poeno et Aetolo Thoante 66 et Mnasilocho [1] Acarnane et Chalcidensibus Eubulida et Philone dedendis in hoc quoque foedere adscriptum est et ut, si quid postea addi demi mutarive placuisset, ut id salvo foedere fieret.

XXXIX. Consul in hoc foedus iuravit; ab rege qui exigerent [2] iusiurandum, profecti Q. Minucius Thermus et L. Manlius, qui tum forte ab Oroandis
2 rediit. Et Q. Fabio Labeoni qui classi praeerat [3] scripsit, ut Patara extemplo proficisceretur, quaeque ibi naves regiae essent concideret cremaretque.
3 Profectus ab Epheso quinquaginta tectas naves aut concidit aut incendit. Telmessum eadem expeditione territis subito adventu classis oppidanis recipit.
4 Ex Lycia protinus, iussis ab Epheso sequi qui ibi relicti erant per insulas in Graeciam traiecit. Athenis paucos moratus dies, dum Piraeum ab Epheso naves venirent, totam inde classem in Italiam reduxit.
5 Cn. Manlius cum inter cetera quae accipienda ab Antiocho erant elephantos quoque accepisset donoque Eumeni omnes dedisset,[4] causas deinde civita-
6 tium, multis inter novas res turbatis, cognovit. Et Ariarathes rex parte dimidia pecuniae imperatae beneficio Eumenis, cui desponderat per eos dies filiam,
7 remissa [5] in amicitiam est acceptus. Civitatium autem

[1] Mnasilocho Drakenborch: milunosymacho B.
[2] exigerent $\bar{r}$: exigeret B.
[3] praeerat $\bar{r}$: praeerant B.
[4] dedisset $\bar{r}$: dedisset et B.
[5] remissa ed. Frobeniana 1535: demissam B: dimissa $\bar{r}$.

[1] Polybius names these men in the clause which Livy quotes as sect. 7 above: cf. XXXVII. xlv. 16–17.
[2] Polybius requires the consent of both parties to such amendments.
[3] Cf. XXXVII. lx.

With regard to the surrender of Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Aetolian and Mnasilochus the Acarnanian and Eubulidas and Philo the Chalcidians,[1] there was a clause in this treaty too, and another to the effect that whatever in future it should seem desirable to add, take away, or modify, could be so altered without invalidating the treaty.[2] B.C. 188

XXXIX. The consul swore to observe this treaty; to secure the oath from the king, Quintus Minucius Thermus was sent and Lucius Manlius, who chanced at that time to return from Oroanda. He wrote also to Quintus Fabius Labeo, who was in command of the fleet,[3] to proceed at once to Patara and to destroy and burn the ships of the king that were there. Setting out from Ephesus, he either wrecked or burned fifty decked ships. Telmessus, since the townspeople were alarmed at the unexpected appearance of the fleet, was recovered on the same expedition. From Lycia, ordering the ships which had been left at Ephesus to follow from there, Labeo crossed straight to Greece by way of the islands. Delaying a few days at Athens, until the ships from Ephesus should reach Piraeus, he conducted the entire fleet from there to Italy.

When Gnaeus Manlius, among the other things which were to be received from Antiochus, had received the elephants also and had presented them all to Eumenes as a gift, he next investigated the affairs of the cities, since many were in confusion in consequence of the changes. And King Ariarathes, half of the money which had been demanded of him having been remitted through the good offices of Eumenes, to whom he had about this time betrothed his daughter, was received into friendship. The ten cognitis causis decem legati aliam aliarum fecerunt condicionem. Quae stipendiariae regi Antiocho fuerant et cum populo Romano senserant, iis im-8 munitatem dederunt: quae partium Antiochi fuerant aut stipendiariae Attali regis, eas omnes vectigal pendere Eumeni iusserunt. Nominatim praeterea Colophoniis, qui in Notio habitant, et Cymaeis et 9 Mylasenis immunitatem concesserunt; Clazomeniis super immunitatem et Drymussam insulam dono dederunt, et Milesiis quem sacrum appellant agrum

10 restituerunt, et Iliensibus Rhoeteum et Gergithum addiderunt, non tam ob recentia ulla merita quam originum memoria. Eadem at Dardanum liberandi 11 causa fuit. Chios quoque et Zmyrnaeos et Erythraeos, pro singulari fide quam eo bello praestiterunt, et agro donarunt et in omni praecipuo honore habuerunt.
12 Phocaeensibus et ager quem ante bellum habuerant redditus, et ut legibus antiquis uterentur permissum.
13 Rhodiis affirmata quae data priore decreto erant; Lycia et Caria datae usque ad Maeandrum amnem
14 praeter Telmessum. Regi Eumeni Chersonesum in Europa et Lysimachiam, castella vicos agrum quibus
15 finibus tenuerat Antiochus, adiecerunt; in Asia Phrygiam utramque—alteram ad Hellespontum, maiorem alteram vocant—et Mysiam, quam Prusia
16 rex ademerat, ei[1] restituerunt, et Lycaoniam et Milyada et Lydiam et nominatim urbes Tralles

[1] ei ed. Frobeniana 1535 : et B.

[1] Cf. XXXVII. xxvi. 5–6.

commissioners, having looked into the situation of the cities, made different dispositions in different cases. Those which had been tributaries to King Antiochus but had sided with the Roman people were granted freedom from taxation; those which had been partisans of Antiochus or tributaries to King Attalus were all ordered to pay tribute to Eumenes. In addition, they granted freedom from taxation expressly to the Colophonians who live in Notium,[1] to the Cymaeans and the Mylasenians; to the Clazomenians, in addition to immunity, they gave the island of Drymussa as a gift, and to the Milesians they restored what they call the "sacred land," and to the people of Ilium they added Rhoeteum and Gergithus, less as a reward for recent services than in recognition of their descent. This was also the reason for liberating Dardanus. The Chians, Zmyrnaeans and Erythraeans, because of the extraordinary loyalty they had displayed in the war, were rewarded with lands and in addition were treated with every mark of honour. To the Phocaeans they both gave back the lands which they had held before the war and permitted them to live under their ancient laws. The Rhodians were confirmed in the possession of what had been given them by the earlier decree; they received Lycia and Caria as far as the Meander river with the exception of Telmessus. Upon King Eumenes they bestowed, in Europe, the Chersonesus and Lysimachia, the strongholds, villages and lands within the boundaries of Antiochus; in Asia, both Phrygias—the one on the Hellespont, the other which they call the Greater; and they gave back to him Mysia, which King Prusias had taken from him, and Lycaonia and Milyas and Lydia and expressly B.C. 188

c. 17 atque Ephesum et Telmessum. De Pamphylia disceptatum inter Eumenem et Antiochi legatos cum esset, quia pars eius citra pars ultra [1] Taurum est, integra res [2] ad senatum reicitur.

XL. His foederibus decretisque datis Manlius cum decem legatis omnique exercitu ad Hellespontum profectus, evocatis eo regulis Gallorum, leges quibus 2 pacem cum Eumene servarent dixit, denuntiavit ut morem [3] vagandi cum armis finirent agrorumque suo- 3 rum terminis se continerent. Contractis deinde ex omni ora navibus et Eumenis etiam classe per [4] Athenaeum fratrem regis ab Elaea adducta copias omnes 4 in Europam traiecit. Inde per Chersonesum modicis [5] itineribus grave praeda omnis generis agmen trahens Lysimachiae stativa habuit, ut quam maxime recentibus et integris iumentis Thraeciam, per 5 quam iter vulgo horrebant, ingrederetur. Quo profectus est ab Lysimachia die ad amnem Melana 6 quem vocant, inde postero die Cypsela pervenit. A

[1] pars ultra σ : par lustrato B.
[2] integra res ed. Frobeniana 1531 : integra *B*σ.
[3] morem σ : mores B.
[4] classe per σ : classe iper B. [5] modicis σ : om. B.

[1] Polybius (XXII. xxix) seems to think that the dispute concerned all Pamphylia, not regarding it, as Livy does, as cut in two by the range. It is evident that not even the commissioners, while on the spot, could tell where the western end of the Taurus chain was situated, and one does not see how the senate could be expected to determine that geographical fact. The incident shows how indistinct was the boundary established by the treaty : cf. the note to xxxviii. 4 above. In XLIV. xiv. 3 Pamphylia seems to be free, but otherwise there is no indication of the senate's decision.

With the chapters which deal with the treaty and with the settlement of Asia XXXVII. xlv. and lv.–lvi. should be read.

the cities of Tralles and Ephesus and Telmessus. B.C. 1
When a dispute over Pamphylia broke out between Eumenes and the ambassadors of Antiochus, because part of it was on this side of Taurus and part on the other,[1] the whole question was referred to the senate.

XL. Having published these treaties and decrees, Manlius with the ten commissioners and all the army set out for the Hellespont, summoning thither the chiefs of the Gauls, and stated the terms on which they should observe peace with Eumenes,[2] and warned them that they should discontinue their habit of wandering about under arms and should keep themselves within the boundaries of their own lands. Then, collecting ships from the whole Chersonese coast, the fleet of Eumenes also being brought up from Elaea by his brother Athenaeus, he ferried all his forces across to Europe.[3] Thence by short stages, leading a column heavily laden with every sort of booty, he established a base at Lysimachia, in order that with his pack-animals as far as possible fresh and in good condition he might enter Thrace, the journey through which was generally feared. On the day of his departure from Lysimachia he reached the river called Melas and on the day after that Cypsela. From Cypsela

[2] The legal jurisdiction of either Manlius or the legati is not clear. Rome acquired no territory from the Galatians and recognized no Galatian interest in the treaty with Antiochus. Nevertheless, Rome had a moral responsibility for all Asia and particularly for the kingdom of Eumenes, the nearest neighbour and the traditional enemy of the Galatians.

[3] Appian (Syr. 43), who abridges the account of the return journey of Manlius, criticizes severely the decision to return by land rather than by sea, and emphasizes the services rendered to Scipio by Philip (XXXVII. vii. 16).

Cypselis via decem milium fere silvestris angusta confragosa excipiebat, propter cuius difficultatem itineris in duas partes divisus exercitus, et praecedere una iussa, altera, magno intervallo cogere agmen, media impedimenta interposuit: plaustra cum 7 pecunia publica erant pretiosaque alia praeda. Ita cum per saltum iret, Thraecum decem haud amplius milia ex quattuor populis, Astii et Caeni et Maduateni et Coreli, ad ipsas angustias viam circumse-
8 derunt. Opinio erat non sine Philippi Macedonum regis fraude id factum: eum scisse non alia quam per Thraeciam redituros Romanos, et quantam pecu-
9 niam secum portarent. In primo agmine imperator erat, sollicitus propter iniquitatem locorum. Thraeces nihil se moverunt donec armati transirent;
10 postquam primos superasse angustias viderunt, postremos [1] nondum appropinquantes, impedimenta et sarcinas invadunt, caesisque custodibus partim ea quae in plaustris erant diripere, partim sub oneri-
11 bus iumenta abstrahere. Unde postquam clamor primum ad eos, qui iam ingressi saltum sequebantur, deinde etiam ad primum agmen est perlatus, utrimque in medium concurritur, et inordinatum pluribus 12 simul locis proelium conseritur. Thraecas praeda ipsa impeditos oneribus et plerosque, ut ad rapiendum vacuas manus haberent, inermes ad caedem praebet; [2] Romanos iniquitas locorum barbaris per calles notas

[1] postremos σ: supremos B.
[2] praebet σ: praebent B.

---

[1] It was the Thracian plan to let the van go through, block the road so that the van could not get back, and then attack the baggage.

a road awaited him, for about ten miles wooded, B.C. 188 narrow, rough, and by reason of the difficulty of this route he divided the army into two sections, and, having ordered one to go ahead and the other to bring up the rear at a great distance, he placed the baggage between them; there were carts loaded with public money and other valuable booty. As they were marching in this order through the defile, not more than ten thousand Thracians, of four tribes, the Astii and the Caeni and the Maduateni and the Coreli, blocked the road at the narrow point.[1] It was generally believed that this did not happen without treachery on the part of Philip, king of the Macedonians; he knew that the Romans would return by no other route than through Thrace, and he knew how much money they would bring with them. The commander was with the van, being concerned about the unfavourable character of the terrain. The Thracians did not move until the armed troops were past; when they saw that the van was out of the defile and that the rear was not yet at hand, they fell upon the trains and the baggage, and having killed the guards some of them carried off what was in the wagons, others drove off the pack-animals, loads and all. When the uproar reached first those who were following and just entering the defile and then came to the head of the column, there was a rush from both directions towards the centre, and a disorderly battle began in several places at once. The Thracians were exposed to slaughter, hampered as they were by the burden of the booty itself, while many of them were without arms, in order that they might keep their hands free to plunder; the Romans were betrayed by the unfavourable ground, since the barbarians

r.c. occursantibus et latentibus interdum per[1] cavas
66 13 valles prodebat. Ipsa etiam onera plaustraque, ut fors tulit, his aut illis incommode obiecta pugnantibus impedimento sunt. Alibi praedo alibi praedae 14 vindex cadit. Prout locus iniquus aequusve[2] his aut illis, prout animus pugnantium est, prout numerus —alii enim pluribus, quam ipsi erant, alii pauciori-bus occurrerant—varia fortuna pugnae est; multi 15 utrimque cadunt. Iam nox appetebat, cum proelio excedunt Thraeces, non fuga vulnerum aut mortis, sed quia satis praedae habebant.

XLI. Romanorum primum agmen extra saltum circa templum Bendidium castra loco aperto posuit; pars altera ad custodiam impedimentorum medio in 2 saltu, duplici circumdato vallo, mansit. Postero die prius explorato saltu quam moverent primis se con-
3 iungunt. In eo proelio cum et impedimentorum et calonum pars et[3] milites aliquot, cum passim toto prope saltu pugnaretur, cecidissent, plurimum[4] Q. Minucii Thermi morte damni[5] est acceptum,
4 fortis ac strenui viri. Eo die ad Hebrum flumen perventum est. Inde Aeniorum fines praeter Apollinis Zerynthium quem vocant incolae templum
5 superant. Aliae angustiae circa Tempyra excipiunt —hoc loco nomen est—nec minus confragosae quam priores; sed, quia nihil silvestre circa est, ne

[1] per $\bar{r}$: et B. [2] aequusue $\bar{r}$: aequusque B.
[3] et $\bar{r}$: om. B. [4] plurimum $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[5] damni ed. Frobeniana 1535 : amissum $B\bar{r}$.

---

[1] Livy does not commit himself with regard to this battle. For the contradictory accounts of it, cf. xlvii. 6–9 with xlix. 7–12 below.

[2] A native divinity identified with Artemis or with Cybele.

charged them over familiar paths and sometimes laid B.C. 188 ambushes for them in low-lying valleys. Even the loads and the wagons, inconveniently placed for one side or the other, as chance determined, hindered the fighters. Here the plunderer fell, there the defender of the plunder. Just as the terrain was unfavourable or favourable for one party or the other, just as the spirits of the fighters varied, just as their numbers—for some met parties larger than their own and others smaller—just so the fortune of the battle changed; many fell on both sides. Night was now at hand when the Thracians retired from the fight, not to avoid wounds or death, but because they had enough of spoils.[1]

XLI. The head of the Roman column encamped outside the defile near the temple of Bendis [2] on open ground; the rest remained within the defile to guard the trains, sheltered by a double rampart. The following day, having reconnoitred the defile before they moved, they joined the van. In this battle there was a loss both of baggage and of camp-followers and a considerable number of soldiers had fallen, since there was fighting everywhere along the whole defile, but the most serious blow received was the death of Quintus Minucius Thermus, a man of courage and energy.[3] That day they reached the Hebrus river. Then they crossed the frontiers of the Aenians near the temple of Apollo, whom the natives call Zerynthius. Another pass confronted them near Tempyra—this is the name of the place—not less rough than the former; but, because there is no wooded country around it, it does not furnish

[3] He had been consul in 193 B.C. and was one of the ten commissioners.

6 latebras quidem ad insidiandum praebent. Huc[1] ad eandem spem praedae Thrausi, gens et ipsa Thraecum, convenere; sed, quia nudae valles procul ut[2] conspicerentur angustias obsidentes efficiebant, minus terroris tumultusque fuit apud Romanos; quippe etsi iniquo loco, proelio tamen iusto, acie 7 aperta, signis collatis dimicandum erat. Conferti subeunt et cum clamore impetu facto primum expulere loco hostes, deinde avertere; fuga inde caedesque suis ipsos impedientibus angustiis fieri 8 coepta est. Romani victores ad vicum Maronitarum—Salen appellant—posuerunt castra.[3] Postero die patenti itinere Priaticus campus eos excepit, triduumque ibi frumentum accipientes manserunt, partem ex agris Maronitarum, conferentibus ipsis, partem ex navibus suis, quae cum 9 omnis generis commeatu sequebantur. Ab stativis 10 diei via Apolloniam fuit. Hinc per Abderitarum agrum Neapolim perventum est. Hoc omne per Graecorum colonias pacatum iter fuit; reliquum inde per medios Thraecas dies noctesque, etsi non infestum, tamen suspectum, donec in Macedoniam 11 pervenerunt. Mitiores Thraecas idem exercitus, cum a Scipione eadem via duceretur, habuerat, nullam ob aliam causam quam quod praedae minus 12 quod peteretur fuerat: quamquam tunc quoque Claudius auctor est ad quindecim milia Thraecum

[1] huc $\bar{r}$: hoc B.
[2] ut $\bar{r}$: om. B.
[3] posuerunt castra $\bar{r}$: om. B.

---

[1] The modern Cavalla.
[2] Philip received the credit for this in XXXVII. vii. 16.

even hiding-places for ambuscades. The Thrausi, B.C. 188 these too being Thracians, assembled here with the same hope of plunder; but, since the exposed valleys brought it about that those who blocked the pass could be seen from afar, there was less consternation and confusion among the Romans; indeed, although on uneven ground, there was none the less a pitched battle to be fought, a regular engagement with battle-lines open to view. They moved forward in close array, and charging with a shout they first dislodged the enemy and then broke their line; then flight and slaughter began to take place, since the enemy were entangled in the narrow pass which they had themselves selected. The victorious Romans encamped near a village of the Maroneans—they call it Salê. The next day, marching in open country, the Priatic plain received them, and they spent three days there collecting grain, partly from the fields of the Maroneans, brought in by the people themselves, partly from their own ships, which were following with all manner of supplies. From this station it was a day's march to Apollonia. Thence they came through the country of the Abderites to Neapolis.[1] All this journey was peaceful, amid the colonies of Greeks; the rest from there on, through the midst of the Thracians, while not dangerous, yet required vigilance by day and night until they arrived in Macedonia. The same army, led over the same route by Scipio, had found the Thracians more peacefully inclined, for no other reason than that there was less of booty to be sought;[2] and yet Claudius[3] asserts that even then about fifteen thousand Thracians enpraecedenti ad exploranda loca agmen Muttini Numidae occurrisse. Quadringentos equites fuisse 13 Numidas, paucos elephantos; Muttinis filium per medios hostes cum centum quinquaginta [1] delectis equitibus [2] perrupisse; eundem mox, cum iam Muttines in medio elephantis locatis, in cornua equitibus dispositis manum cum hoste conseruisset, 14 terrorem ab tergo praebuisse, atque inde turbatos equestri velut procella hostes ad peditum agmen non 15 accessisse. Cn. Manlius per Macedoniam in Thessaliam exercitum traduxit. Inde per Epirum Apolloniam cum pervenisset, nondum adeo hiberno contempto mari ut traicere auderet, Apolloniae hibernavit.

[3] Perhaps Livy had not read the account of Claudius when he wrote XXXVII. vii. 16 and xxxiii.

XLII. Exitu prope anni M. Valerius consul ex Liguribus ad magistratus subrogandos Romam venit nulla memorabili in provincia gesta re, ut ea probabilis morae causa esset quod solito serius ad comitia 2 venisset. Comitia consulibus rogandis fuerunt a. d.[3] XII. Kal. Martias; creati M. Aemilius Lepidus C. 3 Flaminius. Postero die praetores facti Ap. Claudius 4 Pulcher Ser. Sulpicius Galba Q. Terentius Culleo L. Terentius Massiliota Q. Fulvius Flaccus M. 5 Furius Crassipes. Comitiis perfectis [4] quas provincias praetoribus esse placeret retulit ad senatum consul. Decreverunt duas Romae iuris dicendi

[1] quinquaginta $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[2] equitibus edd. vett.: peditibus $B\bar{\gamma}$.
[3] diem $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[4] perfectis $\bar{\gamma}$: persecutis B.

countered Muttines the Numidian who was preceding the column to reconnoitre. He says that there were four hundred Numidian cavalry with a few elephants; that the son of Muttines with a hundred and fifty picked troopers broke through the centre of the enemy; and that a little later, when Muttines, having placed the elephants in the centre and stationed the cavalry on the flanks, had closed with the enemy, this same son had caused panic by an attack in the rear, and that the enemy, thrown into confusion by this cavalry-storm, so to speak, had not reached the column of the infantry. Gnaeus Manlius led the army through Macedonia into Thrace. When he had proceeded from there through Epirus to Apollonia, not yet holding the wintry sea in such light esteem that he dared to cross it, he passed the winter in Apollonia. B.C. 188

XLII. At almost the end of this year the consul Marcus Valerius came from the Ligurians to Rome to hold the elections of magistrates, having done nothing in the province so worthy of note that it could be a plausible reason for delay, to cause him to arrive later than usual for the elections. The election of consuls took place on the twelfth day before the Kalends of March; the successful candidates were Marcus Aemilius Lepidus and Gaius Flaminius. The next day the praetors were chosen, Appius Claudius Pulcher, Servius Sulpicius Galba, Quintus Terentius Culleo, Lucius Terentius Massiliota, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, Marcus Furius Crassipes. Having finished the elections, the consul referred to the senate the question as to which provinces they desired to assign to the praetors. They decreed that two should be stationed in Rome to

c. 6 causa, duas extra Italiam, Siciliam ac Sardiniam, duas 6 in Italia, Tarentum et Galliam; et extemplo, priusquam inirent magistratum, sortiri iussi. Ser. Sulpicius urbanam, Q. Terentius peregrinam est sortitus, L. Terentius Siciliam, Q. Fulvius Sardiniam, Ap. Claudius Tarentum, M. Furius Galliam.

7 Eo anno L. Minucius Myrtilus et L. Manlius, quod legatos Carthaginienses pulsasse dicebantur, iussu M. Claudii praetoris urbani[1] per fetiales traditi sunt legatis et Carthaginem avecti.

c. 7 8 In Liguribus magni belli et gliscentis in dies magis fama erat. Itaque consulibus novis, quo die de provinciis et de re publica retulerunt, senatus 9 utrisque Ligures provinciam decrevit. Huic senatus consulto Lepidus consul intercedebat, indignum esse praedicans consules ambos in valles Ligurum includi, 10 M. Fulvium et Cn. Manlium biennium iam, alterum in Europa, alterum in Asia, velut pro Philippo atque Antiocho substitutos regnare. Si exercitus in his terris esse placeat, consules iis potius quam privatos 11 praeesse oportere. Vagari eos cum belli terrore per nationes, quibus bellum indictum non sit, pacem

[1] urbani ϝ : urbis B.

---

[1] The whole procedure is irregular, probably because the elections were held less than a month before the inauguration.

[2] Claudius probably acted under instructions from the senate. Valerius Maximus (VI. vi. 3), who cites this incident as an example of publica fides, dates it a year later.

[3] Lepidus raises an important constitutional question, not to be easily answered, whether a magistrate could hold his imperium indefinitely, i.e. until he was relieved. The imperium of Fulvius and Manlius had been prorogued for one year (xxxv. 3 above), and this period was now at an end. Another question which he raises is whether a proconsul administer justice, two outside Italy, in Sicily and Sardinia, and two in Italy, at Tarentum and in Gaul;[1] and they were ordered to cast lots at once, before they were inaugurated. Servius Sulpicius received the civil jurisdiction, Quintus Terentius that between citizens and aliens, Lucius Terentius Sicily, Quintus Fulvius Sardinia, Appius Claudius Tarentum, Marcus Furius Gaul. B.C. 188

In that year Lucius Minucius Myrtilus and Lucius Manlius, because they were said to have beaten Carthaginian ambassadors, by order of Marcus Claudius, the city praetor, were delivered by the fetials to ambassadors and taken to Carthage.[2]

There was the rumour of a great war, growing more dangerous every day, among the Ligurians. So, on the day when the new consuls laid before the senate the question of the provinces and the general policy, the senate decreed to both consuls the Ligurians as their province. To this decree of the senate the consul Lepidus objected, declaring that it was improper that both the consuls should be shut up in the valleys of the Ligurians while Marcus Fulvius and Gnaeus Manlius for two years now, the one in Europe, the other in Asia, were lording it as if they were the successors to Philip and Antiochus. If it were the senate's pleasure that there should be armies in those lands, consuls rather than private citizens[3] should command them. These men were wandering about, carrying the threat of war to nations upon whom no war had been declared, selling peace for a B.C. 187 was technically a privatus in the sense that Scipio, for example, was privatus cum imperio in Spain. Unfortunately, Lepidus is too much influenced by his feud with Fulvius to be a good witness on either point.

pretio venditantes. Si eas provincias exercitibus obtinere opus esset, sicut M'. Acilio L. Scipio consul, L. Scipioni M. Fulvius et Cn. Manlius successissent 12 consules, ita Fulvio Manlioque C. Livium et M. Valerium consules debuisse succedere. Nunc certe, perfecto Aetolico bello, recepta ab Antiocho Asia, devictis Gallis, aut consules ad exercitus consulares mitti aut reportari legiones inde reddique tandem rei 13 publicae debere. Senatus his auditis in sententia perseveravit ut consulibus ambobus Ligures provincia esset: Manlium Fulviumque decedere de provinciis et exercitus inde deducere [1] ac redire Romam placuit.

XLIII. Inimicitiae inter M. Fulvium et M. Aemilium consulem erant, et super cetera Aemilius serius biennio se consulem factum M. Fulvii opera
2 ducebat. Itaque ad invidiam ei faciendam legatos Ambracienses in senatum subornatos criminibus introduxit, qui sibi, cum in pace essent imperataque prioribus consulibus fecissent et eadem oboedienter
3 praestare M. Fulvio parati essent, bellum illatum questi, agros primum [2] depopulatos, terrorem direp-

[1] de—deducere $\bar{r}$: om. B. [2] primum $\bar{r}$: om. B.

---

[1] Manlius, rather than Fulvius, was guilty of this conduct, and the narrative of the Galatian campaign (xii–xxvii above; see also the notes, passim) gives altogether too much support to these charges. They were elaborated by Furius and Aemilius Paulus in chaps. xlv–xlvi below.

[2] Fulvius had presided at the election of his own colleague in the peculiar election for 189 B.C. (XXXVII. xlvii. 7) and at the election for 188 B.C. (xxxv. 1 above), and on both price.[1] If it was necessary, he continued, to hold B.C. 18

these provinces with troops, just as the consul Lucius Scipio had succeeded Manius Acilius and had in turn been superseded by the consuls Marcus Fulvius and Gnaeus Manlius, so Fulvius and Manlius should have been replaced by the consuls Gaius Livius and Marcus Valerius. Now, at any rate, when the Aetolian war was finished, when Asia was rescued from Antiochus, when the Gauls were conquered, either consuls should be sent to command consular armies or the legions should be recalled from there and at length restored to the state. After hearing this the senate persisted in its decision that both consuls should have the Ligurians as their province; it was voted that Manlius and Fulvius should retire from their provinces and withdraw their armies from them and return to Rome.

XLIII. There was a feud between Marcus Fulvius and the consul Marcus Aemilius, and, in addition to everything else, Aemilius considered that it was due to the efforts of Marcus Fulvius that he himself had reached the consulship two years late.[2] Therefore, with a view to making Fulvius unpopular, he introduced to the senate ambassadors of the Ambraciots, previously coached as to their charges, who were to complain that, while they were at peace and had performed the orders of the previous consuls and were ready to render the same obedience to Marcus Fulvius, war had been declared on them, and first their fields had been laid waste and fear of plunder occasions Aemilius was defeated. He had then some reason for blaming Fulvius particularly for his failures. However, the interval between his praetorship (191 B.C.) and his consulship was not unusually long for this period.

tionis et caedis urbi iectum, ut eo metu claudere 4 cogerentur portas; obsessos deinde et oppugnatos se et omnia exempla belli edita [1] in se caedibus incendiis ruinis direptione urbis, coniuges liberos in servitium 5 abstractos, bona adempta, et, quod se ante omnia moveat, templa tota urbe spoliata ornamentis; simulacra deum, deos immo ipsos, convulsos ex sedibus suis ablatos esse; parietes postesque nudatos quos ado-rent, ad quos precentur et supplicent, Ambraciensi-6 bus superesse: haec querentes interrogando criminose ex composito consul ad plura velut non sua sponte 7 dicenda eliciebat. Motis patribus alter consul C.
Flaminius M. Fulvii causam excepit, qui veterem
8 viam et obsoletam ingressos Ambracienses dixit; sic
M. Marcellum ab Syracusanis, sic Q. Fulvium a Campanis accusatos. Quin eadem opera T. Quinc-tium a Philippo rege, M'. Acilium et L. Scipionem ab Antiocho, Cn. Manlium a Gallis, ipsum M.
Fulvium ab Aetolis et Cephallaniae populis accusari 9 paterentur? "Ambraciam oppugnatam et cap-tam et signa inde ornamentaque ablata et cetera facta quae captis urbibus soleant, negaturum aut me pro M. Fulvio aut ipsum M. Fulvium censetis, 10 patres conscripti, qui ob has res gestas [2] triumphum

[1] edita ed. Parisina 1513 : habita $B\sigma$.
[2] res gestas σ : gestas res B.

---

[1] Cf. XXVI. xxx. 12.

and slaughter held before the city, so that they were B.C. 18 compelled by that fear to close their gates; that then they were beleaguered and besieged and that every form of war had been waged against them—slaughter, fires, destruction, plunder of the city; that their wives and children had been carried off into slavery, their property taken from them, and, what disturbed them most of all, the temples throughout the city had been stripped of their ornaments; the images of the gods, or rather the gods themselves, had been torn from their seats and carried away; bare walls and door-posts, they said, had been left to the Ambracians to adore, to pray to, and to supplicate: as they made these complaints the consul, asking leading questions as they had agreed, drew them on, as if against their will, to say even more. When the Fathers were aroused, the other consul, Gaius Flaminius, took up the cause of Marcus Fulvius, saying that the Ambraciots were following an old and long-abandoned path; thus Marcus Marcellus had been accused by the Syracusans, thus Quintus Fulvius by the Campanians.[1] Nay, would they permit similar accusations to be brought against Titus Quinctius by King Philip, against Manius Acilius and Lucius Scipio by Antiochus, against Gnaeus Manlius by the Gauls and even against Marcus Fulvius by the Aetolians and the peoples of Cephallania? "That Ambracia was besieged and captured and that its statues and works of art were removed from there and that other things were done which are usually done when cities are captured, do you think that either I on behalf of Marcus Fulvius or Marcus Fulvius on his own behalf will deny, conscript Fathers, since for these achievements he will

c. 7 a vobis postulaturus sit,[1] Ambraciam captam signaque quae ablata criminantur, et cetera spolia eius urbis ante currum laturus et fixurus in postibus suis? 11 Nihil est quod se ab Aetolis separent; eadem Ambra- 12 ciensium et Aetolorum causa est. Itaque collega meus vel in alia causa inimicitias exerceat vel, si in hac utique [2] mavult, retineat Ambracienses suos in 13 adventum M. Fulvii; ego nec de Ambraciensibus [3] nec de Aetolis decerni quicquam absente M. Fulvio patiar."

XLIV. Cum Aemilius callidam malitiam inimici velut notam omnibus insimularet et tempus eum morando extracturum diceret, ne consule inimico Romam veniret, certamine consulum biduum ab- 2 sumptum [4] est; nec praesente Flaminio decerni quic- 3 quam videbatur posse. Captata occasio est, cum aeger forte Flaminius abesset, et referente Aemilio 4 senatus consultum factum est ut Ambraciensibus suae res omnes redderentur; in libertate essent ac legibus suis uterentur; portoria quae [5] vellent terra marique caperent, dum eorum immunes Romani 5 ac socii nominis Latini essent; signa aliaque ornamenta, quae quererentur ex aedibus sacris sublata esse, de iis, cum M. Fulvius Romam revertisset, placere ad collegium pontificum referri, et quod ii cen- 6 suissent fieri. Neque his contentus consul fuit, sed

[1] postulaturus sit $\bar{\gamma}$: postulet B.
[2] utique $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[3] ambraciensibus $\bar{\gamma}$: ambracienses B.
[4] absumptum $\bar{\gamma}$: assumptum B.
[5] portoria quae ed. Parisina 1513 : portari ea quae $B\bar{\gamma}$.

[1] i.e. a representation of the captured city.

claim from you a triumph, the captured Ambracia[1] B.C. 1 and the statues which they accuse him of removing and the other spoils of that city will be carried before his chariot and fixed to his door-posts? There is no respect in which they can separate themselves from the Aetolians; the situation of Ambraciots and Aetolians is identical. Let my colleague, then, either expend his malice in some other case or, if he prefers to do so in this matter especially, let him keep his Ambraciots here until the arrival of Marcus Fulvius; I shall permit no decree to be passed concerning either the Ambraciots or the Aetolians in the absence of Marcus Fulvius."

XLIV. While Aemilius was thus assailing the shrewd hostility of his enemy as if known to all, and was claiming that Fulvius would drag out the time by delaying, that he might not come to Rome while his foe was consul, two days were wasted by the bickering of the consuls; and it seemed that no decree could be passed while Flaminius was present. Aemilius took advantage of an opportunity when Flaminius was kept away by illness, and on his motion the senate passed a decree that the Ambraciots should recover all their property; that they should be free and should enjoy their own laws; that they should collect port duties at their pleasure, by land and sea, provided that the Romans and the allies of the Latin confederacy should be exempt from paying them; that as to the statues and other works of art which they complained had been taken from their sacred shrines, when Marcus Fulvius had returned to Rome, the question concerning them should be referred to the college of pontiffs, and that whatever they should have ordered should be done. The consul was not postea per infrequentiam adiecit senatus consultum, Ambraciam vi captam esse non videri.

7 Supplicatio inde ex decemvirorum decreto pro valetudine populi per triduum fuit, quia gravis pesti-
8 lentia urbem atque agros vastabat. Latinae inde fuerunt. Quibus religionibus liberati consules et dilectu perfecto—novis enim uterque maluit uti militibus—in provinciam profecti sunt, veteresque omnes dimiserunt.

9 Post consulum profectionem Cn. Manlius proconsul Romam venit; cui cum ab Ser. Sulpicio prae-10 tore senatus ad aedem Bellonae datus esset, et ipse commemoratis rebus ab se gestis postulasset ut ob eas diis immortalibus honos haberetur sibique tri-11 umphanti urbem invehi liceret, contradixerunt pars maior decem legatorum qui cum eo fuerant, et ante alios L. Furius Purpurio et L. Aemilius Paulus.

XLV. Legatos sese Cn. Manlio datos pacis cum Antiocho faciendae causa foederisque legum quae cum L. Scipione inchoatae fuissent perficiendarum.
2 Cn. Manlium summa ope tetendisse ut eam pacem turbaret, et Antiochum, si sui potestatem fecisset, insidiis exciperet; sed illum cognita fraude consulis, cum saepe colloquiis petitis captatus esset, non

---

[1] This last charge has some substantiation (cf. ix. 9 above), and one wonders why it was not pressed. Cato emphasized it in his attacks on Fulvius (Gellius, V. vi. 25; Meyer, pp. 52–53). If it was true, the action of Fulvius was illegal.

[2] The commissioners could have had relations with Manlius only because he had succeeded to the tasks left unfinished by Scipio. According to xxxvii. 11 above they did not reach Asia until after the Galatian campaign was concluded, and they could have had no military duties as legati except on the return, although Manlius speaks of them as eye-witnesses of his victory (xlvii. 4 below).

satisfied with this, but later, in a sparsely attended meeting, added a decree of the senate, to the effect that it did not appear that Ambracia had been captured by force.[1] B.C. 187

Then a three-day period of prayer was proclaimed in accordance with a decree of the decemvirs for the health of the people, because a severe pestilence was wasting the City and the country districts. Next the Latin Festival was held. The consuls, released by these ceremonies and having finished the levy—for each of them preferred to employ new soldiers—departed to the province and discharged all the veterans.

After the departure of the consuls, Gnaeus Manlius the proconsul arrived in Rome; when an audience before the senate in the temple of Bellona had been granted him by the praetor Servius Sulpicius and he, after relating his exploits, had demanded that on account of them honour should be paid to the immortal gods and that he should be permitted to ride into the City in triumph, the majority of the ten commissioners who had been with him opposed it, and, beyond the rest, Lucius Furius Purpurio and Lucius Aemilius Paulus.

XLV. They said that the commissioners had been assigned to Gnaeus Manlius[2] for the purpose of making peace with Antiochus and of putting into final form the terms of the treaty which had been initiated by Lucius Scipio. Gnaeus Manlius, they said, had striven with all his might to break the peace and to take Antiochus by treachery, if the king should have given him any opportunity to do so; but he, being aware of the deceitfulness of the consul, although often approached with requests for conferences, had congressum modo sed conspectum etiam eius 3 vitasse. Cupientem transire Taurum aegre omnium legatorum precibus, ne carminibus Sibyllae praedictam superantibus terminos fatales cladem experiri vellet, retentum admosse tamen exercitum et prope in ipsis[1] iugis ad divortia aquarum castra posuisse.

4 Cum ibi nullam belli causam inveniret quiescentibus regiis, circumegisse[2] exercitum ad Gallograecos; 5 cui nationi non ex senatus auctoritate, non populi iussu[3] bellum illatum. Quod quem umquam de sua sententia facere[4] ausum? Antiochi Philippi Hanni-6 balis et Poenorum recentissima bella esse; de omnibus his consultum senatum, populum iussisse,[5] per[6] legatos ante res repetitas, postremo qui bellum indi-7 cerent, missos. "Quid[7] eorum, Cn. Manli, factum est, ut istud publicum populi Romani bellum et non tuum 8 privatum latrocinium ducamus? At eo[8] ipso conten-tus fuisti, recto itinere exercitum duxisti ad eos, quos 9 tibi hostes desumpseras; an per omnes amfractus viarum, cum ad bivia[9] consisteres ut, quo flexisset

[1] in ipsis Madvig: ipsis $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[2] circumegisse $\bar{\sigma}$: circumiecisse B.
[3] iussu $\bar{\sigma}$: iussum B.
[4] facere $\bar{\sigma}$: om. B.
[5] iussisse $\bar{\sigma}$: fuisse B.
[6] per Madvig: saepe $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[7] quid $\bar{\sigma}$: quod B.
[8] at eo ed. Frobeniana 1535: adeo $B\bar{\sigma}$.
[9] ad bivia ed. Frobeniana 1535: auia B: uia $\bar{\sigma}$.

[1] There seems to be no basis for either charge in the preceding narrative of Livy, but this may be due to his selection of sources.

[2] This may explain the rather aimless invasion of Pamphylia mentioned in xv. 5–6 above.

avoided, not merely a meeting with him, but even the B.C. 187 sight of him.[1] Manlius, they said, when he desired to cross the Taurus,[2] had with difficulty been held back by the pleas of all his lieutenants from trying to test the prediction of ruin found in the verses of the Sibyl[3] for those who crossed the fateful boundaries, but, none the less, had moved up the army and encamped near by on the very crest at the parting of the waters. Finding no pretext for war there, the king's forces remaining passive, he led the army around against the Galatians, a people against whom war had not been declared by the authority of the senate or the vote of the assembly.[4] Who, they asked, had ever ventured to do this on his own motion? The most recent wars were those with Antiochus, Philip, Hannibal and the Carthaginians; in all these cases the senate had passed decrees, the assembly had voted, restitution had previously been demanded by ambassadors, finally, delegates had been sent to declare war.[5] "Which of these things was done, Gnaeus Manlius, so that we can consider this a public war of the Roman people and not a private piratical expedition of your own? Were you even content with that and did you lead your army directly against those whom you had picked out to be your enemies? Or, moving by all the roundabout ways, stopping at [3] There seems to be no other allusion to this prophecy, but there may have been many such oracles in independent circulation and attributed to the Sibyl to increase their authority.

[4] The senate had foreseen the probability of a war with the Gauls (XXXVII. li. 10), but there is no record of a formal declaration of war or of the performance of the ceremonial acts mentioned in sect. 6 below.

[5] The speaker is describing the formal fetial procedure.

c.c. 67 agmen Attalus, Eumenis frater, eo consul mercennarius cum exercitu Romano sequereris, Pisidiae Lycaoniaeque et Phrygiae recessus omnes atque angulos peragrasti, stipem ab tyrannis castellanisque deviis colligens? Quid enim tibi cum Oroandis? Quid cum aliis aeque innoxiis populis?

10 "Bellum autem ipsum, cuius nomine triumphum
11 petis, quo modo gessisti? Loco aequo, tempore tuo pugnasti? Tu vero recte ut diis immortalibus honos habeatur postulas, primum quod pro temeritate imperatoris, nullo gentium iure bellum inferentis, poenas luere exercitum noluerunt; deinde quod beluas, non hostes nobis obiecerunt.

XLVI. "Nolite nomen tantum existimare mixtum[1] esse Gallograecorum: multo ante et corpora
2 et animi mixti ac vitiati sunt. An si illi Galli essent, cum[2] quibus miliens vario eventu in Italia pugnatum est, quantum in imperatore nostro fuit,
3 nuntius illinc[3] redisset?[4] Bis cum iis pugnatum est, bis loco iniquo subiit, in valle inferiore pedibus paene hostium aciem subiecit. Ut non tela ex superiore loco mitterent, sed corpora sua nuda
4 inicerent, obruere nos[5] potuerunt. Quid igitur incidit?[6] Magna fortuna populi Romani est, magnum et terribile nomen. Recenti ruina Hannibalis

[1] mixtum $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[2] cum $\bar{\gamma}$: om. B.
[3] nuntius illinc $\bar{\gamma}$: om., spat. rel., B.
[4] redisset $\bar{\gamma}$: credidisset B.
[5] nos $\bar{\gamma}$: non B.
[6] incidit $\bar{\gamma}$: inci (sic) B, post quod uocabulum subsidio huius codicis omnino caremus.

every cross-road, that, wherever Attalus, the brother B.C. 187 of Eumenes, turned his course, there you, a money-seeking consul, might follow with a Roman army, did you travel over all the nooks and corners of Pisidia and Lycaonia and Phrygia, exacting tribute from tyrants and commanders of out-of-the-way fortresses? What business did you have with the people of Oroanda? What with other equally innocent peoples?

"But the war proper, on account of which you ask a triumph, how did you conduct it? Did you fight on favourable ground, at a time selected by you? Rightly in truth do you demand that honour be paid to the immortal gods, first, because they refused to exact the penalty from the army for the rashness of the commander, who was waging war under no law of nations; second, because they confronted us with dumb animals, not enemies.

XLVI. "Do not think that only the name of the Gallogrecians is a mixture; long since both their bodies and their minds have been mixed and corrupted. Or if they were Gauls, with whom we have fought a thousand times in Italy with varying results, so far as the issue depended on our commander, would even a messenger have come back from there? Twice he engaged in battle with them, twice he attacked over unfavourable ground and placed his battle-line in a valley below the enemy and almost at their feet. Without hurling a weapon from their higher position, and merely flinging their naked bodies down, they could have overwhelmed us. What happened then? Great is the fortune of the Roman people, great and terrible is its name. By the recent overthrow of Hannibal, Philip, Antiochus,

Philippi Antiochi prope attoniti[1] erant. Tantae corporum moles fundis sagittisque in fugam consternatae sunt; gladius in acie cruentatus non est Gallico bello; velut avium examina ad crepitum primum missilium avolavere. At hercule iidem nos—monente fortuna quid, si hostem habuissemus, casurum fuisset—cum redeuntes in latrunculos Thraecas incidissemus, caesi, fugati, exuti impedimentis sumus. Q. Minucius Thermus, in quo haud paulo plus damni factum est quam si Cn. Manlius, cuius temeritate ea clades inciderat, perisset, cum multis viris fortibus cecidit; exercitus spolia regis Antiochi referens trifariam dissipatus, alibi primum, alibi postremum agmen, alibi impedimenta, inter vepres in latebris ferarum noctem unam delituit. Pro his triumphus petitur? Si nihil in Thraecia cladis ignominiaeque foret acceptum, de quibus hostibus triumphum peteres? De iis, ut opinor, quos tibi hostes senatus aut populus Romanus dedisset. Sic huic L. Scipioni, sic illi M'. Acilio de rege Antiocho, sic paulo ante T. Quinctio de rege Philippo, sic P. Africano de Hannibale et Poenis et Syphace triumphus datus. Et minima illa, cum iam senatus censuisset bellum,[2] quaesita tamen sunt, quibus nuntiandum esset: ipsis utique regibus nuntiaretur, an satis esset ad praesidium aliquod nuntiari? Vultis ergo

[1] attoniti $\bar{r}$: attonitae M.
[2] bellum ed. Frobeniana 1535: bella $\bar{r}$.

---

[1] The speaker contrasts the scrupulous care devoted to the fetial ritual, even in recent times (cf. XXXVI. iii. 9), with the omission thereof in this instance, since there had been no formal declaration of war.

they were well-nigh thunderstruck. Bodies of such B.C. 187 huge size were thrown into panic by sling-bullets and arrows; no sword was made bloody in combat in the Gallic war; like flocks of birds they flew away at the first whizzing of the missiles. But, by Hercules, we, the same Romans—Fortune reminding us what would have happened if we had had an enemy —when on our return we had fallen in with the Thracian brigands, were slaughtered, put to flight, robbed of our baggage. Quintus Minucius Thermus, in whose death we suffered a far greater loss than if Gnaeus Manlius, through whose rashness this defeat had come about, had fallen, was killed along with many brave men; the army which was bringing back the spoils of King Antiochus, scattered in three sections, the van in one place, the rear in another, the trains in a third, spent one night skulking in the lairs of beasts among the thickets. For such deeds is a triumph sought? If there had been no calamity and disgrace suffered in Thrace, over what foes would you seek a triumph? Over those, I suppose, whom the senate or the Roman people had assigned to you as enemies. This is how triumphs were granted to Lucius Scipio here and Manius Acilius yonder over King Antiochus, to Titus Quinctius not long ago over King Philip, to Publius Africanus over Hannibal and the Carthaginians and Syphax. And even after the senate had already voted for the war, the most unimportant matters none the less were inquired into to determine to whom it should be announced: should the declaration be given in any case to the kings themselves, or was it sufficient that the declaration be delivered at some military post?[1] Do you wish all these formalities to be violated and haec omnia pollui et confundi, tolli fetialia iura, 12 nullos esse fetiales? Fiat, pace deum dixerim, iactura religionis: oblivio deorum capiat pectora vestra; num senatum quoque de bello consuli non 13 placet? Non ad populum ferri velint iubeantne cum 14 Gallis bellum geri? Modo certe consules Graeciam atque Asiam volebant; tamen perseverantibus vobis Ligures provinciam decernere dicto audientes 15 fuerunt. Merito ergo a vobis prospere bello gesto triumphum petent, quibus auctoribus gesserunt."

XLVII. Talis oratio Furii et Aemilii fuit. Manlium in hunc maxime modum respondisse accepi: "Tribuni plebis antea solebant triumphum postu-
2 lantibus adversari, patres conscripti; quibus ego gratiam habeo quod seu mihi seu magnitudini rerum gestarum hoc dederunt, ut non solum silentio comprobarent honorem meum, sed referre etiam si opus
3 esset viderentur parati esse;[1] ex decem legatis, si diis placet, quod consilium dispensandae cohonestandaeque[2] victoriae imperatoribus maiores dederunt
4 nostri, adversarios habeo. L. Furius et L. Aemilius currum triumphalem me conscendere prohibent, coronam insignem capiti detrahunt, quos ego, si tribuni triumphare me prohiberent, testes citaturus
5 fui rerum a me gestarum. Nullius equidem invideo honori, patres conscripti;[3] vos[4] tribunos plebei

[1] esset vid. par. esse ed. Frobeniana 1535: esse uid. par. essent F.

[2] cohonestandaeque edd. vett.: honestandaeque F.

[3] patres conscripti (p. c.) ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. F.

[4] uos F: post M.

[1] Livy may have used a speech by one or the other of the two—there is no way to determine which—as the basis for his version of the dispute.

thrown into confusion, the fetial laws to be done away with and the fetials themselves abolished? Let there be (may I speak without offence to the gods) neglect of religious observances, let forgetfulness of the gods take possession of your hearts—is it your will that the senate should not be consulted about war? Or the motion put to the people whether they 'wish and order' war to be waged with the Gauls? Not long ago the consuls certainly wished for Greece and Asia; yet when you persisted in decreeing them the Ligurians as their province they obeyed. Justly, therefore, when they have waged successful war, will they ask a triumph from you by whose authority they have waged it." B.C. 187

XLVII. Such was the argument of Furius and Aemilius.[1] Manlius, I have heard, replied in about the following manner: "It was formerly the custom, conscript Fathers, that tribunes of the people should oppose candidates for triumphs; in this case I am grateful to them because they have conceded this much, whether to me or to the greatness of my achievements—that they do not merely by their silence approve my distinction but even seem ready to propose it if necessary; it is among the ten commissioners (heaven help us!), a council which our ancestors created for awarding victory and its honours to commanders, that I find my opponents. Lucius Furius and Lucius Aemilius forbid me to mount the triumphal car, they strip the garland of victory from my head, these men whom, if the tribunes were obstructing my triumph, I should have summoned as witnesses to what I have done. For my part, conscript Fathers, I grudge no man his distinction; when the tribunes of the people, brave nuper, viros fortes ac strenuos, impedientes Q. Fabii Labeonis triumphum auctoritate vestra deterruistis; triumphavit, quem non bellum iniustum 6 gessisse, sed hostem omnino non vidisse inimici iactabant: ego, qui cum centum milibus ferocissimorum hostium signis collatis totiens pugnavi, qui plus quadraginta milia hominum cepi aut occidi, qui bina castra eorum expugnavi, qui citra iuga Tauri omnia pacatiora quam terra Italia est reliqui, non 7 triumpho modo fraudor, sed causam apud vos, patres conscripti, accusantibus meis ipse legatis dico.

8 Duplex eorum, ut animadvertistis, patres conscripti, accusatio fuit: nam nec gerendum mihi fuisse bellum cum Gallis, et gestum temere atque imprudenter dixerunt. 'Non erant Galli hostes, sed tu eos pa-
9 catos imperata facientes violasti.' Non sum postulaturus a vobis, patres conscripti, ut quae communiter de immanitate gentis Gallorum, de infestissimo odio in nomen Romanum scitis, ea de illis quoque qui Asiam incolunt existimetis Gallis;
10 remota universae gentis infamia atque invidia per se ipsos aestimate. Utinam rex Eumenes, utinam Asiae omnes civitates adessent, et illos potius 11 querentes quam me accusantem audiretis. Mittite agedum legatos circa omnes Asiae [1] urbes et quaerite, utra graviori servitute, Antiocho ultra Tauri iuga

[1] omnes Asiae ed. Frobeniana 1535: asiam ad omnes ς.

[1] In XXXVII. lx. 6 Livy quoted Valerius Antias as the authority for this triumph and seemed to have no other information about it.

and energetic men, not long ago were opposing the B.C. 187 triumph of Quintus Fabius Labeo,[1] you checked them by your authority; he triumphed, although his enemies circulated the story, not that he had waged an illegal war, but that he had not set eyes on an enemy at all;[2] I who have so often fought with a hundred thousand of the fiercest enemies, who captured or killed more than forty thousand men, who took two of their camps, who left everything on this side of the ridges of Taurus more peaceful than is the land of Italy, am not only cheated out of my triumph but am pleading my case before you, conscript Fathers, with my own lieutenants as my accusers! Their charge, as you have observed, conscript Fathers, is twofold: for they said that I should not have waged war with the Gauls and that the war was conducted rashly and heedlessly. 'The Gauls,' they say, 'were not enemies, but you attacked them while they were peaceful and obedient to our orders.' I shall not ask you, conscript Fathers, to believe about those Gauls also who dwell in Asia what you know in general about the barbarous character of the people of the Gauls and their most deadly hatred of the name of Rome; setting aside the ill repute and ill fame of the race as a whole, judge them by themselves. Would that King Eumenes were here, would that all the cities of Asia were here, and that you could hear them complaining of rather than me accusing the Gauls. Come, send ambassadors around all the cities of Asia and ask them whether they were freed from a more grievous slavery when Antiochus was expelled beyond the [2] In XL. xxxviii. 9 the consuls of 181 B.C. are said to have been the first to triumph without having done any fighting.

r.c. 12 emoto [1] an Gallis subactis, liberati sint. Quotiens 67 agri eorum vastati sint, quotiens praedae abactae, referant,[2] cum vix redimendi captivos copia esset, et mactatas humanas hostias immolatosque liberos 13 suos audirent. Stipendium scitote pependisse socios vestros Gallis et nunc, liberatos per vos regio imperio, fuisse pensuros, si a me foret cessatum.

XLVIII. "Quo longius Antiochus emotus esset, hoc impotentius in Asia Galli dominarentur et, quidquid est terrarum citra Tauri iuga, Gallorum 2 imperio, non vestro adiecissetis. At enim sunt haec ita vera; sed [3] etiam Delphos quondam, commune humani generis oraculum, umbilicum orbis terrarum, Galli spoliaverunt, nec ideo populus 3 Romanus his bellum indixit aut intulit. Equidem aliquid interesse rebar inter id tempus, quo nondum in iure ac dicione vestra Graecia atque Asia erat, ad 4 curandum animadvertendumque quid in his terris fieret, et hoc quo finem imperii Romani Taurum montem statuistis, quo libertatem, immunitatem civitatibus datis, quo aliis fines adicitis, alias agro multatis, aliis [4] vectigal imponitis, regna augetis minuitis donatis adimitis, curae vestrae censetis
5 esse, ut pacem terra marique habeant. An nisi

[1] emoto ed. Frobeniana 1535 : moto σ.
[2] referant edd. vett. : referam σ.
[3] sed Madvig : om. σ.
[4] aliis ed. Frobeniana 1535 : om. σ.

[1] Manlius contrasts his own realistic and his opponents' legalistic points of view. He then renders the latter absurd by putting into the mouths of his opponents the argument ridges of Taurus or when the Gauls were subdued. B.C. 187

Let them tell you how often their fields were devastated, how often plunder was carried away, when they had barely the wealth to ransom their captives and kept hearing of human victims slain and their own children sacrificed. Know that your own allies had been paying tribute to the Gauls and even now, when liberated by you from the king's control, would still have been paying it if I had failed them.

XLVIII. "The farther Antiochus should be removed, the more uncontrollable would be the rule of the Gauls in Asia, and all the lands on this side of the ridges of Taurus you would have added to Gallic territory, not to your own. Grant, if you will, that what my opponents say is true; but even on one occasion,[1] Delphi, the common oracle of the human race, the navel of the world, the Gauls despoiled, and the Romans did not on that account declare or wage a war upon them. For my part, I thought that there was some difference between that time, when Greece and Asia were not yet under your control and sway, as regards your interest and concern in what was happening in those lands, and this time, when you have fixed the Taurus mountain as the boundary of the Roman empire, when you bestow liberty and immunity upon cities, increase the territory of some, deprive others of their lands, impose tribute upon others, enlarge, diminish, give, take away kingdoms, and deem it your responsibility that they shall have peace on land and sea. Or, that Rome did not even intervene to protect Delphi in 279 B.C. (sed etiam introduces a special case illustrating the general line of argument in ista). He refutes this imaginary argument by pointing out Rome's new position in the world.

praesidia deduxisset Antiochus, quae quieta in suis arcibus[1] erant, non putaretis liberatam Asiam; si Gallorum exercitus effusi vagarentur, rata dona vestra, quae dedistis, regi Eumeni, rata libertas 6 civitatibus esset? Sed quid ego haec ita argumentor, tamquam non acceperim, sed fecerim hostes Gallos? 7 Te, L. Scipio, appello, cuius ego mihi, succedens in vicem imperii tui, virtutem felicitatemque pariter non frustra ab diis immortalibus precatus sum, te, P. Scipio, qui legati ius, collegae maiestatem et apud fratrem consulem et apud exercitum habuisti, sciatisne in exercitu Antiochi Gallorum legiones 8 fuisse, videritis in acie eos, in cornu utroque—id enim roboris esse videbatur—locatos, pugnaveritis ut cum hostibus iustis, cecideritis, spolia eorum retu- 9 leritis. Atqui cum Antiocho, non cum Gallis bellum et[2] senatus decreverat et populus iusserat. Sed simul, ut opinor, cum his decreverant iusserantque 10 qui intra praesidia eius fuissent; ex quibus praeter Antiochum, cum quo pacem pepigerat Scipio, et cum quo nominatim foedus ut fieret mandaveratis, omnes hostes erant, qui pro Antiocho arma adversus 11 nos tulerunt. In qua causa cum Galli ante omnes

[1] arcibus ed. Froben. 1535 : partibus F.
[2] et F : om. M.

[1] Manlius omits, as damaging to his argument, the fact that some, at least, of these Gauls were mercenaries (XXXVII. xviii. 7).

[2] The phrase is curiously used. In XXXVII. xl. 3 the phalanx is called the strongest part of the army, and the meaning here may be simply that the Gauls were more valuable on the flanks than in the centre.

[3] The line of argument, not entirely free from fallacy, is briefly this: Rome had declared war on Antiochus and would have included his allies had she known in advance who they supposing that Antiochus had not withdrawn his B.C. 187 garrisons, which remained peacefully in their citadels, would you consider that Asia had not been set free; but, on the other hand, should the armies of the Gauls be wandering at will, would these gifts which you have presented to King Eumenes have been assured, would liberty have been assured to the cities? But why do I argue as if I had made the Gauls our enemies, not found them so? I appeal to you, Lucius Scipio (and when I succeeded to your authority I prayed to the immortal gods, and not in vain, for your valour and good fortune), to you, Publius Scipio, who had the rank of lieutenant but the authority of a colleague both with your brother the consul and with the army, to say whether you know that in the army of Antiochus there were legions of Gauls,[1] whether you saw them in the line of battle, stationed on both flanks—for this was their strength, as it seemed[2]—whether you fought with them as with lawful enemies, slew them, and carried off their spoils. But yet, they say, it was with Antiochus and not with the Gauls that both the senate had decreed and the assembly had ordered war. But at the same time, in my judgment, they had decreed and ordered war with those who were within his ranks; of those, with the exception of Antiochus, with whom Scipio had contracted a peace and with whom you had expressly ordered that a treaty be made, all were enemies who bore arms against us in the cause of Antiochus.[3] Although the Gauls would be; peace had been made with Antiochus but not with the allies, upon whom war had not been formally declared; Manlius, on succeeding Scipio, had inherited any unfinished business and therefore needed no new or specific declaration of war upon such allies.

fuissent et reguli quidam et tyranni, ego tamen et cum aliis, pro dignitate imperii vestri coactis luere peccata sua, pacem pepigi, et Gallorum animos si 12 possent mitigari a feritate insita temptavi et, postquam indomitos atque implacabiles cernebam, tum demum vi atque armis coercendos ratus sum.
13 " Nunc, quoniam suscepti belli purgatum est crimen, gesti reddenda est ratio. In quo confiderem equidem causae meae, etiam si non apud Romanum sed apud Carthaginiensem senatum agerem, ubi in crucem tolli imperatores dicuntur, si prospero eventu, 14 pravo consilio rem gesserunt; sed ego in ea civitate, quae ideo omnibus rebus incipiendis gerendisque deos adhibet, quia nullius [1] calumniae subicit ea quae dii comprobaverunt, et in sollemnibus verbis habet, cum supplicationem aut triumphum de-
15 cernit, 'quod bene ac feliciter rem publicam administrarit,' si nollem, si grave ac superbum existimarem virtute gloriari, si pro [2] felicitate mea exercitusque mei, quod tantam nationem sine ulla
16 militum iactura devicimus, postularem ut diis immortalibus honos haberetur et ipse triumphans in Capitolium ascenderem, unde votis rite nuncupatis

[1] nullius σ : nullus M.
[2] si pro Crévier : pro σ.

---

[1] Livy's narrative does not support this. The statement is broad enough and vague enough to permit Manlius to say that all the persons from whom he collected money came under this category.

[2] It suffices to compare luendamque pecunia noxam (xxxvii. 3 above).

before all were in this class and certain chiefs and B.C. 187 tyrants,[1] nevertheless I both negotiated for peace with the others, compelling them, in keeping with the dignity of your empire, to atone for their sins,[2] and tried the sentiments of the Gauls, in the hope that perhaps their native fierceness could be softened, and, after I saw that they were untamed and intractable, then at length I decided that I must restrain them by force of arms.

"Now, since I have answered the charge that I initiated the war, I must render account for its conduct. In this I for my part should trust my own cause even if I were pleading, not before the Roman, but before the Carthaginian senate, where commanders are said to be crucified if they have conducted a campaign with successful result but defective policy;[3] but in this state, which, in initiating and carrying out every action, calls upon the gods, for the reason that it exposes to the criticism of no man those actions which the gods have sanctioned, and which includes among its formal phrases, when it decrees a thanksgiving or a triumph, 'because he has conducted the affairs of the state well and successfully,' if I should be unwilling to speak, if I considered it overbearing and presumptuous to exult in our valour, if in recognition of the good fortune of myself and my army, in that we overthrew so great a nation with no loss of soldiers, I demanded that honour should be paid to the immortal gods and that I myself might in triumph mount to the Capitoline, whence I set out after duly announcing profectus sum, negaretis hoc mihi cum diis immortalibus?

[3] Cf. Valerius Maximus II. vii. ext. 1. Extant cases seem to illustrate only crucifixion after defeat (e.g. Per. XVII).

XLIX. "Iniquo enim loco dimicavi. Dic igitur, quo aequiore potuerim dimicare. Cum hostes montem cepissent, loco se munito tenerent, nempe eundum ad hostes erat, si vincere vellem. Quid? 2 Si urbem eo loco haberent et moenibus se tenerent? Nempe oppugnandi erant. Quid? Ad Thermopylas aequone loco M'. Acilius cum rege Antiocho pug- 3 navit? Quid? Philippum non eodem modo super Aoum[1] amnem iuga tenentem montium T. Quinctius deiecit? Equidem adhuc qualem aut sibi fingant aut vobis videri velint hostem fuisse non invenio. 4 Si degenerem et emollitum amoenitate Asiae, quid periculi vel iniquo loco subeuntibus fuit? Si timendum et feritate animorum et robore corporum, 5 huicine tantae victoriae triumphum negatis? Caeca invidia est, patres conscripti, nec quicquam aliud scit quam detractare virtutes, corrumpere honores 6 ac praemia earum.[2] Mihi quaeso ita ignoscatis, patres conscripti, si longiorem orationem non cupiditas gloriandi de me, sed necessaria criminum 7 defensio fecit. An etiam per Thraciam saltus patentes qui angusti erant et plana ex arduis et culta ex silvestribus facere potui et praestare, necubi notis

[1] super Aoum edd. vett.: superatum ϝ.
[2] earum ed. Frobeniana 1535: eorum ϝ.

---

[1] Neither the grammar nor (possibly) the logic of this cumbersome sentence is impeccable, but I have not tried to improve either.

my vows, would you refuse this to me as well as to B.C. 187
the immortal gods?[1]

XLIX. "'Yes,' you say, for I fought on unfavourable ground. Tell me, then, in what more favourable place I could have fought. Since the enemy had occupied the mountain and were keeping themselves within a fortified place, naturally I had to go to the enemy if I wished to defeat them. What if they had had a city in that place and were holding themselves within the walls? Naturally a siege would be necessary. Well, did Manius Acilius at Thermopylae fight with King Antiochus on favourable ground? Well, was not Philip in the same fashion, when he held the crest of the mountains above the Aous, dislodged by Titus Quinctius? For my part, I still do not discover what sort of enemy they are picturing to themselves, or what they want him to seem to you. If he was an enemy degenerate and made effeminate by the pleasant life of Asia, what danger was there if we attacked even over unfavourable ground? If he was an enemy to be feared because of both fierceness of temper and strength of body, why do you refuse a triumph to so great a victory as this? It is blind jealousy, conscript Fathers, and it knows nothing except how to belittle deeds of valour and to spoil the distinctions and rewards they earn. I beg that you will pardon me, conscript Fathers, on this ground, if my speech is made over-long, not by my desire to boast about myself, but by the need to defend myself against their accusations. Again, could I make the passes in Thrace wide when they were narrow, level ground instead of steep, neat groves instead of wild forests, and could I guarantee that there should be no

8 sibi latebris delitescerent latrones Thraces, ne quid carcinarum raperetur, ne quod iumentum ex tanto agmine abstraheretur, ne quis vulneraretur, ne ex vulnere vir fortis ac strenuus Q. Minucius moreretur? 9 In hoc casu, quo[1] infeliciter incidit ut talem civem 10 amitteremus, haerent; quod saltu iniquo, loco alieno cum adortus nos hostis esset, duae simul acies primi et novissimi agminis haerentem ad impedimenta nostra exercitum barbarorum circumvenerunt, quod 11 multa milia illo ipso[2] die, plura multo post dies paucos ceciderunt et ceperunt, hoc, si ipsi tacuerint, vos scituros, cum testis orationis meae totus exercitus 12 sit, non credunt? Si gladium in Asia non strinxissem, si hostem non vidissem, tamen[3] triumphum in Thracia duobus proeliis merueram. Sed iam dictum satis 13 est; quin pro eo, quod pluribus verbis vos quam vellem fatigavi, veniam a vobis petitam impetratamque velim, patres conscripti."

L. Plus crimina eo die quam defensio valuisset, ni altercationem in serum perduxissent. Dimittitur senatus in ea opinione ut negaturus triumphum fuisse

[1] casu quo ed. Aldina : casu et hoc casu et iniquo casu σ.
[2] illo ipso Weissenborn : ipso σ.
[3] tamen Weissenborn : tamen per σ : tamen proconsul ed. Frobeniana 1535.

---

[1] Livy said nothing of this vengeance in his account of the battle (xl–xli above), and his whole picture of the episode differs greatly from that of Manlius. It is impossible to judge their relative accuracy.

[2] This pair of speeches, taken with the narrative which covers the ground of both, may furnish a test for the historical accuracy of both the speeches and the narrative. It will be observed that both speeches contain statements of historical facts which are not mentioned in the narrative. Polybius gives us no help, but the account of the return journey given Thracian brigands lurking in ambushes known to them, that there should be no loss of baggage, that no pack-animal from so long a train should be driven off, that no one should be wounded, that that brave and energetic man Quintus Minucius should not die from his wound? They dwell on this misfortune, because it happened to our sorrow that we lost such a citizen; the fact that, when the enemy attacked us in a defile hard to pass through, on unfavourable ground, the two divisions of our army, the van and the rear, at the same time surrounded the army of the barbarians which was lingering around our trains, that they killed and captured many thousands on that same day and many more a few days later,[1] if they keep silent about all this, do they think that you will not learn of it, since the whole army is here to bear witness to what I say? If I had not drawn sword in Asia, if I had seen no enemy, I should still have earned a triumph in Thrace by these two battles. But enough has already been said; rather, I should wish, conscript Fathers, that pardon be asked and granted for my wearying you with a longer speech than I should have wished to make." [2] B.C. 187

L. The accusations would have had more weight that day than the defence had they not prolonged the debate to a late hour. The senate adjourned, having given the impression that the triumph would by Appian (Syr. 43) is even more hostile than the speech of Furius Aemilius. One is inclined to conclude that the speeches are better rhetoric than history, and that the narrative would have been improved if some items in the speeches (cf. the preceding note) had been critically examined. The tone of the narrative makes it impossible to believe that Livy followed Claudius at this point (cf. xxiii. 8 and the note), but there is no other clue to the source.

videretur. Postero die et cognati amicique Cn. Manlii summis opibus adnisi sunt, et auctoritas seniorum valuit, negantium exemplum proditum memoriae esse, ut imperator, qui devictis perduellibus, confecta provincia exercitum reportasset, sine curru et laurea privatus inhonoratusque urbem iniret. Hic pudor malignitatem vicit, triumphumque frequentes decreverunt.

Oppressit deinde mentionem memoriamque omnem contentionis huius maius et cum maiore et clariore viro certamen ortum. P. Scipioni Africano, ut Valerius Antias auctor est, duo Q. Petillii diem dixerunt. Id prout cuiusque ingenium erat interpretabantur. Alii non tribunos plebis, sed universam civitatem quae id pati posset incusabant: duas maximas orbis terrarum urbes ingratas uno prope tempore in principes inventas, Romam ingratiorem, si quidem victa Carthago victum Hannibalem in exilium expulisset, Roma victrix victorem Africanum expellat. Alii, neminem unum civem tantum eminere [1] debere ut legibus interrogari non possit; nihil tam aequandae libertatis esse quam potentissimum quemque posse dicere causam. Quid autem tuto cuiquam, nedum summam rem publicam, permitti, si ratio non sit reddenda? Qui ius aequum pati non possit, in eum

[1] un. civ. tan. em. ed. Frobeniana 1535: un. tan. em. ciu. ?.

[1] A survey of the triumphs awarded during this period shows that the literal accuracy of this statement cannot be maintained, but that to a steadily increasing degree actual achievement was less important than influence with the senate. The senate is ingenious in finding reasons why triumphs should be awarded to its favourites and denied to men in disfavour.

be refused. The next day the relatives and friends B.C. 187 of Manlius exerted all their efforts and the elder senators also prevailed by their influence, saying that no precedent had been handed down in tradition that a commander who, after decisively defeating the enemy and accomplishing the task assigned him as his province, had brought home his army, should enter the City without the car and laurel, a private citizen and without honour.[1] Respect for this tradition prevailed over ill-will and a full session voted the triumph.

Then all talk and thought of this debate were put into the background by a struggle greater and originating with a greater and more famous man. Publius Scipio Africanus, as Valerius Antias asserts, was prosecuted by two men, each named Quintus Petillius. This action each man interpreted according to his own inclinations. Some reproached, not the tribunes of the people, but the whole state, for being able to allow this—the two greatest cities in the world, they said, were at about the same time found ungrateful towards their foremost citizens, but Rome was more ungrateful, because conquered Carthage had driven the conquered Hannibal into exile, while victorious Rome was driving out the victorious Scipio. Others argued that no single citizen should attain such eminence that he could not be questioned under the laws; that nothing was so essential to equally distributed liberty as that every man, however powerful, should plead his cause. What now—not to mention supreme position in the state—could be safely entrusted to any man if no accounting could be asked? Against a man, they said, who cannot brook equitable law, no violence

U.C. 567

10 vim haud iniustam esse. Haec agitata sermonibus, donec dies causae dicendae venit. Nec alius antea quisquam nec ille ipse Scipio consul censorve maiore omnis generis hominum frequentia quam reus illo
11 die in forum est deductus. Iussus dicere causam sine ulla criminum mentione orationem adeo magnificam de rebus ab se gestis est exorsus ut satis constaret neminem umquam neque melius neque
12 verius laudatum esse. Dicebantur enim ab eo eodem[1] animo ingenioque quo[2] gesta erant, et aurium fastidium aberat, quia pro periculo non in gloriam referebantur.

LI. Tribuni vetera luxuriae crimina Syracusanorum hibernorum et Locris Pleminianum tumultum cum ad fidem praesentium criminum retulissent, suspicionibus magis quam argumentis pecuniae captae
2 reum accusarunt: filium captum sine pretio redditum, omnibusque aliis rebus Scipionem, tamquam in eius unius manu pax Romana bellumque esset, ab An-
3 tiocho cultum; dictatorem eum consuli, non legatum in provincia fuisse; nec ad aliam rem eo profectum quam ut. id quod Hispaniae Galliae Siciliae Africae iam pridem persuasum esset, hoc Graeciae Asiaeque et omnibus ad orientem versis regibus gentibusque
4 appareret, unum hominem caput columenque imperii

[1] eo eodem P. Burman: eodem F.
[2] quo P. Burman: a quo F.

[1] Cf. XXIX. xix. 12, etc.
[2] Cf. XXIX. viii. 6 ff., etc.
[3] The actual charges against Scipio, as well as the specifications which supported them, are variously stated by the sources. Polybius, who should have known, is nowhere explicit as to the trial. In their most serious form, as reported, e.g., by Gellius (IV. xviii. 7), the major charge could easily is illegal. Such was the current of talk until the day B.C. 187 of the trial came. No other man before him, not even this same Scipio, when consul or censor, was ever escorted to the Forum by a greater crowd of men of every rank than was Scipio that day when he was the defendant. Being bidden to plead his cause, he began so magnificent a speech about his achievements that it was very clear that no man had ever been better eulogized or more truthfully. For he spoke of his deeds in the same temper and spirit in which he performed them, and there was no resentment among his hearers, since he was speaking to ward off peril and not to boast.

LI. When the tribunes revived the old charges of luxury in his winter-quarters at Syracuse [1] and the disturbances caused by Pleminius at Locri,[2] to make their present charges more credible, on the basis of suspicions rather than of evidence they charged him with having accepted bribes:[3] that his captured son had been restored without a ransom and that in all other respects Antiochus had paid court to Scipio as if in his hands alone lay peace and war with Rome; he had been, they alleged, a dictator, not a lieutenant, in relation to the consul in the province; he had gone there for no other reason than that which Spain, Gaul, Sicily and Africa had long since come to believe should be manifest to Greece and Asia and all the kings and tribes that lie towards the east, namely, that one man was the source and stay of have been treason. One admits that some of Scipio's messages to Antiochus (e.g. XXXVII. xxxvii. 8) may easily be interpreted as lending aid and comfort to the enemy, when removed from their contexts. Yet the statements of Livy and the conduct of the trial indicate that the charges were less grave.

B.C. 567

Romani esse, sub umbra Scipionis civitatem dominam orbis terrarum latere, nutum eius pro decretis patrum, pro populi iussis esse. Infamia intactum invidia qua
5 possunt urgent. Orationibus in noctem perductis
6 prodicta dies est. Ubi ea venit, tribuni in Rostris prima luce consederunt: citatus reus magno agmine amicorum clientiumque per mediam contionem ad
7 Rostra subiit silentioque facto "hoc" inquit "die, tribuni plebis vosque, Quirites, cum Hannibale et Carthaginiensibus signis collatis in Africa bene ac
8 feliciter pugnavi. Itaque, cum hodie litibus et iurgiis supersederi aequum sit, ego hinc extemplo in Capitolium ad Iovem optimum maximum Iunonemque et Minervam ceterosque deos qui Capitolio 9 atque arci praesident salutandos ibo, hisque gratias agam, quod mihi et hoc ipso die et saepe alias egregie gerendae rei publicae mentem facultatemque
10 dederunt. Vestrum quoque quibus commodum est, Quirites, ite mecum et orate deos ut mei similes
11 principes habeatis, ita, si ab annis septemdecim ad senectutem semper vos aetatem meam honoribus vestris anteistis, ego vestros honores rebus gerendis 12 praecessi." Ab Rostris in Capitolium ascendit. Simul se universa contio avertit et secuta Scipionem est, adeo ut postremo scribae viatoresque tribunos relinquerent, nec cum iis praeter servilem comitatum

---

[1] That is, this was the anniversary of Zama and should be a day of thanksgiving and rejoicing.

[2] Scipio's youth had not prevented his election to offices for which he was technically ineligible, but he reminds the people that he had, before these elections, demonstrated his capacity.

[3] The various literary versions of this speech differ a good deal in form but not in their essential character. The same is true of other incidents of the trial.

Roman power, that under the shadow of Scipio the B.C. 187
City which was the mistress of the world lay sheltered, that his nod was weighty as decrees of the senate and enactments of the assembly. A man untouched by ill repute they loaded with innuendo in every possible way. The speeches having continued until nightfall, the matter was adjourned. When the appointed day came, the tribunes took their seats on the Rostra at dawn; the defendant when summoned came with a great throng of friends and clients through the midst of the meeting to the Rostra, and, when silence ensued, he spoke as follows: "On this day,[1] tribunes of the people, and you, citizens, I fought well and successfully in pitched battle with Hannibal and the Carthaginians in Africa. Therefore, since it is meet on this day to refrain from trials and quarrels, I shall proceed at once from here to the Capitoline to offer homage to Jupiter Optimus Maximus and Juno and Minerva and the other gods who preside over the Capitoline and the citadel, and I shall give thanks to them because both on this same day and on many other occasions they have given me the purpose and the capacity to render conspicuous service to the state. Let all of you too, citizens, for whom it is convenient, come with me and pray to the gods that you may have leaders like me, but on this condition, that, if from my seventeenth year to my old age you have always gone ahead of my years in bestowing honours upon me,[2] I have anticipated your honours by my deeds."[3] From the Rostra he went up to the Capitoline. At the same time the whole meeting withdrew and followed Scipio, so that finally even the clerks and messengers left the tribunes, nor did anyone remain with them et praeconem qui reum ex Rostris citabat quisquam 13 esset. Scipio non in Capitolio modo, sed per totam urbem omnia templa deum cum populo Romano

14 circumiit. Celebratior is prope dies favore hominum et aestimatione vera [1] magnitudinis eius fuit quam quo triumphans de Syphace rege et Carthaginiensibus urbem est invectus.

LII. Hic speciosus ultimus dies P. Scipioni illuxit. Post quem cum invidiam et certamina cum tribunis prospiceret, die longiore prodicta [2] in Literninum concessit certo consilio ne ad causam dicendam ades-
2 set. Maior animus et natura erat ac maiori fortunae adsuetus quam ut reus esse sciret et summittere se
3 in humilitatem causam dicentium. Ubi dies venit citarique absens est coeptus, L. Scipio morbum
4 causae esse cur abesset excusabat. Quam excusationem cum tribuni qui diem dixerant non acciperent, et ab eadem superbia non venire ad causam dicendam arguerent qua iudicium et tribunos plebis et con-
5 tionem reliquisset et, quibus ius sententiae de se dicendae et libertatem ademisset, his comitatus, velut captos trahens, triumphum de populo Romano egisset secessionemque eo die in Capitolium a tribunis plebis fecisset: "Habetis ergo temeritatis illius
6 mercedem; quo duce et auctore nos reliquistis, ab

[1] vera Perizonius: uerae F.
[2] prodicta J. F. Gronovius: producta F.

---

[1] Cf. XXX. xlv. 2–7.

[2] Liternum was a colony, and Scipio's retirement thereto was not, technically, exile. See, however, the Periocha of this Book.

[3] That is, at the third and final day of the trial.

except their retinue of slaves and the herald who B.C. 187 from the Rostra summoned the defendant. Scipio visited all the temples of the gods, not only on the Capitoline but through the whole City, with the Roman people in attendance upon him. This day was rendered almost more famous by the general applause of men and by the true estimate of his greatness than that on which he rode into the City in triumph over King Syphax and the Carthaginians.[1]

LII. This was the last day of glory to shine on Publius Scipio. Since in future he foresaw unpopularity and quarrels with the tribunes, obtaining a longer adjournment he retired to his country place at Liternum,[2] with the definite intention of not being present to plead his cause.[3] His soul and character were too lofty, and too much accustomed to a greater fortune, to know how to be a defendant and to come down to the lowly position of men who must plead their cause. When the day arrived and the summons for the absent defendant began to be proclaimed, Lucius Scipio gave illness as the reason for his absence. When the tribunes who had accused him refused to accept this plea and maintained that he had not come to plead his cause because of the same arrogance as that with which he had deserted the trial and the tribunes of the people and the assembly, and with which, attended by those whom he had robbed of their right to express their opinion of him and of their liberty, leading them captive, as it were, he had celebrated a triumph over the Roman people and had brought about a secession that day from the tribunes of the people to the Capitoline: "You have, therefore," they said, "your reward for that rash conduct; under his leadership and

7 eo ipsi relicti estis, et tantum animorum in dies nobis decrescit ut, ad quem ante annos septemdecim [1] exercitum et classem habentem tribunos plebis aedilemque mittere in Siciliam ausi sumus, qui prenderent eum et Romam reducerent, ad eum privatum ex villa sua extrahendum ad causam dicen-
8 dam mittere non audeamus": [2] tribuni plebis appellati ab L. Scipione ita decreverunt: si [3] morbi causa excusaretur, sibi placere accipi eam causam
9 diemque a collegis prodici.[4] Tribunus plebis eo tempore Ti. Sempronius Gracchus erat, cui inimicitiae cum P. Scipione intercedebant. Is, cum vetuisset nomen suum decreto collegarum adscribi, tristioremque omnes sententiam expectarent, ita
10 decrevit: cum L. Scipio excusasset morbum esse causae fratri, satis id sibi videri; se P. Scipionem priusquam Romam redisset accusari non passurum; tum quoque, si se appellet, auxilio ei futurum ne 11 causam dicat: ad id fastigium rebus gestis, honoribus populi Romani P. Scipionem deorum hominumque consensu pervenisse, ut sub Rostris reum stare et

[1] ante annos septendecim Crévier: antea ϝ: ante annos quindecim M.
[2] audeamus ed. Frobeniana 1535: audemus ϝ.
[3] si ed. Frobeniana 1531: ut si ϝ.
[4] prodici Gronovius: produci ϝ.

[1] Cf. XXIX. xx. 6: this was in connection with the affair of Pleminius.
[2] This appeal was taken to the college of tribunes as a whole against the refusal of the Petillii to accept the plea of illness.

sanction you abandoned us and by him you are yourselves abandoned, and so far has our spirit declined day by day that a man for whom seventeen years ago,[1] when he commanded an army and a fleet, we dared to send tribunes of the people and an aedile, to arrest him and bring him back to Rome—to that man, when a private citizen, we do not dare to send messengers to hale him forth from his country place to plead his cause"; the tribunes of the people, when appealed to[2] by Lucius Scipio, thus decreed: that, if the plea of illness were submitted, it was their pleasure that this plea should be accepted and the case adjourned by their colleagues. One of the tribunes of the people at this time was Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus,[3] between whom and Publius Scipio there was a feud. When he had forbidden his name to be signed to the decree of his colleagues, and all men were anticipating a harsher proposal, he thus decreed: that, since Lucius Scipio had given illness as the excuse for his brother, this seemed to him sufficient; that he would not permit Publius Scipio to be prosecuted before he returned to Rome; that even then, if he were appealed to, he would come to Scipio's aid, to save him from pleading his cause:[4] such heights had Publius Scipio reached, as a result of his own deeds and of the honours conferred by the Roman people, with the approbation of gods and men, that to compel him to stand as a defendant before the Rostra and listen to the insults B.C. 187

[3] Cf. XXXVII. vii. 11; he plays an important part in the following chapters.

[4] Gracchus would prevent, by the use of his tribunicial powers, a condemnation in Scipio's absence and, on request, any further prosecution.

praebere aures adolescentium conviciis populo Romano magis deforme quam ipsi sit.

LIII. Adiecit decreto indignationem: "Sub pedibus vestris stabit, tribuni, domitor ille Africae Scipio? Ideo quattuor nobilissimos duces Poenorum in Hispania, quattuor exercitus fudit fugavitque; ideo Syphacem cepit, Hannibalem devicit, Carthaginem vectigalem nobis fecit, Antiochum—recipit[1] enim fratrem consortem huius gloriae L. Scipio—ultra iuga Tauri emovit, ut duobus Petilliis succumberet? Vos de P. Africano palmam peti feretis?[2] Nullisne meritis suis, nullis vestris honoribus umquam[3] in arcem tutam et velut sanctam clari viri pervenient ubi, si non venerabilis, inviolata saltem senectus eorum considat?" Movit et decretum et adiecta oratio non ceteros modo sed ipsos etiam accusatores, et deliberaturos se quid iuris sui et officii esset dixerunt. Senatus deinde concilio plebis dimisso haberi est coeptus. Ibi gratiae ingentes ab universo ordine, praecipue a consularibus senioribusque, Ti. Graccho actae sunt, quod rem publicam privatis simultatibus potiorem habuisset, et Petillii vexati sunt probris, quod splendere aliena invidia voluissent et spolia ex Africani triumpho peterent. Silentium deinde de Africano fuit. Vitam Literni

[1] recipit Madvig: recepit Σ.
[2] peti feretis Madvig: peteritis M: petereris Σ.
[3] umquam ed. Frobeniana 1531: cum qua M: om. Σ.

---

[1] In later times at least, if not at this time, the prosecution of some prominent person was a means of self-advertisement much sought after by ambitious young men: the careers of Cicero and Caesar illustrate.

of young men [1] would be a greater disgrace to the B.C. 187 Roman people than to Scipio himself.

LIII. He supplemented his decree with an indignant speech: "Are your feet, tribunes, to trample down Scipio, that conqueror of Africa? Was it for this that he repulsed and routed four of the most noted generals of the Carthaginians in Spain, and four armies? Was it for this that he captured Syphax, overthrew Hannibal, made Carthage tributary to us, drove Antiochus—for Lucius Scipio admits his brother to a share in this glory—beyond the ridges of Taurus, that he should fall a victim to the two Petillii? Will you allow a victory over Publius Africanus to be sought? Shall distinguished men by no services of their own, by no honours of your bestowal, ever reach a safe and, as it were, sacred citadel where their old age, if not respected, at least secure, may find rest?" Both the decree and the supplementary speech touched not only the tribunes but even the prosecutors themselves, and the latter said that they would take counsel as to what their right and duty required. After that, when the assembly of the people had been adjourned, a meeting of the senate began. There boundless gratitude was expressed by the whole order and especially by the senators of consular rank and greater age, because Tiberius Gracchus had shown greater regard for the public interest than for his personal quarrels, and the Petillii were assailed with abuse because they had tried to become conspicuous at the expense of another's unpopularity and were seeking spoils from a triumph over Africanus. Thenceforth there was silence regarding Africanus. He spent his life at Liternum, with no desire to egit sine desiderio urbis; morientem rure eo ipso loco sepeliri se iussisse ferunt monumentumque ibi aedificari, ne funus sibi in ingrata patria fieret. Vir memorabilis, bellicis tamen quam pacis artibus memorabilior. Nobilior[1] prima pars vitae quam postrema fuit, quia in iuventa bella adsidue gesta, cum senecta res quoque defloruere, nec praebita est materia ingenio. Quid ad[2] primum consulatum secundus, etiam si censuram adicias? Quid Asiatica legatio, et valetudine adversa inutilis et filii casu deformata et post reditum necessitate aut subeundi iudicii aut simul cum patria deserendi? Punici tamen belli perpetrati, quo nullum neque maius neque[3] periculosius Romani gessere, unus[4] praecipuam gloriam tulit.

LIV. Morte Africani crevere inimicorum animi, quorum princeps fuit M. Porcius Cato, qui vivo quoque eo adlatrare[5] magnitudinem eius solitus erat. Hoc auctore existimantur Petillii et vivo Africano rem ingressi et mortuo rogationem promulgasse. Fuit autem rogatio talis: "Velitis iubeatis, Quirites,[6]

[1] Nobilior Weissenborn: om. ϝ.
[2] Quid ad ed. Froben. 1535: quoad M: quoad et qui ad ϝ.
[3] neque maius neque edd. vett.: neque aut maius ϝ.
[4] unus ed. Froben. 1535: unam ϝ.
[5] adlatrare edd. vett.: lacerare ϝ.
[6] Quirites Brissonius: quaeratur ϝ.

---

[1] One infers from this and from liv. 1 below that the death of Scipio soon followed, but in XXXIX. lii. 1 his death is said to have occurred in 183 B.C. The same uncertainty prevailed regarding his burial-place and the circumstances of his death, on which Livy declines to express an opinion. He gives, however, in chap. lvi. below, some interesting return to the City; when dying[1] they say that he B.C. 187 gave orders that he should be buried in that same place in the country and that his tomb should be erected there, that his funeral might not be held in an ungrateful home-land. He was a man to be remembered, although more to be remembered for his achievements in war than for his deeds in peace. The first part of his life was more distinguished than the last, since in his youth he was continually waging wars, while with old age his deeds too faded, nor was any opportunity afforded to display his talent. What was his second consulship compared to the first, even if you add the censorship? What was gained by his lieutenancy in Asia, rendered unprofitable as it was by his illness and disfigured by the misfortune[2] of his son and, after his return, by the necessity of either standing trial or leaving the trial and his country at the same time? Nevertheless, since he brought to an end the Punic War, than which there was waged none greater nor more dangerous by the Romans, he has secured a singular pre-eminence of fame.

LIV. On the death of Africanus the spirits of his adversaries rose, the first of them being Marcus Porcius Cato, who even during his life had been accustomed to snarl at his greatness. It was with his backing, it is thought, that the Petillii initiated the prosecution of Africanus while he lived and after his death introduced a motion. The motion was to this effect: "Do you wish and order,[3] citizens, with historical criticism which contrasts strangely with his dogmatic statements elsewhere (but note ferunt in this section).

[2] Cf. XXXVII. xxxiii. 4–7.

[3] The formula retains the subjunctive even in direct quotation.

quae pecunia capta ablata coacta ab rege Antiocho est quique sub imperio eius fuerunt, quod eius in publicum relatum non est, uti de ea re Ser. Sulpicius praetor urbanus ad senatum referat quem eam rem velit senatus quaerere de iis qui praetores nunc sunt?" Huic rogationi primo Q. et L. Mummii [1] intercedebant, senatum quaerere de pecunia non relata in publicum, ita ut antea semper factum esset, aequum censebant. Petillii nobilitatem et regnum in senatu Scipionum accusabant. L. Furius Purpurio consularis, qui in decem legatis in Asia fuerat, latius rogandum censebat, non quae ab Antiocho modo pecuniae captae forent, sed quae ab aliis regibus gentibusque, Cn. Manlium inimicum incessens. Et L. Scipio, quem magis pro se quam adversus legem dicturum apparebat, dissuasor processit. Is morte P. Africani fratris, viri omnium fortissimi clarissimique, eam exortam rogationem est conquestus;

[1] Mummii Sigonius: numini et al. c.

[1] There was no systematic or effective method of verifying a general's returns of the booty he had collected: one device, of uncertain validity, was seen in the case of Glabrio (XXXVII. lvii. 13–14). The episode of Scipio Nasica (XXXVI. xxxvi. 1–2 and the note) suggests that the senate was either unable to secure accurate information or tolerant of plausible irregularities in the accounts of a general and his quaestor. Yet the fears of Manlius and the investigation which follows of the accounts of the Scipios show that some method existed, although one wonders how the Petillii knew that there were discrepancies in the present instance.

respect to the money which was captured from, B.C. 187 taken from, levied upon King Antiochus and those who were under his rule, and what of this money has not been accounted for to the state,[1] that regarding this matter Servius Sulpicius the city praetor shall refer to the senate the question, whom, of those who are now praetors, the senate wishes to investigate this matter?" This proposal was at first vetoed by Quintus and Lucius Mummius; they deemed it proper that the senate should inquire regarding money which had not been turned in to the treasury in the manner in which it had always been done before.[2] The Petillii kept assailing the influential position and tyrannical power of the Scipios in the senate. Lucius Furius Purpurio, a man of consular rank, who had been one of the ten commissioners in Asia, proposed to extend the field of the investigation to include moneys which had been taken, not only from Antiochus, but from other kings and peoples as well, striking at his enemy Gnaeus Manlius.[3] Lucius Scipio also, who was evidently about to speak for himself rather than against the bill, came forward to oppose it. He complained that only after the death of his brother Publius Africanus, a man conspicuous above all for courage and fame, this proposal had originated; for it was not

[2] The protest is not against the auditing of the accounts but at the method, which, to judge from similar incidents in Roman history, was designed to increase the probability of a conviction. The Romans were generally intuitively distrustful of special procedures invented for particular situations.

[3] It is clear from XXXIX. vi. 4 that Manlius was afraid of such an inquiry, although he could say that missing property had been carried off by the Thracians.

U.C. 567
9 parum enim fuisse non laudari pro Rostris P. Afri-
10 canum post mortem, nisi etiam accusaretur; et Carthaginienses exilio Hannibalis contentos esse, populum Romanum ne morte quidem P. Scipionis exsatiari, nisi et ipsius fama sepulti laceretur et 11 frater insuper, accessio invidiae, mactetur. M. Cato suasit rogationem—exstat et oratio eius de pecunia regis Antiochi—et Mummios tribunos auctoritate 12 deterruit ne adversarentur rogationi. Remittentibus ergo his intercessionem omnes tribus uti rogassent iusserunt.

LV. Ser. Sulpicio deinde referente, quem rogatione Petillia quaerere vellent, Q. Terentium Culleonem
2 patres iusserunt. Ad hunc praetorem, adeo amicum Corneliae familiae ut, qui Romae mortuum elatumque P. Scipionem—est enim ea quoque fama—tradunt, pilleatum, sicut in triumpho ierat, in funere quoque ante lectum isse memoriae prodiderint, et ad Portam Capenam mulsum prosecutis funus dedisse, quod ab eo inter alios captivos in Africa ex
3 hostibus receptus esset, aut adeo inimicum eundem, ut propter insignem simultatem ab ea factione quae adversa Scipionibus erat, delectus sit potissimum ad
4 quaestionem exercendam: ceterum ad hunc nimis

---

[1] The habit of pronouncing public laudationes over distinguished men was very old (II. xlvii. 11, etc.). It would appear from liii. 8 above that Africanus had not wanted such a eulogy.

[2] The alternative formula "uti rogas" is also employed: cf. XXXIII. xxv. 7.

[3] Cf. XXX. xlv. 5. The pilleus was the conical cap worn by newly-manumitted slaves.

[4] Cf. lvi. 4 below. The tomb of the Scipios, still to be seen, is close to this gate.

enough that no eulogy had been pronounced before B.C. 187
the Rostra over Publius Africanus after his death [1] without also bringing charges against him; even the Carthaginians had been satisfied with the exile of Hannibal, the Roman people was not content even with the death of Publius Scipio without also tearing to shreds his reputation as he lay in the tomb, and, besides, sacrificing his brother as an additional victim to their jealousy. Marcus Cato supported the bill—and a speech of his on the money of King Antiochus is extant—and by his influence deterred the tribunes, the Mummii, from further opposing the measure. With their veto withdrawn, therefore, all the tribes voted "aye." [2]

LV. Servius Sulpicius then brought up the question of what praetor they wished to have conduct the investigation under the Petillian law, and the Fathers selected Quintus Terentius Culleo. Before this praetor, either so friendly to the Cornelian family that those who say that Publius Scipio died and was buried at Rome—for this too is reported—have put it on record that, wearing the cap of freedom, just as he had marched in the triumphal procession,[3] he walked also before the bier at the funeral, and at the Porta Capena [4] served wine and honey to those who attended the funeral, because he had been rescued from the enemy by Scipio, along with the other prisoners in Africa, or, on the other hand, so hostile that on account of his well-known unfriendliness the faction which was opposed to the Scipios chose him in preference to anyone else to conduct the investigation; at any rate,[5] before this praetor, too well or [5] Livy becomes so involved in his discussion of the partisanship of Culleo that he has to make a fresh start in his sentence.

aequum aut iniquum praetorem reus extemplo factus
L. Scipio. Simul et delata et recepta nomina lega-5 torum eius, A. et L. Hostiliorum Catonum, et C.
Furii Aculeonis [1] quaestoris et, ut omnia contacta societate peculatus viderentur, scribae quoque duo et accensus. L. Hostilius et scribae et accensus, priusquam de Scipione iudicium fieret, absoluti sunt, Scipio et A. Hostilius legatus et C. Furius damnati:
6 quo commodior pax Antiocho daretur, Scipionem sex milia pondo auri, quadringenta octoginta argenti plus 7 accepisse quam in aerarium retulerit, A. Hostilium octoginta pondo auri et argenti quadringenta tria, Furium quaestorem auri pondo centum triginta,
8 argenti ducenta. Has ego summas auri et argenti relatas apud Antiatem inveni. In L. Scipione malim equidem librarii mendum quam mendacium scrip-9 toris esse in summa auri atque argenti; similius enim veri est argenti quam auri maius pondus fuisse, et potius quadragiens quam ducentiens quadragiens
10 litem aestimatam, eo magis quod tantae summae

[1] Furii Aculeonis ed. Frobeniana 1535: furii culleonis M: furiacii leonis r.

---

[1] They have not been mentioned before as legati of Scipio.

[2] They were discharged for lack of evidence by the praetor at the preliminary hearing; there seemed to be a prima facie case against the others.

[3] Livy is more charitable than on other occasions towards the vagaries of Antias; it is not quite clear what the annalist said about the fine.

[4] Reckoning one pound of gold as 4,000 sesterces and one pound of silver as 336 sesterces, 6,000 pounds of gold, leaving the silver out of account, would be 24,000,000 sesterces; reversing the figures, 480 pounds of gold (1,920,000 sesterces) plus 6,000 pounds of silver (2,016,000 sesterces) would produce approximately 4,000,000 sesterces to be recovered by the too ill disposed, Lucius Scipio was immediately B.C. 187 arraigned. At the same time the names of two of his lieutenants, Aulus and Lucius Hostilius Cato,[1] were both brought forward and accepted, and that of his quaestor, Gaius Furius Aculeo, and, that everything might seem infected by a conspiracy for peculation, also those of two clerks and an orderly. Lucius Hostilius and the clerks and the orderly were acquitted[2] before the trial of Scipio took place; Scipio and his lieutenant Aulus Hostilius and Gaius Furius were convicted: the charge was that, in order to secure more favourable terms of peace for Antiochus, Scipio had received six thousand pounds of gold, and four hundred and eighty pounds of silver more than he turned in to the treasury, Aulus Hostilius eighty pounds of gold and four hundred and three of silver, the quaestor Furius one hundred and thirty pounds of gold, two hundred of silver. These amounts of gold and silver I have found recorded in the writings of Antias. In the case of Lucius Scipio, I should myself prefer to see an error of the scribe rather than a falsification of the historian[3] in the amounts of gold and silver; for it is more probable that the greater weight would have been of silver and not of gold and that the fine assessed would have been four million sesterces rather than twenty-four million,[4] the more so because there is a tradition[5] that an accounting for just this fine. (I have borrowed these calculations from Weissenborn–Müller, from Mommsen and Hultsch.)

[5] This other tradition (Polybius or another annalist) may be the actual source of this criticism of Antias. At any rate, Livy appears at this point to abandon Antias, whom he has followed from l. 5 above, in favour of another authority. He appears also to go back to Antias at chap. lviii. below.

rationem etiam ab ipso P. Scipione requisitam esse 11 in senatu tradunt librumque rationis eius cum Lucium fratrem adferre iussisset, inspectante senatu suis ipsum manibus concerpsisse[1] indignantem 12 quod, cum bis milliens in aerarium intulisset, quad-
13 ragiens ratio ab se posceretur. Ab eadem fiducia animi, cum quaestores pecuniam ex aerario contra legem promere non auderent, poposcisse claves et se aperturum aerarium dixisse, qui ut clauderetur effecisset.

LVI. Multa alia in Scipionis exitu maxime vitae dieque dicta, morte, funere, sepulcro, in diversum trahunt, ut cui famae, quibus scriptis adsentiar non 2 habeam. Non de accusatore convenit: alii M. Naevium, alii Petillios diem dixisse scribunt, non de tempore quo dicta dies sit, non de anno quo mortuus
3 sit, non ubi mortuus aut elatus sit; alii Romae, alii Literni et mortuum et sepultum. Utrobique monumenta ostenduntur et statuae; nam et Literni monumentum monumentoque statua superimposita fuit,

[1] concerpsisse Sabellicus: compressisse F.

---

[1] That is, 4,000,000 sesterces.

[2] This anecdote is told also by Polybius (XXIV. ix; he has also the following story), Gellius (IV. xviii. 7–12), Auct. De Vir. Ill. (49. 17), all with small variations. Polybius alone mentions definite sums, substituting 3,000 talents and 15,000 talents for those given by Livy. Under the circumstances it seems useless to try to determine whether Polybius or an annalist, probably Claudius, is Livy's source. The following chapter well illustrates the uncertainty which still exists regarding these events.

[3] No pre-Livian source for this anecdote is known except Polybius; he makes it clear that this episode had nothing to do with the preceding. The impossibility of equating the sums given by Polybius (see the preceding note) with sum [1] was also demanded in the senate from Publius B.C. 187

Scipio himself, and that, when he had directed his brother Lucius to bring the account-book, he had himself, with his own hands, torn it up, being angry that after he had brought two hundred millions into the treasury he should be asked to account for four millions.[2] With the same self-confidence, they say, when the quaestors did not dare to take money from the treasury [3] contrary to the law, he demanded the keys and said that he would open the treasury who had brought it to pass that it was closed.

LVI. Much else is said, especially about the end of Scipio's life, his trial, his death, his funeral, his tomb, all so contradictory that I find no tradition, no written documents, which I can accept. There is no unanimity as to his accuser: some say that Marcus Naevius [4] accused him, others the Petillii; there is no agreement as to the time when he was prosecuted nor as to the year when he died [5] nor as to where he died or was buried; some say that both death and burial took place at Rome, others at Literum. In both places tombs and statues are shown; for at Literum [6] there is a tomb and a statue placed upon those of Livy leaves it doubtful still whether Polybius is the source for both anecdotes. The second means, of course, that it was due to Scipio that there was any money to be guarded in the treasury.

[4] Naevius was tribune in 184 B.C. (XXXIX. lii. 4 below).

[5] Livy returns to this question in dealing with the year 183 B.C. (XXXIX. lii.).

[6] Seneca, writing to Lucilius from Scipio's villa at Literum, says . . . ara quam sepulchrum esse tanti viri suspicor (Ep. LXXXVI. 1). Strabo (p. 243) also mentions the tomb, but there seems to be no other reference to the statue of which Livy speaks.

L.C. 67

4 quam tempestate disiectam nuper vidimus ipsi, et Romae extra Portam Capenam in Scipionum monumento tres statuae sunt, quarum duae P. et L. Scipionum dicuntur esse, tertia poetae Q. Ennii. 5 Nec inter scriptores rerum discrepat solum, sed orationes quoque, si modo ipsorum sunt quae feruntur, 6 P. Scipionis et Ti. Gracchi abhorrent inter se. Index orationis P. Scipionis nomen M. Naevii tribuni plebis habet, ipsa oratio sine nomine est accusatoris; modo 7 nebulonem. modo nugatorem appellat. Ne Gracchi quidem oratio aut Petilliorum accusatorum Africani aut 8 diei dictae Africano ullam mentionem habet. Alia tota serenda fabula est Gracchi orationi conveniens, et illi auctores sequendi sunt qui, cum L. Scipio et accusatus et damnatus sit pecuniae captae ab rege legatum in 9 Etruria fuisse Africanum tradunt; qua post famam de casu fratris adlatam relicta legatione cucurrisse eum Romam et, cum a porta recta ad forum se contulisset, quod in vincula duci fratrem dictum erat, reppulisse a corpore eius viatorem, et tribunis retinentibus magis

---

[1] No inscriptions to Publius or Lucius Scipio and no identifiable statue of either has been found in the Scipio tomb. The bust which some suppose to be that of Ennius exists in the Vatican Museum.

[2] Cicero (Brutus 77) had few specimens of Scipio's style, but he quotes a punning fragment from a speech against Naevius (quid hoc Naevio ignavius: De Or. II. 249). But Livy (sect. 6 below) says that Naevius was not mentioned in the speech itself. There is a slight indication that Livy and Gellius (l.c.) read the same speech, since Livy says that Scipio called his accuser nebulonem, and this word occurs in the direct quotation given by Gellius.

[3] This speech is otherwise unknown.

the tomb, which I myself saw recently, shattered by a storm, and at Rome, outside the Porta Capena, in the tomb of the Scipios, there are three statues, two of which are said to represent Publius and Lucius Scipio, the third the poet Quintus Ennius.[1] Not only is there disagreement among historians, but the speeches also (if indeed those which are in circulation are genuine works of these men) of Publius Scipio[2] and Tiberius Gracchus[3] are inconsistent with one another. The index[4] of the speech of Publius Scipio contains the name of Marcus Naevius, tribune of the people: the speech itself lacks the name of the accuser; it calls him now "a ne'er-do-well," now "a no-good." Nor does the speech of Gracchus make any mention at all either of the Petillii as accusers of Africanus or of the prosecution of Africanus. Another entirely different story must be put together, consistent with the oration of Gracchus, and those writers must be followed who say that, when Lucius Scipio was both accused and convicted of receiving money from the king, Africanus was serving on a commission in Etruria;[5] that, leaving this post after receiving the news of his brother's downfall, he hastened to Rome, and when he had gone from the gate straight to the Forum, because it was said that his brother was being put in chains, that he drove the messenger from him, and that when the tribunes tried to stop him he attacked them, with more B.C. 187

[4] The index was a tag fastened to the projecting end of the rod on which the roll was wound, containing the title of the work contained in that roll.

[5] Nothing further is known of this commission, although Gellius (VI. (VII.) xix) tells the rest of the story, with greater detail.

T.C. 67

10 pie quam civiliter vim fecisse. Haec enim ipsa Ti. Gracchus queritur dissolutam esse a privato tribuniciam potestatem, et ad postremum, cum auxilium L. Scipioni pollicetur, adicit tolerabilioris exempli esse a tribuno plebis potius quam a privato victam videri et tribuniciam potestatem et rem
11 publicam esse. Sed ita hanc unam impotentem eius iniuriam invidia onerat ut increpando, quod degenerarit [1] tantum a se ipse, cumulatas ei [2] veteres laudes moderationis et temperantiae pro reprehen-
12 sione praesenti reddat: castigatum enim quondam ab eo populum ait, quod eum perpetuum consulem et dictatorem vellet facere; prohibuisse statuas sibi in comitio, in Rostris, in curia, in Capitolio, in cella
13 Iovis poni; prohibuisse ne decerneretur ut imago sua triumphali ornatu e templo Iovis optimi maximi exiret.

LVII. Haec vel in laudatione posita ingentem magnitudinem animi moderantis ad civilem [3] habitum honoribus significarent, quae exprobrando inimicus
2 fatetur. Huic Graccho minorem ex duabus filiis— nam maior P. Cornelio Nasicae haud dubie a patre

[1] degenerarit ed. Frobeniana 1535: generauit et generauerit $\bar{r}$.

[2] ei ed. Frobeniana 1531: et $\bar{r}$.

[3] moderantis ad civilem Drakenborch: moderantis uilem M: moderandis ad ciuilem $\bar{r}$.

---

[1] The presumable situation was this: L. Scipio had been condemned by a tribune to pay a fine; in default of bond he would be imprisoned and could be released only by another tribune; Gracchus finally assumed the responsibility of freeing him after Africanus had committed his assault.

[2] Valerius Maximus (IV. i. 6) tells a similar story, but the occasion of the rebuke is unknown. It seems probable that Livy uses perpetuus in the sense of "for a considerable con-affection for his brother than respect for the laws. B.C. 187

For it is just this conduct that Tiberius Gracchus complains of—that the tribunicial power had been infringed by a private citizen, and at the end, when he promised his official assistance to Lucius Scipio, he added that it seemed to be a more endurable precedent that a tribune of the people rather than a private citizen should have overthrown both the tribunicial power and the state.[1] But this one act of uncontrolled violence on Scipio's part he loaded with reproaches in such a way that, taunting him because he had fallen so far below his own standards, he paid him, as compensation for his criticism of the moment, lasting and accumulated praises for his integrity and self-command; for he said that the people had once been rebuked by Scipio because they wished to make him perpetual[2] consul and dictator; that he forbade statues to himself to be erected in the Comitium, on the Rostra, in the Curia, on the Capitoline, in the cell of Jupiter; that he prevented also a decree that his image in triumphal dress should appear to be coming out of the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus.[3]

LVII. Such statements, even if included in a eulogy, would indicate the unusual greatness of a soul which restricted distinctions to conformity with a democratic constitution, and they were made by an enemy and accompanied by censure. To this Gracchus the younger of Scipio's two daughters—for the elder was betrothed to Publius Cornelius Nasica tinuous period," contrasting it with in annum: cf. XXIV. viii. 7.

[3] Appian (Iber. 23) reports that this was done despite the protests of Scipio.

3 collocata erat—nuptam fuisse convenit. Illud parum constat, utrum post mortem patris et desponsa sit et nupserit, an verae illae opiniones sint. Gracchum, cum L. Scipio in vincula duceretur, nec quis-
4 quam collegarum auxilio esset, iurasse sibi inimicitias cum Scipionibus quae fuissent manere, nec se gratiae quaerendae causa quicquam facere, sed, in quem carcerem reges et imperatores hostium ducentem vidisset P. Africanum, in eum se fratrem eius duci
5 non passurum. Senatum eo die forte in Capitolio cenantem consurrexisse et petisse, ut inter epulas
6 Graccho filiam Africanus desponderet. Quibus ita inter [1] publicum sollemne sponsalibus rite factis cum se domum recepisset, Scipionem Aemiliae uxori
7 dixisse filiam se minorem despondisse. Cum illa, muliebriter indignabunda nihil de communi filia secum consultatum, adiecisset non si Ti. Graccho daret expertem consilii debuisse matrem esse, 8 laetum Scipionem tam concordi iudicio ei [2] ipsi desponsam respondisse. Haec de tanto viro quam et opinionibus et monumentis litterarum variarent, proponenda erant.

LVIII. Iudiciis a Q. Terentio praetore perfectis, Hostilius et Furius damnati praedes eodem die quaes-

[1] inter ed. Frobeniana 1535 : in F. [2] ei Walch : et F.

[1] They were the parents of the famous tribunes.

[2] Probably in connection with some religious festival.

[3] Whether this is anything more than a pleasant story which Livy had picked up somewhere or not, it is probably characteristic of the conduct of the Roman aristocracy at this period.

[4] With this anecdote Livy concludes his parenthetical miscellany and returns to the narrative based on Valerius Antias : cf. the note to lv. 10 above.

and beyond doubt by her father—was married, as all agree.[1] What is not certain is whether she was both betrothed and married after the death of her father, or whether the opinions are true, that Gracchus, when Lucius Scipio was being taken to prison and no one of his colleagues was coming to his assistance, swore that his feud with the Scipios continued as before and that he was doing nothing to curry favour, but that he would not permit the brother of Africanus to be put into that prison into which he had seen Publius Africanus thrusting kings and generals of the enemy. The story goes on that the senate, which chanced to dine that day on the Capitoline,[2] had risen up and begged that during the banquet Africanus should betroth his daughter to Gracchus. When the contract had been duly made at this public ceremony and Scipio had returned home, he told his wife Aemilia that he had arranged a marriage for their younger daughter. When she, being irritated, as a woman would naturally be, that he had not consulted with her about the daughter of both of them, had added that not even if he were promising her to Tiberius Gracchus should the mother have been excluded from the deliberation, Scipio, they say, rejoicing at their harmony of opinion, replied that it was to Gracchus that he had betrothed her.[3] However much at variance are these accounts of so great a man, they have seemed worthy of presentation.[4] B.C. 187

LVIII. When the trials[5] had been completed by Quintus Terentius the praetor, Hostilius and Furius, who were convicted, gave bond the same day to the [5] Livy seems to be technically correct in his terminology. The iudicium was the trial proper, as distinguished from the preliminary hearing: cf. lv. 5 above and the note.

c. 7 2 toribus urbanis dederunt; Scipio cum contenderet omnem quam accepisset pecuniam in aerario esse, nec se quicquam publici habere, in vincula duci est coeptus. 3 P. Scipio Nasica tribunos appellavit orationemque habuit plenam veris decoribus non communiter modo Corneliae gentis, sed proprie familiae suae. 4 Parentes suos et P. Africani ac L. Scipionis, qui in carcerem duceretur, fuisse Cn. et P. Scipiones, 5 clarissimos viros. Eos, cum per aliquot annos in terra Hispania adversus multos Poenorum Hispanorumque et duces et exercitus nominis Romani famam 6 auxissent non bello solum, sed quod Romanae temperantiae fideique specimen illis gentibus dedissent, ad extremum ambo pro republica mortem [1] occu- 7 buisse. Cum illorum gloriam tueri posteris satis esset. P. Africanum tantum paternas superiecisse laudes ut fidem fecerit non sanguine humano sed 8 stirpe divina satum se esse. L. Scipionem, de quo agatur, ut quae in Hispania, quae in Africa, cum legatus fratris esset, gessisset, praetereantur, consulem et ab senatu dignum habitum [2] cui extra sortem Asia provincia et bellum cum Antiocho rege decerneretur, et a fratre cui post duos consulatus censu- 9 ramque et triumphum legatus in Asiam iret. Ibi ne magnitudo et splendor legati laudibus consulis officeret, forte ita incidisse ut, quo die ad Magnesiam

[1] mortem edd. vett. : morte $\bar{r}$.
[2] habitum Weissenborn : uisum $\bar{r}$.

[1] Execution of judgment on the person of the condemned was permitted when he had or claimed to have no property and did not furnish bond.

City quaestors; when Scipio protested that all the money which he had received was in the treasury and that he had no public property, they proceeded to put him in prison.[1] Publius Scipio Nasica appealed to the tribunes and delivered a speech full of deserved tributes, not only to the Cornelian gens as a whole, but specifically to his own family. The fathers, he said, both of himself and of Publius Africanus and the Lucius Scipio who was being imprisoned, were Gnaeus and Publius Scipio, men of the highest distinction. After they had, through many years in the land of Spain, against many generals and armies alike of Carthaginians and Spaniards, increased the fame of the Roman name, not only in war but because they had given those peoples an example of Roman self-control and devotion, both had in the end met death for their fatherland. While it would have been enough, he continued, to maintain for posterity their standard of glory, Publius Africanus had so far surpassed his father's praises that he had given reason to believe that he was born, not of human blood, but of divine stock. Lucius Scipio, whose fate was now in question, not to mention what he had done in Spain, in Africa, while serving as his brother's lieutenant, had, as consul, been deemed by the senate worthy to have decreed to him, without recourse to the lot, the province of Asia and the war with King Antiochus, and had been deemed by his brother worthy to be attended to Asia by that brother as his lieutenant, after he had been twice consul and censor and had celebrated a triumph.[2] There, that the greatness and glory of the lieutenant might not obscure the consul's fame, it happened that, on the day when B.C. 187

[1] Cf. XXXVII. i. 9.

signis collatis L. Scipio Antiochum devicisset, aeger 10 P. Scipio Elaeae dierum aliquot abesset via. Non fuisse minorem eum exercitum quam Hannibalis, cum quo in Africa esset pugnatum; Hannibalem eundem fuisse inter multos alios regios duces, qui imperator Punici belli fuerit. Et bellum quidem ita gestum esse ut ne fortunam quidem quisquam criminari
11 possit: in pace crimen quaeri; eam dici venisse. Hic decem legatos simul argui,[1] quorum ex consilio data
12 pax esset; quamquam exstitissent[2] ex decem legatis, qui Cn. Manlium accusarent, tamen non modo ad criminis fidem, sed ne ad moram quidem triumphi eam accusationem valuisse.

LIX. At hercule in Scipione leges ipsas pacis, ut nimium accommodatas Antiocho, suspectas esse; integrum enim ei regnum relictum; omnia possidere
2 eum victum, quae ante bellum eius fuerint; auri et argenti cum vim magnam habuisset, nihil in publicum
3 relatum, omne in privatum versum; an praeter omnium oculos tantum auri argentique in triumpho L. Scipionis quantum non decem aliis triumphis, si
4 omne in unum conferatur, latum? [1] Nam quid de fini-

[1] argui ed. Frobeniana 1535: arguique et argui quoque rec.
[2] quamquam exstitissent Drakenborch: quamquam exstitisse M: quam (aut quem) exstitisse rec.

[1] Cf. XXXVII. xli. 1 and the note.
[2] This is one of the minor mysteries in this affair: Livy's narrative shows that their dealings had been entirely with Manlius, who, as a matter of fact, had far more opportunity to convert tribute and booty to his own use than Scipio had

Lucius Scipio defeated Antiochus in pitched battle B.C. 187
at Magnesia, Publius Scipio was sick at Elaea, some days' journey away. That army, he went on, was no smaller than that of Hannibal, with which they had fought in Africa; that same Hannibal,[1] who had been commander in the Punic War, was there among many other generals of the king. And the war indeed had been so conducted that no one could find fault even with fortune; it was in the peace that ground for accusation was sought; the peace, they said, had been sold. On this point, he maintained, the ten commissioners were likewise accused, by whose advice the peace had been concluded;[2] although some of the ten commissioners had come forward to accuse Gnaeus Manlius, this charge had failed, not only to win belief in his guilt, but even to delay his triumph.

LIX. But, by Hercules, they say in the case of Scipio that the very terms of peace were suspicious, as too favourable to Antiochus; for it was implied that his kingdom had been left undiminished; that after his defeat he possessed everything he had owned before the war; that, although he had had a great quantity of gold and silver, none of it had been turned in to the treasury, all of it converted to private use; but (as to the last charge) had not so much gold and silver been displayed before the eyes of all in the triumph of Lucius Scipio as had not been carried in ten other triumphs if they were combined into one? [3] For what (returning to their first charge) shall I say had. The following sentence is almost conclusive proof that the Scipios were victims of political animus, regardless of their actual guilt or innocence.

[3] Cf. XXXVII. lix. 2–5.

bus regni dicam? Asiam omnem et proxima Euro-5 pae tenuisse Antiochum. Ea quanta regio orbis terrarum sit, a Tauro monte in Aegaeum usque prominens mare, quot non urbes modo sed gentes 6 amplectatur, omnes scire. Hanc regionem dierum plus triginta iter in [2] longitudinem, decem inter duo maria in latitudinem patentem usque ad Tauri 7 montis iuga Antiocho ademptam, expulso in ultimum angulum orbis terrarum. Quid si gratuita pax esset plus adimi ei potuisse? Philippo victo Macedoniam, Nabidi Lacedaemonem relictam, nec Quinctio crimen quaesitum; non enim habuisse eum Africanum fratrem; cuius cum [3] gloria prodesse L. Scipioni 8 debuisset, invidiam nocuisse. Tantum auri argentique iudicatum esse in domum L. Scipionis illatum quantum venditis omnibus bonis redigi non posset.
Ubi [4] ergo esse regium aurum, ubi tot hereditates 9 acceptas? In domo quam sumptus non exhauserint, exstare debuisse novae fortunae cumulum. At enim, quod ex bonis redigi non possit, ex corpore et tergo per vexationem et contumelias L. Scipionis 10 petituros inimicos, ut in carcere inter fures nocturnos et latrones vir clarissimus includatur et in robore et tenebris exspiret, deinde nudus ante carcerem 11 proiciatur. Non id Corneliae magis familiae quam urbi Romanae fore erubescendum.

[1] latum Crévier: sit latum σ.
[2] iter in Weissenborn: in M: om. σ.
[3] cuius cum ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. σ.
[4] ubi ed. Frobeniana 1535: id ubi σ.

about the boundaries of the kingdom of Antiochus? B.C. 187
He had held, as we know, all Asia and the adjacent parts of Europe. How great this section of the earth is, extending from the Taurus mountain clear to the Aegean Sea, how many cities and even nations it contains, all men know. This region, extending in length more than thirty days' march and ten in width between the two seas, as far as the crest of the Taurus mountain, had been taken from Antiochus, who had been driven back into the farthest corner of the earth. What more, if the peace involved no loss of territory, could have been taken from him? Macedonia, he reminded them, had been left to Philip after his defeat, Lacedaemon to Nabis, nor had Quinctius been the victim of a trumped-up charge; he, of course, had not had Africanus as a brother; although his fame should have aided Lucius Scipio, his unpopularity had done him harm. Judgment had been given that so much gold and silver had been conveyed into the house of Lucius Scipio as the sale of all his property could not produce. Where, then, he asked, was the royal gold, where all the legacies he had received? In a house which extravagance had not drained, this heap of new wealth should be apparent. But, of course, what cannot be obtained from his property the foes of Lucius Scipio will seek from his body and from his back, by means of persecution and insults, so that this most distinguished man may be shut up in prison among thieves of the night and brigands and may die in the darkness of a cell and then be cast out naked before the prison. And it was not, he concluded, to the Cornelian family so much as to the City of Rome that this would bring the blush of shame.

u.c. 67

LX. Adversus ea Terentius praetor rogationem Petilliam et senatus consultum [1] et iudicium de L. 2 Scipione factum recitavit; se, ni referatur pecunia in publicum, quae iudicata sit, nihil habere quod faciat nisi ut prendi damnatum et in vincula duci iubeat. 3 Tribuni cum in consilium secessissent, paulo post C. Fannius ex sua collegarumque aliorum, praeter Gracchum, sententia pronuntiavit praetori non intercedere 4 tribunos quo minus sua potestate utatur. Ti. Gracchus ita decrevit, quo minus ex bonis L. Scipionis quod iudicatum sit redigatur, se non intercedere 5 praetori; L. Scipionem, qui regem opulentissimum orbis terrarum devicerit, imperium populi Romani 6 propagaverit in ultimos terrarum fines, regem Eumenem, Rhodios, alias tot Asiae urbes devinxerit populi Romani beneficiis, plurimos duces hostium in triumpho ductos carcere incluserit, non passurum inter hostes populi Romani in carcere et vinculis 7 esse, mittique eum se iubere. Tanto adsensu auditum est decretum, adeo dimissum Scipionem laeti homines viderunt ut vix in eadem civitate videretur 8 factum iudicium. In bona deinde L. Scipionis possessum publice quaestores praetor misit. Neque in iis non modo vestigium ullum comparuit pecuniae regiae, sed nequaquam tantum redactum est quantae 9 summae damnatus fuerat. Collata ea pecunia a cognatis amicisque et clientibus est L. Scipioni ut, si

[1] et senatus consultum ed. Frobeniana 1535: ex senatus consulto r.

LX. In reply to this the praetor Terentius read the Petillian law and the decree of the senate and the sentence which had been passed on Lucius Scipio; unless the fine which was imposed was paid to the treasury there was nothing which he could do except to order the convicted man to be arrested and taken to prison. When the tribunes had withdrawn for consultation, a little later Gaius Fannius announced that, in accordance with the decision of himself and his colleagues except Gracchus, the tribunes would not interfere with the praetor so as to prevent his exercise of his authority. Tiberius Gracchus thus decreed: that he would not prevent the praetor from collecting, out of the property of Lucius Scipio, the fine that had been imposed; Lucius Scipio himself, who had conquered the richest king in the world, extended the empire of the Roman people to the most distant limits of the earth, bound King Eumenes, the Rhodians, and so many cities of Asia by obligations to the Roman people, had led in his triumph and thrown into prison so many leaders of the enemy, he would not permit to lie in prison and in chains among the enemies of the Roman people, and he ordered him to be released. This decree was listened to with such applause and with such joy did men see Scipio released that it scarcely seemed that the trial had taken place in the same state. Then the praetor sent the quaestors to take possession, on behalf of the state, of the property of Lucius Scipio. Not only was there no trace of the king's wealth discovered, but by no means was there as much property found as would equal the amount of the fine. Such a sum was raised for Lucius Scipio by his relatives and friends and clients that if he had B.C. 187 acciperet eam, locupletior aliquanto esset quam ante calamitatem fuerat. Nihil accepit; quae necessaria ad cultum erant, redempta ei a proximis cognatis sunt; verteratque Scipionum invidia in praetorem et consilium eius et accusatores.

received it he would have been a great deal richer than he had been before his downfall. He accepted none of it; what was necessary for a decent existence was redeemed for him by his nearest relatives; and the ill-will against the Scipios ended by recoiling upon the heads of the praetor and his advisers and the accusers.[1] B.C. 187

[1] It has seemed unwise to attempt any further reconstruction of these scenes in the drama of the Scipios. Livy is unusually conscious of the contradictions and difficulties of the story without being able to solve the problems they create. Excessive space would be required to discuss these problems adequately, and the results would be incommensurate with the effort required.

LIBRI XXXVIII PERIOCHA

M. Fulvius cos. in Epiro Ambracienses obsessos in deditionem accepit, Cephallaniam subegit, Aetolis perdomitis pacem dedit. Cn. Manlius cos., collega eius, Gallograecos, Tolostobogios et Tectosagos et Trocmos,[1] qui Brenno duce in Asiam transierant, cum soli citra Taurum montem non apparerent, vicit. Eorum origo et quo modo[2] ea loca quae tenent occupaverint refertur. Exemplum quoque virtutis et pudicitiae in femina traditur. Quae cum regis Gallograecorum uxor fuisset, capta centurionem qui ei vim intulerat occidit. Lustrum a censoribus conditum est. Censa sunt civium capita CCLVIII CCCX.[3] Cum Ariarathe, Cappadociae rege, amicitia iuncta est. Cn. Manlius, contradicentibus X legatis ex quorum consilio foedus cum Antiocho conscripserat, de Gallograecis acta pro se in senatu causa triumphavit. Scipio Africanus die ei dicta, ut quidam tradunt. a Q.[4] Petillio tr. pl., ut quidam, a Naevio, quod praeda ex Antiocho capta aerarium fraudasset, postquam is dies venit, evocatus in rostra: "Hac die" inquit "Quirites, Carthaginem vici," et prosequente populo Capitolium escendit. Inde ne amplius tribuniciis iniuriis vexaretur, in voluntarium exilium Liternum[5] concessit. Incertum ibi an Romae defunctus sit; nam monumentum

[1] These names, much confused in the MSS., are corrected from the Livy text.

[2] quo modo Jahn: quoniam N P.

[3] The number is left as it is found in the MSS., although it disagrees with that given by Livy in xxxvi. 10 above.

[4] Q. Sigonius ex vet. lib.: p. codd.

[5] Liternum edd.: om. codd.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXVIII

THE consul Marcus Fulvius besieged the Ambraciots in Epirus and received their surrender, subdued Cephallania, and granted peace to the conquered Aetolians. Gnaeus Manlius his colleague defeated the Gallogrecians, that is, the Tolostobogii, the Tectosagi and the Trocmi, who had crossed into Asia under the leadership of Brennus, when they alone of the peoples on this side of the Taurus mountain did not offer submission. Their origin and the manner in which they gained control of the districts which they hold are recorded. An example also of virtue and chastity in a woman is reported. She, being the wife of the king of the Gallogrecians, and being a prisoner, slew a centurion who had violated her. The lustrum was closed by the censors. The number of citizens rated was two hundred and fifty-eight thousand three hundred and ten. A treaty of friendship was concluded with Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia. Gnaeus Manlius, despite the opposition of the ten commissioners by whose advice he had put into form the treaty with Antiochus, having pleaded his cause in person before the senate, triumphed over the Gallogrecians. Scipio Africanus, having been accused, as some say, by Quintus Petillius the tribune of the people, as others say, by Naevius, on the ground that he had cheated the treasury of booty taken from Antiochus, when the day came and he was summoned to the Rostra, said: "On this day, citizens, I conquered Carthage," and with the people attending him ascended the Capitoline. Then, to avoid being further annoyed by the attacks of the tribunes, he withdrew to Liternum in voluntary exile. It is uncertain whether he died there or in Rome;

eius utrobique fuit. L. Scipio Asiaticus, frater Africani, eodem crimine peculatus accusatus damnatusque cum in vincula et carcerem duceretur, Ti. Sempronius Gracchus tr. pl.. qui antea Scipionibus inimicus fuerat, intercessit et ob id beneficium Africani filiam duxit. Cum quaestores in bona eius publice possidenda missi essent,[1] non modo in his ullum vestigium pecuniae regiae apparuit, sed nequaquam tantum redactum quantae summae erat damnatus. Collatam a cognatis et amicis innumerabilem pecuniam accipere noluit; quae necessaria ei erant ad cultum redempta.

[1] missi essent J. F. Gronovius: misissent codd.

for there was a tomb to him in each place. Lucius Scipio Asiaticus, the brother of Africanus, was accused and convicted on the same charge of embezzlement, and, when he was being led to chains and prison, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, tribune of the people, who had formerly been an enemy of the Scipios, intervened for him, and in return for that act of kindness was given the daughter of Africanus in marriage. When the quaestors had been sent to take possession, on behalf of the state, of the property of Scipio, not only was there no trace of the king's wealth discovered, but by no means was there as much found as would equal the amount of the fine. A countless amount of money collected by his relatives and friends he refused to accept; what was necessary for a decent existence for him was redeemed.

BOOK XXXIX

LIBER XXXIX

I. Dum haec, si modo hoc anno acta sunt, Romae aguntur, consules ambo in Liguribus gerebant bellum. 2 Is hostis velut natus ad continendam inter magnorum intervalla bellorum Romanis militarem disciplinam erat; nec alia provincia militem magis ad virtutem 3 acuebat. Nam Asia et amoenitate urbium et copia terrestrium maritimarumque rerum et mollitia hostium regiisque opibus ditiores quam fortiores exerci- 4 tus faciebat. Praecipue sub imperio Cn. Manlii solute ac neglegenter habiti sunt. Itaque asperius paulo iter in Thracia et exercitatior hostis magna 5 clade eos castigavit. In Liguribus omnia erant quae militem excitarent, loca montana et aspera, quae et ipsis capere labor erat et ex praeoccupatis deicere 6 hostem; et itinera ardua angusta infesta insidiis; hostis levis et velox et repentinus, qui nullum usquam tempus,[1] nullum locum quietum aut securum esse

[1] nullum usquam tempus Heraeus: usquam tempus nullus F.

---

[1] The allusion is to the uncertainty as to the date of the trial of the Scipios: cf. XXXVIII. lvi. 2 above.

[2] The assignment of Liguria to the consuls was reported at XXXVIII. xliii. 8 above.

[3] This charge was not made in the speech of Furius Aemilius (XXXVIII. xlv.–xlvi. above), but is brought up again in

BOOK XXXIX

I. While these things were going on at Rome, if indeed they did happen that year,[1] both consuls were waging war against the Ligurians.[2] This enemy was born, as it were, to keep alive the military discipline of the Romans during the intervals between their great wars; nor did any province do more to put an edge to the soldier's courage. For Asia, on account of the pleasantness of its cities and the abundance of its treasures of land and sea and the feebleness of the enemy and the wealth of its kings, made armies richer rather than braver. Especially under the command of Gnaeus Manlius was discipline slackly and indifferently enforced;[3] and so a somewhat more difficult advance in Thrace and a rather more effective enemy had taught them a lesson with great slaughter. Among the Ligurians there was everything to keep an army alert—hilly and rough ground, which was difficult both for the men themselves to occupy and to dislodge the enemy who had already occupied it, and roads difficult, narrow, dangerous by reason of ambuscades; an enemy lightly equipped, mobile and unexpected in his movements, who permitted no time or place whatever to be quiet or B.C. 187

vi. 5 and vii. 3 below. Its presence here, in contrast with its absence from the preceding Book, may indicate a change of source.

sineret: oppugnatio necessaria munitorum castellorum, laboriosa simul periculosaque: inops regio, quae parsimonia astringeret milites, praedae haud
7 multum praeberet. Itaque non lixa sequebatur, non iumentorum longus ordo agmen extendebat. Nihil praeter arma et viros omnem spem in armis
8 habentes erat. Nec deerat umquam cum iis vel materia belli vel causa, quia propter domesticam inopiam vicinos agros incursabant. Nec tamen in discrimen summae rerum pugnabatur.

II. C. Flaminius consul, cum Friniatibus[1] Liguribus in agro eorum pluribus proeliis secundis factis,
2 in deditionem gentem accepit et arma ademit. Ea quia non sincera fide tradebant, cum castigarentur, relictis vicis in montem Auginum profugerunt.
3 Confestim secutus est consul. Ceterum effusi rursus, et pars maxima inermes, per invia et rupes deruptas praecipitantes fugerunt, qua sequi hostis non posset. Ita trans Appenninum abierunt. Qui castris se
4 tenuerant, circumsessi et expugnati sunt. Inde trans Appenninum ductae legiones. Ibi montis quem ceperant altitudine paulisper se tutati mox in deditionem concesserunt. Tum conquisita cum in-
5 tentiore cura arma et omnia adempta. Translatum deinde ad Apuanos Ligures bellum, qui in agrum

[1] cum Friniatibus ed. Frobeniana 1535 : confirmatis r.

---

[1] This reflection seems to be fully warranted by Livy's narrative, and raises doubts as to the legitimacy of some of the Ligurian triumphs, which were still notorious in Cicero's day (Brutus 255).

[2] The Friniates lived mainly south of the Apennines.

[3] The Apuani lived west of the Apennines. A raid covering safe; the besieging of fortified points was necessary B.C. 187 and at the same time toilsome and dangerous; the district was poor, which constrained the soldiers to simple living and offered them little plunder. Accordingly, no civilian camp-follower went along, no long train of pack-animals stretched out the column. There was nothing except arms and men who placed all their trust in their arms. Nor was there ever wanting either the occasion or the cause for war with them, because on account of their poverty at home they were constantly raiding their neighbours' lands. And yet the fighting never brought about the final settlement of a campaign.[1]

II. The consul Gaius Flaminius, having fought several successful battles with the Ligurian Friniates [2] on their own soil, received the tribe in surrender and disarmed them. When they were reproved because they did not surrender the arms in good faith, they abandoned their villages and fled to the Auginus mountain. The consul followed in haste. But they scattered again, the largest part being unarmed, and fled at full speed through pathless country and over steep cliffs where the enemy could not pursue. So they departed across the Apennines. Those who remained in camp were surrounded and captured. Thence the legions were led across the Apennines. There the enemy defended themselves for a while by virtue of the height of the mountain which they had occupied, but presently yielded in surrender. At this time the arms were sought out with greater diligence, and all were taken from them. The war was then transferred to the Ligurian Apuani,[3] who all the country between Pisa and Bologna was an ambitious undertaking.

Pisanum Bononiensemque ita incursaverant ut coli 6 non possent. His quoque perdomitis consul pacem dedit finitimis. Et quia a bello quieta ut esset provincia effecerat, ne in otio militem haberet, viam a 7 Bononia perduxit Arretium. M. Aemilius alter consul agros Ligurum vicosque, qui in campis aut vallibus erant, ipsis montes duos Ballistam [1] Suismontiumque 8 tenentibus, deussit depopulatusque est. Deinde eos qui in montibus erant adortus primo levibus proeliis fatigavit, postremo coactos in aciem descendere iusto proelio devicit, in quo et aedem Dianae vovit.
9 Subactis cis Appenninum omnibus, tum transmontanos adortus—in his et Friniates [2] Ligures erant, quos non adierat C. Flaminius—omnes Aemilius subegit arma-que ademit et de montibus in campos multitudinem 10 deduxit. Pacatis Liguribus exercitum in agrum Gallicum duxit viamque a Placentia ut Flaminiae 11 committeret Ariminum perduxit. Proelio ultimo, quo cum Liguribus signis collatis conflixit, aedem Iunoni reginae vovit. Haec in Liguribus eo anno gesta.

III. In Gallia M. Furius praetor insontibus Ceno-manis, in pace speciem belli quaerens, ademerat

[1] Ballistam edd. vett. : uallis tamen et similia ϝ.
[2] Friniates ϝ : erisinates M.

---

[1] If, as seems probable, there was already a road from Arezzo to Rome, the new road provided a route to Gaul shorter than the Via Flaminia (built in 220 B.C. by the father of the present consul) and the Via Aemilia (see sect. 10 below), by way of Ariminum.

[2] In XL. lii. 1–3, Aemilius, as censor in 179 B.C., received had raided the lands of Pisa and Bologna to such effect that they could not be cultivated. Having subdued them too, the consul granted peace to their neighbours. And, because he had brought it to pass that the province was free from war, that he might not leave his army idle, he built a road from Bologna to Arezzo.[1] The other consul, Marcus Aemilius, burned and ravaged the farms and villages of the Ligurians which were in the plains or valleys, the people themselves holding the two mountains Ballista and Suismontium. Then, attacking the men who were on the mountains, he first wore them out with small skirmishes, then forced them to come down to face his battle-line and defeated them in a regular battle, in the course of which he vowed a temple to Diana.[2] Having subdued all the tribes on this side of the Apennines, Aemilius then attacked those beyond the mountains—among whom there were those Ligurian Friniates also whom Gaius Flaminius had not visited—and subdued them all, took away their arms and transferred the population from the hills to the plains. Leaving the Ligurians pacified, he led his army into Gallic territory, and built a road from Placentia to Ariminum, in order to make a junction with the Via Flaminia. In the final encounter in which he engaged the Ligurians in a pitched battle, he vowed a temple to Juno Regina. Such were the events of that year among the Ligurians. B.C. 187

III. In Gaul the praetor Marcus Furius, seeking in peace the appearance of war, had disarmed the an appropriation for games in connection with the dedication of temples to Diana and Juno Regina (sect. 11 below). Both were near the Circus Flaminius.

U.C. 567

2 arma. Id [1] Cenomani questi Romae apud senatum reiectique ad consulem Aemilium, cui ut cognosceret statueretque senatus permiserat, magno certamine
3 cum praetore habito obtinuerunt causam. Arma reddere Cenomanis, decedere provincia praetor iussus.
4 Legatis deinde sociorum Latini nominis, qui toto undique ex Latio frequentes convenerant, senatus datus est. His querentibus magnam multitudinem civium suorum Romam commigrasse et ibi censos esse,
5 Q. Terentio Culleoni praetori negotium datum est ut eos conquireret, et quem C. Claudio M. Livio [2] censoribus postve eos censores ipsum parentemve eius apud se censum esse probassent socii, ut redire eo
6 cogeret, ubi censi essent. Hac conquisitione duodecim milia Latinorum domos redierunt, iam tum multitudine alienigenarum urbem onerante.

IV. Priusquam consules redirent Romam, M. Ful-
2 vius proconsul ex Aetolia redit; isque ad aedem Apollinis in senatu cum de rebus in Aetolia Cephallaniaque ab se gestis disseruisset, petit a patribus ut,

[1] id Gelenius : inde et M : inde aut in σ.
[2] Liuio σ : iulio M.

---

[1] The Cenomani had been quiet since their defeat by Cethegus in 197 B.C. (XXXIII. xxiii. 4).

[2] The allied cities and the Latin colonies, whose status was similar, were under obligations to Rome, in accordance with their several treaties and constitutions. The migration of their citizens to Rome increased the burden on those who remained at home; the status of the migrants is uncertain; they seem not to have acquired Roman citizenship and yet to have been assessed by the censors.

Cenomani,[1] who had given no provocation: they in B.C. 187 consequence laid a complaint about this before the senate at Rome, and were referred to the consul Aemilius, whom the senate had authorized to investigate and decide, and after engaging in great contention with the praetor won their case. The praetor was ordered to restore their arms to the Cenomani and to leave the province.

Then ambassadors from the allies of the Latin confederacy, who had assembled from all Latium in great numbers from every side, were granted an audience by the senate. When they complained that a great number of their citizens had migrated to Rome and had been assessed there,[2] Quintus Terentius Culleo the praetor was instructed to search them out, and, on receiving from the allies proof that any person or the father of such person[3] had been assessed among the allies in the censorship of Gaius Claudius and Marcus Livius[4] or after that censorship, to compel such persons to return to the places where they had been registered. As a consequence of this investigation twelve thousand of the Latins returned home, for even at that time a multitude of aliens was burdening the city.

IV. Before the consuls returned to Rome, the proconsul Marcus Fulvius returned from Aetolia; and when the senate, in the temple of Apollo, had heard him describe his exploits in Aetolia and Cephallania, he asked the Fathers, if they deemed it proper, by [3] Since only heads of families were listed, the omission of this provision would have opened the door to persons who moved to Rome in the lifetimes of their fathers.

[4] They were censors in 204 B.C. The date chosen was probably arbitrary and the result of compromise.

u.c. 567

si [1] aequum censerent, ob rem publicam bene ac feliciter gestam et diis immortalibus honorem haberi
3 iuberent et sibi triumphum decernerent. M. Aburius tribunus plebis si quid de ea re ante M. Aemilii consulis adventum decerneretur intercessurum se
4 ostendit: eum contra dicere velle, proficiscentemque in provinciam ita sibi mandasse ut ea disceptatio integra in adventum suum servaretur. Fulvium temporis iacturam facere: senatum etiam praesente
5 consule [2] quod vellet decreturum. Tum [3] Fulvius: si aut simultas M. Aemilii secum ignota hominibus esset, aut quam is eas inimicitias impotenti ac prope
6 regia ira exerceret, tamen non fuisse ferendum absentem consulem et deorum immortalium honori obstare et meritum debitumque triumphum morari,
7 imperatorem rebus egregie gestis victoremque exercitum cum praeda et captivis ante portas stare, donec consuli ob hoc ipsum moranti redire Romam libitum
8 esset. Verum enimvero cum sint notissimae sibi cum consule inimicitiae, quid ab eo quemquam posse aequi exspectare, qui per infrequentiam furtim sena-
9 tus consultum factum ad aerarium detulerit, Ambraciam non videri vi captam, quae aggere ac vineis oppugnata sit, ubi incensis operibus alia de integro

[1] ut si Madvig: ut F. [2] pr. con. F: con. pr. M.
[3] tum Muretus: om. F.

reason of his successful and fortunate conduct of the B.C. 187 business of the state, both to order that honour should be paid to the immortal gods and to decree a triumph to him. Marcus Aburius, tribune of the people, announced that, if any decree on that subject were passed prior to the arrival of Marcus Aemilius, he would veto it: Aemilius, he said, wished to speak against it, and on his departure to his province had given instructions to him, the tribune, that this whole discussion should be reserved for his return. Fulvius, he said, was suffering the loss of time only: even with the consul present the senate would decree what he wished. Then Fulvius replied: if either the quarrel between him and Marcus Aemilius was unknown to men, or if it was unknown with what uncontrollable and almost tyrannical passion Aemilius carried on the feud, even then it would have been unendurable that the absent consul should both stand in the way of the honour due to the immortal gods and delay an earned and merited triumph, and that a general after a brilliant campaign and a victorious army with its booty and prisoners should stand before the gates until it suited the fancy of a consul (who stayed away for just that reason) to return to Rome. But as a matter of fact, he went on, since his quarrel with the consul was very well known, what justice could be expected from a man who had deposited in the treasury a decree of the senate passed stealthily and in a poorly attended meeting, to the effect that Ambracia did not appear to have been taken by force, although it had been besieged with a mound and sheds, where other works were built anew when the first were burned, where the battle had raged facta sint, ubi circa muros supra subterque terram 10 per dies quindecim pugnatum, ubi a prima luce, cum iam transcendisset muros miles, usque ad noctem diu anceps proelium tenuerit, ubi plus tria milia hostium 11 sint caesa. Iam de deorum immortalium templis spoliatis in capta urbe qualem calumniam . . .[1] ad 12 pontifices attulerit? Nisi Syracusarum ceterarumque captarum civitatium ornamentis urbem exornari fas fuerit, in Ambracia una capta non valuerit belli ius.

13 Se et patres conscriptos orare et ab tribuno petere, ne se superbissimo inimico ludibrio esse sinant.

V. Undique omnes alii deprecari tribunum, alii castigare. Ti. Gracchi collegae plurimum oratio 2 movit. Ne suas quidem simultates pro magistratu exercere boni exempli esse: alienarum vero simulta-tum tribunum plebis cognitorem fieri turpe et indignum collegii eius potestate et sacratis legibus 3 esse. Suo quemque iudicio et homines odisse aut diligere et res probare aut improbare debere, non pendere ex alterius vultu ac nutu nec alieni momentis animi circumagi, adstipularique irato consuli tribunum
4 plebei; et quid privatim M. Aemilius mandaverit

[1] lacunam susp. Madvig.

---

[1] I have filled out the suspected lacuna in what seems the simplest way consistent with grammar and sense. Madvig takes the passage to mean that spoils captured by Fulvius would bestow fame upon the pontiffs when they used them in the decoration of temples. The action referred to is the decree reported in XXXVIII. xliv. 5 above.

[2] Adstipulari is at least semi-technical, implying giving support to a legal proceeding.

[3] The consul had no right to issue official orders of this sort to the tribune.

around the walls for fifteen days, above and below the ground, where from daylight, after the soldiers had already scaled the walls, until nightfall the battle had been maintained with uncertain issue, and where more than three thousand of the enemy had perished? Then, too, as to the plundering of the temples of the immortal gods in the captured city, what kind of insult was it that he had turned the booty over to the pontiffs?[1] Unless it had been lawful to adorn the City with the trophies of Syracuse and other captured towns, but that in the case of captured Ambracia alone the law of war did not hold good! He begged the conscript Fathers and he requested of the tribune that they should not permit him to be made a laughing-stock by this most insolent personal enemy. B.C. 187

V. Everybody from all sides began to address the tribune, some with entreaties, some with reproaches. The argument of his colleague Tiberius Gracchus impressed him most. He said that it was not a good precedent to follow up even one's own contentions while holding a magistracy; but it was disgraceful for a tribune of the people to take sides in the contentions of others, and unworthy of the authority of that college and of its sacred laws. Each man, he said, in accordance with his own judgment should both hate or love men and approve or disapprove measures, should not depend upon another's expression and nod or be led this way or that under the pressure of another's will, nor should a tribune of the people be a second[2] to an angry consul; he should not remember any commission which Marcus Aemilius had privately[3] entrusted to him, and forget the office of tribune which had been meminisse, tribunatum sibi a populo Romano mandatum oblivisci, et mandatum pro auxilio ac libertate privatorum, non pro consulari regno. Ne hoc quidem cernere eum, fore ut memoriae ac posteritati mandetur eiusdem collegii alterum et duobus tribunis plebis suas inimicitias remisisse rei publicae, alterum alienas et mandatas exercuisse. His victus castigationibus tribunus cum templo excessisset, referente Ser. Sulpicio praetore triumphus M. Fulvio est decretus. Is cum gratias patribus conscriptis egisset, adiecit ludos magnos se Iovi optimo maximo eo die quo Ambraciam cepisset vovisse: in eam rem sibi centum pondo auri a civitatibus collatum: petere ut ex ea pecunia quam in triumpho latam [1] in aerario positurus esset id aurum secerni iuberent. Senatus pontificum collegium consuli iussit, num omne id aurum in ludos consumi necesse esset. Cum pontifices negassent ad religionem pertinere quanta impensa in ludos fieret, senatus Fulvio quantum impenderet permisit, dum ne summam octoginta milium excederet. Triumphare mense Ianuario statuerat: sed cum audisset consulem M. Aemilium, litteris M. Aburii tribuni plebis acceptis de remissa intercessione, ipsum ad

[1] latam ϝ: delatam M.

---

[1] The first tribune is, of course, Gracchus himself.

[2] Neither the vow nor the contribution has been mentioned before. The celebration of the games is reported at XXII. 1 below.

[3] The denomination of the coins is omitted. If the allowance was 80,000 sesterces, as is probable, only twenty pounds of gold would be used: 80,000 denarii would amount to eighty pounds. In either case, one wonders what became of the balance. The senate's decree probably did not forbid the expenditure of private funds in addition.

entrusted to him by the Roman people, and entrusted B.C. 187 for the purpose of rendering assistance to and protecting the liberty of private citizens, not of bolstering up the consular authority. Aburius, he said, did not even see that the result would be that tradition and posterity would have the story how in the same college one of two tribunes of the people had laid aside his own enmities for the sake of the state, the other had assumed and carried on those of another because they had been entrusted to him.[1] When the tribune, overcome by this criticism, had left the temple, on the motion of Servius Sulpicius the praetor the triumph was voted to Marcus Fulvius. When he had thanked the conscript Fathers, he went on to say that he had vowed the Great Games to Jupiter Optimus Maximus on the day when he had captured Ambracia, that for this purpose a hundred pounds of gold had been contributed by the cities;[2] he requested that, from this money which he had planned to display in his triumph and then deposit in the treasury, this particular sum should, by their order, be kept separate. The senate ordered the college of pontiffs to be consulted whether it was necessary to spend this entire sum on the games. When the pontiffs had replied that from the point of view of religion it was immaterial how much should be spent on the games, the senate granted permission to Fulvius for whatever amount he should spend, provided that he did not exceed a total of eighty thousand sesterces.[3] He had decided to triumph in the month of January; but when he had heard that the consul Marcus Aemilius, having received a letter from Marcus Aburius about the withdrawal of the veto, was himself coming to Rome impediendum triumphum Romam venientem aegrum in via substitisse, ne plus in triumpho certaminum quam in bello haberet, praetulit triumphi diem.

13 Triumphavit ante diem decimum Kal. Ianuarias de 14 Aetolis et de Cephallania. Aureae coronae centum duodecim pondo ante currum latae [1] sunt; argenti pondo milia octoginta tria, auri pondo ducenta quad-
15 raginta tria, tetrachma Attica centum octodecim milia, Philippei nummi duodecim milia trecenti [2] viginti duo, signa aenea septingenta octoginta quinque, signa marmorea ducenta triginta, arma tela
16 cetera spolia hostium, magnus numerus, ad hoc catapultae, ballistae, tormenta omnis generis; duces aut Aetoli et Cephallanes aut regii ab Antiocho ibi relicti
17 ad viginti septem. Multos eo die priusquam in urbem inveheretur in circo Flaminio tribunos praefectos equites centuriones, Romanos sociosque, donis militaribus donavit. Militibus ex praeda vicenos quinos [3] denarios divisit, duplex centurioni, triplex equiti.

VI. Iam consularium comitiorum appetebat tempus: quibus quia M. Aemilius, cuius sortis ea cura

[1] latae σ: delatae M.
[2] trecenti Madvig: trecenta M: quadringenti σ.
[3] vicenos quinos ed. Aldina: uiginti quinque M: quinos vicenos σ.

---

[1] It is always uncertain whether pondo should be read in such passages, and I have followed in each case what seems to be the most trustworthy reading of the MSS. The additional complication exists in this instance, that Livy has already recorded (XXXVIII. ix. 13 above) the gift of a single crown weighing 150 pounds, but we do not know that this was to be carried in the procession, nor whether the gift for the games should be included. See also the note to the passage just quoted.

to hinder the triumph, but had been detained on the B.C. 187 way by illness, he advanced the date, lest he have more strife in the triumph than in the war. He triumphed the tenth day before the Kalends of January over the Aetolians and over Cephallania. Golden crowns of one hundred and twelve pounds [1] in weight were carried before his car; he displayed also eighty-three thousand pounds of silver, two hundred and forty-three pounds of gold, one hundred and eighteen thousand Attic four-drachma pieces, twelve thousand three hundred and twenty-two coins called "Philippei," [2] bronze statues to the number of seven hundred and eighty-five and two hundred and thirty of marble, weapons, javelins and other spoils taken from the enemy, in great quantities, besides catapults, ballistae and every variety of artillery; there marched also generals, whether Aetolians and Cephallanians or commanders of the king left there by Antiochus, to the number of twenty-seven. On that day, before he rode into the City, in the Circus Flaminius,[3] he presented many tribunes, prefects, cavalrymen and centurions, Romans and allies, with military decorations.[4] To the soldiers, out of the booty, he gave twenty-five denarii each, twice that amount to each centurion, and thrice to each cavalryman.

VI. The time for the consular elections was now at hand; for these, since Marcus Aemilius, to whom

[2] Cf. XXXVII. lix. 4 and the note.

[3] This circus was probably the only enclosure of suitable size which lay outside the pomerium.

[4] The generosity of Fulvius in this respect was severely criticized by Cato (Gellius V. vi. 24–25, where a fragment of a speech is preserved).

.c. 67 erat. occurrere non potuit, C. Flaminius Romam venit. Ab eo creati [1] consules Sp. Postumius Albinus
2 Q. Marcius Philippus. Praetores inde facti T. Maenius P. Cornelius Sulla C. Calpurnius Piso M. Licinius Lucullus C. Aurelius Scaurus L. Quinctius Crispinus.
3 Extremo anni, magistratibus iam creatis, ante diem tertium nonas Martias Cn. Manlius Volso de Gallis
4 qui Asiam incolunt triumphavit. Serius ei triumphandi causa fuit, ne Q. Terentio Culleone praetore causam lege Petillia diceret et incendio alieni
5 iudicii quo L. Scipio damnatus erat conflagraret, eo infensioribus in se quam in illum iudicibus quod disciplinam militarem severe ab eo conservatam successorem ipsum omni genere licentiae corrupisse
6 fama attulerat. Neque ea sola infamiae erant, quae in provincia procul ab oculis facta narrabantur, sed ea etiam magis quae in militibus eius cotidie aspicie-
7 bantur. Luxuriae enim peregrinae origo ab exercitu Asiatico invecta in urbem est. Ii primum [2] lectos aeratos, vestem stragulam pretiosam, plagulas et alia textilia, et quae tum magnificae supellectilis habebantur, monopodia et abacos Romam advexerunt.

[1] creati σ : decreti M.
[2] ii primum Gelenius : inde primum σ.

---

[1] It may be accidental that so many of the names on this list are relatively unfamiliar: it may also be true that conditions had made the Romans somewhat distrustful of the families that had been exercising political and military leadership and had encouraged them to look elsewhere for talent.

[2] Manlius probably had good reason to fear prosecution, especially before Culleo, who had displayed his inflexibility in the trial of Scipio. Until his triumph Manlius was outside the City and exempt from prosecution by virtue of his proconsulship; in the brief interval between the triumph and this responsibility had fallen by lot, was unable to B.C. 187 come, Gaius Flaminius came to Rome. He announced the choice of Spurius Postumius Albinus and Quintus Marcius Philippus as consuls. Then the praetors were elected, Titus Maenius, Publius Cornelius Sulla, Gaius Calpurnius Piso, Marcus Licinius Lucullus, Gaius Aurelius Scaurus, Lucius Quinctius Crispinus.[1]

At the end of the year, when the new magistrates had already been elected, on the third day before the Nones of March, Gnaeus Manlius Volso triumphed over the Gauls who inhabit Asia. His purpose in delaying so long to celebrate his triumph was to avoid pleading his cause under the Petillian law before the praetor Quintus Terentius Culleo and being himself consumed in the flames of another's trial, in which Lucius Scipio had been condemned,[2] seeing that the jurors were far more hostile to him than to Scipio because it was rumoured that he, when he succeeded Scipio, had ruined the military discipline, strictly maintained by his predecessor, by permitting every kind of licence. Nor was this only a matter of unfavourable report of what was said to have happened in the province, far from their eyes, but still more of what was apparent every day among his soldiers. For the beginnings of foreign luxury were introduced into the City by the army from Asia. They for the first time imported into Rome couches of bronze, valuable robes for coverlets, tapestries and other products of the loom, and what at that time was considered luxurious furniture—tables with one the Ides (when a new praetor would succeed Culleo) a trial could not be completed. See the notes to XXXVIII. liv. 3; 7; lviii. 12 above.

8 Tunc psaltriae sambucistriaeque et convivalia alia ludorum oblectamenta addita epulis: epulae quoque ipsae et cura et sumptu maiore apparari coeptae. 9 Tum coquus, vilissimum antiquis mancipium et aestimatione et usu, in pretio esse, et quod ministerium fuerat, ars haberi coepta. Vix tamen illa, quae tum conspiciebantur, semina erant futurae luxuriae.

VII. In triumpho tulit Cn. Manlius coronas aureas ducentas duodecim,[1] argenti pondo ducenta viginti milia, auri [2] pondo duo milia centum tria, tetrachmum [3] Atticum centum viginti septem milia, cistophori ducenta quinquaginta, Philippeorum [4] aureorum 2 nummorum sedecim milia trecentos viginti; et arma spoliaque multa Gallica carpentis travecta, duces hostium duo et quinquaginta ducti ante currum. Militibus quadragenos binos denarios divisit, duplex centurioni, triplex in equites, et stipendium duplex 3 dedit;[5] multi omnium ordinum donati militaribus donis currum secuti sunt. Carminaque a militibus ea in imperatorem dicta, ut facile appareret in ducem indulgentem ambitiosumque ea dici, triumphum esse

[1] ducentas duodecim Lentz: ducentas duodecim pondo M: decem duas σ: CC decem pondo duas edd. vett.
[2] auri Gelenius: argenti σ.
[3] tetrachmum Bekker: tetracinum et similia σ.
[4] Philippeorum edd. vett.: philipporum σ.
[5] dedit Madvig: in pedites dedit σ.

---

[1] Pliny (XXXIV. 14) derives from the annalist Piso a similar list of articles of luxury first imported at this time. It does not necessarily follow that Piso was Livy's source also.
[2] He probably includes dancing-girls, buffoons, and the like.

pedestal and sideboards.[1] Then female players of the lute and the harp and other festal delights of entertainments[2] were made adjuncts to banquets; the banquets themselves, moreover, began to be planned with both greater care and greater expense. At that time the cook, to the ancient Romans the most worthless of slaves, both in their judgment of values and in the use they made of him, began to have value, and what had been merely a necessary service came to be regarded as an art. Yet those things which were then looked upon as remarkable were hardly even the germs of the luxury to come. B.C. 187

VII. In his triumph Gnaeus Manlius carried two hundred and twelve golden crowns, two hundred and twenty thousand pounds of silver, two thousand one hundred and three pounds of gold, of Attic four-drachma pieces one hundred and twenty-seven thousand, of cistophori[3] two hundred and fifty thousand, of gold Philippei sixteen thousand three hundred and twenty; there were also arms and many Gallic spoils transported in carts, and fifty-two leaders of the enemy led before his car. To the soldiers he gave forty-two denarii each, twice that amount to each centurion and thrice to each cavalryman, and he gave them also double pay;[4] many of all ranks, presented with military decorations, followed his car. Such songs were sung by the soldiers about their commander that it was easily seen that they were sung about an indulgent leader who sought popularity, and that the triumph was

[3] Cf. XXXVII. xlvi. 3.

[4] The grammar of the sentence is peculiar and there is corruption in the text. I have given what seems to be the most reasonable translation.

4 militari magis favore quam populari celebrem. Sed ad populi quoque gratiam conciliandam amici Manlii 5 valuerunt: quibus adnitentibus senatus consultum factum est ut, ex pecunia quae in triumpho translata esset, stipendium collatum a populo in publicum quod eius solutum antea non esset solveretur. Vicenos quinos et semisses in milia aeris quaestores urbani cum fide et cura solverunt.

6 Per idem tempus tribuni militum duo ex duabus Hispaniis cum litteris C. Atinii et L.[1] Manlii qui eas 7 provincias obtinebant venerunt. Ex iis litteris cognitum est Celtiberos Lusitanosque in armis esse et sociorum agros populari. De ea re consultationem inte-gram senatus ad novos magistratus reiecit.

8 Ludis Romanis eo anno, quos [2] P. Cornelius Cethe-gus A. Postumius Albinus faciebant, malus in circo instabilis in signum Pollentiae procidit atque id 9 deiecit. Ea religione moti patres et diem unum adiciendum ludorum censuerunt et signa duo pro 10 uno reponenda et novum auratum faciendum. Et plebeii ludi ab aedilibus C. Sempronio Blaeso et M.
Furio Lusco diem unum instaurati sunt.

[1] L. ed. Frobeniana 1535 : cn. ϝ.
[2] quos edd. vett. : quo ϝ.

[1] This stipendium may have been some extraordinary tax, paid in an emergency and regarded as a loan to the treasury, analogous to the contribution mentioned in XXVI. xxxvi. 8 (cf. XXIX. xvi. 1; XXXI. xiii. 2–9; XXXIII. xlii. 2). Nothing further is known of it, and no translation can be more than a guess.

[2] It is not clear whether this is a final payment, a payment on account, or a favourable composition with creditors.

marked more by the applause of the military than B.C. 187 of the civil population. But the friends of Manlius were able to curry favour with the people as well; at their instance a decree of the senate was passed that, with regard to the tax [1] which had been paid by the people into the treasury, whatever portion of this was in arrears should be paid out of the money which had been carried in the triumph. The city quaestors, displaying fidelity and diligence, paid twenty-five and one-half asses each per thousand asses.[2]

About the same time two tribunes of the soldiers arrived from the two Spains, bringing dispatches from Gaius Atinius and Lucius Manlius, who were holding those provinces.[3] From these letters it was learned that the Celtiberians and Lusitanians were in arms and were ravaging the lands of the allies. The decision regarding the whole question was left to the new magistrates by the senate.

At the Roman Games that year, which Publius Cornelius Cethegus and Aulus Postumius Albinus gave, a badly-fixed mast [4] in the Circus fell on the statue of Pollentia and shattered it. The Fathers, disturbed by this omen, voted, first, that one day should be added to the Games, and, second, that two statues should be set up in place of one and the new one gilded. The Plebeian Games too were repeated, to the extent of one day, by the plebeian aediles Gaius Sempronius Blaesus and Marcus Furius Luscus.

[3] Cf. XXXVIII. xxxv. 10 above for their assignment.

[4] Probably this was a permanent mast set up on the spina; less probably it was one of the spars which supported the awnings.

VIII. Insequens annus Sp. Postumium Albinum a.u.c. 568 et Q. Marcium Philippum consules ab exercitu bellorumque et provinciarum cura ad intestinae coniura-
2 tionis vindictam avertit. Praetores provincias sortiti sunt, T. Maenius urbanam, M. Licinius Lucullus inter cives et peregrinos, C. Aurelius Scaurus Sardiniam, P. Cornelius Sulla Siciliam, L. Quinctius Crispinus Hispaniam citeriorem, C. Calpurnius Piso
3 Hispaniam ulteriorem. Consulibus ambobus quaestio de clandestinis coniurationibus decreta est. Graecus ignobilis in Etruriam primum venit nulla cum arte earum, quas multas ad animorum corporumque cultum nobis eruditissima omnium gens invexit, sacri-
4 ficulus et vates; nec is qui aperta religione, propalam et quaestum et disciplinam profitendo, animos errore imbueret, sed occultorum et nocturnorum antistes
5 sacrorum. Initia erant quae primo paucis tradita sunt deinde vulgari coepta sunt per viros mulieresque. Additae voluptates religioni vini et epularum, quo
6 plurium animi illicerentur. Cum vinum animos incendisset,[1] et nox et mixti feminis mares, aetatis tenerae maioribus, discrimen omne pudoris exstinxissent, corruptelae primum omnis generis fieri coeptae, cum ad id quisque, quo natura pronioris libidinis
7 esset, paratam voluptatem haberet. Nec unum genus noxae, stupra promiscua ingenuorum feminarumque erant, sed falsi testes, falsa signa testamen-
8 taque [2] et indicia ex eadem officina exibant: venena

[1] animos incendisset Madvig: om. F.
[2] testamentaque Roever: testimoniaque F.

[1] Rome's treatment of the Christians illustrates her general attitude towards meetings conducted with any degree of concealment.

VIII. The following year diverted the consuls B.C. 186
Spurius Postumius Albinus and Quintus Marcius Philippus from the army and the administration of wars and provinces to the suppression of an internal conspiracy. The praetors drew lots for their provinces, Titus Maenius receiving the city jurisdiction, Marcus Licinius Lucullus that between citizens and aliens, Gaius Aurelius Scaurus Sardinia, Publius Cornelius Sulla Sicily, Lucius Quinctius Crispinus Nearer Spain, Gaius Calpurnius Piso Farther Spain. To both consuls the investigation of secret conspiracies was decreed. A nameless Greek came first to Etruria, possessed of none of those many arts which the Greek people, supreme as it is in learning, brought to us in numbers for the cultivation of mind and body, but a dabbler in sacrifices and a fortune-teller; nor was he one who, by frankly disclosing his creed and publicly proclaiming both his profession and his system, filled minds with error, but a priest of secret rites performed by night.[1] There were initiatory rites which at first were imparted to a few, then began to be generally known among men and women. To the religious element in them were added the delights of wine and feasts, that the minds of a larger number might be attracted. When wine had inflamed their minds, and night and the mingling of males with females, youth with age, had destroyed every sentiment of modesty, all varieties of corruption first began to be practised, since each one had at hand the pleasure answering to that to which his nature was more inclined. There was not one form of vice alone, the promiscuous matings of free men and women, but perjured witnesses, forged seals and wills and evidence, all issued from this same indidem intestinaeque caedes, ita ut ne corpora quidem interdum ad sepulturam exstarent. Multa dolo, pleraque per vim audebantur. Occulebat vim quod prae ululatibus tympanorumque et cymbalorum strepitu nulla vox quiritantium inter stupra et caedes exaudiri poterat.

U.C. 682

IX. Huius mali labes ex Etruria Romam veluti contagione morbi penetravit. Primo urbis magnitudo capacior patientiorque talium malorum ea celavit: tandem indicium hoc maxime modo ad Postu-
2 mium consulem pervenit. P. Aebutius, cuius pater publico equo stipendia fecerat, pupillus relictus, mortuis deinde tutoribus sub tutela Duroniae matris
3 et vitrici T. Sempronii Rutili educatus fuerat. Et mater dedita viro erat et vitricus, quia tutelam ita gesserat ut rationem reddere non posset, aut tolli pupillum aut obnoxium sibi vinculo aliquo fieri cupie-
4 bat. Via una corruptelae Bacchanalia erant. Mater adulescentem [1] appellat: se pro aegro eo vovisse ubi primum convaluisset, Bacchis eum se initiaturam; damnatam voti benignitate deum exsolvere id velle. Decem dierum castimonia opus esse: decimo die cenatum, deinde pure lautum in sacrarium deductu-

[1] adolescentem σ: adulescentulum M.

---

[1] He was an eques equo publico, receiving an annual allowance for the purchase and upkeep of his mounts.

[2] A tutor rendered to the court which appointed him an account of his administration of the property, at least when the ward came of age.

[3] A vow, to a Roman, created a quasi-contractual obligation, which was as effective as the sentence of a court: hence damnatam voti.

workshop: likewise poisonings and murders of kin- B.C. 186
dred, so that at times not even the bodies were found for burial. Much was ventured by craft, more by violence. This violence was concealed because amid the howlings and the crash of drums and cymbals no cry of the sufferers could be heard as the debauchery and murders proceeded.

IX. The destructive power of this evil spread from Etruria to Rome like the contagion of a pestilence. At first the size of the City, with abundant room and tolerance for such evils, concealed it: at length information came to the consul Postumius in about this manner. Publius Aebutius, whose father had performed his military service with a horse supplied by the state,[1] was left a ward, and later, on the death of his guardians, was brought under the tutelage of his mother Duronia and his stepfather Titus Sempronius Rutilus. His mother was devoted to her husband, and his stepfather, who had so administered his guardianship that he could not render an accounting,[2] desired that the ward should either be done away with or be made dependent upon them by some tie. The one method of corrupting him was through the Bacchanalia. The mother addressed the young man: while he was sick, she said, she had vowed for him that as soon as he had recovered she would initiate him into the Bacchic rites; being compelled, by the kindness of the gods, to pay her vow,[3] she wished to fulfil it. For ten days, she continued, he must practise continence: on the tenth day she would conduct him to the banquet and then, after ritual purification,[4] to the shrine. There was a well-

[4] Paulus Diaconus (p. 248) defines pure lautum as aqua pura lautum.

5 ram. Scortum nobile libertina Hispala Faecenia, non digna quaestu cui ancillula adsuerat, etiam postquam 6 manumissa erat, eodem se genere tuebatur. Huic consuetudo iuxta vicinitatem cum Aebutio fuit, minime adulescentis aut [1] rei aut famae damnosa:
ultro enim amatus appetitusque erat et maligne omnia praebentibus suis meretriculae munificentia 7 sustinebatur. Quin eo processerat consuetudine capta ut post patroni mortem, quia in nullius manu erat, tutore ab tribunis et praetore petito, cum testamentum faceret, unum Aebutium institueret heredem.

X. Haec amoris pignora cum essent, nec quicquam secretum alter ab altero haberent, per iocum adulescens vetat eam mirari, si per aliquot noctes secu-2 buisset: religionis se causa ut voto pro valetudine sua facto liberetur, Bacchis initiari velle. Id ubi mulier audivit, perturbata "dii meliora!" inquit:
mori et sibi et illi satius esse quam id faceret; et in caput eorum detestari minas periculaque, qui id 3 suasissent. Admiratus cum verba tum perturbatio-nem tantam adulescens parcere exsecrationibus iubet:
4 matrem id sibi adsentiente vitrico imperasse. "Vi-

[1] aut ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. MS.

---

[1] i.e., worthy of something better.

[2] A freedwoman was subject to the manus of her patron, who was often her former owner. Faecenia had no patron and no relative who would naturally assume the responsibilities of guardianship, and could therefore petition the praetor and the tribunes jointly for the appointment of a tutor, whose approval was necessary to the performance of any legal act, such as making a will.

known courtesan, a freedwoman named Hispala Faecenia, not worthy [1] of the occupation to which, while still a mere slave, she had accustomed herself, and even after she had been manumitted she maintained herself in the same way. Between her and Aebutius, since they were neighbours, an intimacy developed, not at all damaging either to the young man's fortune or to his reputation; for he had been loved and sought out without any effort on his part, and, since his own relatives made provision for all his needs on a very small scale, he was maintained by the generosity of the courtesan. More than that, she had gone so far, under the influence of their intimacy, that, after the death of her patron, since she was under the legal control of no one, having petitioned the tribunes and the praetor for a guardian, when she made her will she had instituted Aebutius as her sole heir.[2] B.C. 186

X. Since there were these bonds of affection between them, and neither had any secrets from the other, the young man jestingly told her not to be surprised if he were away from her for several nights: as a matter of religious duty, he said, to free himself from a vow made for the sake of his health, he intended to be initiated in the Bacchic rites. When the woman heard this she exclaimed in great distress, "The gods forbid!" She said that it would be much better both for him and for her to die rather than do that; and she called down curses and vengeance upon the heads of those persons who had given him this counsel. Wondering both at her language and at her so manifest distress, the young man bade her spare her curses: it was his mother, he said, with the approval of his stepfather, who had ordered it.

tricus ergo " inquit " tuus—matrem enim insimulare forsitan fas non sit—pudicitiam famam spem vitamque tuam perditum ire hoc facto properat." 5 Eo magis mirabundo quaerentique quid rei esset, pacem veniamque precata deorum dearumque, si coacta caritate eius silenda enuntiasset, ancillam se ait dominae comitem id sacrarium intrasse, liberam 6 numquam eo accessisse. Scire corruptelarum omnis generis eam officinam esse: et iam biennio constare 7 neminem initiatum ibi maiorem annis viginti. Ut quisque introductus sit, velut victimam tradi sacerdotibus. Eos deducere in locum, qui circumsonet ululatibus cantuque symphoniae et cymbalorum et tympanorum pulsu, ne vox quiritantis,[1] cum per vim 8 stuprum inferatur, exaudiri possit. Orare inde atque obsecrare ut eam rem quocumque modo discuteret nec se eo praecipitaret, ubi omnia infanda patienda 9 primum, deinde facienda essent. Neque ante dimisit eum quam fidem dedit adulescens ab his sacris se temperaturum.

XI. Postquam domum venit, et mater mentionem intulit, quid eo die, quid deinceps ceteris, quae ad sacra pertinerent, faciendum esset, negat eorum se quicquam facturum nec initiari sibi in animo esse. 2 Aderat sermoni vitricus. Confestim mulier exclamat Hispalae concubitu carere eum decem noctes non

[1] quiritantis ed. Parisina 1513 : quaeritantis F.

"Your stepfather, then," she replied, "is making B.C. 186 haste—for perhaps it is not right to accuse your mother—to destroy in this way your virtue, your reputation and your life." As he marvelled the more and asked her what she meant, beseeching gods and goddesses for peace and forgiveness if, compelled by her love for him, she had declared what should be concealed, she told him that while she was a slave she had attended her mistress to that shrine, but that as a free woman she had never visited it. She knew, she said, that it was the factory of all sorts of corruptions; and it was known that for two years now no one had been initiated who had passed the age of twenty years. As each was introduced, he became a sort of victim for the priests. They, she continued, would lead him to a place which would ring with howls and the song of a choir and the beating of cymbals and drums, that the voice of the sufferer, when his virtue was violently attacked, might not be heard. Then she begged and besought him to put an end to this matter in any way he could and not to plunge into a situation where all disgraceful practices would have first to be endured and then performed. Nor would she let him go until the young man gave her his promise that he would have nothing to do with those mysteries.

XI. When he came home and his mother began to tell him what he had to do that day and on the following days in connection with the rites, he informed her that he would do none of them and that it was not his intention to be initiated. His stepfather was present at the interview. Straightway the woman exclaimed that he could not do without his mistress Hispala for ten nights; infected with the posse; illius excetrae [1] delenimentis et venenis imbutum nec parentis nec vitrici nec deorum verecundiam habere. Iurgantes hinc mater, hinc vitricus

3 cum quattuor eum servis domo exegerunt. Adulescens inde ad Aebutiam se amitam contulit, causamque ei, cur esset a matre eiectus, narravit, deinde ex auctoritate eius postero die ad consulem Postu-
4 mium arbitris remotis rem detulit. Consul post diem tertium redire ad se iussum dimisit; ipse Sulpiciam gravem feminam, socrum suam, percunctatus est,
5 ecquam anum Aebutiam ex Aventino nosset. Cum ea nosse probam et antiqui moris feminam respondisset, opus esse sibi ea conventa dixit: mitteret nun-
6 tium ad eam, ut veniret. Aebutia accita ad Sulpiciam venit et consul paulo post, velut forte intervenisset, sermonem de Aebutio fratris eius filio infert.
7 Lacrimae mulieri obortae et miserari casum adulescentis coepit, qui spoliatus fortunis, a quibus minime oporteret, apud se tunc esset, eiectus a matre, quod probus adulescens—dii propitii essent—obscenis, ut fama esset, sacris initiari nollet.

XII. Satis exploratum de Aebutio ratus consul non vanum auctorem esse, Aebutia dimissa socrum rogat ut Hispalam indidem ex Aventino libertinam, non ignotam viciniae, arcesseret ad sese: eam quoque
2 esse quae [2] percunctari vellet. Ad cuius nuntium

[1] excetrae ed. Frobeniana 1531 : exterae F.
[2] quae ed. Frobeniana 1531 : quam F.

[1] The prayer is due to the fear that the compliment might provoke the jealousy of the gods.

enchantments and poisons of that vampire, he had no B.C. 186 respect for his mother or his stepfather or yet the gods. Berating him thus, his mother on one side, his stepfather with four slaves on the other, drove him from the house. The young man thereupon went to his aunt Aebutia and explained to her the reason why his mother had driven him out, and on her recommendation the following day reported the affair to the consul Postumius with no witnesses present. The consul sent him away with instructions to return the third day; he himself asked his mother-in-law Sulpicia, a woman of high character, whether she was acquainted with an elderly woman, Aebutia, from the Aventine. When she replied that she knew that she was a virtuous woman of the old style, he said that he felt the need of an interview with her: Sulpicia should send her a message to come. Aebutia, summoned by Sulpicia, came, and a little later the consul, as if he had come in by chance, brought in an allusion to Aebutius, the son of her brother. Tears flowed from the woman's eyes, and she began to bewail the fate of the young man who was robbed of his estate by those who should least of all have treated him thus, and who was then at her house, driven from home by his mother because the virtuous youth—might the gods be gracious [1]—refused to be initiated into rites which, if reports were to be believed, were full of lewdness.

XII. The consul, thinking that he had learned enough about Aebutius to trust his story, sent Aebutia away and asked his mother-in-law to summon to her Hispala, also from the Aventine, a freedwoman and no stranger in the neighbourhood: he wished to ask her also certain questions. Hispala, perturbata Hispala, quod ad tam nobilem et gravem feminam ignara causae arcesseretur, postquam lictores in vestibulo turbamque consularem et consulem ipsum conspexit, prope exanimata est. In interiorem partem aedium abductam socru adhibita consul, si vera dicere inducere in animum posset, negat perturbari debere: fidem vel a Sulpicia, tali femina, vel ab se acciperet: expromeret sibi, quae in luco Stimulae [1] Bacchanalibus in sacro nocturno solerent fieri. Hoc ubi audivit, tantus pavor tremorque omnium membrorum mulierem cepit, ut diu hiscere non posset. Tandem confirmata puellam admodum se ancillam initiatam cum domina ait: aliquot annis, ex quo manumissa sit, nihil quid ibi fiat scire. Iam id ipsum consul laudare, quod initiatam se non infitiaretur: sed et cetera eadem fide expromeret. Neganti ultra quicquam scire, non eandem dicere, si coarguatur ab alio, ac per se [2] fatenti veniam aut gratiam fore; eum sibi omnia exposuisse, qui ab illa audisset.

XIII. Mulier haud dubie, id quod erat, Aebutium indicem arcani rata esse, ad pedes Sulpiciae procidit, et eam primo orare coepit, ne mulieris libertinae cum amatore sermonem in rem non seriam modo sed capi-

[1] Stimulae Gronovius: simili et simulae et simul F.
[2] per se ed. Moguntina: om. F.

[1] Stimula is identified with Semele, the mother of Bacchus. The name is obviously appropriate. The grove was near the Tiber and the Aventine.

alarmed by her message, because without knowing B.C. 186 the reason she was summoned to so important and respected a woman, when she saw the lictors in the vestibule and the consul's retinue and the consul himself, almost swooned. Conducting her into the inner part of the house, with his mother-in-law present, the consul told her that if she could bring herself to tell the truth she had no cause to feel alarmed; she would receive a pledge either from Sulpicia, a woman of such standing, or from himself; she should state to them what rites were usually performed in the nocturnal orgies at the Bacchanalia in the grove of Stimula.[1] When she heard this, such fear and trembling seized the woman in all her limbs that for a long time she could not open her mouth. Being at length restored, she said that when quite young and a slave she had been initiated with her mistress; that for many years after her manumission she had known nothing of what went on there. Then the consul praised her on this ground, that she had not denied that she had been initiated; but she was to tell, under the same pledge, the rest as well. When she insisted that she knew nothing more, he told her that she would not receive the same forgiveness or consideration if she were convicted by the evidence of someone else as if she had confessed of her own accord; the man, he added, who had heard it from her had told him the whole story.

XIII. The woman, thinking without a doubt, as was indeed the fact, that Aebutius had revealed the secret, threw herself at the feet of Sulpicia, and at first began to plead with her not to try to turn the chatter of a freedwoman with her lover into something that was not merely serious but even fatal:

talem etiam verti vellet: se terrendi eius causa, non 3 quod sciret quicquam, ea locutam esse. Hic Postumius accensus ira tum quoque ait eam cum Aebutio se amatore cavillari credere, non in domo gravissimae feminae et cum consule loqui. Et Sulpicia attollere paventem, simul illam [1] adhortari, simul iram generi
4 lenire. Tandem confirmata, multum incusata perfidia Aebutii, qui optime de ipso [2] meritae talem
5 gratiam rettulisset, magnum sibi metum deorum, quorum occulta initia enuntiaret, maiorem multo dixit hominum esse, qui se indicem manibus suis
6 discerpturi essent. Itaque hoc se Sulpiciam, hoc consulem orare, ut se extra Italiam aliquo ablegarent,[3] ubi reliquum vitae degere tuto posset.
7 Bono animo esse iubere eam consul et sibi curae fore
8 dicere ut Romae tuto habitaret. Tum Hispala originem sacrorum expromit. Primo sacrarium id feminarum fuisse, nec quemquam eo virum admitti solitum. Tres in anno statos [4] dies habuisse, quibus interdiu Bacchis initiarentur; sacerdotes in vicem 9 matronas creari solitas. Pacullam Anniam Campanam sacerdotem omnia, tamquam deum monitu, immutasse: nam et viros eam primam filios suos initiasse, Minium et Herennium Cerrinios; et nocturnum sacrum ex diurno, et pro tribus in anno diebus quinos singulis mensibus dies initiorum fecisse.

[1] illam $\bar{r}$: etiam M.
[2] de ipso Madvig: in eo ipso $\bar{r}$.
[3] ablegarent $\bar{r}$: amandarent M.
[4] statos Gelenius: statutos $\bar{r}$.

---

[1] One thinks of the Bacchae of Euripides.

she had spoken thus for the purpose of frightening B.C. 186 him, not because she knew anything. At this point Postumius, inflamed with wrath, said that she believed even then that she was jesting with her lover Aebutius, and not speaking in the house of a most respectable matron and in the presence of a consul. Sulpicia too lifted up the terror-stricken woman, and at the same time encouraged her and mollified the anger of her son-in-law. At length regaining her self-control, and complaining much of the treachery of Aebutius, who had returned such gratitude to one who deserved so well of him, she declared that she feared greatly the wrath of the gods whose hidden mysteries she was to reveal, but far more the wrath of the men who would, if she informed against them, with their own hands tear her limb from limb. Accordingly she begged Sulpicia and the consul that they would banish her somewhere outside Italy, where she could pass the rest of her life in safety. The consul bade her be of good cheer and assured her that it would be his responsibility to see that she could safely live in Rome. Then Hispala set forth the origin of the mysteries. At first, she said, it was a ritual for women,[1] and it was the custom that no man should be admitted to it. There had been three days appointed each year on which they held initiations into the Bacchic rites by day; it was the rule to choose the matrons in turn as priestesses. Paculla Annia, a Campanian, she said, when priestess, had changed all this; for she had been the first to initiate men, her sons, Minius and Herennius Cerrinius; she had held the rites by night and not by day, and instead of a mere three days a year she had established five days of initiation in every month.

10 Ex quo in promiscuo sacra sint et permixti viri feminis, et noctis licentia accesserit, nihil ibi facinoris, nihil flagitii praetermissum. Plura virorum inter sese
11 quam feminarum esse stupra. Si qui minus patientes dedecoris sint et pigriores ad facinus, pro victimis immolari. Nihil nefas ducere, hanc summam inter
12 eos religionem esse. Viros, velut mente capta, cum iactatione fanatica corporis vaticinari; matronas Baccharum habitu crinibus sparsis cum ardentibus facibus decurrere ad Tiberim, demissasque in aquam faces, quia vivum sulpur cum calce insit, integra
13 flamma efferre. Raptos a diis homines dici, quos machinae illigatos ex conspectu in abditos specus abripiant: eos esse, qui aut coniurare aut sociari 14 facinoribus aut stuprum pati noluerint. Multitudinem ingentem, alterum iam prope populum esse; in his nobiles quosdam viros feminasque. Biennio proximo institutum esse, ne quis maior viginti annis initiaretur: captari aetates et erroris et stupri patientes.

XIV. Peracto indicio advoluta rursus genibus pre-
2 ces easdem, ut se ablegaret, repetivit. Consul rogat socrum ut aliquam partem aedium vacuam faceret

---

[1] The torches probably contained the elements mentioned in the form of a mixture of free sulphur and calcium sulphate, which is still to be found in Italy. A torch of this composition, if burning well, would not be extinguished by a brief or partial immersion in water, so that the Bacchanals could perform the feat mentioned if they were reasonably swift in their movements. Calcium sulphate will not burn; free elementary sulphur burns, and we should probably translate vivum as "free" or "elementary" and therefore "burnable." But it is rather remarkable that Livy, who was not a scientist, should have approached scientific fact so closely. I am indebted for this information to Dr. E. Ward Tillotson,

From the time that the rites were performed in common, men mingling with women and the freedom of darkness added, no form of crime, no sort of wrong-doing, was left untried. There were more lustful practices among men with one another than among women. If any of them were disinclined to endure abuse or reluctant to commit crime, they were sacrificed as victims. To consider nothing wrong, she continued, was the highest form of religious devotion among them. Men, as if insane, with fanatical tossings of their bodies, would utter prophecies. Matrons in the dress of Bacchantes, with dishevelled hair and carrying blazing torches, would run down to the Tiber, and plunging their torches in the water (because they contained live sulphur mixed with calcium) would bring them out still burning.[1] Men were alleged to have been carried off by the gods who had been bound to a machine and borne away out of sight to hidden caves: they were those who had refused either to conspire or to join in the crimes or to suffer abuse. Their number, she said, was very great, almost constituting a second state; among them were certain men and women of high rank. Within the last two years it had been ordained that no one beyond the age of twenty years should be initiated: such ages could be involved in error and also were ready to permit abuse. B.C. 186

XIV. Having finished her testimony, again falling at their feet, she repeated the same prayers that they should banish her. The consul asked his mother-in-law to vacate some part of the house into quo Hispala immigraret. Cenaculum super aedes datum est, scalis ferentibus in publicum obseratis, 3 aditu in aedes verso. Res omnes Faeceniae extemplo translatae et familia arcessita, et Aebutius migrare ad consulis clientem iussus.

Assistant Director, and Dr. W. W. Duecker, Senior Industrial Fellow, both of the Mellon Institute of Industrial Research of the University of Pittsburgh.

Ita cum indices ambo in potestate essent, rem ad senatum Postumius defert, omnibus ordine expositis, quae delata primo, quae deinde ab se inquisita forent. 4 Patres pavor ingens cepit, cum publico nomine, ne quid [1] eae coniurationes coetusque nocturni fraudis occultae aut periculi importarent, tum privatim suorum cuiusque [2] vicem, ne quis adfinis ei noxae esset. 5 Censuit autem senatus gratias consuli agendas quod eam rem et cum singulari cura et sine ullo tumultu 6 investigasset. Quaestionem deinde de Bacchanalibus sacrisque nocturnis extra ordinem consulibus mandant; indicibus Aebutio ac Faeceniae ne fraudi ea res sit curare et alios indices praemiis invitare 7 iubent; [3] sacerdotes eorum sacrorum, seu viri seu feminae essent, non Romae modo sed per omnia fora et conciliabula conquiri, ut in consulum potestate essent; edici praeterea in urbe Roma et per totam 8 Italiam edicta mitti, ne quis qui Bacchis initiatus esset coisse aut convenisse sacrorum causa velit, neu quid talis rei divinae fecisse. Ante omnia ut quaestio

[1] ne quid Gelenius: quid $\bar{r}$.
[2] cuiusque Doering: quisque $\bar{r}$.
[3] iubent $\bar{r}$: iubet M.

[1] The cenaculum was an apartment on an upper floor, with its own stairway to the street. In this house there was also a stairway to the inside of the house.

which Hispala might move. An apartment above B.C. 186
the house [1] was assigned to her, the stairs leading to the street being closed up and an approach to the house arranged. All the household goods of Faecenia were at once moved and her slaves summoned, and Aebutius was directed to move to the house of a client of the consul.

When both witnesses were thus available, Postumius laid the matter before the senate, everything being set forth in detail; first what had been reported, then what he had himself discovered. Great panic seized the Fathers, both on the public account, lest these conspiracies and gatherings by night might produce something of hidden treachery or danger, and privately, each for himself, lest some relative might be involved in the mischief. The senate, moreover, decreed that the consul should be thanked because he had investigated the affair both with great industry and without creating any confusion. Then the investigation of the Bacchanals and their nocturnal orgies they referred to the consuls, not as a part of their regular duties; they directed the consuls to see to it that the witnesses Aebutius and Faecenia did not suffer harm and to attract other informers by rewards; the priests of these rites, whether men or women, should be sought out, not only at Rome but through all the villages and communities, that they might be at the disposal of the consuls; that it should be proclaimed in addition in the city of Rome and that edicts should be sent through all Italy, that no one who had been initiated in the Bacchic rites should presume to assemble or come together for the purpose of celebrating those rites or to perform any such ritual. Before all, it

de iis habeatur, qui coierint coniuraverintve, quo
9 stuprum flagitiumve inferretur. Haec senatus decrevit. Consules aedilibus curulibus imperarunt ut sacerdotes eius sacri omnes conquirerent, comprehensosque libero conclavi ad quaestionem servarent; aediles plebis viderent [1] ne qua sacra in operto fierent.
10 Triumviris capitalibus mandatum est ut vigilias disponerent per urbem servarentque ne qui nocturni coetus fierent, utque ab incendiis caveretur; adiutores triumviris quinqueviri uls cis [2] Tiberim suae quisque regionis aedificiis praeessent.

XV. Ad haec officia dimissis magistratibus consules in rostra escenderunt, et contione advocata cum sollemne carmen precationis, quod praefari, priusquam populum adloquantur, magistratus solent, peregisset
2 consul, ita coepit. "Nulli umquam contioni, Quirites, tam non [3] solum apta sed etiam necessaria haec sollemnis deorum comprecatio fuit, quae vos admoneret hos esse deos, quos colere venerari precarique
3 maiores vestri instituissent, non illos, qui pravis et externis religionibus captas mentes velut furialibus stimulis ad omne scelus et ad omnem libidinem
4 agerent. Equidem nec quid taceam nec quatenus

[1] viderent Gronovius: uidere σ.
[2] uls cis Heusinger: uti cis et similia σ.
[3] tam non σ: non M.

---

[1] They were minor magistrates charged with assisting in the maintenance of order.

[2] It is not known whether these two boards of five, one operating on the left bank (cis) of the river, the other on the right bank (uls), were regular magistrates or posses of civilians, organized in case of emergency. The form of the title, especially the ante-classical uls (standing for ultra much as cis is used for citra), suggests an early origin.

was decreed that an inquiry should be conducted regarding those persons who had come together or conspired for the commission of any immorality or crime. Such was the decree of the senate. The consuls ordered the curule aediles to search out all the priests of this cult and to keep them under surveillance, in free custody for the investigation; the plebeian aediles were to see to it that no celebration of the rites should be held in secret. The task was entrusted to the triumviri capitales[1] of placing guards through the City, of seeing that no night meetings were held, and of making provision against fire; as assistants to the triumviri, the quinqueviri uls cis Tiberim[2] were to stand guard each over the buildings of his own district. B.C. 186

XV. When the magistrates had been dispatched to these posts, the consuls mounted the Rostra and called an informal meeting[3] of the people, and, when the consul had finished the regular formula of prayer which magistrates are accustomed to pronounce before they address the people, he thus began: "Never for any assembly, citizens, has this formal prayer to the gods been not only so suitable but even so necessary, a prayer which reminds us that these are the gods whom our forefathers had appointed to be worshipped, to be venerated, to receive our prayers, not those gods who would drive our enthralled minds with vile and alien rites, as by the scourges of the Furies, to every crime and every lust. For my part, I do not discover what I should refrain from telling or how far I should speak out. If you

[3] Cf. XXXI. vii. 1 and the note. This meeting was called simply to hear the news about the conspiracy and the measures taken to suppress it.

A.U.C. 568

proloquar invenio. Si aliquid ignorabitis, ne locum neglegentiae dem, si omnia nudavero, ne nimium
5 terroris offundam vobis vereor. Quidquid dixero, minus quam pro atrocitate et magnitudine rei dictum scitote esse: ut ad cavendum satis sit, dabitur opera
6 a nobis. Bacchanalia tota iam pridem Italia et nunc per urbem etiam multis locis esse, non fama solum accepisse vos sed crepitibus etiam ululatibusque nocturnis, qui personant tota urbe, certum habeo, 7 ceterum quae ea res sit, ignorare: alios deorum aliquem cultum, alios concessum ludum et lasciviam credere esse, et, qualecumque sit, ad paucos pertinere.
8 Quod ad multitudinem eorum attinet, si dixero multa milia hominum esse, ilico necesse est exterreamini,
9 nisi adiunxero qui qualesque sint. Primum igitur mulierum magna pars est, et is fons mali huiusce fuit; deinde simillimi feminis mares, stuprati et constupratores, fanatici, vigiliis,[1] vino, strepitibus
10 clamoribusque nocturnis attoniti. Nullas adhuc vires coniuratio, ceterum incrementum ingens virium ha-11 bet, quod in dies plures fiunt. Maiores vestri ne vos quidem, nisi cum aut vexillo in arce posito comitiorum causa exercitus eductus[2] esset, aut plebi concilium tribuni edixissent, aut aliquis ex magistratibus ad contionem vocasset, forte temere coire voluerunt; et ubicumque multitudo esset, ibi et

[1] vigiliis Crévier: uigiles F.
[2] eductus Gruter: edictus F.

---

[1] For the military character of the comitia centuriata, of which the speaker is thinking, cf. XXXI. v. 9 and the note.

[2] In the concilium plebis; Livy generally seems not to distinguish between this and the comitia tributa, but the problem is too complicated for discussion here.

are left ignorant of anything, I fear that I shall B.C. 186 leave room for carelessness; if I lay bare everything, that I shall scatter abroad an excess of terror. Whatever I shall have said, be sure that my words are less than the dreadfulness and the gravity of the situation: to take sufficient precautions will be our task. As to the Bacchanalia, I am assured that you have learned that they have long been celebrated all over Italy and now even within the City in many places, and that you have learned this not only from rumour but also from their din and cries at night, which echo throughout the City, but I feel sure that you do not know what this thing is: some believe that it is a form of worship of the gods, others that it is an allowable play and pastime, and, whatever it is, that it concerns only a few. As regards their number, if I shall say that there are many thousands of them, it cannot but be that you are terrified, unless I shall at once add to that who and of what sort they are. First, then, a great part of them are women, and they are the source of this mischief; then there are men very like the women, debauched and debauchers, fanatical, with senses dulled by wakefulness, wine, noise and shouts at night. The conspiracy thus far has no strength, but it has an immense source of strength in that they grow more numerous day by day. Your ancestors did not wish that even you should assemble casually and without reason, except when the standard was displayed on the citadel and the army was assembled for an election,[1] or the tribunes had announced a meeting of the plebeians,[2] or some of the magistrates had called you to an informal gathering; and wherever there was a crowd collected they thought that there should also be a

u.c. 568

legitimum rectorem multitudinis censebant esse de-12 bere. Quales primum nocturnos coetus, deinde pro-
13 miscuos mulierum ac virorum esse creditis? Si quibus aetatibus initientur mares sciatis, non misereat vos eorum solum, sed etiam pudeat. Hoc sacramento initiatos iuvenes milites faciendos censetis, 14 Quirites? His [1] ex obsceno sacrario eductis arma committenda? Hi cooperti stupris suis alienisque pro pudicitia coniugum ac liberorum vestrorum ferro decernent?

XVI. "Minus tamen esset si flagitiis tantum effeminati forent—ipsorum id magna ex parte dedecus erat—a facinoribus manus, mentem a 2 fraudibus abstinuissent: numquam tantum malum in re publica fuit, nec ad plures nec ad plura pertinens. Quidquid his annis libidine, quidquid fraude, quidquid scelere peccatum est, ex illo uno sacrario
3 scitote ortum esse. Necdum [2] omnia in quae coniurarunt edita facinora habent. Adhuc privatis noxiis, quia nondum ad rem publicam [3] opprimendam satis virium est, coniuratio sese impia tenet. Crescit et serpit cotidie malum. Iam maius est quam ut [4] capere id privata fortuna possit: ad summam rem
4 publicam spectat. Nisi praecavetis, Quirites, iam huic diurnae, legitime ab consule vocatae, par nocturna contio esse poterit. Nunc illi vos singuli universos contionantes timent: iam ubi vos dilapsi domos et in rura vestra eritis, illi coierint, consulta-

[1] his edd. vett.: iis σ.
[2] necdum ed. Frobeniana 1535: nec σ.
[3] rem publicam σ: po. romanum (sic) M.
[4] quam ut Gelenius: quam σ.

[1] One thinks of the caustic remarks of Cato on the participation of women in public affairs (XXXIV. ii.–iv. passim).

legal leader of the crowd. Of what sort do you B.C. 186 think are, first, gatherings held by night, second, meetings of men and women in common? [1] If you knew at what ages males were initiated, you would feel not only pity for them but also shame. Do you think, citizens, that youths initiated by this oath should be made soldiers? That arms should be entrusted to men mustered from this foul shrine? Will men covered with the signs of their own debauchery and that of others fight to the death on behalf of the chastity of your wives and children?

XVI. "Yet it would be less serious if their wrongdoing had merely made them effeminate—that was in great measure their personal dishonour—and if they had kept their hands from crime and their thoughts from evil designs: never has there been so much evil in the state nor affecting so many people in so many ways. Whatever villainy there has been in recent years due to lust, whatever to fraud, whatever to crime, I tell you, has arisen from this one cult. Not yet have they revealed all the crimes to which they have conspired. Their impious compact still limits itself to private crimes, since as yet it does not have strength enough to crush the state. Daily the evil grows and creeps abroad. It is already too great to be purely a private matter: its objective is the control of the state. Unless you are on guard betimes, citizens, as we hold this meeting in the day-time, summoned by a consul, in accordance with law, so there can be one held at night. Now, as single individuals, they stand in fear of you, gathered here all together in this assembly: presently, when you have scattered to your homes and farms, they will have come together and they will take measures

c. 8 bunt de sua salute simul ac vestra pernicie: tum
5 singulis vobis universi timendi erunt. Optare igitur unusquisque vestrum debet ut bona mens suis omnibus fuerit. Si quem libido, si furor in illum gurgitem abripuit, illorum eum, cum quibus in omne flagitium et facinus coniuravit, non suum iudicet esse.
6 Ne quis etiam errore labatur vestrum, Quirites,[1] non sum securus. Nihil enim in speciem fallacius
7 est quam prava religio. Ubi deorum numen praetenditur sceleribus, subit animum timor, ne fraudibus humanis vindicandis divini iuris aliquid immixtum violemus. Hac vos religione innumerabilia decreta pontificum, senatus consulta, haruspicum denique
8 responsa liberant. Quotiens hoc patrum avorumque aetate negotium est magistratibus datum uti sacra externa fieri vetarent, sacrificulos vatesque foro circo urbe prohiberent, vaticinos[2] libros conquirerent comburerentque, omnem disciplinam sacrificandi
9 praeterquam more Romano abolerent. Iudicabant enim prudentissimi viri omnis divini humanique iuris nihil aeque dissolvendae religionis esse, quam ubi
10 non patrio sed externo ritu sacrificaretur. Haec vobis praedicenda ratus sum, ne qua superstitio agitaret animos vestros, cum demolientes nos Bacchanalia discutientesque nefarios coetus cer-

[1] Quirites Weissenborn: quidem et quod F.
[2] vaticinos ed. Frobeniana 1531: uaticinios M: etacinios et al. F.

for their own safety and at the same time for your destruction: then you, as isolated individuals, will have to fear them as a united body. Therefore each one of you should hope that all your friends have been endowed with sound minds. If lust, if madness has carried off anyone into that whirlpool, let each consider that such a person belongs, not to himself, but to those with whom he has conspired to every wickedness and wrong. I am not free of anxiety lest some even of you, citizens, may go astray through error. Nothing is more deceptive in appearance than a false religion. When the authority of the gods is put forward as a defence for crime, there steals upon the mind a fear lest in punishing human misdeeds we may violate something of divine law which became mixed up with them. From this scruple innumerable edicts of the pontiffs, decrees of the senate, and finally responses of the haruspices free you. How often, in the times of our fathers and our grandfathers, has the task been assigned to the magistrates of forbidding the introduction of foreign cults, of excluding dabblers in sacrifices and fortune-tellers from the Forum, the Circus, and the City, of searching out and burning books of prophecies, and of annulling every system of sacrifice except that performed in the Roman way. For men wisest in all divine and human law used to judge that nothing was so potent in destroying religion as where sacrifices were performed, not by native, but by foreign, ritual. I have thought that this warning should be given you, that no religious fear may disturb your minds when you see us suppressing the Bacchanalia and breaking up these nightly meetings. All these things, if the B.C. 186

c. 11 neretis. Omnia diis propitiis volentibusque fa-8 ciemus;[1] qui quia suum numen sceleribus libidinibusque contaminari indigne ferebant, ex occultis ea tenebris in lucem extraxerunt, nec patefieri, ut impunita essent, sed ut vindicarentur et oppri-12 merentur, voluerunt. Senatus quaestionem extra ordinem de ea re mihi collegaeque meo mandavit.
Nos quae ipsis nobis agenda sunt impigre exsequemur; vigiliarum nocturnarum curam per urbem 13 minoribus magistratibus mandavimus. Vos quoque aequum est, quae vestra munia sunt, quo quisque loco positus erit, quod imperabitur, impigre praestare, et dare operam, ne quid fraude noxiorum periculi aut tumultus oriatur."

XVII. Recitari deinde senatus consulta iusserunt indicique praemium proposuerunt si quis quem ad 2 se deduxisset nomenve absentis detulisset. Qui nominatus profugisset, diem certam se finituros, ad quam nisi citatus respondisset, absens damnaretur.
Si quis eorum, qui tum extra terram Italiam essent, nominaretur, ei laxiorem diem daturos, si venire ad 3 causam dicendam vellet. Edixerunt deinde ne quis quid fugae causa vendidisse neve emisse vellet; ne quis reciperet celaret ope ulla iuvaret fugientes.
4 Contione dimissa terror magnus urbe tota fuit, nec moenibus se tantum urbis aut finibus Romanis con-

[1] faciemus Bauer: ea faciemus F.

gods are favourable and willing, we shall do; they, B.C. 186 because they were indignant that their own divinity was being polluted by acts of crime and lust, have dragged these matters from darkness into the light, nor have they willed that they should be discovered in order that they might be unpunished, but that they might be coerced and suppressed. The senate has entrusted the investigation of this affair, by extraordinary assignment, to my colleague and myself. We shall zealously carry through what has to be done by ourselves; the responsibility of keeping watch through the City we have entrusted to the minor magistrates. For you too it is proper, whatever duties are assigned you, in whatever place each one is posted, to obey zealously and to see to it that no danger or confusion may arise from the treachery of criminals."

XVII. Then they ordered the decrees of the senate to be read and announced the reward to be paid the informer if anyone had brought any person before them or had reported the name of anyone who was absent. If anyone was named and had escaped, for him they would designate a fixed day, and, if he did not respond when summoned on that day, he would be condemned in his absence. If anyone was named of those who were at that time outside the land of Italy, they would fix a more elastic date if he wished to come to plead his cause. They next proclaimed that no one should venture to sell or buy anything for the purpose of flight; that no one should harbour, conceal, or in any wise aid the fugitives.

When the meeting was dismissed there was great panic in the whole City, nor was this confined only to the walls or the boundaries of Rome; but gradually

tinuit, sed passim per totam Italiam, litteris hospitum de senatus consulto et contione et edicto
5 consulum acceptis, trepidari coeptum est. Multi ea nocte, quae diem insecuta est quo in contione res palam facta est, custodiis circa portas positis fugientes a triumviris comprehensi et reducti sunt: multorum delata nomina. Quidam ex iis viri feminaeque
6 mortem sibi consciverunt. Coniurasse supra septem milia virorum ac mulierum dicebantur. Capita autem coniurationis constabat esse M. et C. Atinios[1] de plebe Romana et Faliscum L. Opicernium et Minium
7 Cerrinium Campanum: ab his omnia facinora et flagitia orta, eos maximos sacerdotes conditoresque eius sacri esse. Data opera, ut primo quoque tempore comprehenderentur. Adducti ad consules fassique de se nullam moram indicio fecerunt.

XVIII. Ceterum tanta fuga ex urbe facta erat ut, quia multis actiones[2] et res peribant, cogerentur praetores T. Maenius et M. Licinius per senatum res in diem tricesimum differre, donec quaestiones a 2 consulibus perficerentur. Eadem solitudo, quia Romae non respondebant nec inveniebantur, quorum nomina delata erant, coegit consules circa fora
3 proficisci ibique quaerere et iudicia exercere. Qui tantum initiati erant et ex carmine sacro, praeeunte verba sacerdote, precationes fecerant, quibus[3]

[1] M. et C. Atinios Sigonius: m. et l. catinios M: m. catinium et similia τ.
[2] multis actiones Gelenius: multae santiones τ.
[3] quibus H. J. Mueller: in quibus τ.

[1] Cases could not be tried because of the absence of one or both parties to suits. The remedy adopted was the proclamation of a iustitium for thirty days: this suspended all ordinary public and private business.

through all Italy, as letters were received from their B.C. 186 friends concerning the decree of the senate, concerning the assembly and the edict of the consuls, the terror began to spread. Many during the night after the day when the revelation was made in the meeting were caught trying to escape and brought back by the guards whom the triumviri had posted at the gates: the names of many were reported. Certain of these, men and women, committed suicide. In the conspiracy, it was said, more than seven thousand men and women were involved. But the heads of the conspiracy, it was clear, were Marcus and Gaius Atinius of the Roman plebs, and the Faliscan Lucius Opicernius and the Campanian Minius Cerrinius: they were the source of all wickedness and wrongdoing, the story went, and they were the supreme priests and the founders of the cult. It was seen to that at the first opportunity they were arrested. They were brought before the consuls, confessed, and asked for no delay in standing trial.

XVIII. But so numerous were the persons who had fled from the City that, since in many instances legal proceedings and causes were falling through,[1] the praetors Titus Maenius and Marcus Licinius were compelled, through the intervention of the senate, to adjourn court for thirty days, until the investigations should be finished by the consuls. The same depopulation, because at Rome men whose names had been given in did not respond or were not found, compelled the consuls to make the rounds of the villages and there investigate and conduct trials. Those who had merely been initiated and had made their prayers in accordance with the ritual formula,

c. nefanda coniuratio in omne facinus ac libidinem continebatur, nec earum rerum ullam,[1] in quas iureiurando obligati erant, in se aut alios admiserant, 4 eos in vinculis relinquebant; qui stupris aut caedibus violati erant, qui falsis testimoniis, signis adulterinis, subiectione testamentorum, fraudibus aliis con- 5 taminati, eos capitali poena adficiebant. Plures necati quam in vincula coniecti sunt. Magna vis in 6 utraque causa virorum mulierumque fuit. Mulieres damnatas cognatis, aut in quorum manu essent, tradebant, ut ipsi in privato animadverterent in eas: si nemo erat idoneus supplicii exactor, in publico 7 animadvertebatur. Datum deinde consulibus negotium est ut omnia Bacchanalia Romae primum, deinde per totam Italiam diruerent, extra quam si qua ibi 8 vetusta ara aut signum consecratum esset. In reliquum deinde senatus consulto cautum est ne qua Bacchanalia Romae neve in Italia essent. Si quis tale sacrum sollemne et necessarium duceret,[2] nec sine religione et piaculo se id omittere[3] posse, apud praetorem urbanum profiteretur, praetor 9 senatum consuleret. Si ei permissum esset, cum in senatu centum non minus essent, ita id sacrum faceret, dum ne plus quinque sacrificio interessent,

[1] ullam $\bar{\sigma}$: ulla res M.
[2] duceret ed. Parisina 1513 : duceret et $\bar{\sigma}$.
[3] id omittere Gelenius : id dimittere M : dimittere $\bar{\sigma}$.

[1] Such punishments were inflicted by virtue of patria potestas.
[2] Their antiquity was their guarantee that they antedated the priest dictating the words, in which the wicked conspiracy to all vice and lust was contained, but had committed none of the acts to which they were bound by the oath against either themselves or others, they left in chains; upon those who had permitted themselves to be defiled by debauchery or murder, who had polluted themselves by false testimony, forged seals, substitution of wills or other frauds, they inflicted capital punishment. More were killed than were thrown into prison. There was a large number of men and women in both classes. Convicted women were turned over to their relatives or to those who had authority over them, that they might be punished in private:[1] if there was no suitable person to exact it, the penalty was inflicted by the state. Then the task was entrusted to the consuls of destroying all forms of Bacchic worship, first at Rome and then throughout Italy, except in cases where an ancient altar or image had been consecrated.[2] For the future it was then provided by decree of the senate that there should be no Bacchanalia in Rome or Italy. If any person considered such worship to be ordained by tradition or to be necessary, and believed that he could not omit it without sin and atonement, he was to make a declaration before the city praetor, and the latter would consult the senate. If permission were granted to him, at a meeting where not fewer than one hundred were in attendance, he should offer the sacrifice, provided that not more than five people should take part in the rite, and that there the abuse of the Bacchus worship and were free from its bad features. In any case the Romans were inclined to respect venerable age.

B.C. 186

U.C. 568 neu qua pecunia communis neu quis magister sacrorum aut sacerdos esset.

XIX. Aliud deinde huic coniunctum referente Q. Marcio consule senatus consultum factum est, ut de iis quos pro indicibus consules habuissent integra res ad senatum referretur, cum Sp. Postumius 2 quaestionibus perfectis Romam redisset. Minium Cerrinium Campanum Ardeam in vincula mittendum censuerunt, magistratibusque Ardeatium praedicendum ut intentiore eum custodia adservarent, non solum ne effugeret, sed ne mortis consciscendae 3 locum haberet. Sp. Postumius aliquanto post Romam venit: eo referente de P. Aebutii et Hispalae Faeceniae praemio, quod eorum opera indicata 4 Bacchanalia essent, senatus consultum factum est, uti singulis his centena milia aeris quaestores urbani ex aerario darent: utique consul cum tribunis plebis ageret, ut ad plebem primo quoque tempore ferrent, ut P. Aebutio emerita stipendia essent, ne invitus

---

[1] The last clauses prevent a definite organization of the cult. The decree, however, legalizes traditional rites in honour of Bacchus and necessary individual acts of worship.

We are fortunate in possessing an inscription (CIL. I. 196), containing, in the form of a letter addressed to the Teurani, a federated state of Bruttium, the substance of the senate's decisions (the celebrated Senatus Consultum de Bacchanalibus). In general the statements of Livy agree with the inscription, although the evidence of language gives no indication that Livy saw the inscription.

[2] The ultimate fate of Cerrinius is not recorded.

should be no common purse or master of sacrifices or priest.[1] B.C. 186

XIX. Then another decree of the senate, allied to this, was passed on the motion of the consul Quintus Marcius, that the entire question of those whose services as informers the consuls had enjoyed should be referred to the senate when Spurius Postumius should have returned to Rome after completing the investigations. Minius Cerrinius the Campanian they voted should be sent to Ardea for imprisonment, advance notice being given to the magistrates of the Ardeans that they should keep especially close guard over him, not only to prevent his escape but also to allow him no opportunity to commit suicide.[2] Spurius Postumius returned to Rome a considerable time later: on his motion with reference to the rewards for Publius Aebutius and Hispala Faecenia, because it was through their information that the Bacchanalia had been discovered, a decree of the senate was passed that to each of them one hundred thousand asses[3] should be paid by the city quaestors out of the treasury; and that the consuls should take up with the tribunes of the people the matter of their presenting to the assembly at the earliest possible moment proposals that Publius Aebutius should be rated as having performed his military service,[4] that he should not serve in the [3] This was the sum required for assignment to the first census-class.

[4] The proposal to exempt Aebutius from his military obligations is genuine, so far as one can see, but nevertheless odd at this period, when military service was still a recognized part of the citizen's duty. It cannot be determined whether the exemption carried with it immediate eligibility to office, since Aebutius had no political ambitions.

militaret neve censor ei invito[1] equum publicum
5 assignaret; utique Faeceniae Hispalae datio, deminutio, gentis enuptio, tutoris optio item esset, quasi ei vir testamento dedisset; utique ei ingenuo nubere liceret, neu quid ei qui eam duxisset ob id
6 fraudi ignominiaeve esset; utique consules praetoresque, qui nunc essent quive postea futuri essent, curarent ne quid ei mulieri iniuriae fieret, utique tuto esset. Id senatum velle et aequum censere ut
7 ita fieret. Ea omnia lata ad plebem factaque sunt ex senatus consulto; de ceterorum indicum impunitate praemiisque consulibus permissum est.

XX. Et iam[2] Q. Marcius quaestionibus suae regionis perfectis in Ligures provinciam proficisci parabat, tribus milibus peditum Romanorum, centum quinquaginta equitibus, et quinque milibus Latini nominis peditum, ducentis equitibus in supplementum
2 acceptis. Eadem provincia, idem numerus peditum

[1] censor ei invito Mommsen: censor licinius M: censores σ.
[2] et iam σ: ita M.

---

[1] The assignment of an equus publicus (cf. xlii. 6 and xliv. 1 below and the notes) would make Aebutius liable to service and so cancel the exemption just granted. Service as a volunteer would be performed in the capacity of an eques equo publico.

[2] The interests of a patronus in the property of his libertus were well protected by Roman law. Although the patronus of Faecenia was dead his interests survived, descending in this case to his gens, and the senate therefore bestows upon her the right to give away or otherwise alienate her property irrespective of gentile rights (datio may be synonymous with alienatio, the term employed by later jurists). The proposal of some scholars to understand capitis with deminutio, which would grant her the right to accept inferior civic status, seems to be self-contradictory. But it is not certain that Livy understood what he wrote.

army except by his own act, that the censor should B.C. 186 not assign him a public horse without his consent;[1] that Hispala Faecenia should have the rights of bestowing and alienating property,[2] of marriage outside her gens,[3] and choice of a tutor just as if her husband had given it to her by his will;[4] that she should be permitted to marry a man of free birth, nor should any fraud or disgrace on this account attach to a man who should have married her;
that the consuls and praetors who were at this time in office and those who should follow them should have a care that no injury should be done to this woman and that she should be secure. The senate, they were to say, wished and judged it proper that this should be done. All these motions were presented to the assembly and passed in accordance with the decree of the senate; with respect to the impunity and rewards of the rest of the informers discretion was left to the consuls.

XX. And by this time Quintus Marcius, having completed the investigation in his district, was preparing to set out against the Ligurians, who composed his province, having received three thousand Roman infantry and one hundred and fifty cavalry and five thousand infantry and two hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy as reinforcements. The same province and the same numbers

[3] The conditions surrounding gentis enuptio are only vaguely known. It is clear, however, that Faecenia is to have the maximum of privilege allowed to women.

[4] A wife in manu might be granted this privilege by her husband's will. By the bestowal of these four rights Faecenia acquired a legal status at least not inferior to that of free women generally.

U.C. 568 equitumque et collegae decretus erat. Exercitus acceperunt quos priore anno C. Flaminius et M. 3 Aemilius consules habuerant.[1] Duas praeterea legiones novas ex senatus consulto scribere iussi sunt, et viginti milia peditum sociis et nomini Latino imperarunt et equites octingentos[2] et tria milia 4 peditum Romanorum. ducentos equites. Totum hunc exercitum praeter legiones in supplementum Hispaniensis exercitus duci placebat. Itaque consules, dum ipsi quaestionibus impediebantur, T. 5 Maenium dilectui habendo praefecerunt. Perfectis quaestionibus prior Q. Marcius in Ligures Apuanos 6 est profectus. Dum penitus in abditos saltus, quae latebrae receptaculaque illis semper fuerant, persequitur, in praeoccupatis angustiis loco iniquo est 7 circumventus. Quattuor milia militum amissa, et legionis secundae signa tria, undecim[3] vexilla socium Latini nominis in potestatem hostium venerunt, et arma multa, quae, quia impedimento fugientibus per silvestres semitas erant, passim 8 iactabantur. Prius[4] sequendi Ligures finem quam 9 fugae Romani fecerunt. Consul ubi primum ex hostium agro evasit, ne quantum deminutae copiae forent appareret, in locis pacatis exercitum dimisit. 10 Non tamen obliterare famam rei male gestae potuit:

[1] habuerant Madvig: habuerunt $\bar{\gamma}$.
[2] octingentos $\bar{\gamma}$: mille trecentos M.
[3] undecim $\bar{\gamma}$: quadraginta M, XL pro XI fortasse interpretans.
[4] prius $\bar{\gamma}$: nec prius M.

[1] Unless the last clause of the sentence depends upon scribere above, despite the intervening clause, a verb has dropped out, which I have supplied in the translation.
[2] The term vexilla is used for variety only: it is more of infantry and cavalry had been decreed to his colleague as well. They received the armies which Gaius Flaminius and Marcus Aemilius had commanded as consuls the preceding year. Besides, they were directed, under the decree of the senate, to enlist two new legions, and they called upon the allies of the Latin confederacy for twenty thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry, and they enlisted three thousand Roman infantry and two hundred cavalry.[1] All this army, except the legions, it was resolved to send to reinforce the army in Spain. Accordingly the consuls, while they were themselves busy with the investigations, placed Titus Maenius in charge of conducting the levy. When the investigations were completed, Quintus Marcius set out before his colleague against the Ligurian Apuani. While he was following them into a retired glade, which had always been their secret retreat and hiding-place, he was surrounded on unfavourable ground in a narrow pass which had been occupied in advance. Four thousand soldiers were lost and three standards of the second legion and eleven ensigns[2] of the allies of the Latin confederacy fell into the hands of the enemy, as well as many weapons which were thrown away everywhere because they hindered the flight along the paths in the forest. The Ligurians desisted from their pursuit before the Romans stopped their flight. As soon as the consul got free of the enemy's country, that it might not be seen how great was the loss, he disbanded the army in a peaceful region. He could not, however, erase the record of his defeat; for the glade from B.C. 186 regularly used for the guidons of cavalry, while both Roman and allied infantry carried signa.

B.C. 186 nam saltus, unde eum Ligures fugaverant, Marcius est appellatus.

XXI. Sub hunc nuntium ex Ligustinis vulgatum litterae ex Hispania mixtam gaudio tristitiam ad- 2 ferentes recitatae sunt.[1] C. Atinius,[2] qui biennio ante praetor in eam provinciam profectus erat, cum Lusitanis in agro Hastensi signis collatis pugnavit: ad sex milia hostium sunt caesa, ceteri fusi et fugati 3 castrisque exuti. Ad oppidum deinde Hastam oppugnandum legiones ducit: id quoque haud multo maiore certamine cepit quam castra; sed dum incautius subit muros, ictus ex vulnere post dies 4 paucos moritur. Litteris de morte propraetoris recitatis senatus censuit mittendum, qui ad Lunae portum C. Calpurnium praetorem consequeretur, nuntiaretque senatum aequum censere ne sine imperio provincia esset maturare eum proficisci. 5 Quarto die qui missus erat Lunam venit: paucis ante 6 diebus Calpurnius profectus erat. Et in citeriore Hispania L. Manlius Acidinus, qui eodem tempore, quo C. Atinius in provinciam ierat,[3] cum Celtiberis 7 acie conflixit. Incerta victoria discessum est, nisi quod Celtiberi castra inde nocte proxima moverunt, Romanis et suos sepeliendi et spolia legendi ex 8 hostibus potestas facta est. Paucos post dies maiore coacto exercitu Celtiberi ad Calagurrim oppidum 9 ultro lacessiverunt proelio Romanos. Nihil traditur,

[1] recitatae sunt $\bar{\gamma}$: uenerunt M.
[2] C. Atinius Sigonius: c. catinius $\bar{\gamma}$.
[3] provinciam ierat Gelenius: prouincia erat $\bar{\gamma}$.

[1] Its position is unknown.

which the Ligurians had driven him was called B.C. 186
"Marcius."[1]

XXI. About the time the news from the Ligustini was published, dispatches from Spain were read, bringing sorrow mingled with joy. Gaius Atinius, who as praetor two years before had set out to that province, had engaged in pitched battle with the Lusitanians in the territory of Hasta: about six thousand of the enemy fell and the rest were repulsed and routed and stripped of their camp. He then led the legions to assault the town of Hasta: this too he took without much more of a fight than the camp; but while he was too carelessly approaching the walls he was hit and a few days later died from his wound. When the letter regarding the death of the propraetor was read, the senate decreed that a messenger should be sent to overtake the praetor Gaius Calpurnius at the harbour of Luna and announce to him that the senate deemed it proper that he should hasten his departure, that the province might not be left without a governor. The messenger who was sent arrived at Luna on the fourth day: Calpurnius had departed a few days before. And in Nearer Spain Lucius Manlius Acidinus, who had gone to the province at the same time as Gaius Atinius, engaged in a battle with the Celtiberians. Both sides withdrew with the result indecisive, except that the Celtiberians moved their camp from there the next night and gave the Romans the opportunity to bury their dead and collect the spoils from the enemy. A few days later, having collected a larger army, the Celtiberians challenged the Romans to battle near the town of Calagurris. It is not explained what cause made quae causa numero aucto infirmiores eos [1] fecerit. Superati proelio sunt: ad duodecim milia hominum caesa, plus duo capta et castris Romanus potitur. Et nisi successor adventu suo inhibuisset impetum victoris, subacti Celtiberi forent. Novi praetores ambo in hiberna exercitus deduxerunt.

XXII. Per eos dies, quibus haec ex Hispania nuntiata sunt, ludi Taurii per biduum facti religionis causa. Decem deinde dies magno apparatu [2] ludos M. Fulvius, quos voverat Aetolico bello, fecit. Multi artifices ex Graecia venerunt honoris eius causa. Athletarum quoque certamen tum primo Romanis spectaculo fuit, et venatio data leonum et pantherarum, et prope huius saeculi copia ac varietate ludicrum celebratum est. Novemdiale deinde sacrum tenuit, quod in Piceno per triduum lapidibus pluerat, ignesque caelestes multifariam orti adussisse complurium levi adflatu vestimenta maxime dicebantur. Addita et unum diem supplicatio est ex decreto pontificum, quod aedis Opis in Capitolio de caelo tacta erat. Hostiis maioribus consules procurarunt urbemque lustraverunt. Sub idem tempus et ex

[1] infirmiores eos edd. vett.: firmiores eos aut firmiores eos non F.

[2] decem deinde dies magno apparatu Novák: decem apparatos deinde F.

---

[1] These games, instituted under the monarchy, were in honour of the gods of the lower world.

[2] While the expression is vague, it would seem that there was some special reason for celebrating these games at this time.

them weaker after their numbers were increased. B.C. 186
They were defeated in the battle: about twelve thousand men were killed and two thousand captured and the Romans gained possession of the camp. And, if the arrival of his successor had not prevented the victor from exploiting his success, the Celtiberians might have been subdued. Both new praetors led their armies into winter quarters.

XXII. About the time that these reports were brought from Spain, the Taurian Games [1] were performed for two days for religious reasons.[2] Then for ten days, with great magnificence, Marcus Fulvius gave the games which he had vowed during the Aetolian war.[3] Many actors too came from Greece to do him honour. Also a contest of athletes [4] was then for the first time made a spectacle for the Romans and a hunt of lions and panthers was given, and the games, in number and variety, were celebrated in a manner almost like that of the present time.[5] Then a nine-day feast took place because in Picenum through three days there had been showers of stones, and especially because flames shining in the sky in many places were said to have set fire to the garments of many when a light breeze blew upon them. A one-day period of prayer was also added by decree of the pontiffs because the temple of Ops on the Capitoline had been struck by lightning. The consuls atoned for this with full-grown victims and purified the City. About the same time

[3] Cf. v. 7–10 above. If the emendation here adopted is correct, Fulvius probably exceeded his appropriation of 80,000 sesterces there mentioned.

[4] They were probably boxers or wrestlers.

[5] The Greek features of the games were marks of the Greek culture of Fulvius.

Umbria nuntiatum est semimarem duodecim ferme annos natum inventum. Id prodigium abominantes arceri Romano agro necarique quam primum iusserunt.

6 Eodem anno Galli Transalpini transgressi in Venetiam sine populatione aut bello haud procul inde, ubi nunc Aquileia est, locum oppido condendo ceperunt.
7 Legatis Romanis de ea re trans Alpes missis responsum est neque profectos ex auctoritate gentis eos, nec quid in Italia facerent sese scire.
8 L. Scipio ludos eo tempore, quos bello Antiochi vovisse sese dicebat, ex collata ad id pecunia ab regi-
9 bus civitatibusque per dies decem fecit. Legatum eum post damnationem et bona vendita missum in Asiam ad dirimenda inter Antiochum et Eumenem
10 reges certamina Valerius Antias est auctor: tum collatas ei pecunias congregatosque per Asiam artifices, et quorum ludorum post bellum, in quo votos diceret, mentionem non fecisset, de iis post legationem demum in senatu actum.

XXIII. Cum iam in exitu annus esset, Q. Marcius absens magistratu abiturus erat, Sp. Postumius quaestionibus cum summa fide curaque perfectis
2 comitia habuit. Creati consules sunt Ap. Claudius Pulcher M. Sempronius Tuditanus. Postero die

---

[1] Cf. the treatment of a similar creature reported at XXXI. xii. 8.

[2] This is the first invasion of Italy over the eastern passes of the Alps. Possibly these invaders were not Gauls, but came from farther east.

[3] Neither the vow nor the embassy is mentioned elsewhere by Livy.

it was reported from Umbria that a hermaphrodite about twelve years old had been discovered. In their fear and awe of this portent they ordered the prodigy to be removed from Roman soil and killed as soon as possible.[1] B.C. 186

In the same year Transalpine Gauls, crossing into Venetia without any devastation or war, took possession of a site for founding a town not far from where Aquileia now stands. Roman ambassadors sent across the Alps to inquire into the matter received the reply that this party had not set out with the authority of the state, nor did they know what they were doing in Italy.[2]

Lucius Scipio at this time celebrated for ten days the games which he said he had vowed during the war with Antiochus, with money contributed for the purpose by the kings and cities. Valerius Antias is the authority for the statement that after his condemnation and the sale of his property he had been sent as an ambassador to Asia to resolve the disputes between the two kings, Antiochus and Eumenes: he adds that at that time the money was contributed to him and artists collected throughout Asia, and that finally, after his embassy, action was taken in the senate about these games, of which he had made no mention after the war in which he said that they had been vowed.[3]

XXIII. When the year was now coming to its end, Quintus Marcius was about to retire from office while absent from Rome and Spurius Postumius, having conducted the investigations with the greatest faithfulness and energy, held the elections. The consuls elected were Appius Claudius Pulcher and Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus. Next day the praetores facti P. Cornelius Cethegus A. Postumius Albinus C. Afranius [1] Stellio C. Atilius Serranus L. Postumius Tempsanus M. Claudius Marcellinus.

3 Extremo anni, quia Sp. Postumius consul renuntiaverat peragrantem se propter quaestiones utrumque litus Italiae desertas colonias Sipontum supero, 4 Buxentum infero mari invenisse, triumviri ad colonos eo scribendos ex senatus consulto ab T.[2] Maenio praetore urbano creati sunt L. Scribonius Libo M. Tuccius Cn. Baebius Tamphilus.

5 Cum Perseo rege et Macedonibus bellum quod imminebat, non unde plerique opinantur, nec ab ipso Perseo causas cepit: inchoata initia a Philippo sunt; et is ipse, si diutius vixisset, id bellum gessisset.
6 Una eum res, cum victo leges imponerentur, maxime angebat, quod qui Macedonum ab se defecerant in bello, in eos ius saeviendi ademptum ei ab senatu
7 erat, cum, quia rem integram Quinctius in condicionibus pacis distulerat, non desperasset impetrari
8 posse. Antiocho rege deinde bello superato ad Thermopylas, divisis partibus, cum per eosdem dies

[1] C. Afranius ed. Frobeniana 1531 : c. arranius ς.
[2] T. ed. Moguntina : l. ς.

---

[1] Livy omits to record the inauguration of the new magistrates and the assignment of provinces and armies.

[2] Livy here makes an abrupt transition from Rome to Macedonia. His chronology, however, is uncertain, as is inevitable in a transitional passage designed to sum up the causes of the war with Perseus, who, incidentally, was not yet king. Livy has said little about Greek affairs since he described the Achaean-Lacedaemonian difficulties in XXXVIII. xxx.–xxxiv., where the chronology is also obscure.

[3] The allusion must be to such states as the Orestae (XXXIII. xxxiv. 6), although Livy has mentioned no such prohibition as that of which Philip complained, and, indeed, praetors were chosen, Publius Cornelius Cethegus, B.C. 186

Aulus Postumius Albinus, Gaius Afranius Stellio, Gaius Atilius Serranus, Lucius Postumius Tempsanus, Marcus Claudius Marcellinus. At the end of the year, because the consul Spurius Postumius had reported that on his journeys in the prosecution of the investigations on both coasts of Italy he had found colonies abandoned, Sipontum on the upper sea, Buxentum on the lower, three commissioners to enroll colonists for them were elected in accordance with a decree of the senate and under the presidency of the praetor Titus Maenius. The commissioners were Lucius Scribonius Libo, Marcus Tuccius, Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus.[1]

The war[2] with King Perseus and the Mace- B.C. 185
donians which was threatening did not arise from the causes which most people assign to it, nor from Perseus himself: the beginnings had been made by Philip; and Philip himself, had he lived longer, would have waged that war. One thing, when terms of peace were dictated to him after his defeat, especially offended him—that the right of punishing those of the Macedonians who had revolted from him during the war had been taken from him by the senate, although, since Quinctius, in their negotiations for peace, had postponed the whole question, he had not despaired of obtaining it.[3] Then, when King Antiochus had been defeated at Thermopylae, the tasks had been divided,[4] and at the same time has said nothing at all of the treatment of revolted Macedonian cities except in the instance mentioned.

[4] For the phrase, cf. XXXVII. xxi. 8, where, as here, it refers to co-ordinated action of commanders. The joint campaign referred to was described by Livy in XXXVI. xxxv.

consul Acilius Heracleam, Philippus Lamiam oppug-9 nasset, capta Heraclea quia iussus abscedere a moenibus Lamiae erat Romanisque oppidum de-10 ditum est, aegre eam rem tulerat. Permulsit iram eius consul, quod ad Naupactum ipse festinans, quo se ex fuga Aetoli contulerant, Philippo permisit Athamaniae et Amynandro bellum inferret, et [1] urbes, quas Thessalis Aetoli ademerant, regno ad-11 iceret. Haud magno certamine et Amynandrum Athamania expulerat et urbes receperat aliquot.
12 Demetriadem quoque, urbem validam et ad omnia opportunam, et Magnetum gentem [2] suae dicionis 13 fecit. Inde et in Thracia quasdam urbes, novae atque insuetae libertatis vitio seditionibus principum turbatas, partibus, quae domestico certamine vin-cerentur, adiungendo sese cepit.

XXIV. His sedata in praesentia regis ira in Romanos est. Numquam tamen remisit animum a colligendis in pace viribus, quibus, quandoque data
2 fortuna esset, ad bellum uteretur. Vectigalia regni non fructibus tantum agrorum portoriisque maritimis auxit sed metalla etiam et vetera intermissa recoluit

[1] et ed. Aldina : om. F.
[2] gentem ed. Frobeniana 1535 : gentes F.

---

[1] The sequence of events here described does not quite agree with that found in Book XXXVI passim. The passages agree in general as to the extent of Philip's gains, which had awakened the suspicions of Flamininus (XXXVI. xxxv. 9–10).

[2] The occupation of Aenus and Maronea had taken place after the other events related, and has not been previously mentioned by Livy. These towns had been at various times under Ptolemaic, Macedonian and finally Seleucid rule before they were liberated by the Romans after the defeat of Antiochus (XXXVII. lx. 7).

the consul Acilius had laid siege to Heraclea, Philip B.C. 185 to Lamia; but when Heraclea was taken Philip had felt aggrieved because he had been ordered to retire from the walls of Lamia and the town had been surrendered to the Romans. The consul soothed his wrath, because, when he was himself in haste to move towards Naupactus, whither the Aetolians had gone from their flight, he had permitted Philip to make war on Athamania and Amynander and to add to his kingdom the cities which the Aetolians had taken from the Thessalians. Without great effort he had both driven Amynander from Athamania and recovered a considerable number of towns. Demetrias also, a powerful city, opportunely situated in every respect, and the tribes of the Magnesians he had brought under his control.[1] After that he had also gained certain cities in Thrace, amid the disorder caused by the quarrels of their leading citizens—the fault of new and unwonted liberty—by joining himself to the parties which were being worsted in this internal rivalry.[2]

XXIV. By these means the anger of the king against the Romans was temporarily assuaged. Never, however, did he relax his attention to the assembling in time of peace of strength which, whenever the chance should be given, he could use in time of war.[3] He not only increased the revenues of his kingdom from the farm crops and the harbour duties, but also reopened old mines long

[3] The true story of the alienation of Philip after the reconciliation during the war with Antiochus would be interesting and revealing. We cannot, however, expect to find it in Livy, and the narrative of Polybius is too fragmentary to be very helpful.

B.C. 169

3 et nova multis locis instituit. Ut vero antiquam multitudinem hominum quae belli cladibus amissa erat restitueret, non subolem tantum stirpis parabat cogendis omnibus procreare atque educare liberos,
4 sed Thracum etiam magnam multitudinem in Macedoniam traduxerat, quietusque aliquamdiu a bellis omni cura in augendas regni opes intentus fuerat.
5 Rediere deinde causae, quae de integro iram move-
6 rent in Romanos. Thessalorum et Perrhaeborum querellae de urbibus suis ab eo possessis, et legatorum Eumenis regis de Thraciis oppidis per vim occupatis traductaque in Macedoniam multitudine, ita auditae
7 erant ut eas non neglegi satis appareret. Maxime moverat senatum, quod iam Aeni et Maroneae affectari possessionem audierant;[1] minus Thessalos
8 curabant. Athamanes quoque venerant legati, non partis amissae, non finium iacturam querentes, sed totam Athamaniam sub ius iudiciumque regis
9 venisse; et Maronitarum exsules venerant,[2] pulsi, quia libertatis causam defendissent ab regio praesidio: ii non Maroneam modo sed etiam Aenum in

[1] iam A. et M. affectari p. audierant Gelenius: eum a. et m. affectare p. audieret M: iam eum et maroniae affectari p. audierant (-at) r.

[2] venerant Crévier: erant r.

---

[1] The dangers attending Rome's policy in the east are here manifest. The adversity of one eastern power inevitably meant the prosperity of another, and constant vigilance on Rome's part was necessary to ensure the maintenance of any equilibrium. The fact that there was now no considerable Greek power made the "liberation" of the Greeks more and disused and began operations on new ones in many B.C. 185 places. But that he might restore the ancient population, which had been lost in the calamities of war, he did not merely look to the natural increase of the people, by requiring all to beget and rear children, but he had transferred a great number of Thracians to Macedonia as well, being for some time free from wars and devoting all his thought to increasing the resources of his kingdom. Then causes recurred which aroused anew his anger against the Romans. The complaints of the Thessalians and the Perrhaebians with regard to their cities which were in his hands and those of the envoys of King Eumenes with regard to his violent occupation of the Thracian towns and the transfer of the population to Macedonia had been so received that it was plainly evident that they would not be ignored.[1] The senate had been especially moved by the fact that they had heard that he now coveted the possession of Aenus and Maronea; they were less concerned about the Thessalians. Athamanian ambassadors had also arrived, complaining, not of the occupation of part of their kingdom or of the loss of territory, but that all Athamania had come under the sovereignty and sway of the king;[2] exiles of the Maroneans had also come, expelled because they had defended the cause of liberty against the king's garrison: they brought the news that not only Maronea but also Aenus was in the more a farce and prevented the Romans from developing a Greek state which could check Philip in Europe as Eumenes checked Antiochus in Asia.

[2] This embassy must have antedated the recovery of Athamania by Amynander (XXXVIII. i. 1–iii. 2), unless Philip had again expelled him, and of this there is no record.

potestate narrabant esse Philippi. Venerant et a Philippo legati ad purganda ea, qui nihil nisi permissu Romanorum imperatorum factum affirmabant: civitates Thessalorum et Perrhaeborum et Magnetum et cum Amynandro Athamanum gentem in eadem causa qua Aetolos fuisse; Antiocho rege pulso occupatum oppugnandis Aetolicis urbibus consulem ad recipiendas eas civitates Philippum misisse; armis subactos parere. Senatus, ne quid absente rege statueret, legatos ad eas controversias disceptandas misit Q. Caecilium Metellum M. Baebium Tamphilum Ti. Sempronium. Quorum sub adventum [1] ad Thessalica Tempe omnibus iis civitatibus, quibus cum rege disceptatio erat, concilium indictum est.

XXV. Ibi cum Romani legati disceptatorum loco, Thessali Perrhaebique et Athamanes haud dubii accusatores, Philippus ad audienda crimina tamquam reus consedissent, pro ingenio quisque eorum, qui principes legationum erant, et gratia cum Philippo aut odio acerbius leniusve egerunt. In controversiam autem veniebant Philippopolis Tricca Pha-

[1] adventum ed. Frobeniana 1535: aduentu r.

---

[1] The various events which inspired these complaints had extended over a considerable period of time, but may have been forced upon Rome's attention simultaneously. One can picture the bewilderment of the senate, forced to listen to contradictory arguments and decide claims on the basis of justice plus diplomatic policy, and being, probably, none too familiar with the Greek language.

[2] The negotiations between the Roman commanders Baebius and Acilius and the king had been conducted in haste, under the pressure of war-time conditions, and had probably never been given definiteness by statement in written form. It is by no means impossible that a liberal interpretation power of Philip.[1] Ambassadors too from Philip had B.C. 185

come to clear him on these counts, and they asserted that he had done nothing except with the consent of the Roman generals:[2] the cities of the Thessalians and Perrhaebians and Magnesians and the people of the Athamanians, including Amynander, had been in the same situation as the Aetolians; after the defeat of King Antiochus the consul, kept busy with besieging the Aetolian cities, had sent Philip to recover the above-mentioned places; subdued by arms, they now obeyed him. The senate, in order not to reach any decision in the absence of the king, sent as commissioners to settle these disputes Quintus Caecilius Metellus, Marcus Baebius Tamphilus, Tiberius Sempronius.[3] On their arrival at Thessalian Tempe all the states which had matters of dispute with the king were summoned to a council.

XXV. There, when they had taken their places, the Roman commissioners in the position of arbitrators, the Thessalians, Perrhaebians and Athamanians as unquestionably accusers, and Philip to hear the charges almost as a criminal, each one of the men who were chiefs of embassies, in accordance with his own inclinations, whether towards sympathy for Philip or towards hatred, made more harsh or more lenient proposals. But the principal grounds for controversy were Philippopolis, Tricca, Phaloria, justified Philip in keeping what he had gained and that the Roman problem at this time was how to take away, while avoiding making Philip an enemy, what their generals had so generously and thoughtlessly given.

[3] Metellus is probably the consul of 206 B.C., Baebius the praetor of 192 B.C. who had co-operated with Philip in the early campaigns against Antiochus, Sempronius probably the tribune of 187 B.C.

loria et Eurymenae[1] et cetera circa eas oppida, 4 utrum, Thessalorum iuris cum essent,[2] vi ademptae possessaeque ab Aetolis forent—nam Philippum Aetolis ademisse eas[3] constabat—an Aetolica anti-5 quitus ea oppida fuissent: ita enim Acilium regi concessisse, si Aetolorum fuissent, et[4] si voluntate, non si vi atque armis coacti cum Aetolis essent.
6 Eiusdem formulae disceptatio de Perrhaeborum
Magnetumque oppidis fuit: omnium enim iura possi-7 dendo per occasiones Aetoli miscuerant. Ad haec quae disceptationis erant, querellae Thessalorum adiectae, quod ea oppida, si iam redderentur sibi, 8 spoliata ac deserta redditurus esset: nam praeter belli casibus amissos quingentos principes iuventutis in Macedoniam abduxisse, et opera eorum in servilibus abuti ministeriis; et quae reddiderit coactus Thes-9 salis, inutilia ut redderet curasse. Thebas Phthias

[1] haec nomina, multimodis in codd. corrupta, corr. Gelenius.
[2] essent Madvig: om. F.
[3] Aetolis ademisse eas Gelenius: odisse ac dimisisse ea M: ademisse eas F.
[4] et ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. F.

---

[1] Tricca and Phaloria, as well as Malloea and Ericinium in sect. 16 below, but not Philippopolis and Eurymenae, are on the list of towns recovered from the Athamanians by Baebius and Philip (XXXVI. xiii. 6).

[2] This is inconsistent with the narrative quoted in the preceding note.

[3] The text of this passage seems to be corrupt in so many places that the real meaning remains obscure and uncertain, and no combination of emendations possesses both palaeographical and intrinsic probability. It is clear, however, that the general question involved is the priority of Thessalian and Aetolian claims to these towns. Two details make the answer particularly difficult: first, the uncertainty as to the

Eurymenae [1] and other cities near them, whether, B.C. 185 at a time when they were under Thessalian control, they had been forcibly seized and occupied by the Aetolians—for it was agreed that Philip had taken them from the Aetolians [2]—or whether these towns had been Aetolian in earlier times; for Acilius had given them to the king subject to the condition that they had belonged to the Aetolians and, furthermore, that they had joined with the Aetolians voluntarily, not under compulsion of armed force.[3] Under the same procedure the dispute was conducted as to the cities of the Perrhaebians and Magnesians; for the Aetolians had confused all claims by seizing them as opportunity offered.[4] Besides these questions, which were matters for legal adjudication, there were the complaints of the Thessalians that if these cities should be restored to them he would give them back after they had been despoiled and abandoned; for in addition to those who had been lost in the hardships of war he had taken five hundred of the leaders of the youth away to Macedonia and was misusing their services on tasks fit only for slaves; and what he had restored to the Thessalians, under compulsion, he had taken care to return unusable. Phthian Thebes, they said, had once been meaning of the word antiquitus, since Aetolian expansion seems to have begun only after the Macedonian conquest; second, the fact that the condition said here to have been imposed by Acilius has not been mentioned before. Both text and translation, it must be admitted, are a patch-work.

[4] The incessant shifting of military control rendered impossible any purely legal adjudication of such questions which could be regarded as final. Rome's decisions were certain to offend some party and were likely to offend all parties, even if they were purely impersonal and equitable.

u.c. 559 unum maritimum emporium fuisse quondam Thessalis quaestuosum et frugiferum: ibi navibus onerariis comparatis regem, quae praeter Thebas Demetriadem cursum derigerent, negotiationem maritimam omnem eo[1] avertisse. Iam ne a legatis quidem, qui iure gentium sancti sint, violandis abstinere: insidias positas euntibus ad T. Quinc-11 tium. Itaque ergo in tantum metum omnes Thessalos coniectos, ut non in civitatibus suis, non in communibus gentis conciliis quisquam hiscere audeat. Procul enim abesse libertatis auctores Romanos: lateri adhaerere gravem dominum, prohibentem uti beneficiis populi Romani. Quid autem, si vox libera 12 non sit, liberum esse? Nunc se fiducia et praesidio legatorum ingemiscere magis quam loqui. Nisi provideant aliquid Romani, quo et Graecis Macedoniam accolentibus metus et audacia Philippo minuatur, nequiquam et illum victum et se liberatos
13 esse. Ut equum tenacem, non parentem frenis
14 asperioribus castigandum esse. Haec acerbe postremi, cum priores leniter permulsissent iram eius
15 petentes ut ignosceret pro libertate loquentibus et ut deposita domini acerbitate adsuesceret socium atque amicum sese praestare, et imitaretur populum Romanum, qui caritate quam metu adiungere sibi 16 socios mallet. Thessalis auditis Perrhaebi Gonno-

[1] eo edd. vett.: in eo F.

[1] This incident has not been mentioned.

the one maritime market of the Thessalians which B.C. 185 was profitable and productive of revenue: by assembling there cargo-boats which would steer past Thebes to Demetrias, the king had diverted thither all the sea-trade. At last not even ambassadors, who were inviolable under the law of nations, had he refrained from attacking: he had laid an ambush for them while they were on their way to Titus Quinctius.[1] As a result, then, they said, all Thessalians had been thrown into such a panic that no one dared to open his mouth either in his own city or in the common councils of the people. The Romans, the source of their liberty, were far away: close beside them was a threatening master, forbidding them to take advantage of the kindnesses of the Roman people. What, pray, was free if there was no free speech? Even now, with the confidence and under the safeguards of ambassadors, they were lamenting rather than stating their case. Unless the Romans found some device by which both the fear of the Greeks who were neighbours of Macedonia and the aggressiveness of Philip could be diminished, both his defeat and their liberation would be in vain. Like a stubborn horse which would not obey, more cruel reins must be employed to control him. These remarks the last speakers made in bitterness, although previous speakers had gently soothed his wrath, begging that he would pardon their pleas for liberty, that he would lay aside the harshness of a tyrant and train himself to act as an ally and friend, and that he would imitate the Roman people, which preferred to win for itself allies by affection rather than by fear. When the Thessalians had been heard, the Perrhaebians argued

c. condylum, quod Philippus Olympiadem appellaverat, Perrhaebiae fuisse, et ut sibi restitueretur, agebant; et de Malloea et Ericinio eadem postulatio erat.
17 Athamanes libertatem repetebant et castella Athenaeum et Poetneum.

XXVI. Philippus, ut accusatoris potius quam rei speciem haberet, et ipse a querellis orsus Menelaidem in Dolopia, quae regni sui fuisset, Thessalos vi atque armis expugnasse questus est; item Petram in Pieria [1] ab iisdem Thessalis Perrhaebisque captam.
2 Xynias quidem, haud dubie Aetolicum oppidum, sibi contribuisse eos; et Paracheloida, quae sub Athamania esset, nullo iure Thessalorum formulae
3 factam. Nam quae sibi crimina obiciantur de insidiis legatorum et maritimis portubus frequentatis
4 aut desertis, alterum ridiculum [2] esse, se reddere rationem, quos portus mercatores aut nautici petant,
5 alterum mores respuere suos.[3] Tot annos esse per quos numquam cessaverint legati nunc ad imperatores Romanos nunc Romam ad senatum crimina de se deferre: quem umquam verbo violatum esse?
6 Semel euntibus ad Quinctium insidias dici factas: sed quid iis acciderit, non adici. Quaerentium quod falso obiciant, cum veri nihil habeant, ea crimina

[1] Petram in Pieria ed. Frobeniana 1531 : petram imperiam F.

[2] ridiculum F : deridiculum M.

[3] mores respuere suos Gronovius : mores pueros uos F.

---

[1] This demand is inconsistent with Livy's previous narrative. Poetneum is otherwise unknown. For Athenaeum cf. XXXVIII. i. 11.

that Gonnocondylum, which Philip had named Olympias, belonged to Perrhaebia and should be restored to them; the same demand was also made for Malloea and Ericinium. The Athamanians sought liberty and the forts of Athenaeum and Poetneum.[1] B.C. 185

XXVI. Philip, so as to assume the pose of the accuser rather than the accused, himself began with complaints, alleging that the Thessalians had seized by force of arms Menelaïs in Dolopia, which had belonged to his kingdom; similarly, Petra in Pieria had been taken by the same Thessalians and the Perrhaebians. Xyniae indeed, which was certainly an Aetolian town, they had absorbed into themselves; and Paracheloïs, which was under Athamania, had been made Thessalian under no rule of law. Now as to the charges which they had made against him regarding the ambushing of ambassadors and the frequenting or deserting of maritime harbours, the one, he said, was nonsense, that he should be accountable for what harbours merchants or sailors would seek, the other was inconsistent with his character. It was so many years now that ambassadors had never stopped going now to Roman commanders, now to the senate in Rome, carrying charges against him: who of these, he asked, had ever been harmed even by word? They said that once ambassadors going to Quinctius had been ambushed; but what had happened to them they did not add. These were the allegations of men seeking some false charge to make, since they had nothing true to say.

[1] The discrepancies between these chapters and Livy's account in Book XXXVI suggest that Livy here follows a different source. The real facts become, in consequence, less attainable.

u.c. 7 esse. Insolenter et immodice abuti Thessalos indul-69 gentia populi Romani, velut ex diutina siti nimis
8 avide meram haurientes libertatem: ita [1] servorum modo praeter spem repente manumissorum licentiam vocis et linguae experiri et iactare sese insectatione 9 et conviciis dominorum. Elatus deinde ira adiecit nondum omnium dierum solem occidisse. Id minaciter dictum non Thessali modo in sese, sed etiam 10 Romani acceperunt. Et cum fremitus post eam vocem ortus et tandem sedatus esset, Perrhaeborum inde Athamanumque legatis respondit eandem, de 11 quibus illi agant, civitatium causam esse. Con-sulem Acilium et Romanos sibi dedisse eas, cum 12 hostium essent. Si suum munus qui dedissent adimere velint, scire cedendum esse: sed meliori et fideliori amico in gratiam levium et inutilium 13 sociorum iniuriam eos facturos. Nec enim ullius rei minus diuturnam esse gratiam quam libertatis, praesertim apud eos, qui male utendo eam corrupturi 14 sint. Causa cognita pronuntiarunt legati placere deduci praesidia Macedonum ex iis urbibus, et antiquis Macedoniae terminis regnum finiri. De iniuriis quas ultro citroque illatas querantur [2] quo modo inter eas gentes et Macedonas disceptetur, formulam iuris exsequendi constituendam esse.

[1] ita ed. Frobeniana 1535: itaque F.
[2] querantur ed. Frobeniana 1535: querebantur F.

---

[1] The expression has a proverbial sound; Philip's last day had not come.

[2] What boundaries are meant is uncertain: the treaty of 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxx.) fixed them only vaguely and only on the south. Roman decisions at this period frequently and perhaps deliberately err in the direction of being too sententious and consequently ambiguous.

Arrogantly and excessively did the Thessalians misuse the indulgence of the Roman people, as if after a long thirst they drank too greedily a draught of pure freedom: thus, like slaves suddenly set free contrary to their expectations, they were trying out their freedom of voice and tongue and were making a show of themselves by attacking and insulting their masters. Carried away by anger, he added that the sun of all his days had not yet set.[1] This remark not only the Thessalians took as a threat against them, but the Romans also. And when after this speech a roar of protest began and was finally quieted, he replied next to the Perrhaebians and the Athamanians, that the status of the cities about which they were arguing was the same. He claimed that the consul Acilius and the Romans had given them to him because they were on the side of the enemy. If they who had given them wished to take away their gift, he was aware, he said, that he would have to yield; but they would be doing an injury to a better and more loyal friend to gratify fickle and useless allies. For nothing was gratitude less enduring than for liberty, especially when bestowed upon men who are certain to spoil it by misuse. Having heard the case, the commissioners gave judgment that it was their pleasure that the Macedonian garrisons should be withdrawn from these cities and that the kingdom should be reduced to the ancient boundaries of Macedonia.[2] Regarding the injuries which they complained of as committed by both sides, they would have to determine the rule of procedure to be followed, so as to know in what manner to settle the disputes between these peoples and the Macedonians. B.C. 185

XXVII. Inde graviter offenso rege Thessalonicen ad cognoscendum de Thraciae urbibus proficiscuntur. 2 Ibi legati Eumenis, si liberas esse Aenum et Maroneam velint Romani, nihil sui pudoris esse ultra dicere quam ut admoneant, re, non verbo eos liberos relinquant, nec suum munus intercipi ab alio patian- 3 tur. Sin autem minor cura sit civitatium in Thracia positarum, multo verius esse, quae sub Antiocho fuerint, praemia belli Eumenem quam Philippum 4 habere, vel pro patris Attali meritis bello, quod adversus Philippum ipsum gesserit populus Romanus, vel suis, quod [1] Antiochi bello terra marique laboribus 5 periculisque omnibus interfuerit. Habere eum praeterea decem legatorum in eam rem praeiudicium, qui cum Chersonesum Lysimachiamque dederint, Maroneam quoque atque Aenum profecto dedisse, quae ipsa propinquitate regionis velut appendices 6 maioris muneris essent. Nam Philippum quidem quo aut merito in populum Romanum aut iure imperii, cum tam procul a finibus Macedoniae absint, civitatibus his praesidia imposuisse? Vocari Maronitas iuberent: ab iis certiora omnia de statu civitatium earum scituros.

7 Legati Maronitarum vocati non uno tantum loco urbis praesidium regium esse, sicut in aliis civitatibus,

[1] quod ed. Moguntina: quo r.

[1] By "another" they, of course, mean Philip. The words have a peculiar sound on the lips of Eumenes, who had profited so much from Rome's victory over Antiochus.

[2] The commissioners who had been sent to Asia to formulate the peace-treaty with Antiochus.

[3] Aenus and Maronea had apparently been in some way overlooked in the final settlement with Antiochus.

[4] Philip's claim to these cities seems weak in comparison with his rights to some of the other districts in dispute.

XXVII. Thence, having given serious offence to the king, they proceeded to Thessalonica to investigate the condition of the cities of Thrace. There ambassadors of Eumenes told them that if the Romans wished Aenus and Maronea to be free, the king's sense of propriety permitted them to say nothing more, except to suggest that they leave them free in fact and not merely in name, and not allow their own work to be a source of gain to another.[1] But if there were less concern for the cities situated in Thrace, it was far more proper that towns which had belonged to Antiochus should fall as prizes of war to Eumenes rather than to Philip, either in consideration of the services of his father Attalus in the war which the Roman people had waged against Philip himself, or of his own services, in that he had taken part, during the war with Antiochus, in all its labours and perils on land and sea. They said that Eumenes had in addition the preliminary opinion of the ten commissioners[2] on the matter, who, since they had given him the Chersonesus and Lysimachia, surely gave him Maronea and Aenus too, which, from their nearness to his country, were mere appendages to the larger gift.[3] In consequence of what service to the Roman people, they asked, or of what right to rule had Philip imposed his garrisons upon these cities when they were so far away from the boundaries of Macedonia?[4] Let the commissioners order the Maroneans to be summoned: from them they would receive all certain information about the condition of these cities. B.C. 185

The agents of the Maroneans, when called in, said that the royal garrison occupied, not merely one place in the city, as in other towns, but several at dixerunt, sed pluribus simul, et plenam Macedonum

8 Maroneam esse. Itaque dominari adsentatores regios: his solis loqui et in senatu et in contionibus licere; eos omnes honores et capere ipsos et dare 9 aliis. Optimum quemque, quibus libertatis, quibus legum cura sit, aut exsulare pulsos patria aut in-10 honoratos et deterioribus obnoxios silere. De iure etiam finium pauca adiecerunt: Q. Fabium Labeonem, cum in regione ea fuisset, derexisse[1] finem Philippo veterem viam regiam, quae ad Thraciae Paroreian subeat, nusquam ad mare declinantem: Philippum novam postea deflexisse viam,[2] qua Maronitarum urbes agrosque amplectatur.

XXVIII. Ad ea Philippus longe aliam quam adversus Thessalos Perrhaebosque nuper ingressus disserendi viam "non cum Maronitis" inquit "mihi aut cum Eumene disceptatio est, sed iam vobiscum, Romani, a quibus nihil aequi me impetrare
2 iam diu animadverto. Civitates Macedonum quae a me inter indutias defecerant, reddi mihi aequum censebam, non quia magna accessio ea regni futura

[1] derexisse H. J. Mueller: direxisse Γ.

[2] veterem . . . viam ut hoc loco legitur Gelenius: ueterem regiam quae thraciae paroreiam sub ea nusquam ad mare ferentem deflexisse uiam Γ.

---

[1] The aristocratic party in a Greek city of this period was generally pro-Roman, and the constitutions of Flamininus (cf. XXXIV. li. 6; XXXV. xxxiv. 3 and the note) favoured this element. It is interesting to note that the commissioners feel no necessity of hearing from the opposing (democratic and pro-Macedonian) party in Maronea.

[2] The meaning seems to be that Labeo had established as a boundary between Macedonia and the territory surrendered by Antiochus an old road which perhaps followed the general course of the Roman Via Egnatia. Since the boundary was once, and that Maronea was full of Macedonians. B.C. 185

As a result, the king's partisans were in control: they alone were permitted to speak in the senate and in the public meetings; they either held themselves or gave to others all offices. All the aristocrats, who felt some concern for liberty and the laws, were either in exile, driven from their homes, or were silent, unhonoured and at the mercy of their inferiors.[1] And as to the boundary rights, they had little new to say: only that Quintus Fabius Labeo, when he had been in that region, had fixed as the boundary for Philip the ancient royal road which leads to Paroreia in Thrace, nowhere approaching the sea: Philip had later laid out a new road which encompassed the cities and lands of the Maroneans.[2]

XXVIII. In reply to this Philip followed a very different line of argument from that recently used against the Thessalians and Perrhaebians: "With the Maroneans or with Eumenes," he said, "I have no debate, but now, Romans, the debate is with you, from whom I have for some time observed that I receive no fair treatment. The cities of the Macedonians which had revolted from me during the truce [3] I deemed it right that I should recover, not because it would be an important addition to my kingdom—for probably described by a term as vague as "a certain road." Philip had availed himself of the vagueness by relocating the old road or building a new one which put Maronea on his side of the boundary as thus described. But corruption in the text and the lack of any other version of the affair leave the true sense in doubt. It may be added that the authority of Labeo to take such action as is here described (Livy has not mentioned it before) is more than questionable.

[3] Possibly the truce of 197 B.C. (XXXII. xxxvi. 8), but the revolt has not been mentioned before.

U.C. 569

esset—sunt enim et parva oppida et in finibus extremis posita—sed quia multum ad reliquos Mace-3 donas continendos exemplum pertinebat. Negatum est mihi. Bello Aetolico Lamiam oppugnare iussus a consule M'. Acilio cum diu fatigatus ibi operibus proeliisque essem, transcendentem me iam muros a capta prope urbe revocavit consul et abducere copias
4 inde coegit. Ad huius solacium iniuriae permissum est ut Thessaliae Perrhaebiaeque et Athamanum reciperem quaedam castella magis quam urbes. Ea quoque ipsa vos mihi, Q. Caecili, paucos ante dies
5 ademistis. Pro non dubio paulo ante, si diis placet, legati Eumenis sumebant, quae Antiochi fuerunt Eumenem aequius esse quam me habere. Id ego longe aliter iudico esse. Eumenes enim non, nisi vicissent Romani, sed nisi bellum gessissent, manere in regno suo non potuit. Itaque ille vestrum meri-
6 tum habet, non vos illius. Mei autem regni tantum aberat ut ulla pars in discrimine fuerit ut tria milia talentum et quinquaginta tectas naves et omnes Graeciae civitates, quas antea tenuissem, pollicentem ultro Antiochum in mercedem societatis sim asper-
7 natus; hostemque ei me esse prius etiam quam M'. Acilius exercitum in Graeciam traiceret praetuli. Et cum eo consule belli partem quamcumque mihi
8 delegavit gessi, et insequenti consuli L. Scipioni, cum terra statuisset ducere exercitum ad Hellespontum, non iter tantum per regnum nostrum dedi, sed vias

---

[1] Hannibal had urged that every means should be used to win over Philip (XXXVI. vii. 3 ff.), but Livy has said nothing to suggest that actual overtures were made to him by Antiochus.

they are small towns and, moreover, situated on the B.C. 185 farthest frontiers—but because it was a valuable precedent for holding within bounds the other Macedonians. This was refused me. During the Aetolian war, ordered by the consul Manius Acilius to besiege Lamia, after I had been wearied for a long time by the siege and battles and when I was on the point of scaling the walls, I was recalled by him from the city, which was all but taken, and compelled to march my troops away. As a consolation for this injustice it was permitted to me to recover certain fortresses (such they were rather than cities) of Thessaly and Perrhaebia and the Athamanians. Even these, Quintus Caecilius, you took away from me a few days ago. Just now (heaven help us !) the ambassadors of Eumenes assumed it as not to be gainsaid that it was more just for Eumenes than for me to have what had belonged to Antiochus. I judge the matter far differently. Eumenes could not have remained in his kingdom, I do not mean if the Romans had not conquered, but if they had not undertaken the war. And so he has received favours from you, not you from him. So far from true was it that any part of my kingdom was in danger that when Antiochus voluntarily promised me three thousand talents and fifty decked ships and all the cities of Greece which I had held before, as the price of my alliance,[1] I refused ; I preferred to be his enemy even before Manius Acilius brought his army across to Greece. And with that consul I conducted whatever campaign he assigned to me ; and for the following consul, Lucius Scipio, when he had decided to lead his army to the Hellespont by land, I not merely gave him a right of way through our kingdom but also paved roads, built

A.U.C. 569

9 etiam munivi, pontes feci, commeatus praebui; nec per Macedoniam tantum, sed per Thraciam etiam, ubi inter cetera pax quoque praestanda a barbaris
10 erat. Pro hoc studio meo erga vos, ne dicam merito, utrum adicere vos, Romani, aliquid et amplificare et augere regnum meum munificentia vestra oportebat an, quae haberem aut meo iure aut beneficio vestro
11 eripere, id quod nunc facitis? Macedonum civitates quas regni mei fuisse fatemini non restituuntur. Eumenes tamquam ad Antiochum spoliandum me venit et, si diis placet, decem legatorum decretum calumniae[1] impudentissimae praetendit, quo maxi-
12 me et refelli et coargui potest. Disertissime enim planissimeque in eo scriptum est Chersonesum et Lysimachiam Eumeni dari. Ubi tandem Aenus et Maronea et Thraciae civitates adscriptae sunt? Quod ab illis ne postulare quidem est ausus, id apud 13 vos, tamquam ab illis impetraverit, obtinebit? Quo in numero me apud vos esse velitis, refert. Si tamquam inimicum et hostem insectari propositum est, 14 pergite ut coepistis facere: sin aliquis respectus est mei ut socii atque amici regis, deprecor ne me tanta iniuria dignum iudicetis."

XXIX. Movit aliquantum oratio regis legatos. Itaque medio responso rem suspenderunt: si decem legatorum decreto Eumeni datae civitates eae essent,
2 nihil se mutare; si Philippus bello cepisset eas,

[1] calumniae Gelenius: pecuniae calumniae F.

---

[1] Philip's claims here are supported by Livy's narrative. The commissioners had left his services entirely unrewarded.

[2] The silence of the commissioners receives an interpretation contradicting that of xxvii. 5 above.

bridges, furnished supplies; and this not through B.C. 185 Macedonia alone but also through Thrace, where, along with everything else, I had to maintain peace with the barbarians. For this zeal in your behalf, not to say for these services to you, was it right, Romans, that you should add to and enlarge and increase somewhat my domains by your generosity, or that you should take away what I have, either by my own right or by your kindness, as you are doing now?[1] The cities of the Macedonians, which you admit were part of my dominion, are not restored. Eumenes has come to despoil me as if I were Antiochus, and (heaven help us!) he brings forward, by a most impudent manipulation of the facts, the decree of the ten commissioners, by which more than anything else he can be both refuted and convicted. For it was written therein most explicitly and clearly that the Chersonesus and Lysimachia were given to Eumenes. Where, pray, were Aenus and Maronea and the Thracian cities assigned to him?[2] What he did not even dare to ask of them shall he obtain from you as if he had been granted it by them? It makes a difference in what category you wish me to be with reference to you. If you have determined to harass me as a private and public enemy, continue to act as you have begun; but if some consideration is due me as an allied and friendly king, I beg you not to judge me worthy of such an injury."

XXIX. The speech of the king affected the commissioners profoundly. Therefore they left the question unsettled by an indecisive answer: if by the decree of the ten commissioners these cities had been assigned to Eumenes, they were making no change; if Philip had captured them in war, he should praemium victoriae iure belli habiturum: si neutrum eorum foret, cognitionem placere senatui reservari et, ut omnia in integro [1] manerent, praesidia quae in iis urbibus sint deduci.

U.C. 569

3 Hae causae maxime animum Philippi alienaverunt ab Romanis, ut non a Perseo filio eius novis causis motum, sed ob has a patre bellum relictum filio videri
4 possit. Romae nulla Macedonici belli suspicio erat. L. Manlius proconsul ex Hispania redierat; cui postulanti ab senatu in aede Bellonae triumphum rerum gestarum magnitudo impetrabilem faciebat;
5 exemplum obstabat quod ita comparatum more maiorum erat ne quis qui exercitum non deportasset triumpharet, nisi perdomitam pacatamque provinciam tradidisset successori. Medius tamen honos Manlio
6 habitus ut ovans urbem iniret. Tulit coronas aureas quinquaginta duas, auri praeterea pondo centum
7 triginta duo, argenti sedecim milia trecenta, et pronuntiavit in senatu decem milia pondo argenti et octoginta auri Q. Fabium quaestorem advehere: id quoque se in aerarium delaturum.

8 Magnus motus servilis eo anno in Apulia fuit. Tarentum provinciam L. Postumius praetor habebat.

[1] integro Gelenius: integrum ς.

---

[1] From Philip's standpoint this decision does not leave the affair "in its original state," and one is not surprised that it contributed to Philip's feeling that he was being mistreated. The opposite decision would have been equally unfair to the other parties in the case. It is never made clear whether the Maroneans wished to be given to Eumenes.

[2] This is a variation on the form of statement adopted in XXXVIII. i. 3; it is obvious that the senate has discovered hold them as the prize of victory under the law of B.C. 185 war; if neither of these was true, it was their pleasure that the decision should be reserved for the senate and, in order that everything might remain in its original state, that the garrisons which were in these cities should be withdrawn.[1]

These were the principal causes which had turned the thoughts of Philip away from the Romans, so that the war can appear, not as begun for new reasons by his son Perseus, but as a heritage from the father to the son. At Rome there was no suspicion of a Macedonian war. Lucius Manlius the proconsul had returned from Spain; when he demanded from the senate, meeting in the temple of Bellona, a triumph for his achievements, their importance made the request reasonable; precedent stood in the way, because it had been so arranged by the custom of their forefathers that a general who had not brought back his army should not triumph unless he had handed over to his successor a province thoroughly conquered and pacified.[2] Nevertheless, the intermediate distinction, of entering the City in ovation, was granted to Manlius. He carried in his procession fifty-two golden crowns, in addition to one hundred and thirty-two pounds of gold and sixteen thousand three hundred of silver, and he declared in the senate that his quaestor Quintus Fabius was bringing ten thousand pounds of silver and eighty of gold: this too he would put into the treasury.

There was a serious slave insurrection that year in Apulia. Lucius Postumius the praetor had Tarentum as his province. He conducted a strict investithe art of juggling with the conditions to suit its shifting purposes.

v.c. 569

9 Is de pastorum coniuratione, qui vias latrociniis pascuaque publica infesta habuerant, quaestionem severe exercuit. Ad septem milia hominum condemnavit: multi inde fugerunt, de multis sumptum
10 est supplicium. Consules diu retenti ad urbem dilectibus tandem in provincias profecti sunt.

XXX. Eodem anno in Hispania praetores C. Calpurnius et L. Quinctius, cum primo vere ex hibernis copias eductas in Baeturia iunxissent, in Carpetaniam, ubi hostium castra erant, progressi sunt, com-
2 muni animo consilioque parati rem gerere. Haud procul Dipone et Toleto urbibus inter pabulatores pugna orta est, quibus dum utrimque subvenitur a castris, paulatim omnes copiae in aciem eductae sunt.
3 In eo tumultuario certamine et loca sua et genus pugnae pro hoste fuere. Duo exercitus Romani fusi atque in castra compulsi sunt. Non institere per-
4 culsis hostes. Praetores Romani, ne postero die castra oppugnarentur, silentio proximae noctis tacito
5 signo exercitum abduxerunt. Luce prima Hispani acie instructa ad vallum accesserunt, vacuaque praeter spem castra ingressi, quae relicta [1] inter nocturnam trepidationem erant, diripuerunt, regressique in castra sua paucos dies quieti stativis [2]
6 manserunt. Romanorum sociorumque in proelio fugaque ad quinque milia occisa, quorum se spoliis hostes armarunt. Inde ad Tagum flumen profecti
7 sunt. Praetores interim Romani omne id tempus

[1] relicta Γ: derelicta M.
[2] quieti statiuis Γ: quietis hi statiuis M.

---

[1] The order for departure was given not by voice or trumpet but by written message (per tesseram).

gation into a conspiracy of shepherds who had endangered the highways and the public pasture-lands by their brigandage. He condemned about seven thousand men: many of them escaped, many were executed. The consuls, long delayed in the City by the levies, at length set out for their provinces. B.C. 185

XXX. The same year the praetors in Spain, Gaius Calpurnius and Lucius Quinctius, when in the beginning of spring they had led their troops out of winter quarters and had united in Baeturia, marched into Carpetania, where the camp of the enemy lay, and prepared to conduct the campaign with a common plan and policy. Not far from the towns of Dipo and Toletum a fight broke out between foraging parties, and as these were reinforced, each from its own camp, gradually all the troops were drawn out into the line. In this sudden engagement both the familiar ground and the nature of the fighting favoured the enemy. The two Roman armies were routed and driven back into camp. The enemy did not keep up their pressure on the defeated foe. The Roman praetors, in order that their camp might not be attacked the next day, in the quiet of the following night with silent signals[1] led the army away. At daybreak the Spaniards approached the rampart in battle-line and entering an empty camp, contrary to expectations, plundered what had been left behind in the confusion of the night, and returning to their own camp remained quietly in their quarters for a few days. About five thousand of the Romans and allies fell in the battle and rout, and with their spoils the enemy armed themselves. Then they moved away to the river Tagus. Meanwhile the Roman praetors spent all their time in collecting contrahendis ex civitatibus sociis Hispanorum auxiliis et reficiendis ab terrore adversae pugnae militum 8 animis consumpserunt. Ubi satis placuere vires et iam miles quoque ad delendam priorem ignominiam hostem poscebat, duodecim milia passuum ab Tago 9 flumine posuerunt castra. Inde tertia vigilia sublatis signis quadrato agmine principio lucis ad Tagi ripam 10 pervenerunt. Trans fluvium in colle hostium castra erant. Extemplo, qua duobus locis vada nudabat amnis, dextra parte Calpurnius, laeva Quinctius exercitus traduxerunt quieto hoste, dum miratur subitum adventum consultatque, qui tumultum inicere trepidantibus in ipso transitu amnis potuisset.

11 Interim Romani, impedimentis quoque omnibus traductis contractisque in unum locum, quia iam moveri videbant hostem nec spatium erat castra 12 communiendi, aciem instruxerunt. In medio locatae[1] quinta Calpurnii legio et octava Quinctii: id robur totius exercitus erat. Campum apertum usque ad hostium castra habebant, liberum a metu in-sidiarum.

XXXI. Hispani postquam in citeriore ripa duo Romanorum agmina conspexerunt, ut, priusquam se iungere atque instruere possent, occuparent eos, castris repente effusi cursu ad pugnam tendunt.
2 Atrox in principio proelium fuit, et Hispanis recenti victoria inflatis et insueta ignominia milite Romano
3 accenso. Acerrime media acies, duae fortissimae

[1] locatae ed. Frobeniana 1535 : locata F.

auxiliaries from the allied towns of the Spaniards and B.C. 185 in restoring the courage of the men after the panic of the defeat. When their strength was sufficient and even the soldiers were now demanding the enemy in order to wipe out the previous disgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus. Thence, breaking camp in the third watch, they marched in a hollow square at dawn to the banks of the Tagus. Across the river on a hill was the camp of the enemy. Immediately, where the river revealed fords in two places, Calpurnius on the right, Quinctius on the left, led the army across, the enemy quietly watching while they marvelled at their sudden advance and talked about how they might have caused confusion while the Romans were disorganized in the act of crossing the river. Meanwhile the Romans, having brought over all their trains and massed them in one place, because they saw the enemy already in motion and there was no opportunity to fortify a camp, drew up their line of battle. In the centre were posted the fifth legion of Calpurnius and the eighth of Quinctius: these constituted the strength of the whole army. They had an open plain as far as the camp of the enemy, free from any danger of ambuscade.

XXXI. When the Spaniards saw the two Roman columns on the nearer bank, in order to catch them before they could unite and form their ranks, rushing hastily out of their camp they hastened to the conflict. There was a fierce fight at the outset, the Spaniards on the one side being puffed up by their recent victory, the Roman soldiers on the other incensed by their unaccustomed defeat. The fiercest fight was in the centre of the line, composed of the two bravest legiones, dimicabant. Quas cum aliter moveri loco non posse hostis cerneret, cuneo institit pugnare; et usque plures confertioresque medios urgebant. 4 Ibi postquam laborare aciem Calpurnius praetor vidit, T. Quinctilium Varum et L. Iuventium Talnam legatos ad singulas legiones adhortandas propere mittit; 5 docere et monere iubet in illis spem omnem vincendi et retinendae Hispaniae esse: si illi loco cedant, neminem eius exercitus non modo Italiam, sed ne Tagi quidem ulteriorem ripam umquam [1] visurum. 6 Ipse cum equitibus duarum legionum paulum circumvectus in cuneum hostium, qui mediam urge- 7 bat aciem, ab latere incurrit. Quinctius cum sociis [2] equitibus alterum hostium latus invadit. Sed longe acrius Calpurniani equites pugnabant, et praetor ante 8 alios: nam et primus hostem percussit et ita se immiscuit mediis ut vix utrius partis esset nosci 9 posset; et equites praetoris eximia virtute et equitum pedites accensi sunt. Pudor movit primos centuriones, qui inter tela hostium praetorem conspexerunt. Itaque urgere signiferos pro se quisque, iubere inferre signa et confestim militem sequi. 10 Renovatur ab omnibus clamor: impetus fit velut ex superiore loco. Haud secus ergo quam torrentis modo fundunt sternuntque perculsos, nec sustineri alii 11 super alios inferentes sese possunt. Fugientes in castra equites persecuti sunt, et permixti turbae

[1] umquam ed. Frobeniana 1535: usquam F.
[2] sociis Heusinger: suis F.

legions. When the enemy saw that they could be B.C. 185 dislodged in no other way, they began to attack in wedge formation; and ever more men, more closely massed, were pressing on the centre. After Calpurnius the praetor saw that the line was in distress there, he sent Titus Quinctilius Varus and Lucius Juventius Talna, the lieutenants, at full speed to encourage the single legions; he ordered them to instruct and remind the troops that in them lay all their hopes of victory and of holding Spain: if they retired from that spot, no one in that army would ever see—not to mention Italy—even the farther bank of the Tagus river. He himself with the cavalry of the two legions, making a short detour, took in flank the wedge of the enemy which was pressing on the centre. Quinctius with the allied cavalry attacked the other flank of the enemy. But the cavalry of Calpurnius fought far more furiously, and the praetor beyond the rest: for he was both the first to strike down an enemy and so threw himself into the midst that it could scarcely be told to which side he belonged; and the cavalry were inspired by the remarkable valour of the praetor and in turn inspired the infantry. Shame moved the senior centurions when they saw the praetor amid the weapons of the enemy. And so each for himself urged on the standard-bearers, ordered them to advance and the soldiers to follow at once. The shouting was renewed by all: an attack was launched as if from higher ground. And so they swept forward like a torrent and overwhelmed the panic-stricken enemy, nor as they charged wave after wave could they be resisted. The cavalry pursued the fugitives to the camp, and mingling with the throng of the enemy hostium intra vallum penetraverunt; ubi ab relictis in praesidio castrorum proelium instauratum, coacti-que sunt Romani equites descendere ex equis.

12 Dimicantibus iis legio quinta supervenit: deinde ut 13 quaeque potuerant, copiae adfluebant. Caeduntur passim Hispani per tota castra; nec plus quam quattuor milia hominum effugerunt. Inde tria milia fere qui arma retinuerant montem propinquum ceperunt: mille semiermes maxime per agros palati 14 sunt. Supra triginta quinque milia hostium fuerant, ex quibus tam exigua pars pugnae superfuit. Signa 15 capta centum triginta tria.[1] Romani sociique paulo plus sescenti et provincialium auxiliorum centum 16 quinquaginta ferme ceciderunt. Tribuni militum quinque amissi et pauci equites Romani cruentae maxime victoriae speciem fecerunt. In castris hostium, quia ipsis spatium sua communiendi non 17 fuerat, manserunt. Pro contione postero die laudati donatique a C. Calpurnio equites phaleris, pronuntiavitque eorum maxime opera hostes fusos, castra 18 capta et expugnata esse. Quinctius alter praetor suos equites catellis ac fibulis [2] donavit. Donati et centuriones ex utriusque exercitu permulti, maxime qui mediam aciem tenuerant.[3]

XXXII. Consules dilectibus aliisque quae Romae agendae erant peractis rebus in Ligures provinciam
2 exercitum duxerunt. Sempronius a Pisis profectus

[1] tria ed. Moguntina: duo F.
[2] fibulis ed. Moguntina: fistulis F.
[3] tenuerant Madvig: tenuerunt F.

---

[1] The apparent meaning is that the losses of officers and knights (i.e. men of rank) were disproportionately heavy.

made their way inside the rampart; there the battle B.C. 185 was renewed by the troops who had been left to guard the camp, and the Roman cavalry were forced to dismount. While they were fighting thus the fifth legion came up; then, as they could, new forces were joining the battle. Spaniards were being slaughtered everywhere through the whole camp, and not more than four thousand men escaped. About three thousand of them, who had kept their weapons, occupied a mountain near by; a thousand, most of them partially armed, straggled through the fields. There had been more than thirty-five thousand of the enemy, of whom so small a remnant survived the battle. One hundred and thirty-three standards were taken. Of the Romans and allies a few more than six hundred fell, and of the auxiliaries from the province about a hundred and fifty. The loss of five tribunes of the soldiers and of a few Roman knights particularly gave the appearance of a bloody victory.[1] They remained in the camp of the enemy because there had been no opportunity to fortify their own. Before an assembly the next day Gaius Calpurnius praised and decorated the cavalry with trappings for their horses and proclaimed publicly that the enemy had been defeated and his camp taken and captured mainly through their efforts. Quinctius, the other praetor, decorated his cavalry with chains and clasps. Also many centurions from both armies were honoured, especially those who had held the centre of the line.

XXXII. The consuls, having finished the levies and the other business which had to be transacted in Rome, led the army against the Ligurians, who constituted their province. Sempronius, setting out

.c. in Apuanos Ligures, vastando agros urendoque vicos
9 et castella eorum aperuit saltum usque ad Macram
3 fluvium et Lunae portum. Hostes montem, antiquam sedem maiorum suorum, ceperunt; et inde
4 superata locorum iniquitate proelio deiecti sunt. Et Ap. Claudius felicitatem virtutemque collegae in Liguribus Ingaunis aequavit secundis aliquot proeliis. Sex praeterea oppida eorum expugnavit; multa milia hominum in iis cepit; belli auctores tres et quadraginta securi percussit.

5 Iam comitiorum appetebat tempus. Prior tamen Claudius quam Sempronius, cui sors comitia habendi obtigerat, Romam venit, quia P. Claudius frater eius
6 consulatum petebat. Competitores habebat patricios L. Aemilium Q. Fabium Ser. Sulpicium Galbam, veteres candidatos, et ab repulsis eo magis debitum
7 quia primo negatus erat honorem repetentes. Etiam quia plus quam unum ex patriciis creari non licebat, 8 artior petitio quattuor petentibus erat. Plebeii quoque gratiosi homines petebant, L. Porcius Q. Terentius Culleo Cn. Baebius Tamphilus, et hi repulsi in spem impetrandi tandem aliquando honoris
9 dilati. Claudius ex omnibus unus novus [1] candidatus

[1] novus Gelenius: nobilis F.

---

[1] They probably lived south-west of Genoa.

[2] For the psychology cf. XXXV. xxiv. 5.

[3] The dates of the praetorships of the candidates were: Claudius, 188; Aemilius, 191: Fabius, 189; Sulpicius, 187; Porcius, 193; Terentius, 187; Baebius, 199 (all B.C.). These dates give some indication of the possible duration of a political career at this period, and show that there were other from Pisa against the Ligurian Apuani, devastating B.C. 185 their lands and burning the villages and forts, opened up the pass as far as the river Macra and the harbour of Luna. The enemy retired to a mountain, the ancient seat of their forefathers; even from there, the handicap of unfavourable ground having been overcome, they were dislodged by an attack. Appius Claudius too equalled the good fortune and valour of his colleague among the Ligurian Ingauni[1] in a number of victories. In addition he captured six of their towns; in them he took many thousands of men; forty-three, who had been responsible for the war, he beheaded.

The time for the elections was now approaching. But Claudius arrived in Rome earlier than Sempronius, to whom had fallen by lot the conduct of the elections, because his brother Publius Claudius was seeking the consulship. He had as patrician competitors Lucius Aemilius, Quintus Fabius, Servius Sulpicius Galba, all perennial candidates, who after defeats were again seeking an office which was due them all the more because it had been at first refused.[2] Also, because it was not lawful that more than one from the patricians should be elected, there was a closer race among the four candidates. Influential plebeians also were contending for the office, Lucius Porcius, Quintus Terentius Culleo, Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus,[3] and these too, having suffered defeat, were filled with the hope that some day they would at last[4] win in the election. Claudius was the only new candidate of them all. In the general hard-fought campaigns than those which Livy singles out for special mention: cf. also XL. xxxvii. 6 below

[4] The combination tandem aliquando is highly colloquial.

erat. Opinione hominum haud dubie destinabantur
B.C. 69 10 Q. Fabius Labeo et L. Porcius Licinus.[1] Sed Claudius consul sine lictoribus cum fratre toto foro volitando, clamitantibus adversariis et maiore parte 11 senatus, meminisse eum debere se prius consulem populi Romani quam fratrem P. Claudii esse : quin ille sedens pro tribunali aut arbitrum aut tacitum spectatorem comitiorum se praeberet?—coerceri tamen ab 12 effuso studio nequit. Magnis contentionibus tribunorum quoque plebis, qui aut contra consulem aut pro studio eius pugnabant, comitia aliquotiens turbata, donec pervicit Appius ut deiecto Fabio fratrem trahe- 13 ret. Creatus P. Claudius Pulcher praeter spem suam et ceterorum. Locum suum tenuit L. Porcius Licinus, quia moderatis studiis, non vi[2] Claudiana inter ple- 14 beios certatum est. Praetorum inde comitia sunt habita : C. Decimius Flavus P. Sempronius Longus P. Cornelius Cethegus Q. Naevius Matho C. Sempronius Blaesus A. Terentius Varro praetores facti. 15 Haec eo anno, quo Ap. Claudius M. Sempronius consules fuerunt, domi militiaeque gesta.

B.C. 70 XXXIII. Principio insequentis anni P. Claudius L. Porcius consules, cum Q. Caecilius M. Baebius Ti. Sempronius, qui ad disceptandum inter Philippum et Eumenem reges Thessalorumque civitates 2 missi erant, legationem renuntiassent, regum quoque eorum civitatiumque legatos in senatum introduxe-

[1] Licinus Sigonius : licinius ϝ. [2] vi Gelenius : ut ϝ.

[1] The tribunal was a platform erected in the Campus Martius, from which the presiding magistrate conducted the election.

[2] The direct reference is to the activity of the consul in the election, with more than a hint that such impetuosity was characteristic of the gens Claudia.

opinion of men Quintus Fabius Labeo and Lucius B.C. 185
Porcius Licinus were almost certain of success. But the consul Claudius, without his lictors, flitting with his brother around the whole Forum, though his adversaries and the greater part of the senate kept crying out that he should remember that he was the consul of the Roman people rather than the brother of Publius Claudius (why should he not take his seat on the tribunal[1] and act either as an umpire or else as a silent spectator of the elections?), nevertheless could not be restrained from his zealous canvass. Great contentions among the tribunes of the people, as well, who took part in the fight either against the consul or on his side, disturbed the elections several times, until Appius succeeded in bringing in his brother, Fabius being defeated. Publius Claudius Pulcher was elected contrary to his own expectations and those of others. Lucius Porcius Licinus held his place because among the plebeians the contest was conducted with moderate partisanship, not with Claudian violence.[2] Then the praetorian elections were held: Gaius Decimius Flavus, Publius Sempronius Longus, Publius Cornelius Cethegus, Quintus Naevius Matho, Gaius Sempronius Blaesus and Aulus Terentius Varro were chosen praetors. Such were the events, at home and abroad, of the consular year of Appius Claudius and Marcus Sempronius.

XXXIII. In the beginning of the following year, B.C. 184 when Quintus Caecilius, Marcus Baebius and Tiberius Sempronius, who had been sent to arbitrate between the kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the cities of the Thessalians, had reported on their mission, the consuls Publius Claudius and Lucius Porcius also introduced into the senate the ambassadors of these runt. Eadem utrimque iterata, quae dicta apud legatos in Graecia erant. Aliam deinde novam legationem patres, cuius princeps Ap. Claudius fuit, in Graeciam et Macedoniam decreverunt ad visendum, redditaene civitates Thessalis et Perrhaebis essent. Iisdem mandatum, ut ab Aeno et Maronea praesidia deducerentur, maritimaque omnis Thraciae ora a Philippo et Macedonibus liberaretur. Peloponnesum quoque adire iussi, unde prior legatio discesserat incertiore statu rerum quam si non venissent: nam super cetera etiam sine responso dimissi, nec datum petentibus erat Achaeorum concilium. De qua re querente graviter Q. Caecilio et simul Lacedaemoniis deplorantibus moenia diruta, abductam plebem in Achaiam et venumdatam, ademptas, quibus ad eam diem civitas stetisset, Lycurgi leges, Achaei maxime concilii negati crimen excusabant recitando legem, quae nisi belli pacisve causa, et cum legati ab senatu cum litteris aut scriptis mandatis venirent, vetaret indici concilium. Ea ne postea excusatio esset, ostendit senatus curae iis esse debere, ut legatis Romanis semper adeundi concilium gentis

B.C. 570

---

[1] In chaps. xxiv.–xxix. above, Livy said nothing about a visit to the Achaean League by the commission headed by Caecilius. In XXIII. xi. (XXII. xv.), however, Polybius gives the same account as that which Livy gives here.

[2] Cf. XXXVIII. xxxiv; the enslaved commons here are apparently the adscripti of that chapter.

kings and of the cities. The same arguments were repeated on both sides that had been used before the commissioners in Greece. Then the Fathers decreed another new commission, of which Appius Claudius was the chief, to go to Greece and Macedonia to see whether the cities had been restored to the Thessalians and Perrhaebians. They were also instructed that the garrisons were to be withdrawn from Aenus and Maronea and that the whole sea coast should be freed from Philip and the Macedonians. They were directed to visit the Peloponnesus also, from which the previous commission [1] had come away leaving the position of things more uncertain than if they had not gone: for in addition to everything else they had even been sent away without an answer, and the Achaean council had not been summoned as they requested. When Quintus Caecilius complained bitterly of this conduct and the Lacedaemonians at the same time lamented that their walls had been destroyed, their common people taken away to Achaia and enslaved, the laws of Lycurgus, on which their state had been based up to that time, annulled,[2] the principal reply of the Achaeans to the charge that a council had been refused was to read the law which forbade the calling of the council except when it was a question of peace or war or when ambassadors arrived from the senate with letters or written instructions.[3] That this excuse might not be given again, the senate made it plain that it was their duty to see that Roman commissioners should always have the opportunity to address the council of the people, B.C. 184

[3] It is nowhere made clear whether this was a law of the council itself (cf. XXXI. xxv. 9) or a part of the treaty between Rome and the League.

potestas fieret, quem ad modum et illis quotiens vellent senatus daretur.

XXXIV. Dimissis iis legationibus, Philippus a suis certior factus cedendum civitatibus deducendaque praesidia esse, infensus omnibus in Maronitas iram
2 effundit. Onomasto, qui praeerat maritimae orae, mandat, ut partis adversae principes interficeret. Ille per Casandrum quendam, unum ex regiis iam diu habitantem Maroneae, nocte Thracibus intro-
3 missis velut in bello capta urbe caedem fecit. Idem [1] apud Romanos legatos querentes tam crudeliter adversus innoxios Maronitas, tam superbe adversus populum Romanum factum ut, quibus libertatem restituendam senatus censuisset, ii pro hostibus trucidarentur, abnuebat quicquam eorum ad se aut
4 quemquam suorum pertinere; seditione inter ipsos dimicatum, cum ad se alii, alii ad Eumenem civitatem
5 traherent: id facile scituros esse; percunctarentur ipsos Maronitas, haud dubius, perculsis omnibus terrore tam recentis caedis, neminem hiscere adversus
6 se ausurum. Negare Appius rem evidentem pro dubia quaerendam. Si ab se culpam removere vellet, Onomastum et Casandrum, per quos acta res diceretur, mitteret Romam, ut eos senatus percunctari
7 posset. Primo adeo perturbavit ea vox regem ut

[1] idem M. Mueller: id F.

[1] The situation required a delicate adjustment between the sovereignty of the League and the quasi-protectorate of Rome.

just as to them too the senate was open as often as they wished.[1] B.C. 184

XXXIV. When these embassies had been dismissed, Philip was informed by his representatives that he was to retire from the cities and withdraw his garrisons; being angered at everyone, he vented his wrath on the Maroneans. He sent word to Onomastus, who was in command of the sea coast, to kill the leading men of the opposing party. Onomastus, through the agency of a certain Casander, one of the king's supporters who had long been a resident of Maronea, admitting the Thracians by night, caused a slaughter as if the town had been captured in war. When the Roman commissioners complained of such cruel treatment of the unoffending Maroneans and of such arrogant conduct towards the Roman people, that those men whose liberty the senate had declared was to be restored were murdered as if they were enemies, Philip in reply denied that any of this concerned himself or any one of his subjects; there had been fighting as a consequence of internal strife, since some were for transferring the city to him, others to the Romans; this fact they could easily ascertain; let them, he said, question the Maroneans themselves—not doubting that when all were smitten with the terror of so recent a massacre no one would dare to open his mouth against him. Appius replied that so clear a case needed no investigation as if it were not clear. If Philip wished to avert blame from himself he should send Onomastus and Casander, through whom it was said that the plan had been executed, to Rome, in order that the senate might question them. This speech at first so disconcerted the king that he could not control his colour or

.c. non color, non vultus ei constaret; deinde collecto
0 tandem animo Casandrum, qui Maroneae fuisset, si
8 utique vellent, se missurum dixit: ad Onomastum quidem quid eam rem pertinere, qui non modo Maron-eae, sed ne in regione quidem propinqua fuisset?
9 Et parcebat magis Onomasto, honoratiori amico, et eundem indicem haud paulo plus timebat, quia et ipse sermonem cum eo contulerat et multorum talium 10 ministrum et conscium habebat. Casander quoque, missis qui per Epirum ad mare prosequerentur eum, ne qua indicium emanaret, veneno creditur sublatus.

XXXV. Et legati a Philippi colloquio ita digressi
2 sunt, ut prae se ferrent nihil eorum sibi placere, et Philippus minime, quin rebellandum esset, dubius.
Quia tamen [1] immaturae ad id vires erant, ad moram interponendam Demetrium minorem filium mittere Romam simul ad purganda [2] crimina, simul ad de-3 precandam iram senatus statuit, satis credens ipsum etiam iuvenem, quod Romae obses specimen indolis 4 regiae dedisset, aliquid momenti facturum. Interim per speciem auxilii Byzantiis ferendi, re ipsa ad terrorem regulis Thracum iniciendum profectus, perculsis iis uno proelio et Amadoco duce capto in Macedoniam rediit, missis ad accolas Histri fluminis barbaros, ut in Italiam irrumperent, sollicitandos.

[1] quia tamen ed. Moguntina : quia dum quia et similia ϝ.
[2] purganda ed. Frobeniana 1531 : depurganda ϝ.

---

[1] Polybius (XXIII. xiv.) says bluntly that he was poisoned.
[2] The earlier career of Demetrius is briefly sketched in the following. A still younger son, Philip (XLII. lii. 5), is consistently ignored in the Books contained in this volume.
[3] The barbarians referred to were probably the Bastarnae (XL. v. 10), who lived along the lower Hister (Danube) river.

expression; then, at length collecting his wits, he B.C. 184 said that he would send Casander, who had been at Maronea, if they really wished it; but how did this affair concern Onomastus, who had not only not been at Maronea but had not even been in any district close to it? And in fact he was both careful to spare Onomastus, as a more valued friend, and was likewise much more afraid of him as an informer, because he himself had exchanged views with him and used him as an agent and accomplice in many such affairs. Casander, moreover, when men were sent to conduct him through Epirus to the sea, was believed to have been done away with by poison, lest in some way his evidence might get out.[1]

XXXV. And the commissioners went away from the conference with Philip in such fashion as to advertise the fact that nothing in his conduct pleased them, and Philip had no doubt at all that he would have to resort to war. Yet, since his strength was still insufficient for that, in order to cause delay, he determined to send his younger son Demetrius [2] to Rome, partly to explain away the charges against him, partly to turn aside the wrath of the senate, being well persuaded that he, even though a young man, because while he was a hostage at Rome he had shown signs of possessing a kingly nature, would have some influence. Meanwhile, setting out under the pretence of bringing aid to the Byzantines, but in reality in order to inspire the chiefs of the Thracians with fear, having defeated them in one battle and captured their leader Amadocus, he returned to Macedonia, sending agents to stir up the barbarians [3] living along the Hister river, to the end that they might invade Italy.

5 Et in Peloponneso adventus legatorum Romanorum, qui ex Macedonia in Achaiam ire iussi erant, exspectabatur; adversus quos ut praeparata consilia
6 haberent, Lycortas praetor concilium indixit. Ibi de Lacedaemoniis actum: ex hostibus eos accusatores factos, et periculum esse ne victi magis timendi forent quam bellantes fuissent. Quippe in bello sociis Romanis Achaeos usos: nunc[1] eosdem Romanos
7 aequiores Lacedaemoniis quam Achaeis esse, ubi Areus etiam et Alcibiades, ambo exsules, suo beneficio restituti, legationem Romam[2] adversus gentem Achaeorum ita de ipsis meritam suscepissent, adeoque infesta oratione usi essent ut pulsi patria non 8 restituti in eam viderentur. Clamor undique ortus, referret[3] nominatim de iis: et cum omnia ira non consilio gererentur, capitis damnati sunt. Paucos post dies Romani legati venerunt. His Clitore in Arcadia datum est concilium.

XXXVI. Priusquam agerent quicquam, terror Achaeis iniectus erat et cogitatio, quam non ex
2 aequo disceptatio futura esset, quod Areum et Alcibiadem capitis ab se concilio proximo damnatos cum legatis videbant; nec hiscere quisquam audebat.
3 Appius ea quae apud senatum questi erant Lacedaemonii displicere senatui ostendit: caedem primum

[1] usos: nunc edd. vett.: ausos tunc ⁻.
[2] Romam ed. Aldina: romanam ⁻.
[3] referret ⁻: referri M.

[1] They had been exiled by Nabis.

In the Peloponnesus also the coming of the Roman B.C. 184 commissioners, who had been ordered to proceed from Macedonia to Achaia, was being awaited; and in order that they might have their arguments prepared in advance with which to confront the Romans, the praetor Lycortas called a council. There the question concerned the Lacedaemonians: from enemies they had turned accusers, and there was danger that in defeat they would prove more to be feared than they had been when at war. In the war, they reflected, the Achaeans had had the Romans as allies: now the same Romans were more favourably disposed towards the Lacedaemonians than towards the Achaeans, in a situation where even Areus and Alcibiades, both exiles,[1] restored through Achaean influence, had undertaken an embassy to Rome against the Achaean people which had deserved so well of them, and had expressed sentiments so hostile that they seemed to have been driven from their country, not restored to it. A cry went up from all sides that the praetor should offer a motion concerning them by name; and since everything was governed by passion, not deliberation, they were condemned to death. A few days later the Roman commissioners arrived. A council was called for them at Clitoris in Arcadia.

XXXVI. Before they did anything, fear struck the Achaeans and the thought came to them on how unequal grounds the argument was likely to be conducted, because they saw Areus and Alcibiades, who had been condemned to death by them at the latest council, with the commissioners; nor did anyone dare to open his mouth. Appius stated that the conduct of which the Lacedaemonians had complained before the senate was displeasing to the senate: first, the ad Compasium [1] factam eorum, qui a Philopoemene 4 ad causam dicendam evocati venissent; deinde cum in homines ita saevitum esset ne [2] ulla parte crude-litas eorum cessaret, muros dirutos urbis nobilissimae esse, leges vetustissimas abrogatas, inclutamque per 5 gentes disciplinam Lycurgi sublatam. Haec cum Appius dixisset, Lycortas, et quia praetor et quia

Philopoemenis, auctoris omnium quae Lacedaemone
6 acta fuerant, factionis erat, ita respondit: "Difficilior nobis, Ap. Claudi, apud vos oratio est quam
7 Romae nuper apud senatum fuit. Tunc enim Lacedaemoniis accusantibus respondendum erat:
nunc a vobis ipsis accusati sumus, apud quos causa 8 est dicenda. Quam iniquitatem condicionis subimus illa spe, iudicis animo te auditurum esse, posita con-tentione qua paulo ante egisti. Ego certe, cum ea quae et hic antea apud Q. Caecilium [3] et postea Romae questi sunt Lacedaemonii, a te paulo ante relata sint, non tibi sed illis me apud te respondere 9 credam.[4] Caedem obicitis eorum, qui a Philopoemene praetore evocati ad causam dicendam inter-

[1] Compasium Crévier: conflictum Σ.
[2] ne Madvig: nec M: ne in Σ.
[3] Q. Caecilium Σ: p. sulpitium M.
[4] credam ed. Frobeniana 1531: credebam Σ.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. xxxiii. The scene of the episode has not been mentioned before. Rome had apparently given no indication of its attitude towards this affair, except as it might be inferred from their general attitude towards the Achaeans.

[2] He probably means the embassy reported in xxxiii. 7 above, although it is not recorded that Lycortas himself was a member of that embassy, and Livy has not mentioned any slaughter which took place at Compasium of those B.C. 184 Lacedaemonians who had come in response to the summons of Philopoemen to plead their cause;[1] second, that after they had treated men with such violence, that they might overlook no form of cruelty, they had torn down the walls of a most illustrious city, had repealed their most ancient laws, and had done away with the discipline of Lycurgus, famed as it was throughout the world. When Appius had said this, Lycortas, both because he was praetor and because he belonged to the party of Philopoemen, who was responsible for whatever had been done in Lacedaemon, replied thus: "It is more difficult for us, Appius Claudius, to speak in your presence than it was recently in Rome before the senate.[2] For then our task was to answer the accusations of the Lacedaemonians: now we have been accused by you, before whom we must plead our cause. This disadvantage of situation we accept in the hope that you will listen in the spirit of a judge, laying aside the vehemence of a prosecutor with which you spoke a little while ago. I at any rate, when these complaints which were presented, both here previously before Quintus Caecilius[3] and in Rome later by the Lacedaemonians, were repeated by you a little while ago, shall believe that I am replying, not to you, but to them in your presence. You bring up the murder of those men who were killed when they had been summoned by the praetor Philopoemen to plead their argument with the Lacedaemonians at that time. Lycortas was also at Rome in 189 B.C. (XXXVIII. xxxii. 5–10).

[3] There must have been unofficial conferences with the commissioners even if no meeting of the council was held: cf. xxxiii. 6 above.

fecti sunt. Hoc ego crimen non modo a vobis, Romani, sed ne apud vos quidem nobis obiciendum fuisse arbitror. Quid ita? Quia in vestro foedere erat ut 10 maritimis urbibus abstinerent Lacedaemonii. Quo tempore armis captis urbes, a quibus abstinere iussi erant, nocturno impetu occupaverunt, si T.[1] Quinctius, si exercitus Romanus, sicut antea, in Peloponneso fuisset, eo nimirum capti et oppressi con-
11 fugissent. Cum vos procul essetis, quo alio nisi ad nos, socios vestros, quos antea Gytheo opem ferentes, quos Lacedaemonem vobiscum simili de causa op-
12 pugnantes viderant, confugerent? Pro vobis igitur iustum piumque bellum suscepimus. Quod cum alii laudent, reprehendere ne Lacedaemonii quidem possint, dii quoque ipsi comprobaverint, qui nobis victoriam dederunt, quonam modo ea quae belli iure acta sunt in disceptationem veniunt? Quorum 13 tamen maxima pars nihil pertinet ad nos. Nostrum est quod evocavimus ad causam dicendam eos, qui ad arma multitudinem exciverant, qui expugnaverant maritima oppida, qui diripuerant, qui caedem princi-
14 pum fecerant. Quod vero illi venientes in castra interfecti sunt, vestrum est, Areu et Alcibiade, qui 15 nunc nos, si diis placet, accusatis, non nostrum. Exules Lacedaemoniorum, quo ex[2] numero hi quoque duo fuerunt, et tunc nobiscum erant, et quod domicilio sibi delegerant maritima oppida, se petitos credentes, in eos, quorum opera patria extorres ne

[1] t. $\bar{r}$: ti. F. [2] ex codd. Modii : in $\bar{r}$.

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. xxx.–xxxi. and the note to xxx. 6.

cause. This charge, in my opinion, should not only B.C. 184 not have been made against us by you, Romans, but not even by them before you. Why so? Because it was stated in your treaty that the Lacedaemonians should keep their hands off the towns on the coast. At the time when they took up arms and seized, by a night attack, those cities which they had been ordered to let alone, if Titus Quinctius, if a Roman army, as before, had been in the Peloponnesus, the captured and oppressed would doubtless have fled to them.[1] Since you were far away, where else could they flee except to us, whom they had previously seen bringing aid to Gytheum and besieging Lacedaemon in common cause with you? On your behalf, then, we undertook a legal and righteous war. Since others applaud it, since not even the Lacedaemonians can criticize it, and since the very gods themselves, by giving us the victory, have approved it, how can those things which took place under the law of war come into dispute? Yet the greatest part of those things have nothing to do with us. It is our affair that we summoned to plead their cause those who had called the multitude to arms, who had captured the coast towns, who had plundered them, who had caused the murder of the leading men. But as to the fact that they were killed while they were coming to our camp, that is your affair, Areus and Alcibiades—who now (heaven help us!) are accusing us—not ours. The exiles of the Lacedaemonians, to which number even these two belonged, were indeed at that time with us, and because they had chosen as their places of residence the towns on the coast believing that they were being sought out, they made an attack on those men thanks to whose efforts they

.c. in tuto quidem exsilio posse consenescere se indigna-0 16 bantur, impetum fecerunt. Lacedaemonii igitur Lacedaemonios, non Achaei interfecerunt; nec iure an iniuria caesi sint, argumentari refert.

XXXVII. "At enim illa certe vestra sunt, Achaei, quod leges disciplinamque vetustissimam Lycurgi
2 sustulistis, quod muros diruistis. Quae utraque ab iisdem obici qui possunt, cum muri Lacedaemonis non ab Lycurgo, sed paucos ante annos ad dissolven-
3 dam Lycurgi disciplinam exstructi sint? Tyranni enim nuper eos arcem et munimentum sibi, non civitati paraverunt; et si exsistat hodie ab inferis Lycurgus, gaudeat ruinis eorum, et nunc se patriam
4 et Spartam antiquam agnoscere dicat. Non Philopoemenem exspectare nec Achaeos, sed vos ipsi, Lacedaemonii, vestris manibus amoliri et diruere
5 omnia vestigia tyrannidis debuistis. Vestrae enim illae deformes veluti notae [1] servitutis erant, et cum sine muris per octingentos prope annos liberi, aliquando etiam principes Graeciae fuissetis, muris velut compedibus circumdatis vincti per centum annos
6 servistis. Quod ad leges ademptas attinet, ego antiquas Lacedaemoniis [2] leges tyrannos ademisse

[1] veluti notae Weissenborn: notae F τ: ueluti cicatrices M.
[2] lacedaemoniis τ: lacedaemonis F.

---

[1] Lycortas overlooks the fact that on the day after the riot 63 Lacedaemonians were put to death after a sort of trial, apparently before the Achaeans (XXXVIII. xxxiii. 11). The responsibility of the exiles can extend, then, only to the 17 who were killed in the rioting.

It may be remarked that the Achaeans show no sympathy for the victims of Nabis on the ground of their aristocratic tendencies, and are interested in them, so far as one can judge, solely because they provided a means of creating internal discord in Lacedaemon.

saw with indignation that they, exiles from home, could not grow old even in a safe place of exile. Lacedaemonians, then, were killed by Lacedaemonians, not by Achaeans; whether they were killed justly or unjustly it is not important to inquire.[1] B.C. 184

XXXVII. "But, you say, those other actions were at any rate your acts, Achaeans—the abolition of the laws and the most ancient discipline of Lycurgus, and the destruction of the walls. But how can both these criticisms be made by the same persons, since the walls of Lacedaemon were not built by Lycurgus, but were constructed a few years ago to overthrow the system of Lycurgus? For the tyrants recently erected them, a citadel and protection for themselves, not for the city; and if Lycurgus should rise from the dead to-day he would rejoice in their destruction and would say that now he recognized his home and the ancient Sparta. You yourselves, Lacedaemonians, should not have waited for Philopoemen and the Achaeans, but should with your own hands have torn down and destroyed all traces of the tyranny. For they were yours—those disfiguring scars of servitude, if I may so call them, and while, without walls, you had been free for eight hundred years and for a considerable period even the first state in Greece, when the walls were thrown around you like shackles you were bound in slavery for a hundred years.[2] As far as the abolition of the laws is concerned, I consider that the tyrants took away their ancient laws from the Lacedaemonians; that we did not

[2] The method of calculation throughout is obscure. For the eight centuries under the laws of Lycurgus, cf. XXXVIII. xxxiv. 9. There is no agreement as to the date of the construction of the walls (XXXIV. xxxviii. 2 and the note).

.c. 0 arbitror; nos non suas iis ademisse, quas non habe-
7 bant, sed nostras leges dedisse; nec male consuluisse civitati, cum concilii nostri eam fecerimus et nobis miscuerimus, ut corpus unum et concilium[1] totius
8 Peloponnesi esset. Tunc, ut opinor, si aliis ipsi legibus viveremus, alias istis iniunxissemus, queri se iniquo iure esse et indignari possent.
9 "Scio ego, Ap. Claudi, hanc orationem qua sum adhuc usus neque sociorum apud socios neque liberae gentis esse, sed vere servorum disceptantium
10 apud dominos. Nam si non vana illa vox praeconis fuit, qua liberos esse omnium primos Achaeos iussistis, si foedus ratum est, si societas et amicitia ex aequo observatur, cur ego, quid Capua capta feceritis Romani, non quaero, vos rationem reposcitis, quid 11 Achaei Lacedaemoniis bello victis fecerimus? Interfecti aliqui sunt, finge, a nobis: quid? Vos senatores 12 Campanos securi non percussistis? At muros[2] diruimus: vos non muros tantum sed urbem agros 13 ademistis. Specie, inquis, aequum est foedus: re apud Achaeos precaria libertas, apud Romanos etiam 14 imperium est. Sentio, Appi, et, si non oportet, non

[1] et concilium $\bar{\sigma}$: ut consilium F.
[2] at muros Drakenborch: muros $F\bar{\sigma}$.

---

[1] The decree of 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxxii. 5; Polybius XVIII. xlvi.) named no Peloponnesian state except Corinth, the others being omitted, presumably, because they were already free. The speaker is therefore inexact in his quotation, although omnium primos is exact to the extent that Corinth was the first state mentioned in the decree.

[2] The case of Capua was frequently brought up by Greek critics of Rome: cf., e.g., XXXI. xxix. 11.

[3] This must be regarded as a fair statement of the situation, even if the Greeks themselves were mainly to blame. Lycortas appears to mean by the last clause that such liberty as the take from them what they did not possess, but gave B.C. 184 them our own laws; I believe, too, that the measures we took were not for the disadvantage of the Lacedaemonian state, since we made it part of our League and united it with us, so that there was one body and one council for the whole Peloponnesus. Then and then only, in my judgment, if we ourselves lived under one code and imposed another upon them, would they be able to complain and feel indignant that their status was unfair.

"I know, Appius Claudius, that the speech that I have thus far delivered is neither that of allies in the presence of allies nor that of a free people, but in reality that of slaves arguing before their masters. For if those words of the herald, with which you Romans ordered the Achaeans first of all to be free,[1] were not a mere sham, if the treaty was in fact valid, if the alliance and friendship are being impartially observed, why do I not ask what you Romans did when you took Capua, as you demand an explanation of what we Achaeans did when the Lacedaemonians were conquered in war?[2] Some of them, let us assume, were killed by us: what of it? Did you not behead Campanian senators? But, you say, we tore down their walls: you destroyed, not the walls alone, but the city, the farm lands. The treaty, you say, looks as if it were between equals: in fact, among the Achaeans liberty is a thing bestowed as a favour, among the Romans it amounts even to sovereignty.[3] I know this, Appius, and if I should Achaeans possess under a treaty that was nominally aequum is the gift of the Romans (precaria), but that the Romans by virtue of their imperium could take away their gift as easily as they could make it. The reply of Claudius confirms this.

indignor: sed oro vos, quantumlibet intersit inter Romanos et Achaeos, modo ne in aequo hostes vestri nostrique apud vos sint ac nos socii, immo ne meliore 15 iure sint. Nam ut in aequo essent nos fecimus, cum leges iis nostras dedimus, cum, ut Achaici [1] concilii essent, effecimus. Parum est victis, quod victoribus satis est; plus postulant hostes quam socii habent.
16 Quae iureiurando, quae monumentis litterarum in lapide insculptis in aeternam memoriam sancta atque sacrata sunt, ea cum periurio nostro tollere parant.
17 Veremur quidem vos, Romani, et si ita vultis, etiam timemus: sed plus et [2] veremur et timemus deos 18 immortales." Cum adsensu maximae partis est auditus, et locutum omnes pro maiestate magistratus censebant, ut facile appareret molliter agendo dig-19 nitatem suam tenere Romanos non posse. Tum Appius suadere se magnopere Achaeis dixit ut, dum liceret voluntate sua facere, gratiam inirent, ne mox 20 inviti et coacti facerent. Haec vox audita quidem cum omnium gemitu est, sed metum iniecit [3] im-

[1] Achaici Gronovius: achaei F.
[2] et ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. .
[3] metum iniecit Gelenius: metu iniecto .

---

[1] A copy of the decree by which Lacedaemon was taken into the League would doubtless be set up in the temple at Aegium.

[2] For the thought cf. sect. 21 below and the note. Lycortas was the father of Polybius, and therefore, even if any corresponding speech in Polybius were preserved, we should find it impossible to judge how much of the version of Livy was genuine. Its sophistry is evident, and it is difficult to see how even a supporter of Philopoemen could have honestly maintained that Lacedaemon had equal rights in the League. But, genuine or imaginary, the speech seems to not I do not object; but at any rate I beg you, no B.C. 184 matter how great the difference may be between the Romans and the Achaeans, not to permit your enemies and ours to be on an equal footing before you with us, your allies, or rather on a better footing. For we brought it about that they were equal when we gave them our laws, when we made them members of the Achaean League. That is too little for the conquered which is sufficient for the conquerors; enemies demand more than allies possess! Those things which were made sanctified and sacred by oath, by written records [1] carved on stone for eternal preservation, they are trying, by making us perjurers, to destroy. Indeed we respect you, Romans, and, if you wish it so, we even fear you; but still more do we both respect and fear the immortal gods." [2] Lycortas was heard with applause on the part of the majority, and all said that he had spoken in a manner consistent with the dignity of his office, so that it was readily apparent that by a soft answer the Romans could not maintain their position. Then Appius said that he earnestly advised the Achaeans to come to terms while it was still possible to do so of their own free will, lest presently they be forced to take the same action against their will and under compulsion. This speech was received with a general groan, but it made the Achaeans fear to refuse what picture fairly the actual situation that existed in Greece, and its accuracy suggests that Livy had some evidential basis for his composition. For an excellent and well-documented discussion of this question, see Larsen, "Was Greece Free between 196 and 146 B.C.?" in Classical Philology 30, 1935, 193–214. Larsen's findings agree in general with the point of view of this note, although he does not use this speech as evidence.

c.c. 21 perata recusandi. Id modo petierunt ut Romani, 70 quae viderentur, de Lacedaemoniis mutarent nec Achaeos religione obstringerent irrita ea, quae iureiurando sanxissent, faciendi. Damnatio tantum Arei et Alcibiadis, quae nuper facta erat, sublata est.

XXXVIII. Romae principio eius anni, cum de provinciis consulum et praetorum actum est, consulibus Ligures, quia bellum nusquam alibi erat, decreti.
2 Praetores C. Decimius Flavus[1] urbanam, P. Cornelius
3 Cethegus inter cives et peregrinos sortiti sunt, C. Sempronius Blaesus Siciliam, Q. Naevius Matho Sardiniam et ut idem quaereret de veneficiis, A. Terentius Varro Hispaniam citeriorem, P. Sempro-
4 nius Longus Hispaniam ulteriorem. De iis duabus provinciis legati per id fere tempus L. Iuventius Talna
5 et T. Quinctilius Varus venerunt, qui quantum bellum iam profligatum in Hispania esset senatu edocto postularunt simul, ut pro rebus tam prospere gestis diis immortalibus haberetur honos et ut praetoribus
6 exercitum deportare liceret. Supplicatio in biduum decreta est: de legionibus deportandis, cum de consulum praetorumque exercitibus ageretur, rem integ-
7 ram referri iusserunt. Paucos post dies consulibus in Ligures binae legiones, quas Ap. Claudius et M.
8 Sempronius habuerant, decretae sunt. De Hispaniensibus exercitibus magna contentio fuit inter

[1] Decimius Flavus ed. Frobeniana 1535: decimus flauius ς.

[1] The Achaeans, recognizing the inevitability of changes, ask that these changes be enforced upon them by Rome, to spare them the humiliation of breaking their oaths by repealing laws which they had sworn to obey.

[2] The praetors were clearly warned by the experience of Acidinus (xxix. 4–5 above and the note), and tried to avoid giving the senate an excuse to refuse their triumphs.

was ordered. They requested only this, that the B.C. 184
Romans should make such changes as seemed proper to them regarding the Lacedaemonians and should not involve the Achaeans in the religious difficulty of making void what they had ratified by oath.[1] Only the vote of condemnation which had recently been passed on Areus and Alcibiades was repealed.

XXXVIII. At Rome, in the beginning of this year, when the question of the provinces for the consuls and praetors came up, the Ligurians were decreed to the consuls, since there was war nowhere else. Of the praetors, Gaius Decimius Flavus received the civil jurisdiction, Publius Cornelius Cethegus that between citizens and aliens, Gaius Sempronius Blaesus Sicily, Quintus Naevius Matho Sardinia and the additional task of investigating cases of poisoning, Aulus Terentius Varro Nearer Spain, Publius Sempronius Longus Farther Spain. From these two provinces at about the same time came the lieutenants, Lucius Juventius Talna and Titus Quinctilius Varus, who, after informing the senate how great a war had now been finished in Spain, asked at the same time that by reason of such victories honour should be paid to the immortal gods and that the praetors should be permitted to bring home their armies.[2] A thanksgiving for two days was decreed: as to bringing back the legions, they ordered that the question should be brought up anew when the matter of troops for the consuls and praetors was discussed. A few days later the consuls were assigned, for service against the Ligurians, two legions each, which had been under the command of Appius Claudius and Marcus Sempronius. With respect to the Spanish armies, great strife arose between the new praetors and the novos praetores et amicos absentium, Calpurnii

9 Quinctiique. Utraque causa tribunos plebis, utraque consulem habebat. Hi se intercessuros senatus consulto, si deportandos censerent exercitus, denuntiabant: illi, si haec intercessio fieret, nullam rem aliam 10 se decerni passuros. Victa postremo absentium gratia est et senatus consultum factum ut praetores quattuor milia peditum Romanorum scriberent, trecentos equites, et quinque milia peditum sociorum Latini nominis, quingentos equites, quos secum in 11 Hispaniam portarent. Cum ea quattuor milia in legiones discripsissent,[1] quo [2] plus quam quina milia peditum, treceni equites in singulis legionibus esset,[3] dimitterent, eos primum, qui emerita stipendia 12 haberent, deinde ut cuiusque fortissima opera Calpurnius et Quinctius in proelio usi essent.

XXXIX. Hac sedata contentione alia subinde C.
2 Decimii praetoris morte exorta est. Cn. Sicinius et L. Pupius, qui aediles proximo anno fuerant, et C. Valerius flamen Dialis et Q. Fulvius Flaccus—is quia aedilis curulis designatus erat, sine toga candida, sed
3 maxima ex omnibus contentione—petebant; certamenque ei cum flamine [4] erat. Et postquam primo

[1] ea quattuor milia in legiones discripsissent M. Mueller: ea legiones quattuor descripsissent F.
[2] quo Madvig: quod F.
[3] esset ed. Aldina: essent F.
[4] flamine ed. Frobeniana 1535: flamine diale F.

[1] Since the negative always prevailed in such circumstances, a complete deadlock and suspension of public business were threatened.

[2] Livy has confused the story. If Fulvius was aedile-elect only, there could have been no objection to his wearing the toga candida (a curule magistrate wore the toga praetexta), and no question of holding two offices at once could have arisen, friends of the absent, Calpurnius and Quinctius. B.C. 184

Each side had tribunes of the people, each a consul. The one side threatened that they would veto a decree of the senate if they should vote that the armies should be brought home: the others, that if this veto should be used they would permit no other decree to be passed.[1] In the end the influence of the absent praetors proved unavailing, and a decree of the senate was passed that the praetors should enlist four thousand Roman infantry, three hundred cavalry, and of the allies of the Latin confederacy five thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry, whom they should take with them to Spain. When they had assigned these four thousand to the legions, in proportion as they numbered more than five thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry per legion, they should discharge the surplus; first, those who had completed their terms of service, second, those individuals whose conspicuous services Calpurnius and Quinctius had enjoyed in the battle.

XXXIX. When this strife had calmed down, another straightway arose as a consequence of the death of Gaius Decimius the praetor. Gnaeus Sicinius and Lucius Pupius, who had been aediles the preceding year, and Gaius Valerius the flamen Dialis and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus—he, because he was curule aedile elect,[2] did not wear the toga candida, but was canvassing more energetically than the rest—were the candidates. The race was between Fulvius and the flamen. And when Fulvius since his partial term as praetor would expire when his term as aedile began (cf. VII. xlii. 2 for the law forbidding two offices at the same time). We must therefore conclude with Mommsen (St. R. I. 513, n. 3) that Fulvius was aedile, not aedile-elect.

aequare, mox superare etiam est visus, pars tribunorum plebis negare rationem eius habendam esse, 4 quod duos simul unus magistratus, praesertim curules, neque capere posset nec gerere; pars legibus eum solvi aequum censere, ut quem vellet praetorem 5 creandi populo potestas fieret. L. Porcius consul primo in ea sententia esse ne nomen eius acciperet; 6 deinde, ut ex auctoritate senatus idem faceret, convocatis patribus referre se ad eos dixit, quod nec iure ullo nec exemplo tolerabili liberae civitati aedilis curulis designatus praeturam peteret; sibi, nisi quid aliud iis videretur, in animo esse e lege comitia habere. 7 Patres censuerunt, uti L. Porcius consul cum Q. Fulvio ageret ne impedimento esset quo minus comitia praetoris in locum C. Decimii subrogandi e lege 8 haberentur. Agenti consuli ex senatus consulto respondit Flaccus nihil quod se [1] indignum esset facturum. Medio responso spem ad voluntatem interpretantibus fecerat cessurum patrum auctoritati esse. 9 Comitiis acrius etiam quam ante petebat criminando, extorqueri sibi a consule et senatu populi Romani beneficium, et invidiam fieri geminati honoris, tamquam non appareret, ubi designatus praetor esset,

[1] quod se edd. vett. : quidem se quod F.

---

[1] The presiding magistrate had wide discretion in accepting or rejecting candidacies.

[2] The doctrine here expressed had been most recently invoked for the benefit of Flamininus in 199 B.C. (XXXII. vii. 11).

[3] One expects renuntiatus rather than designatus, but there is no authority for it in the MSS.

seemed at first to be on equal terms with Valerius B.C. 184 and then even to be passing him, part of the tribunes of the people declared that his candidacy ought not to be accepted [1] because one man could not seek or hold two offices simultaneously, especially curule offices; part thought that he should be exempted from the operation of the laws, so that the people might have the opportunity of electing whomsoever they wished to the praetorship.[2] Lucius Porcius the consul was at first of the opinion that he should not accept his name; then, that he might take this action with the authorization of the senate, calling together the Fathers, he said that he was referring the matter to them because there was neither any law nor any precedent, acceptable in a free state, that a curule aedile elect might seek the praetorship; unless something else seemed best to them, it was his intention to hold the election in accordance with the law. The Fathers voted that the consul Lucius Porcius should appeal to Quintus Fulvius not to stand in the way of the election of a praetor, as a successor to Gaius Decimius, being held in accordance with the law. When the consul made this appeal in accordance with the decree of the senate, Flaccus replied that he would do nothing which was unworthy of himself. By this ambiguous answer he had created, in the minds of men who interpreted it to suit their own desires, the hope that he would yield to the authority of the Fathers. At the election he continued his canvassing even more actively than before, charging that the consul and the senate were wresting from him the gift of the Roman people and were arousing hostility to him by their talk of duplicated offices, as if it were not evident that when he should be elected [3]

10 extemplo aedilitate se abdicaturum. Consul cum et pertinaciam petentis crescere et favorem populi magis magisque in eum inclinari cerneret, dimissis comitiis senatum vocavit. Censuerunt frequentes, quoniam Flaccum auctoritas patrum nihil movisset, 11 ad populum cum Flacco agendum. Contione advocata cum egisset consul, ne tum quidem de sententia motus gratias populo Romano egit, quod tanto studio, quotienscumque declarandae voluntatis potestas 12 facta esset, praetorem se voluisset facere: ea sibi studia civium suorum destituere non esse in animo. Haec vero tam obstinata vox tantum ei favorem accendit ut haud dubius praetor esset, si consul 13 accipere nomen vellet. Ingens certamen tribunis et inter se ipsos et cum consule fuit, donec senatus a 14 consule est habitus decretumque: quoniam praetoris subrogandi comitia ne legibus fierent, pertinacia Q. Flacci et prava studia hominum impedirent, senatum 15 censere satis praetorum esse; P. Cornelius utramque in urbe iurisdictionem haberet, Apollinique ludos faceret.

XL. His comitiis prudentia et virtute senatus sublatis, alia maioris certaminis, quo et maiore de re et 2 inter plures potentioresque viros, sunt exorta. Cen-

---

[1] The first appeal had been made privately, although the reply of Flaccus had at once been made known.

[2] Their ardour cooled later, and Flaccus did not become praetor until two years after this (lvi. 5 below).

[3] Cf. the similar contest at the preceding election of 189 B.C. (XXXVII. lvii. 9–lviii. 2).

praetor he would immediately resign the aedileship. B.C. 184
When the consul saw both that the stubbornness of the candidate increased and that the favour of the people was turning more and more to him, he adjourned the assembly and summoned the senate. A full meeting declared that, since the authority of the Fathers had had no influence with Flaccus, the appeal to Flaccus should be made before the assembly.[1] When the consul had called an informal meeting and presented his plea, Flaccus, not even then moved from his position, expressed his gratitude to the Roman people because with such enthusiasm, as often as the opportunity to declare their desires had been granted to them, they had wished to make him praetor: it was not his intention to disappoint these desires of his fellow-citizens. This speech, obstinate though it was, aroused so much enthusiasm for him that he would be praetor beyond a doubt if the consul would accept his candidacy.[2] Then the tribunes had a great argument, both among themselves and with the consul, until the senate was convoked by the consul and passed this decree: that since the stubbornness of Quintus Flaccus and the base desires of men prevented the holding, in accordance with the laws, of the election to fill a vacancy among the praetors, the senate decreed that there were enough praetors; Publius Cornelius should hold both jurisdictions in the City and should preside at the games to Apollo.

XL. When this election had been avoided by the wisdom and courage of the senate, another followed,[3] involving a greater contest, as it was both for a more important prize and participated in by more and more powerful men. The censorship was sought with suram summa contentione petebant L. Valerius Flaccus P. et L. Scipiones Cn. Manlius Volso L. Furius 3 Purpurio patricii, plebeii autem M. Porcius Cato M. Fulvius Nobilior Ti. et M. Sempronii, Longus et Tuditanus. Sed omnes patricios plebeiosque nobilis- 4 simarum familiarum M. Porcius longe anteibat. In hoc viro tanta vis animi ingeniique fuit ut quocumque loco natus esset, fortunam sibi ipse facturus fuisse videretur. Nulla ars neque privatae neque publicae rei gerendae ei defuit; urbanas rusticasque res pari- 5 ter callebat. Ad summos honores alios scientia iuris, alios eloquentia, alios gloria militaris provexit: huic versatile [1] ingenium sic pariter ad omnia fuit ut natum 6 ad id unum diceres, quodcumque ageret: in bello manu fortissimus multisque insignibus clarus pugnis, idem postquam ad magnos honores pervenit, summus imperator, idem in pace, si ius consuleres, peritissi- 7 mus, si causa oranda esset, eloquentissimus, nec is tantum, cuius lingua vivo eo viguerit,[2] monumentum eloquentiae nullum exstet: vivit immo vigetque 8 eloquentia eius sacrata scriptis omnis generis. Orationes et pro se multae et pro aliis et in alios: nam non solum accusando sed etiam causam dicendo 9 fatigavit inimicos. Simultates nimio plures et

[1] versatile edd. vett.: uersabile F.
[2] viguerit edd. vett.: uiguit F.

[1] All the candidates were ex-consuls, as usual. Publius Scipio is Nasica. Lucius Scipio was striving for rehabilitation after his trial, but the outcome of the election suggests that the glory of the Scipios had, at least for the time, departed.
[2] That is, battles in which he took part as a private.

the most intense rivalry by Lucius Valerius Flaccus, B.C. 184
Publius and Lucius Scipio, Gnaeus Manlius Volso and Lucius Furius Purpurio, patricians, as well as by the plebeians Marcus Porcius Cato, Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, Tiberius Sempronius Longus and Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus.[1] But among all the patricians and plebeians of the most illustrious houses, Marcus Porcius Cato stood out most conspicuously. In this man there was such force of mind and character that in whatever station he had been born it seemed that he would have made his fortune for himself. No art of conducting either private or public business was lacking to him; he was equally skilled in affairs of the city and of the farm. Some men were advanced to the highest offices by knowledge of the law, others by eloquence, others by military reputation: his comprehensive genius was so adapted to everything alike that you would say that whatever he was doing was the one thing for which he was born: in war he was the bravest of fighters and was famous for many remarkable battles,[2] and after he attained to the highest offices, he was likewise a consummate commander; the same man in peace was, if you consider the law, most skilled therein, if there was a case to be pleaded, most eloquent, nor was he merely one whose tongue was potent while he lived but left no record of his eloquence: rather, he lives and flourishes by his eloquence, enshrined in books of every kind. There are many orations, both for himself and for and against others; for he wore down his enemies not only by accusing them but also by pleading his own cause.[3] Feuds in excessive numbers pursued him

[3] Plutarch (Cato Major, xv.) says that Cato was put on trial about fifty times.

exercuerunt eum et ipse exercuit eas; nec facile dixeris, utrum magis presserit eum nobilitas, an ille 10 agitaverit nobilitatem. Asperi procul dubio animi et linguae acerbae et immodice liberae fuit, sed invicti a cupiditatibus animi, rigidae innocentiae, con-
11 temptor gratiae, divitiarum. In parsimonia, in patientia laboris periculique [1] ferrei prope corporis animique, quem ne senectus quidem quae solvit 12 omnia fregerit, qui sextum et octogesimum annum agens causam dixerit, ipse pro se oraverit scripseritque, nonagesimo anno Ser. Galbam ad populi adduxerit iudicium.

XLI. Hunc, sicut omni vita, tum petentem premebat nobilitas; coierantque praeter [2] L. Flaccum, qui collega in consulatu fuerat, candidati omnes ad
2 deiciendum honore, non solum ut ipsi potius adipiscerentur, nec quia indignabantur novum hominem censorem videre, sed etiam quod tristem censuram periculosamque multorum famae et ab laeso a 3 plerisque et laedendi cupido exspectabant. Etenim tum quoque minitabundus petebat, refragari sibi, qui

[1] periculique ed. Parisina 1513 : periculi aut et p. ϝ.
[2] praeter ed. Frobeniana 1535 : apud praetorem ϝ.

---

[1] The play on the verb is so clumsy that it may have been preserved from Livy's source.

[2] According to Per. XLIX, L. Scribonius and not Cato prosecuted Galba for his treacherous treatment of the Lusitanians. Cato, however, spoke against him (Cicero de oratore I. 227; Brutus 89, etc.).

This characterization raises once more the question of a special source dealing with Cato which Livy used (cf. XXXIV. xxi. 8; XXXVI. xxi. 4–6 and the notes). I see no reason—least of all the play on words mentioned in the preceding note—and he himself pursued them;[1] nor could you easily say whether the nobility worked harder to suppress him or he to irritate the nobility. Without question he had a stern temper, a bitter tongue and one immoderately free, but he had a soul unconquerable by appetites, an unwavering integrity, and a contempt for influence and wealth. In his economy, in his endurance of toil and danger, he was of almost iron-like body and mind, and his mind not even old age, which weakens everything, could break down, since at the age of eighty-six he pleaded a case, spoke and wrote in his own defence, and in his ninetieth year brought Servius Galba to trial before the assembly.[2] B.C. 184

XLI. Against him as a candidate on this occasion the nobility, as throughout his life, used their influence; and all the candidates except Lucius Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the consulship, had formed a combination to keep him from the office,[3] not only that they themselves might rather win it nor because they objected to seeing a "new man"[4] chosen censor, but also because they anticipated a stern censorship dangerous to the reputation of many, from a man who had both been injured by many and was eager to do injury. For even then he was canvassing by means of threats, charging that why this passage and the account of the censorship in the following chapters should not have been derived from the same source. There seems to be nothing in this passage which Cato would not have regarded as a compliment and would not have been willing to say about himself.

[3] Formal coitiones were illegal, but informal combinations could not be prevented. The other candidates were all more or less closely allied with the Scipionic party.

[4] Cf. XXXVII. lvii. 2 and the note.

u.c. 570 liberam et fortem censuram timerent, criminando.
4 Et simul L. Valerio suffragabatur: illo uno collega castigare se nova flagitia et priscos revocare mores posse. His accensi homines, adversa nobilitate, non M. Porcium modo censorem fecerunt, sed collegam ei L. Valerium Flaccum adiecerunt.
5 Secundum comitia censorum consules praetoresque in provincias profecti praeter Q. Naevium, quem quattuor non minus menses, priusquam in Sardiniam iret, quaestiones veneficii, quarum magnam partem extra urbem per municipia conciliabulaque habuit, quia ita
6 aptius visum erat, tenuerunt. Si Antiati Valerio credere libet, ad duo milia hominum damnavit. Et L. Postumius praetor, cui Tarentum provincia evenerat, magnas pastorum coniurationes vindicavit, et reliquias Bacchanalium quaestionis cum cura exsecutus
7 est. Multos, qui aut citati non adfuerant aut vades deseruerant, in ea regione Italiae latentes partim noxios iudicavit, partim comprehensos Romam ad senatum misit. In carcerem omnes a P. Cornelio coniecti sunt.

XLII. In Hispania ulteriore fractis proximo bello Lusitanis quietae res fuerunt: in[1] citeriore A. Terentius in Suessetanis oppidum Corbionem vineis et operibus expugnavit, captivos vendidit: quieta
2 deinde hiberna et citerior provincia habuit. Veteres praetores C. Calpurnius Piso et L. Quinctius Romam

[1] fuerunt : in ed. Frobeniana 1535 : fuerant et in ς.

[1] Cf. xxix. 8–9 above, which seems to be duplicated by this item.

he was being opposed by men who feared a free and B.C. 184 courageous censorship. At the same time he canvassed for Lucius Valerius also: with him alone as his colleague could he chastise the new vices and revive the ancient character. Aroused by such arguments and against the opposition of the nobility, the citizens not only chose Marcus Porcius as censor, but also gave him Lucius Flaccus as his colleague.

After the election of the censors the consuls and praetors departed for their provinces, with the exception of Quintus Naevius, who was detained for not less than four months before he could set out for Sardinia by the investigation of poisonings, a great part of which he conducted outside the City, in the municipalities and rural communities, because this method seemed more convenient. If one wishes to trust Valerius Antias, he condemned about two thousand persons. And Lucius Postumius the praetor, to whom the province of Tarentum had fallen, broke up large conspiracies of shepherds [1] and diligently prosecuted what was left of the Bacchanalian investigation. Many who either had not appeared when summoned or had abandoned their sureties, hiding in that part of Italy, he pronounced guilty in some cases, and in others he arrested them and sent them to the senate in Rome. All were thrown into prison by Publius Cornelius.

XLII. In Farther Spain, the Lusitanians having been broken in the last campaign, things were quiet; in Nearer Spain Aulus Terentius among the Suessetani took the town of Corbio with sheds and siegeworks and sold the captives: after that the nearer province too had a quiet winter. The former praetors Gaius Calpurnius Piso and Lucius Quinctius redierunt. Utrique magno patrum consensu

3 triumphus est decretus. Prior C. Calpurnius de Lusitanis et Celtiberis triumphavit: coronas aureas tulit octoginta tres et duodecim milia pondo argenti.
4 Paucos post dies L. Quinctius Crispinus ex iisdem Lusitanis et Celtiberis triumphavit: tantundem auri atque argenti in eo triumpho praelatum.
5 Censores M. Porcius et L. Valerius metu mixta expectatione senatum legerunt; septem moverunt senatu, ex quibus unum insignem et nobilitate et honoribus. L. Quinctium Flamininum consularem.
6 Patrum memoria institutum fertur ut censores motis senatu adscriberent notas. Catonis et aliae quidem acerbae orationes exstant in eos quos aut senatorio
7 loco movit aut quibus equos ademit, longe gravissima in L. Quinctium oratio, qua si accusator ante notam, non censor post notam usus esset, retinere L. Quinctium in senatu ne frater quidem T. Quinctius,
8 si tum censor esset, potuisset. Inter cetera obiecit ei Philippum Poenum, carum ac nobile scortum, ab Roma in Galliam provinciam spe ingentium donorum
9 perductum. Eum puerum, per[1] lasciviam cum cavillaretur, exprobrare consuli saepe[2] solitum, quod sub ipsum spectaculum gladiatorium abductus ab

[1] per ed. Parisina 1513: om. ⊽ (vid. inf.).
[2] saepe Heraeus: persaepe ⊽ (vid. sup.).

[1] Though older than his brother Titus, he had served under him against Philip and had reached the consulship in 192 B.C.

[2] H. Meyer (Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta) listed twenty-six censorial speeches of Cato (nos. 24–49 incl.), although not all are directed at individuals and the dates of some are uncertain. Other scholars compile different lists, but it is at least clear that Cato's censorship was active and that his decisions were vigorously contested.

[3] This constituted removal from the list of equites.

returned to Rome. To each of them a triumph was B.C. 184 decreed by the general consent of the Fathers. First Gaius Calpurnius triumphed over the Lusitanians and Celtiberians: he displayed eighty-three golden crowns and twelve thousand pounds of silver. A few days later Lucius Quinctius Crispinus triumphed over the same Lusitanians and Celtiberians: the same amount of gold and silver was carried in this triumph.

The censors Marcus Porcius and Lucius Valerius chose the senate amid suspense mingled with fear; they expelled seven from the senate, one of whom was distinguished by both high birth and political success, Lucius Quinctius Flamininus, a man of consular rank.[1] Within the memory of our fathers the custom is said to have arisen that the censors should affix the nota to the names of those who are expelled from the senate. But in this case there are speeches of Cato[2] and indeed other bitter orations against those who were either expelled from the senate or whose horses were taken from them,[3] by far the most vehement being that against Lucius Quinctius, and if he had made this speech as an accuser before the branding rather than as censor after the branding, Lucius Quinctius could not have been kept in the senate even by his brother Titus Quinctius, had he been censor at the time. Among other things he reproached him regarding Philippus, a Carthaginian, a notorious degenerate whom he loved and whom he had attracted from Rome to his province of Gaul by the promise of great gifts. This boy, says Cato, in the course of his playful jesting, used frequently to reproach the consul because just on the eve of the gladiatorial games he had been

Roma esset, ut obsequium amatori venditaret.[1]
10 Forte epulantibus iis, cum iam vino incaluissent, nuntiatum in convivio esse nobilem Boium cum liberis transfugam venisse; convenire consulem velle
11 ut ab eo fidem praesens acciperet. Introductum in tabernaculum per interpretem adloqui consulem coepisse. Inter cuius sermonem Quinctius scorto "vis tu," inquit, "quoniam gladiatorium spectaculum reliquisti, iam hunc Gallum morientem videre?"
12 Et cum is vixdum serio adnuisset, ad nutum scorti consulem stricto gladio, qui super caput pendebat, loquenti Gallo caput primum percussisse, deinde, fugienti fidemque populi Romani atque eorum, qui aderant, imploranti latus transfodisse.

XLIII. Valerius Antias, ut qui nec orationem Catonis legisset et fabulae tantum sine auctore editae credidisset, aliud argumentum, simile tamen et 2 libidine et crudelitate[2] peragit. Placentiae famosam mulierem, cuius amore deperiret,[3] in convivium arcessitam scribit. Ibi iactantem sese scorto inter cetera rettulisse quam acriter quaestiones exercuisset et quam multos capitis damnatos in vinculis
3 haberet, quos securi percussurus esset. Tum illam infra eum accubantem negasse umquam vidisse quemquam securi ferientem, et pervelle id videre. Hic indulgentem amatorem unum ex illis miseris[4] attrahi

[1] amatori venditaret Lipsius "ex meo cod.": amatori iactaret M: amator ei uenditaret σ.
[2] libidine et crudelitate σ: libidini et crudelitati M.
[3] deperiret σ: deperierat M.
[4] illis miseris Gelenius: damnatis σ.

[1] This form of the story was followed by Valerius Maximus (II. ix. 3) and possibly by Cicero (Cato maior 42).
[2] The phrase is conventional in erotic literature.

carried off from Rome, that he might sell his favours B.C. 184 to his lover. By chance, when they were dining and were by now heated with wine, it was announced in the dining-room that a noble Boian, accompanied by his sons, had come as a deserter; he wished, they said, to meet the consul, that he might obtain a safeguard from him personally. Having been introduced into the tent, Cato continued, he began to address the consul through an interpreter. While he was speaking, Quinctius said to the boy, "Do you wish, since you missed the gladiatorial show, to see now this Gaul dying?" And when he nodded, although not really in earnest, the consul, at the boy's nod, seized the sword that was hanging above his head and first struck the head of the Gaul while he was speaking, and then, as the Gaul was fleeing and calling for the protection of the Roman people and of those who were present, he stabbed him through the side.

XLIII. Valerius Antias, as if he had never read the speech of Cato and had accepted the story as if it were nothing but a story anonymously circulated, gives another version,[1] similar, however, in its lust and cruelty. He writes that at Placentia a notorious woman, with whom Flamininus was desperately in love,[2] had been invited to dinner. There he was boasting to the courtesan, among other things, about his severity in the prosecution of cases and how many persons he had in chains, under sentence of death, whom he intended to behead. Then the woman, reclining below him, said that she had never seen a person beheaded and was very anxious to behold the sight. Hereupon, he says, the generous lover, ordering one of the wretches to be brought to him,

B.C. 4 iussum securi percussisse. Facinus sive eo modo quo 70 censor obiecit, sive, ut Valerius tradit, commissum est, saevum atque atrox: inter pocula atque epulas, ubi libare diis dapes, ubi bene precari mos esset, ad spectaculum scorti procacis, in sinu consulis recubantis, mactatam humanam victimam esse et cruore mensam respersam! In extrema oratione Catonis condicio Quinctio fertur ut si id factum negaret ceteraque, quae obiecisset, sponsione defenderet sese: sin [1] fateretur, ignominiane sua quemquam doliturum censeret, cum ipse vino et venere amens sanguine hominis in convivio lusisset?

XLIV. In equitatu recognoscendo L. Scipioni Asiatico ademptus equus. In censibus quoque accipiendis tristis et aspera in omnes ordines censura fuit. 2 Ornamenta et vestem muliebrem et vehicula, quae pluris quam quindecim milium aeris essent, deciens tanto pluris quam quanti essent [2] in censum referre 3 iuratores iussi; [3] item mancipia minora annis viginti, quae post proximum lustrum decem milibus aeris aut pluris eo venissent, uti ea quoque deciens [4] tanto pluris quam quanti essent aestimarentur, et his rebus

[1] sine ed. Veneta 1495: qui F.
[2] deciens tanto pluris quam quanti essent Wesenberg: om. F.
[3] iussi ed. Frobeniana 1535: iussit F.
[4] deciens Sigonius: decem F.

---

[1] Although mentioned also by Plutarch (Cato 17), the procedure is obscure. The sponsio (a sort of judicial wager) was a recognized feature of legal procedure, but it may be less technically used here. Plutarch represents this challenge as given and accepted before the assembly: this could be true only in case of a conviction and an appeal. Titus seems, in Plutarch, to be a party also.

cut off his head with his sword. This deed, whether B.C. 184
it was performed in the manner for which the censor rebuked him, or as Valerius reports it, was savage and cruel: in the midst of drinking and feasting, where it is the custom to pour libations to the gods and to pray for blessings, as a spectacle for a shameless harlot, reclining in the bosom of a consul, a human victim sacrificed and bespattering the table with his blood! At the end of the speech a challenge of Cato to Quinctius is reported: if he would deny this act and the other things which Cato had charged, he should defend himself by legal methods,[1] but if he confessed it, would he think that anyone would grieve at his disgrace, since he himself, mad with drink and desire, had played with a man's blood at a feast?

XLIV. In reviewing the equites Cato deprived Lucius Scipio Asiaticus of his horse. Also in accepting assessments [2] his censorship was stern and harsh towards all ranks. Jewels and women's dresses and vehicles which were worth more than fifteen thousand asses he directed the assessors to list at ten times more than their actual value;[3] likewise slaves less than twenty years old, who had been bought since the previous lustrum for ten thousand asses or more, he directed to be assessed at ten times more than their actual cost, and he ordered that on all these

[2] The citizens appeared in person before the censors and declared their property. The censors could revise or refuse their declarations.

[3] The emendation (see the critical note) seems to be warranted by the appearance of the same words in sect. 3 below, with reference to other articles of luxury. Perhaps these measures are Cato's revenge for his defeat in the debate over the Oppian law (XXXIV. i.–viii.).

4 omnibus terni[1] in milia aeris attribuerentur. Aquam publicam omnem in privatum aedificium aut agrum fluentem ademerunt: et quae in loca publica inaedificata immolitave privati habebant, intra dies triginta
5 demoliti sunt. Opera deinde facienda ex decreta in eam rem pecunia, lacus sternendos lapide, detergendasque,[2] qua opus esset, cloacas, in Aventino et in aliis partibus, qua nondum erant, faciendas
6 locaverunt. Et separatim Flaccus molem ad Neptunias aquas, ut iter populo esset, et viam per For-
7 mianum montem, Cato atria duo, Maenium et Titium, in lautumiis, et quattuor tabernas in publicum emit basilicamque ibi fecit, quae Porcia appellata est. Et vectigalia summis pretiis, ultro tributa infimis loca-
8 verunt. Quas locationes cum senatus precibus et lacrimis victus publicanorum induci et de integro locari iussisset, censores, edicto summotis ab hasta qui ludificati priorem locationem erant, omnia eadem
9 paulum imminutis pretiis locaverunt. Nobilis censura fuit simultatiumque plena, quae M. Porcium, cui acerbitas ea assignabatur, per omnem vitam exercuerunt.

10 Eodem anno coloniae duae, Potentia in Picenum,

[1] terni edd. vett.: terna et trina et tria ς.
[2] detergendasque Gelenius: tegendasque (-osque) ς.

---

[1] If the ordinary tax rate was one as per thousand (XXIV. xv. 9, etc.), this heavier tax on a much higher evaluation must have been, and was probably designed to be, almost confiscatory.

[2] It may be accidental that the number of the verb here shifts to the plural. This particular act prevented the piping into private property of water from the aqueducts.

[3] Their position is unknown.

[4] Cicero (de lege agraria I. 7) seems to speak of them as auction-rooms.

articles a tax of three asses per thousand should be B.C. 184 imposed.[1] All public water [2] flowing into a private dwelling or lot they shut off; and what private persons had built or erected on public property they tore down on thirty days' notice. Then they let contracts for the public works to be constructed from funds appropriated for that purpose, the paving of fountain basins with stone, the cleaning of sewers wherever that was necessary, and the construction of new sewers on the Aventine and elsewhere where none had yet been built. And Flaccus separately built a dike at the Neptunian waters [3] that the people might have a footpath there, and a road over the hill at Formiae, and Cato built two markets,[4] the Maenium and the Titium, in the region of the Lautumiae,[5] and bought four shops for the state and erected there the basilica [6] which is called Porcia. The revenues also they farmed at the highest rates and contracted for voluntary services at the lowest. When the senate, moved by the prayers and tears of the publicani, had ordered these contracts to be cancelled and new ones made, the censors, removing by edict from the place of auction [7] those bidders who had evaded the original contracts, let all the same contracts at slightly lowered figures. It was a remarkable censorship and full of quarrels, which occupied Marcus Porcius, to whom the severity was attributed, through his whole life.

In the same year two colonies, Potentia in the [5] Cf. XXXII. xvi. 7 and the note.

[6] This building, used for the law-courts, stood between the comitium and the north end of the Capitoline.

[7] Literally, "from the spear." The hasta or spear was a conventional sign set up to indicate a place where bidding was going on.

u.c. 670 Pisaurum in Gallicum agrum, deductae sunt. Sena iugera in singulos data. Diviserunt agrum coloniasque deduxerunt iidem tresviri, Q. Fabius Labeo, et 11 M. et Q. Fulvii, Flaccus et Nobilior. Consules eius anni nec domi nec militiae memorabile quicquam egerunt.

XLV. In insequentem annum crearunt consules M. Claudium Marcellum Q. Fabium Labeonem.

u.c. 671 M. Claudius Q. Fabius idibus Martiis, quo die consulatum inierunt, de provinciis suis praetorumque 2 rettulerunt. Praetores creati erant C. Valerius flamen Dialis, qui et priore anno petierat, et Sp. Postumius Albinus et P. Cornelius Sisenna L. Pupius 3 L. Iulius Cn. Sicinius.[1] Consulibus Ligures cum iisdem exercitibus, quos P. Claudius et L. Porcius 4 habuerant, provincia decreta est. Hispaniae extra sortem prioris anni praetoribus cum suis exercitibus servatae. Praetores ita sortiri iussi uti flamini Diali utique altera iuris dicendi Romae provincia esset: 5 peregrinam est sortitus. Sisennae Cornelio urbana, Sp. Postumio Sicilia, L. Pupio Apulia, L. Iulio Gallia, Cn. Sicinio Sardinia evenit. L. Iulius maturare est

[1] Sicinius ed. Frobeniana 1535 : sulpitius ϝ.

[1] I have given the names as they stand in the text. It is not impossible that the praenomina of the Fulvii have been interchanged.

[2] It seems strange that Livy should have separated the praetorian election from the consular in this fashion, and the use of conjunctions in this sentence is unusual. Yet the MSS. show no signs of dislocation, and the tense of creati erant shows that the sentence was meant to be here, unless it was emended by some very early scribe after the dislocation had occurred.

[3] He was not permitted, by virtue of his priesthood, to be away from Rome overnight (V. lii. 13). Livy says nothing

Picene territory, Pisaurum in the Gallic, were B.C. 184 founded. Six iugera were given to each colonist. The division of the land and the organization of the colonies were the work of the same commissioners, Quintus Fabius Labeo, Marcus Fulvius Flaccus and Quintus Fulvius Nobilior.[1] The consuls of this year did nothing noteworthy either at home or in the field.

XLV. For the following year they announced the election of Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Quintus Fabius Labeo as consuls.

Marcus Claudius and Quintus Fabius, on the Ides B.C. 183 of March, the day on which they were inaugurated, brought up the question of provinces for themselves and the praetors. The praetors who had been elected were Gaius Valerius, the flamen Dialis, who had been a candidate the preceding year also, and Spurius Postumius Albinus and Publius Cornelius Sisenna, Lucius Pupius, Lucius Julius, Gnaeus Sicinius.[2] To the consuls the Ligurians were decreed as their province, with the same armies which Publius Claudius and Lucius Porcius had had. The Spains, excluded from the lot, were reserved for the praetors of the previous year, along with their armies. The praetors were ordered to draw lots with the provision that the province of the flamen Dialis should be one of the jurisdictions in Rome : [3] the praetorship which he drew dealt with cases between citizens and aliens. The civil jurisdiction fell to Cornelius Sisenna, Sicily to Spurius Postumius, Apulia to Lucius Pupius, Gaul to Lucius Julius, Sardinia to Gnaeus Sicinius. Lucius Julius was directed to about the arrangement about his oath, which he had to take by proxy when he held the office of aedile (XXXI. i. 7 and the note).

c. 6 iussus. Galli Transalpini per saltus ignotae antea viae, ut ante dictum est, in Italiam transgressi oppidum in agro, qui nunc est Aquileiensis, aedifica-7 bant. Id eos ut prohiberet, quod eius sine bello posset, praetori mandatum est. Si armis prohibendi essent, consules certiores faceret: ex his placere alterum adversus Gallos ducere legiones.
8 Extremo prioris anni comitia auguris creandi habita erant in demortui Cn. Cornelii Lentuli locum; creatus erat Sp. Postumius Albinus.

XLVI. Huius principio anni P. Licinius Crassus pontifex maximus mortuus est, in cuius locum M.
2 Sempronius Tuditanus pontifex est cooptatus; pontifex[1] maximus est creatus C. Servilius Geminus. P. Licinii funeris causa visceratio data,[2] et gladiatores centum viginti pugnaverunt, et ludi funebres per 3 triduum facti, post ludos epulum. In quo cum toto foro strata triclinia essent, tempestas cum magnis procellis coorta coegit plerosque tabernacula statuere

[1] est cooptatus; pontifex Gelenius: om. σ.
[2] visceratio data Gelenius: uisceratione data σ.

---

[1] Cf. xxii. 6–7 above and the note.

[2] I have chosen the simplest course, by retaining the reading of M as the nearest possible approach to the true text now available. The various readings of σ differ as to the proper nouns but agree on creatus erat, so that *M*σ all preserve the apparent error of fact that Postumius is said to have been elected, whereas co-optation was the rule until 104 B.C. There is, then, nothing to be gained by piecemeal emendation. The question of dislocation again arises (cf. the note to sect. 2 above), and it can be argued here that the displacement was deliberate, for the sake of continuity with the following sentence, but this emphasis seems disproportion-hasten his departure. Transalpine Gauls, as has been said before,[1] crossing into Italy by a pass hitherto unknown, were building a city in the territory which now belongs to Aquileia. The praetor was instructed to prevent them from doing this, so far as it was possible for him to do so without war. If they had to be prevented by arms, he was to inform the consuls: it was the senate's desire that one of them should lead the legions against the Gauls. B.C. 183

At the end of the preceding year an election had been held to choose an augur in the place of Gnaeus Cornelius Lentulus, who had died; Spurius Postumius Albinus had been elected.[2]

XLVI. In the beginning of this year Publius Licinius Crassus, the pontifex maximus, died, and in his stead Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus was co-opted as pontiff;[3] Gaius Servilius Geminus was elected[4] pontifex maximus. On the occasion of the funeral of Publius Licinius a public distribution of meats took place, and one hundred and twenty gladiators fought and funeral games were given for three days, and after the games a banquet. During this, when the banqueting tables had been arranged through the whole Forum, a storm coming up with great gusts of wind drove most people to set up ate to the historical or rhetorical importance of the sentence. Again the MSS. show no signs of dislocation and the tense of the verbs must have been changed very early, if at all.

[3] Here the regular method is employed, in contrast with that recorded in the preceding sentence.

[4] One of the pontiffs was elected pontifex maximus in the usual way, by the college of pontiffs, and while Livy may at times confuse cooptare and creare he discriminates between them here.

.c. 4 in foro: eadem paulo post, cum undique disserenas-1 set,[1] sublata; defunctosque vulgo ferebant quod inter fatalia vates cecinissent, necesse esse tabernacula 5 in foro statui. Hac religione levatis altera iniecta, quod sanguine per biduum pluvisset in area Vulcani;
et per decemviros supplicatio indicta erat eius prodigii expiandi causa.

6 Priusquam consules in provincias proficiscerentur, legationes transmarinas in senatum introduxerunt.
Nec umquam ante tantum regionis eius hominum
7 Romae fuerat. Nam ex quo fama per gentes, quae Macedoniam accolunt, vulgata est crimina querimoniasque de Philippo non neglegenter ab Romanis 8 audiri, multis operae pretium fuisse queri, pro se quaeque civitates gentesque, singuli etiam privatim—gravis enim accola omnibus erat—Romam aut ad spem levandae iniuriae aut ad deflendae [2] solacium 9 venerunt. Et ab Eumene rege legatio cum fratre eius Athenaeo venit ad querendum simul quod non deducerentur ex Thracia praesidia, simul quod in Bithyniam Prusiae bellum adversus Eumenem gerenti auxilia missa forent.

XLVII. Respondendum ad omnia iuveni tum

[1] disserenasset σ: consenerasset M: serenasset Gelenius.
[2] deflendae σ: defendendae M.

---

[1] Pessimists would naturally expect that the tents of the prophecy would be those of the enemy who was master of the City, but the omen has now been harmlessly fulfilled.

[2] It was near the temple of Concord (lvi. 6; XL. xix. 1 below).

[3] These events should then belong to the winter of 184–183 B.C. or the early spring of the latter year. Polybius (XXIV. i. ff.) puts them after the departure of the consuls, and so some months later in 183 B.C.

[4] Cf. xxxv. 2–3 above. Demetrius was about twenty-five tents in the Forum: these, a little later, when it B.C. 183 had cleared up all around, were taken down; and the general talk was that the omen had been fulfilled, because the soothsayers had declared that it was among the decrees of the fates that it was destined that tents should be set up in the Forum.[1] When they were freed from this fear another came upon them, because for two days it had rained blood in the precinct of Vulcan;[2] and a period of prayer was proclaimed by the decemvirs as expiation for this prodigy.

Before the consuls[3] set out for their provinces, they introduced the embassies from across the seas to the senate. Never before had there been so many people from this region in Rome. For from the time that the news spread among the tribes that live near Macedonia that charges and complaints against Philip were listened to not inattentively by the Romans, and that many had found it profitable to make complaints, each city and tribe for itself and many individuals privately—for everyone found him a neighbour hard to get along with—came to Rome either in the hope of redressing their wrongs or for the consolation of lamenting them. From King Eumenes also came an embassy, including his brother Athenaeus, to complain both because the garrisons were not withdrawn from the cities in Thrace and because aid had been sent to Prusias in Bithynia, who was waging war against Eumenes.

XLVII. Demetrius,[4] who was then quite a young years old, and, obviously, not precocious. For a recent study of the career of Demetrius, see Edson, "Perseus and Demetrius," in Harvard Studies in Classical Philology, 46 (1935), 191–202.

u.c. admodum Demetrio erat. Cum haud facile esset aut 571 ea, quae obicerentur, aut quae adversus ea dicenda
2 erant, memoria complecti—nec enim multa solum, sed etiam pleraque oppido quam parva erant, de controversia finium, de hominibus raptis pecoribusque abactis, de iure aut dicto per libidinem aut non dicto,
3 de rebus per vim aut gratiam iudicatis—nihil horum neque Demetrium docere dilucide nec se satis liquido discere ab eo senatus cum cerneret posse, simul et tirocinio et perturbatione iuvenis moveretur, quaeri iussit ab eo, ecquem de his rebus com-
4 mentarium a patre accepisset. Cum respondisset accepisse se, nihil prius nec potius visum est quam regis ipsius de singulis responsa [1] accipere. Librum extemplo poposcerunt, deinde ut ipse recitaret
5 permiserunt. Erant autem de singulis rebus in breve coactae causae, ut alia fecisse se secundum decreta legatorum diceret, alia non per se stetisse, quo minus faceret, sed per eos ipsos, qui accusarent.
6 Interposuerat et querellas de iniquitate decretorum, et quam non ex aequo disceptatum apud Caecilium foret indigneque sibi nec ullo suo merito insultatum
7 ab omnibus esset. Has notas irritati eius animi collegit senatus: ceterum alia excusanti iuveni, alia recipienti futura ita, ut maxime vellet senatus,

[1] responsa ϝ : responsum M.

---

[1] For the phrase, cf. XXXVI. xxv. 3 and the note.

man, had to answer all these complaints. Since it B.C. 183 was not easy to remember either all the charges which were made or what was to be said in reply to them—for they were not only numerous but many of them also trivial in the extreme,[1] dealing with boundary disputes, men abducted or animals driven off, justice either administered by caprice or not administered, decisions rendered as a result of violence or influence—when the senate saw that Demetrius could give no intelligent information on any of these points and that they could learn nothing explicit from him, and when they were moved by both the inexperience and the embarrassment of the young man, they ordered that the question be asked of him whether he had received any notes from his father on these matters. When he replied that he had received them, it was resolved that nothing should have preference or precedence over hearing the answers of the king himself to these several charges. They immediately demanded the book and then allowed him to read it. The arguments, however, on single items were given in a brief digest; for example, that he had done some things in accordance with the decrees of commissioners, other things he had been prevented from doing, not through his own fault, but that of the very persons who made the accusations. He had included also complaints about the injustice of the decrees and how unfair had been the discussion before Caecilius, and how he had been trampled upon by everyone unjustifiably and in no wise as he deserved. The senate took these to be indications of his irritation; but when the young man apologized for some things and undertook that in the future

c. 8 responderi placuit nihil patrem eius neque rectius 1 nec magis quod ex voluntate senatus esset fecisse, quam quod, utcumque ea gesta essent, per Deme-9 trium filium satisfieri voluisset Romanis. Multa et dissimulare et oblivisci et pati praeterita senatum 10 posse, et credere etiam Demetrio.[1] Obsidem enim se animum eius habere, etsi corpus patri reddiderit, et scire, quantum salva in patrem pietate possit, amicum 11 eum populi Romani esse, honorisque eius causa missuros in Macedoniam legatos, ut si quid minus factum sit quam debuerit, tum quoque sine piaculo rerum praetermissarum fiat. Velle etiam sentire Philippum integra omnia sibi cum populo Romano Demetrii filii beneficio esse.

XLVIII. Haec, quae augendae amplitudinis eius causa facta erant, extemplo in invidiam, mox etiam in perniciem adulescenti verterunt.

2 Lacedaemonii deinde introducti sunt. Multae et parvae[2] disceptationes iactabantur; sed quae maxime rem continerent, erant utrum restituerentur
3 quos Achaei damnaverant necne; inique an iure occidissent quos occiderant, et[3] utrum manerent in

[1] Demetrio Madvig: demetrio credendum esse (esset) ϝ.
[2] paruae ϝ: paruulae M.
[3] et Weissenborn: uertebatur et aut uertebant et ϝ.

[1] This whole episode is based on Polybius, XXIII. (XXIV.) i.–iii. but with a good deal of rearrangement and with the postponement to the next Book of several items. By so doing Livy has improved the rhetorical quality of the passage at the expense of historical accuracy.

[2] Livy has not mentioned the exile of any Lacedaemonians by the Achaeans, but it would be very strange if some had not been banished.

[3] The victims of the massacre at Compasium: cf. xxxvi. 9 above and the note. In sect. 16 of that chapter Lycortas other things should be done as the senate specifically desired, it was decided to reply that his father had done nothing more correctly or more in accordance with the senate's wishes than that, whatever his own conduct had been, he had wished to be justified in the eyes of the Romans through his son Demetrius. The senate, they said, could close its eyes to much and could forget and let the past be past and continue to trust to Demetrius. For they held his soul hostage, even though his body had been restored to his father, and they knew that, so far as his loyalty to his father would permit, he would be a friend to the Roman people, and for the sake of doing him honour they would send ambassadors to Macedonia, to say that if anything had not been done which should have been done, it might even then be done without any atonement being required for previous omissions. They said that they wished Philip to know that all things were unchanged between him and the Roman people, thanks to his son Demetrius. B.C. 183

XLVIII. These things, which were done in order to enhance his distinction, were immediately turned into a cause of unpopularity and presently even of ruin to the young man.[1]

Then the Lacedaemonians were brought in. Many and trivial subjects of dispute were talked about; but those which contained the real gist of the matter had to do with the question whether the men whom the Achaeans had condemned should be restored or not;[2] whether those who had been killed[3] had been killed justly or unjustly; and ruled this question out as unimportant, but the Lacedaemonians did not agree. Apparently the Romans did not decide either way, but see sect. 4 below.

Achaico concilio Lacedaemonii an, ut ante fuerat, secretum eius unius in Peloponneso civitatis ius esset. Restitui iudiciaque facta tolli placuit,[1] Lacedaemonem manere in Achaico concilio scribique id decretum et consignari a Lacedaemoniis et Achaeis. Legatus in Macedoniam Q. Marcius est missus, iussus idem in Peloponneso sociorum res aspicere. Nam ibi quoque et ex veteribus discordiis residui motus erant, et Messene desciverat[2] a concilio Achaico. Cuius belli et causas et ordinem si expromere velim, immemor sim propositi, quo statui non ultra attingere externa, nisi qua Romanis cohaererent rebus.

XLIX. Eventus memorabilis est, quod, cum bello superiores essent Achaei, Philopoemen praetor eorum capitur, ad praeoccupandam Coronen, quam hostes petebant, inita valle[3] iniqua cum equitibus paucis oppressus. Ipsum potuisse effugere Thracum Cretensiumque auxilio tradunt: sed pudor relinquendi equites, nobilissimos gentis, ab ipso nuper lectos,[4] tenuit. Quibus dum locum ad evadendas angustias cogendo ipse agmen praebet, sustinens

[1] placuit ed. Aldina : placere et placet et placeret $\bar{r}$.
[2] Messene desciuerat $\bar{r}$: messenii desciuerant M, fortasse rectius.
[3] inita valle Heraeus. XXI. xxxv. 4 conferens : in ualle $\bar{r}$.
[4] lectos $\bar{r}$: electos M.

[1] Livy has condensed and simplified the account of an affair which, according to Polybius, XXIII. (XXIV.) iv. was far from simple. Neither Livy nor Polybius is clear as to whether the first clause of the decree covered the second question of the Lacedaemonians as well as the first, or what action the Romans took on the Compasium affair.
[2] He makes an exception of the Philopoemen episode.

whether the Lacedaemonians should remain in the Achaean League or, as had been the case before, their state, alone in the Peloponnesus, should have a separate constitution. It was decided that the exiles should be restored and the judgments passed against them reversed, and that Lacedaemon should remain in the Achaean League, and that this decree should be written down and signed by the Lacedaemonians and Achaeans.[1] B.C. 183

Quintus Marcius was sent as a commissioner to Macedonia, and was likewise instructed to look into the affairs of the allies in the Peloponnesus. For there were also both the troubles that were survivals from ancient discords, and Messenê had seceded from the Achaean League. If I should wish to set forth both the causes and the events of this war,[2] I should be unmindful of my purpose, according to which I have determined not to touch further upon foreign affairs except as they are inseparable from Roman history.[3]

XLIX. One event worthy of record occurred: although the Achaeans had the advantage in the war, their praetor Philopoemen was captured, who, in order to get the lead in occupying Coronê, for which the enemy was making, entered a dangerous valley, accompanied by a small guard of cavalry, and was surprised. They say that he himself could have escaped with the aid of the Thracians and Cretans; but the shame, if he should abandon the cavalry, the noblest of the people, and recently chosen by him personally, restrained him. While he was offering them a way of escape from the narrow pass by holding the rear in person, sustaining impetus hostium. prolapso equo et suo ipse casu et onere equi super eum ruentis haud multum afuit, quin 4 exanimaretur, septuaginta annos iam natus et diutino morbo, ex quo tum primum reficiebatur, viribus 5 admodum attenuatis. Iacentem hostes superfusi oppresserunt; cognitumque primum a verecundia memoriaque meritorum haud secus quam ducem suum attollunt reficiuntque et ex valle devia in viam portant, vix sibimet ipsi prae necopinato 6 gaudio credentes; pars nuntios Messenen prae-mittunt debellatum esse, Philopoemenem captum 7 adduci. Primum adeo incredibilis visa res, ut non pro vano modo sed vix pro sano nuntius audiretur.

[3] Cf. XXXV. xl. 1.

Deinde ut super alium alius idem omnes affirmantes 8 veniebant, tandem facta fides; et priusquam appro-pinquare urbi satis scirent, ad spectaculum omnes simul liberi ac servi, pueri quoque cum feminis, effunduntur. Itaque clauserat [1] portam turba, dum pro se quisque, nisi ipse oculis suis credidisset, vix pro 9 comperta tantam rem habiturus videtur.[2] Aegre summoventes obvios intrare portam, qui adducebant Philopoemenem, potuerunt. Aeque [3] conferta turba 10 iter reliquum clauserat; et cum pars maxima exclusa a spectaculo esset, theatrum repente, quod propinquum viae erat, compleverunt et ut eo adduceretur in conspectum populi una voce omnes exposce-11 bant. Magistratus et principes veriti ne quem

[1] clauserat ed. Frobeniana 1535: clauserant F.
[2] videtur Crévier: uideretur F.
[3] aeque Walch: atque F.

the charge of the enemy, his horse fell and he himself B.C. 183 was very near to perishing from the shock to himself and the weight of the horse which came down upon him, being now seventy years old and much weakened in strength as the result of a long illness from which he was then just recovering. The enemy, rushing past, came upon him lying there; recognizing him at once, because of their veneration for him and their recollection of his past services, they raised him up as if he were their own leader, revived him and carried him out of the retired valley to the high-road, scarcely believing their own eyes for this unexpected joy; part of them sent messengers ahead to Messenê to say that the war was over and that they were bringing Philopoemen a prisoner. At first this seemed so incredible that his words were listened to, not merely as vain, but as the words of a messenger who was scarcely sane. Then, as one after another came, all bringing the same tidings, at length they were convinced; and before they knew for certain that he was approaching the city, all alike, free and slave, children along with the women, rushed out. So the crowd had blocked the gate, while each for himself, if he had not seen it with his own eyes, would scarcely accept so great a thing as true. The men who were bringing Philopoemen were hardly able to thrust aside the bystanders and enter the gate. An equally crowded mass had blocked the rest of the way; and when the largest part had been excluded from the spectacle, they suddenly filled the theatre, which adjoined the street, and with one voice all demanded that he should be brought there to be seen by the people. The magistrates and leading citizens, fearing that pity for so great a motum misericordia praesentis tanti viri faceret, cum alios verecundia pristinae maiestatis collatae [1] praesenti fortunae, alios recordatio ingentium meritorum motura esset, procul in conspectu eum statue-12 runt, deinde raptim ex oculis hominum abstraxerunt, dicente praetore Dinocrate esse quae pertinentia ad summam belli percunctari eum magistratus vellent. Inde abducto eo in curiam et senatu vocato consultari coeptum.

L. Iam invesperascebat, et non modo cetera, sed ne in proximam quidem noctem ubi satis tuto
2 custodiretur, expediebant. Obstupuerant ad magnitudinem pristinae eius fortunae virtutisque, et neque ipsi domum recipere custodiendum audebant, nec
3 cuiquam uni custodiam eius satis credebant. Admonent deinde quidam esse thesaurum publicum sub terra, saxo quadrato saeptum. Eo vinctus demittitur, et saxum ingens quo operitur machina super-
4 impositum est. Ita loco potius quam homini cuiquam credendam custodiam rati, lucem insequentem
5 exspectaverunt. Postero die multitudo quidem integra, memor pristinorum eius in civitatem meritorum, parcendum ac per eum remedia quaerenda
6 esse praesentium malorum censebant: defectionis [2] auctores, quorum in manu res publica erat, in secreto consultantes omnes ad necem eius consentiebant. Sed utrum maturarent an differrent ambigebatur.
7 Vicit pars avidior poenae, missusque qui venenum

[1] conlatae Duker: conlata σ.

[2] defectionis Gelenius: sed defectionis M: factionis aut sed factionis σ.

---

[1] It resembled the Tullianum in Rome, in design if not in use.

man, present before their eyes, might cause some B.C. 183 disturbance, since regret at his former greatness compared with his present fortune would move some and recollection of his tremendous services others, placed him in sight but at a distance, and then speedily removed him from the eyes of men, the praetor Dinocrates saying that there were matters pertaining to the final issue of the war on which the magistrates wished to question him. Then, after taking him to the senate-house and calling the council, they began their deliberations.

L. It was now growing dark, and not only were all other things uncertain, but even where they could guard him with sufficient safety even for the ensuing night. They had been awed by the greatness of his former success and courage, and neither did they dare to receive him into their own homes for guarding nor were they satisfied to entrust the guardianship of him to any one man. Then someone reminded them that there was a public treasury underground, walled in by hewn stones.[1] Bound, he was let down into it and a great stone by which it was closed placed by machinery over it. So, thinking that they should trust the place, rather than any man, to keep him safe, they waited for the coming morning. The next day the whole multitude, mindful of his former services to the state, considered that he should be spared and that through him remedies should be sought out for their present troubles: the authors of the revolt, who had the administration in their hands, held a secret consultation, and all were agreed upon his death. But it was not agreed whether they should act at once or delay. The faction that was more insistent on punishment prevailed, and a

L.C. 71 ferret. Accepto poculo nihil aliud locutum ferunt quam quaesisse, si incolumis Lycortas—is alter imperator Achaeorum erat—equitesque evasissent. 8 Postquam dictum est incolumes esse, " bene habet " inquit et poculo impavide exhausto haud ita multo 9 post exspiravit. Non diuturnum mortis eius gaudium auctoribus crudelitatis fuit. Victa namque Messene bello exposcentibus Achaeis dedidit noxios, ossaque reddita Philopoemenis sunt, et sepultus ab universo Achaico est concilio, adeo omnibus humanis congestis 10 honoribus, ut ne divinis quidem abstineretur. Ab scriptoribus rerum Graecis Latinisque tantum huic viro tribuitur ut a quibusdam eorum, velut ad insignem notam huius anni, memoriae mandatum sit tres claros imperatores eo anno decessisse, Philopoe- 11 menem, Hannibalem, P. Scipionem: adeo in aequo eum duarum[1] potentissimarum gentium summis imperatoribus posuerunt.

LI. Ad Prusiam regem legatus T. Quinctius Flamininus venit, quem suspectum Romanis et receptus post fugam Antiochi Hannibal et bellum 2 adversus Eumenem motum faciebat. Ibi seu quia a Flaminino inter cetera obiectum Prusiae erat

[1] duarum Gelenius: duobus Γ.

---

[1] The hipparchus or praefectus equitum (XXXV. xxxiv. 9) was second in command.

[2] This revives the question of the date of Scipio's death, to which Livy had found no answer when he wrote the latter chapters of Book XXXVIII, and which he discusses again in chap. lii. below. (It remains a mystery why he did not consolidate this chapter with his earlier discussion.) Antiquity was fond of coincidences, and it was convenient, if only for man was sent to take him the poison. Receiving the B.C. 183 cup, he asked only if Lycortas—he was the other commander[1] of the Achaeans—was safe and if the cavalry had escaped. When he was assured that they were safe, he said "it is well," and courageously draining the cup perished no long time afterwards. The persons responsible for this act of cruelty had no great time in which to rejoice in his death. For Messenê, being conquered in the war, at the demand of the Achaeans handed over the guilty persons, and the bones of Philopoemen were given back and he was buried by the whole Achaean League, all human distinctions being heaped upon him to such a degree that they did not even refrain from divine honours. Greek and Latin historians pay such tribute to this man that some of them have put it on record, as if it were a conspicuous brand of infamy set against this year, that three famous generals died during this year—Philopoemen, Hannibal, Publius Scipio: on terms of such equality have they placed him with the greatest commanders of the two most powerful nations.[2]

LI. Titus Quinctius Flamininus went as an ambassador to King Prusias, whom the Romans suspected both because he had given shelter to Hannibal after the flight of Antiochus[3] and because he had begun and was carrying on war against Eumenes. There, whether Prusias was reproached by Flamininus on this ground among others, because mnemonic reasons, to have the three greatest generals associated in death, even if only two were associated in life (Philopoemen had been compared with Flamininus rather than with Scipio: cf. XXXV. xxx. 12–13 and the note).

[3] Cf. XXXVII. xlv. 16 and the note.

hominem omnium, qui viverent, infestissimum populo Romano apud eum esse, qui patriae suae primum, deinde fractis eius opibus Antiocho regi auctor belli adversus populum Romanum fuisset: seu quia ipse Prusias, ut[1] gratificaretur praesenti Flaminino Romanisque, per se necandi aut tradendi eius in potestatem consilium cepit; a primo colloquio Flaminini milites extemplo ad domum Hannibalis custodiendam missi sunt. Semper talem exitum vitae suae Hannibal prospexerat animo et Romanorum inexpiabile[2] odium in se cernens, et fidei regum nihil sane confisus:[3] Prusiae vero levitatem etiam expertus erat: Flaminini quoque adventum sibi velut fatalem horruerat. Ad omnia undique infesta ut iter semper aliquod praeparatum fugae haberet, septem exitus e domo fecerat, et ex iis quosdam occultos, ne custodia saepirentur. Sed grave imperium regum nihil inexploratum, quod vestigari volunt, efficit. Totius circuitum domus ita custodiis complexi sunt, ut nemo inde elabi posset. Hannibal, postquam est nuntiatum[4] milites regios in vestibulo esse, postico, quod devium maxime atque occultissimi exitus erat, fugere conatus, ut id quoque occursu militum obsaeptum sensit et omnia circa clausa custodiis dispositis esse venenum, quod multo ante praeparatum ad tales habebat casus, poposcit. "Liberemus" inquit[5] "diuturna cura populum Romanum, quando

[1] ut ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. Σ.
[2] inexpiabile ed. Parisina 1513: inexplicabile Σ.
[3] confisus Σ: fretus M.
[4] est nuntiatum ed. Aldina: nuntiatum M: est enuntiatum Σ.
[5] inquit edd. vett.: om. Σ.

of all living men the one who was most danger- B.C. 183 ous to the Roman people was at his court, the man who had first urged his own country and then, after its defeat, King Antiochus to war upon the Roman people, or whether Prusias himself, in order to do a favour to Flamininus when he came and to the Romans, formed the plan of killing him or giving him into custody; for whatever reason, immediately after the first conference with Flamininus he sent soldiers to put the house of Hannibal under guard. Hannibal had always foreseen such an end to his life, both from his knowledge of the insatiable hatred of the Romans for him and from his lack of faith in the loyalty of kings: as for Prusias, he had in fact experienced his fickleness;[1] then too the arrival of Flamininus had made him tremble as at the signal for his doom. Having regard to the dangers which were all around him, in order that he might always have some way of escape in readiness, he had made seven exits from his house, and some of these were secret, lest he might be hemmed in by guards. But the dread power of kings leaves nothing unexplored when they want it traced down. They surrounded the whole area about the house with guards, so that no one could escape from it. When the word was brought to him that the king's troops were in the vestibule, Hannibal attempted to escape by a side door which was out of the way and especially adapted to a stealthy departure, and when he found that this too was blocked by guards stationed around it, he called for the poison which he had long kept ready for such emergencies. "Let us," he said, "relieve the Roman people of their long anxiety, since they

[1] The meaning of the allusion is not known.

l.c. 10 mortem senis exspectare longum censent. Nec 71 magnam nec memorabilem ex inermi proditoque Flamininus victoriam feret. Mores quidem populi Romani quantum mutaverint, vel hic dies argumento 11 erit. Horum patres Pyrrho regi, hosti armato, exercitum in Italia habenti ut a veneno caveret praedixerunt: hi legatum consularem, qui auctor esset Prusiae per scelus occidendi hospitis, miserunt." 12 Execratus deinde in caput regnumque Prusiae et hospitales deos violatae ab eo fidei testes invocans, poculum exhausit. Hic vitae exitus fuit Hannibalis.

LII. Scipionem et Polybius et Rutilius hoc anno mortuum scribunt. Ego neque his neque Valerio adsentior, his, quod censoribus M. Porcio L. Valerio L. Valerium[1] principem senatus ipsum censorem lectum invenio, cum superioribus duobus lustris
2 Africanus fuisset, quo vivo, nisi ut ille senatu moveretur, quam notam nemo memoriae prodidit, alius
3 princeps in locum eius lectus non esset. Antiatem auctorem refellit tribunus plebis M. Naevius, adversus

[1] L. Valerium Hertz: post ipsum coll. edd. vett.: om. Σ.

---

[1] Nepos (Hannibal 13) gives his age at his death as 70, but says that different authorities place his death in 183, 182, and 181 B.C.

[2] Polybius (XXIV. ix.–ix.a) and Rutilius (consul 105 B.C., a member of the Scipionic circle, although much younger than the majority, and a writer of memoirs) should have had access to family records and other evidence as to the date. Yet apparently Polybius (l.c.; cf. Nepos, l.c.), despite what Livy says here, puts the date a year later. Rutilius is nowhere else quoted by Livy.

[3] Antias dated Scipio's death in 187 B.C.: XXXVIII. liii. 8.

[4] The censors of 189 B.C. gave him this rank for the third time (XXXVIII. xxviii. 2 and the note). The choice of find it tedious to wait for the death of an old man.[1] Neither magnificent nor memorable will be the victory which Flamininus will win over a man unarmed and betrayed. How much the manners of the Roman people have changed, this day in truth will prove. Their fathers sent word to King Pyrrhus, an enemy in arms, commanding an army in Italy, warning him to beware of poison: these Romans have sent an ambassador of consular rank to urge upon Prusias the crime of murdering his guest." Then, cursing the person and the kingdom of Prusias and calling upon the gods of hospitality to bear witness to his breach of faith, he drained the cup. This was the end of the life of Hannibal. B.C. 183

LII. Scipio also, as both Polybius and Rutilius[2] write, died this year. For my part, I agree neither with them nor with Valerius[3]—not with them, because in the censorship of Marcus Porcius and Lucius Valerius I find that the princeps senatus chosen was the same Lucius Valerius who was censor, whereas in the two preceding lustra[4] Africanus had held this distinction, and while he lived, unless he had been expelled from the senate, a disgrace which no one has recorded, another princeps would not have been chosen in his stead.[5] The refutation of Antias as an authority is the tribune of the people Marcus Naevius, Valerius in 184 B.C. is not mentioned in the running account of the censorship (xliii. 5–xliv. 9 above).

[5] Livy thus concludes that Scipio was dead before the lectio by Cato and Flaccus. Their active term as censors extended from March 15, 184 B.C., to about mid-September 183 B.C., and the lectio might have been held late in the period. So far as this evidence goes, then, Scipio's death might have occurred as late as the summer of 183 B.C., and Livy's criticism is not necessarily valid.

B.C. 571

4 quem oratio inscripta P. Africani est. Hic Naevius in magistratuum libris est tribunus plebis [1] P. Claudio L. Porcio consulibus, sed iniit tribunatum Ap. Claudio M. Sempronio consulibus ante diem quartum 5 idus Decembres. Inde tres menses ad idus Martias sunt, quibus P. Claudius L. Porcius consulatum 6 inierunt. Ita [2] vixisse in tribunatu Naevii videtur, diesque ei dici ab eo potuisse, decessisse autem ante L. Valerii et M. Porcii censuram.

7 Trium clarissimorum suae cuiusque gentis virorum non tempore magis congruente comparabilis mors videtur esse, quam quod nemo eorum satis dignum 8 splendore vitae exitum habuit. Iam primum omnes

[1] in magistratuum libris est tribunus plebis Gelenius: magistratum iniit tribunus plebis σ.

[2] ita Gelenius: ita et σ.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. lvi. 6 and the note. Livy forgets here his own remark, that the speech itself did not contain the name of Naevius.

[2] Presumably official registers containing the names of the magistrates year by year.

[3] Inauguration day for consuls at this period was March 15; for tribunes, apparently at all times, December 10. Naevius then entered upon his office December 10, 185 B.C. (Ap. Claudius M. Sempronius coss.), and his term was concurrent with that of P. Claudius and Porcius (and of Cato and Flaccus) from March 15 to December 10, 184 B.C. If Naevius was the prosecutor Scipio could not have been tried in 187 B.C. Livy does not observe that his criticism brings under suspicion his entire narrative of the trial, so far as it is based on Antias.

[4] The last sentence seems to be an attempt to reconcile conflicting testimony. Livy has rejected 183 B.C. (Polybius and Rutilius) because he believes that Scipio was dead before the censorship of Cato and Flaccus beginning March 15, 184 B.C. He has rejected 187 B.C. (Antias) because he now against whom was directed, according to the title,[1] the speech of Publius Africanus. This Naevius, in the books of the magistrates,[2] is named as tribune of the people in the consulship of Publius Claudius and Lucius Porcius, but he entered upon the tribunate in the consulship of Appius Claudius and Marcus Sempronius, on the fourth day before the Ides of December. From that time it is three months to the Ides of March, when Publius Claudius and Lucius Porcius were inaugurated.[3] Thus it seems that he lived in the tribunate of Naevius and that he might have been accused by him, but died before the censorship of Lucius Valerius and Marcus Porcius.[4] B.C. 183

It seems that the deaths of these three men, each the most famous among his own people, are comparable not so much because of the coincidence of their times, as because no one of them met an end worthy of the brilliance of his life. In the first believes that Naevius was the prosecutor (term beginning December 10, 185 B.C.). Since Livy thinks that death followed soon after the trial, this reasoning brackets both events as having occurred between December 10, 185 B.C., and March 15, 184 B.C., this being the portion of the term of Naevius which does not overlap that of Cato and Flaccus.

The whole is an interesting specimen of Livy's historical criticism, the more valuable because there are so few parallels. But his readiness to follow one source, almost blindly, in Book XXXVIII, while professing his inability to reconcile it with other sources, his refutation of that same source in this passage, the fallacies in his own argumentation, and his ability to omit important details, do not increase our faith in his critical sense. (Of the two pieces of evidence employed here, he neglected one and rejected the other in Book XXXVIII.) One wonders how much of what he had said in Book XXXVIII. was in his active memory when he wrote Book XXXIX. and why the earlier narrative was allowed to stand after he was convinced that it was wrong.

non in patrio [1] solo mortui nec sepulti sunt. Veneno absumpti Hannibal et Philopoemen; exul Hannibal, proditus ab hospite, captus Philopoemen in carcere et 9 in vinculis exspiravit; Scipio etsi non exul neque damnatus, die tamen dicta, ad quam non adfuerat reus, absens citatus, voluntarium non sibimet ipse solum sed etiam funeri suo exilium indixit.

LIII. Dum ea in Peloponneso, a quibus devertit oratio, geruntur, reditus in Macedoniam Demetrii legatorumque aliter aliorum affecerat animos. 2 Volgus Macedonum, quos belli ab Romanis imminentis metus terruerat, Demetrium ut pacis auctorem cum ingenti favore conspiciebant, simul et spe haud dubia regnum ei post mortem patris 3 destinabant. Nam etsi minor aetate quam Perseus esset, hunc iusta matre familiae, illum paelice ortum esse; illum ut ex vulgato corpore genitum nullam certi patris notam habere, hunc insignem Philippi 4 similitudinem prae se ferre. Ad hoc Romanos Demetrium in paterno solio locaturos, Persei nullam 5 apud eos gratiam esse. Haec vulgo loquebantur. Itaque et Persea cura angebat, ne parum pro se una aetas valeret, cum aliis omnibus rebus frater superior 6 esset; et Philippus ipse, vix sui arbitrii fore, quem heredem regni relinqueret credens, sibi quoque gravi-

[1] in patrio edd. vett.: patrio F.

---

[1] Cf. xlviii. 6 above.

[2] Plutarch (Aemilius, viii.) hints that Perseus was not the son of Philip, and in XL. ix. 2 Perseus himself suggests the same possibility.

place, none of them either died or was buried in his native land. Hannibal and Philopoemen were carried off by poison; Hannibal was an exile, betrayed by his host, Philopoemen, a captive, died in prison and in chains; Scipio, although not an exile or condemned, yet, because he was absent when summoned, on the day he failed to stand trial, pronounced a sentence of voluntary exile not only upon himself but upon his funeral. B.C. 183

LIII. While these events,[1] as a result of which my narrative turned from its course, were occurring in the Peloponnesus, the return of Demetrius and the other ambassadors to Macedonia had made different impressions upon different minds. The mass of the Macedonians, terrified by the fear of the war which threatened from the Romans, looked with very great favour upon Demetrius as the author of peace, and at the same time marked him with assured hope for the throne after the death of his father. For although he was younger in years than Perseus, men recalled that Demetrius was born of a legal wife, the other of a concubine; that the elder, the offspring of a body accessible to all, bore no sure mark of his father,[2] while Demetrius displayed a notable resemblance to Philip. Besides, they said, the Romans would establish Demetrius upon his father's throne, while Perseus would have no influence with them. Such was the general talk. Accordingly Perseus, on the one hand, was anxiously afraid that his age by itself would not carry sufficient weight in his behalf, while his brother had the advantage in all other respects, and on the other, Philip himself, believing that it would hardly be in his power to decide which son he should leave as heir to his

7 orem esse quam vellet minorem filium aiebat. Offen-debatur interdum concursu Macedonum ad eum, et 8 alteram iam se vivo regiam esse indignabatur. Et ipse iuvenis haud dubie inflatior redierat, subnisus erga se iudiciis senatus, concessisque sibi, quae patri 9 negata essent; et omnis mentio Romanorum quantam dignitatem ei apud ceteros Macedonas, tantam invidiam non apud fratrem modo sed etiam apud 10 patrem conciliabat, utique postquam legati alii Romani venerunt, et cogebatur decedere Thracia praesidiaque deducere et alia aut ex decreto priorum legatorum aut ex nova constitutione senatus facere.
11 Sed omnia maerens quidem et gemens, eo magis quod filium frequentiorem prope cum illis quam secum cernebat, oboedienter tamen adversus Romanos faciebat, ne quam movendi extemplo belli 12 causam praeberet. Avertendos etiam[1] animos a suspicione talium consiliorum ratus, mediam per[2] Thraciam exercitum in Odrysas et Dentheletos et 13 Bessos duxit: Philippopolin urbem fuga desertam oppidanorum, qui in proxima montium iuga cum familiis receperant sese, cepit, campestresque barbaros, depopulatus agros eorum, in deditionem 14 accepit. Relicto inde ad Philippopolin praesidio,

[1] praeberet. avertendos etiam Gelenius: praeberet etiam auertendos M: praeuertendos etiam F.

[2] per Heraeus: in F.

---

[1] Both thought and language closely parallel those of Antiochus in similar circumstances (XXXV. xv. 4).

[2] Livy hints at (xlvii. 3–11 above), and Polybius XXIII. (XXIV.) iii. stresses the harm which the senate did by stimulating the vanity of Demetrius.

[3] Probably Marcius is meant (xlviii. 5 above).

throne, kept saying that his younger son was a B.C. 183 greater burden to him than he wished.[1] He was displeased at times by the throngs of Macedonians who visited his son, and was indignant that while he lived there should be a second court. And there is no doubt that the young man had returned too much puffed up regarding himself,[2] relying somewhat on the judgments of the senate about him, and on the concessions made to him of what had been refused to his father; and whatever importance every reference to the Romans brought to him with the rest of the Macedonians, it brought him also exactly as much ill-will, not only with his brother but even with his father, especially after other[3] Roman commissioners came and Philip was compelled to evacuate Thrace and withdraw his garrisons and do other things in accordance with either the decisions of previous commissioners or the new arrangements of the senate. But, although it was with grief and lamentation, the more because he saw his son more frequently in the company of the commissioners than with himself, he nevertheless obeyed the Romans in everything, in order to give them no reason for immediately declaring war. Thinking also that their thoughts should be diverted from any suspicion of such designs, he led his army through the interior of Thrace against the Odrysae and Dentheleti and Bessi: he took the city of Philippopolis,[4] deserted by the flight of its citizens, who with their families had fled to the nearest mountains, and received in surrender the barbarians of the plain, after plundering their farms. Leaving a garrison in Philippopolis quod haud multo post ab Odrysis expulsum est, oppidum in Deuriopo condere instituit—Paeoniae ea regio est—prope Erigonum fluvium, qui ex Illyrico per Pelagoniam[1] fluens in Axium amnem editur, haud procul Stobis, vetere urbe: novam urbem Perseida, ut is filio maiori haberetur honos, appellari iussit.

[4] Probably in the territory of the Odrysae; not the town of the same name mentioned in xxv. 3 above.

LIV. Dum haec in Macedonia geruntur, consules in provincias profecti. Marcellus nuntium praemisit ad L. Porcium proconsulem ut ad novum Gallorum oppidum legiones admoveret. Advenienti consuli Galli sese dediderunt. Duodecim milia armatorum erant: plerique arma ex agris rapta habebant; ea aegre patientibus iis adempta, quaeque alia aut populantes agros rapuerant aut secum attulerant. De his rebus qui quererentur, legatos Romam miserunt. Introducti in senatum a C. Valerio praetore exposuerunt se superante in Gallia multitudine inopia coactos agri et egestate ad quaerendam sedem Alpes transgressos, quae inculta per solitudines viderent, ibi sine ullius iniuria consedisse. Oppidum quoque aedificare coepisse, quod indicium esset nec agro nec urbi ulli vim adlaturos venisse. Nuper M. Claudium ad se nuntium misisse bellum se cum iis, ni dederentur, gesturum. Se certam, etsi non speciosam pacem quam incerta belli praeoptantes

[1] Pelagoniam Schaefer: paeoniam F.

[1] Cf. xxii. 6–7 and xlv. 6–7 above.

(it was expelled a little later by the Odrysae), he B.C. 183 decided to found a city in Deuriopus—this is a district in Paeonia—near the Erigonus river, which flows from Illyricum through Pelagonia and empties into the Axius river not far from the ancient city of Stobi: to the new city he ordered the name of Perseis to be given, so as to show honour to his elder son.

LIV. While this was going on in Macedonia, the consuls departed for their provinces. Marcellus sent a messenger ahead to the proconsul Lucius Porcius, ordering him to move the legions to the new town of the Gauls.[1] On the arrival of the consul the Gauls surrendered. There were twelve thousand armed men: most of them had weapons picked up in the country; these were taken from them, to their great displeasure, and whatever else they had either carried off while ravaging the fields or had brought with them. They sent ambassadors to Rome to complain of this treatment. Introduced to the senate by Gaius Valerius the praetor, they explained that since the population of Gaul was too great, compelled by poverty and the unproductiveness of the soil, they had crossed the Alps in search of a home, and when they found a region which was untilled for lack of settlers, there they established themselves without injuring anyone. They had even, they said, begun to build a town, which was an indication that they had come with no design to harm either farm or city. Recently Marcus Claudius had sent a message to them that he would make war upon them if they did not surrender. Preferring an assured though unattractive peace to the uncertainties of war, they had entrusted them-

dedidisse se prius in fidem quam in potestatem populi 8 Romani. Post paucos dies iussos et urbe et agro decedere sese tacitos abire, quo terrarum possent, in animo habuisse. Arma deinde sibi, et postremo omnia alia, quae ferrent agerentque, adempta.
9 Orare se senatum populumque Romanum, ne in se innoxios deditos acerbius quam in hostes saevirent.
10 Huic orationi senatus ita responderi iussit, neque illos recte fecisse, cum in Italiam venerint oppi-dumque in alieno agro, nullius Romani magistratus, qui ei provinciae praeesset, permissu aedificare conati 11 sint; neque senatui placere deditos spoliari. Itaque se cum iis legatos ad consulem missuros, qui si redeant unde venerint, omnia iis sua reddi iubeant, quique protinus eant trans Alpes, et denuntient Gallicis po-12 pulis, multitudinem suam domi contineant: Alpes prope inexsuperabilem finem in medio esse: non utique iis melius fore quam qui [1] eas primi pervias 13 fecissent. Legati missi L. Furius Purpurio Q.
Minucius L. Manlius Acidinus. Galli, redditis omnibus, quae sine cuiusquam iniuria habebant, Italia excesserunt.

LV. Legatis Romanis Transalpini populi benigne

[1] quam qui Sigonius: qui σ.

---

[1] Their situation is not unlike that of the Aetolians (XXXVI. xxvii. 8–xxviii. 6 and the notes).

[2] The eastern boundary of Cisalpine Gaul had never been defined, and the Gauls may have innocently supposed that the Romans did not intend to occupy this region. Roman ambitions, however, were now directed to Histria, and a colony at Aquileia was contemplated (lv. 4–6 below).

[3] That is, earlier Gallic invaders who had met defeat on Italian soil.

[4] Furius may have been one of the senators who received the nota (xlii. 5–6 above): the fragments of Cato's speeches selves to the good faith rather than to the power of B.C. 183 the Roman people.[1] When, a few days later, they were ordered to leave the town and the country as well, they had planned to go away in silence, wherever in the world they could. Then, they went on to say, their arms were taken from them, and finally everything else which they were carrying or driving. They begged the senate and the Roman people not to treat innocent persons who had surrendered more harshly than enemies. The senate ordered the reply to be given to this appeal, that neither had they acted properly when they came into Italy and attempted to build a town on others' land, without the permission of any Roman magistrate who was in charge of that province;[2] nor did it please the senate to despoil men who had surrendered. Accordingly, the senate would send with them ambassadors to the consul who would direct him, on condition that they would return whence they had come, to give back all their property, and who would then cross the Alps and warn the Gallic tribes to keep their population at home: the Alps were an almost insuperable boundary between them: in any case they would fare no better than those who had first made them passable.[3] The ambassadors who were sent were Lucius Furius Purpurio,[4] Quintus Minucius, Lucius Manlius Acidinus. The Gauls, having recovered all the property which they acquired without injuring anyone, left Italy.

LV. The Roman ambassadors were graciously answered by the Transalpine peoples. Their elders against a Furius (the identification is not quite certain) seem to date from his censorship. If this is true, the embassy must have preceded the lectio senatus.

c. 1 responderunt. Seniores eorum nimiam lenitatem
2 populi Romani castigarunt, quod eos homines, qui gentis iniussu profecti occupare agrum imperii Romani et in alieno solo aedificare oppidum conati sint, impunitos dimiserint: debuisse gravem temeritatis mercedem
3 statui. Quod vero etiam sua reddiderint, vereri ne tanta indulgentia plures ad talia audenda impellantur.
4 Et exceperunt et [1] prosecuti cum donis legatos sunt.

M. Claudius consul Gallis ex provincia exactis Histricum bellum moliri coepit litteris ad senatum missis, ut sibi in Histriam traducere legiones liceret.
5 Id senatui non placuit.[2] Illud agitabant uti colonia Aquileia deduceretur, nec satis constabat utrum Latinam an civium Romanorum deduci placeret. Postremo Latinam potius coloniam deducendam 6 patres censuerunt. Triumviri creati sunt P. Scipio Nasica C. Flaminius L. Manlius Acidinus.

Eodem anno Mutina et Parma coloniae civium Ro-
7 manorum sunt deductae. Bina milia hominum in agro, qui proxime Boiorum, ante Tuscorum fuerat, octona iugera Parmae, quina Mutinae acceperunt.
8 Deduxerunt triumviri M. Aemilius Lepidus T.
9 Aebutius Parrus [3] L. Quinctius Crispinus. Et Saturnia colonia civium Romanorum in agrum Caletranum est deducta. Deduxerunt triumviri Q.

[1] et Γ: ita M.
[2] non placuit Novák: placuit Γ.
[3] Parrus (vel Parus) Buecheler: carus Γ.

---

[1] Since the territory of the Veneti had now been tacitly absorbed, the Histrians, living on the peninsula to the south of the modern Trieste, were near neighbours. There seems to be no evidence that they had given the Romans any cause to attack them at this time.

reproved the Roman people for their excessive B.C. 183 lenience, because those men who had set out without the permission of their state and had attempted to occupy land belonging to the Roman empire and to build a town on others' soil had been let go unpunished: they should have been made to pay a heavy toll for their rash action. Moreover, as to the restoration of their property, the elders feared that such generosity might tempt more peoples to try the same venture. The ambassadors were both received and sent on their way with gifts.

Marcus Claudius the consul, having expelled the Gauls from the province, began to scheme for a war with the Histrians,[1] sending letters to the senate for permission to lead the legions into Histria. This did not please the senate. They were discussing the question of establishing a colony at Aquileia, but it was not generally agreed whether it should be a Latin colony or one of Roman citizens. Finally, the Fathers voted that a Latin colony rather should be founded. The three commissioners elected were Publius Scipio Nasica, Gaius Flaminius, Lucius Manlius Acidinus.

In the same year Mutina and Parma, colonies of Roman citizens, were established. Two thousand men in each case were settled on the land that had recently belonged to the Boi [2] and previously to the Etruscans, and the allotments at Parma were eight iugera each, at Mutina five. The board of three which founded them consisted of Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Titus Aebutius Parrus, Lucius Quinctius Crispinus. Also, a colony of Roman citizens was established at Saturnia in the ager Caletranus.[3] The board of three

[2] Cf. XXXVI. xxxix. 3. [3] In Etruria.

u.c. 571 Fabius Labeo C. Afranius Stellio Ti. Sempronius Gracchus. In singulos iugera data dena.[1]

LVI. Eodem anno A. Terentius proconsul haud procul flumine Hibero, in agro Ausetano, et proelia secunda cum Celtiberis fecit, et oppida, quae ibi 2 communierant, aliquot expugnavit. Ulterior[2] Hispania eo anno in pace fuit[3] quia et P. Sempronius proconsul diutino morbo est implicitus, et nullo 3 lacessente peropportune quieverunt Lusitani. Nec in Liguribus memorabile quicquam a Q. Fabio consule gestum.

Ex Histria revocatus M. Marcellus exercitu 4 dimisso Romam comitiorum causa rediit. Creavit consules Cn. Baebium Tamphilum et L. Aemilium Paulum. Cum M. Aemilio Lepido hic aedilis curulis fuerat; a quo consule quintus annus erat, cum is ipse Lepidus post duas repulsas consul factus esset. 5 Praetores inde facti Q. Fulvius Flaccus M. Valerius Laevinus P. Manlius[4] iterum M. Ogulnius Gallus L. Caecilius Denter C. Terentius Istra.

6 Supplicatio extremo anno fuit prodigiorum causa, quod sanguine per biduum pluvisse in area Concordiae satis credebant, nuntiatumque erat haud procul Sicilia insulam, quae non ante fuerat, novam editam

[1] dena H. J. Mueller : decem M : om. ς.
[2] ulterior Glareanus : citerior ς.
[3] e.a.i.p.f. ed. Frobeniana 1535 : i.p.f.e.a. ς.
[4] P. Manlius ed. Aldina : p. aemilius ς.

[1] Lepidus was consul in 187 B.C. We are left to conjecture the number of defeats suffered by Paulus. Livy seems to dwell on the failures of Paulus, possibly for the contrast with his later brilliant career in Macedonia.

[2] His first praetorship was in 193 B.C. (XXXIII. xlii. 7). No reason is known for this unusual career.

which founded it consisted of Quintus Fabius Labeo, B.C. 183 Gaius Afranius Stellio, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus. Ten iugera were given to each colonist.

LVI. In the same year the proconsul Aulus Terentius, not far from the river Ebro, in the country of the Ausetani, both fought successful battles with the Celtiberians and captured a number of towns which they had fortified. Farther Spain that year was at peace, partly because Publius Sempronius the proconsul was suffering from a long illness, and with no one to provoke them the Lusitanians very fortunately remained quiet. Nor was anything worth recording done by the consul Quintus Fabius among the Ligurians.

Marcus Marcellus, recalled from Histria, disbanded his army and returned to Rome to hold the elections. He returned as consuls Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus and Lucius Aemilius Paulus. The latter had been curule aedile with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus; this was the fifth year after the consulship of Lepidus, although Lepidus himself became consul after two defeats.[1] Next the praetors were chosen, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, Marcus Valerius Laevinus, Publius Manlius (for the second time),[2] Marcus Ogulnius Gallus, Lucius Caecilius Denter, Gaius Terentius Istra.

At the end of the year there was a period of prayer by reason of the prodigies, because the Romans were well persuaded that there had been a shower of blood, lasting two days, in the precinct of Concord,[3] and because it was reported that not far from Sicily, a new island which had not been there before had [3] Cf. also xlvi. 5 above and the note and XL. xix. 2.

A.U.C. 571

7 e mari esse. Hannibalem hoc anno Antias Valerius decessisse est auctor legatis ad eam rem ad Prusiam missis praeter T. Quinctium Flamininum, cuius in ea re celebre est nomen, L. Scipione Asiatico et P. Scipione Nasica.

risen from the sea. Valerius Antias says that B.C. 183
Hannibal died this year, ambassadors having been sent to Prusias for this purpose, namely, Lucius Scipio Asiaticus and Publius Scipio Nasica,[1] in addition to Titus Quinctius Flamininus, whose name is best known in this connection.

[1] Again Livy appends an afterthought, inconsistent with his previous narrative.

LIBRI XXXIX PERIOCHA

M. Aemilius cos. Liguribus subactis viam Placentia usque Ariminum productam Flaminiae iunxit. Initia luxuriae in urbem introducta ab exercitu Asiatico referuntur. Ligures quicumque citra Appenninum erant subacti sunt. Bacchanalia, sacrum Graecum et nocturnum, omnium scelerum seminarium, cum ad ingentis turbae coniurationem pervenisset,[1] investigatum et multorum poena sublatum est. A censoribus L. Valerio Flacco et M. Porcio Catone,[2] et belli et pacis artibus maximo, motus est senatu L. Quinctius Flamininus. T.[3] frater, eo quod cum[4] Galliam provinciam consul obtineret, rogatus in convivio a Poeno Philippo quem amabat, scorto nobili, Gallum quendam sua manu occiderat sive, ut quidam tradiderunt, unum ex damnatis securi percusserat rogatus a meretrice Placentina cuius amore deperibat. Exstat oratio M. Catonis in eum. Scipio Literni decessit et, tamquam iungente[5] fortuna, circa idem tempus duo funera maximorum virorum, Hannibal a Prusia Bithyniae rege, ad quem victo Antiocho confugerat, cum dederetur Romanis, qui ad exposcendum eum T. Quinctium Flamininum miserant, veneno mortem consciit, Philopoemen quoque, dux Achaeorum, vir

[1] pervenisset edd. : peruenisset codd.
[2] nomina corrupta correxerunt edd.
[3] T. edd. : om. codd.
[4] cum add. edd.
[5] iungente edd. : lugente NP.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXXIX

THE consul Marcus Aemilius, having subdued the Ligurians, built a road from Placentia to Ariminum to connect with the Via Flaminia. The beginnings of luxurious living are said to have been introduced into the City by the army from Asia. All the Ligurians on this side of the Apennines were subdued. The Bacchanalia, a Greek rite celebrated by night, the breeding-ground of all crimes, since it had developed into a conspiracy of large numbers, were investigated and suppressed by the punishment of many. The censors Lucius Valerius Flaccus and Marcus Porcius Cato (the latter the greatest of men in the arts of both war and peace) expelled from the senate Lucius Quinctius Flamininus, the brother of Titus, on the ground that while he was holding the province of Gaul as consul, at the request of a Carthaginian, Philippus, a notorious degenerate whom he loved, he had, at a banquet, killed with his own hand a certain Gaul, or, as some say, that he had beheaded a man under sentence of death at the request of a courtesan of Placentia with whom he was desperately in love. The speech of Marcus Cato against him is extant. Scipio died at Liternum and, as if fortune were bringing them together, two deaths occurred about the same time of very great men—Hannibal, who committed suicide by poison when Prusias, king of Bithynia, with whom he had taken refuge after the defeat of Antiochus, was about to surrender him to the Romans who had sent Titus Quinctius Flamininus to demand him, and also Philopoemen, chieftain of the Achaeans and a very great man, who was poisoned maximus, a Messeniis occisus veneno cum ab his in bello captus esset. Coloniae Potentia [1] et Pisaurum et Mutina et Parma deductae sunt. Praeterea res adversus Celtiberos prospere gestas et initia causasque belli Macedonici continet. Cuius origo inde fluxit quod Philippus aegre ferebat regnum suum a Romanis imminui et quod cogeretur a Thracibus aliisque locis praesidia deducere.

[1] Potentia Sigonius : polentia codd.

by the Messenians after they had captured him in war. The colonies of Potentia and Pisaurum and Mutina and Parma were founded. In addition the book contains the victories over the Celtiberians and the beginnings and causes of the Macedonian war. The origin of this was found in Philip's anger that his kingdom was diminished by the Romans and that he was compelled to withdraw his garrisons from Thrace and elsewhere.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION BY

EVAN T. SAGE

AND

ALFRED C. SCHLESINGER

[v. 12]

BOOKS XL–XLII

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS
LONDON, ENGLAND

GRAD
31122486
REPL
5/28/98
ADD

CONTENTS

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE vii

Book XL 1
Summary of Book XL 181
Book XLI 183
Summary of Book XLI 287
Book XLII 291
Summary of Book XLII 507

INDEX OF NAMES 509

MAPS 523
1. Italy
2. Greece
3. The Mediterranean World
4. The City of Rome

T. LIVI
AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XL

A.U.C. 572

I. Principio insequentis anni consules praetoresque sortiti provincias sunt. Consulibus nulla praeter Ligures quae decerneretur erat. Iurisdictio urbana M. Ogulnio[1] Gallo, inter peregrinos M. Valerio 2 evenit; Hispaniarum Q. Fulvio Flacco citerior, P. Manlio ulterior, L. Caecilio Dentri Sicilia, C. Terentio Istrae Sardinia. Dilectus habere consules 3 iussi. Q. Fabius ex Liguribus scripserat Apuanos ad rebellionem spectare, periculumque esse ne 4 impetum in agrum Pisanum facerent. Et ex Hispaniis citeriorem in armis esse et cum Celtiberis bellari sciebant; in ulteriore, quia diu aeger esset praetor, luxuria et otio solutam disciplinam militarem esse. 5 Ob ea novos exercitus conscribi placuit, quattuor legiones in Ligures, uti singulae quina milia et ducenos pedites trecenos haberent equites, sociorum

[1] M. Ogulnio edd. vett.: ogulino aut ogolino r.

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XL

I. In the beginning of the following year the B.C. 182 consuls and praetors drew lots for their provinces. For the consuls there was no province to be decreed except the Ligurians. The civil jurisdiction fell to Marcus Ogulnius Gallus, that between citizens and aliens to Marcus Valerius, Nearer Spain to Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, Farther Spain to Publius Manlius, Sicily to Lucius Caecilius Denter, Sardinia to Gaius Terentius Istra. The consuls were directed to conduct the levies. Quintus Fabius had written from the Ligurian country that the Apuani were meditating rebellion and that there was danger that they would invade the territory of Pisa. As to the Spains also, they knew that the nearer province was in arms and that there was war with the Celtiberians; in the farther province, because the praetor had long been sick, they knew that military discipline had grown slack from easy living and idleness. For these reasons it was determined to enlist new armies, four legions for service against the Ligurians, each to consist of fifty-two hundred infantry and three hundred cavalry, and, in addition thereto, fifteen iisdem Latini nominis quindecim milia peditum addita et octingenti[1] equites. Hi duo consulares 6 exercitus essent. Scribere praeterea iussi septem milia peditum sociorum ac Latini nominis et quadringentos equites et mittere ad M. Marcellum in Galliam, cui ex consulatu prorogatum imperium erat.

A.U.C. 572

7 In Hispaniam utramque quae ducerentur, quattuor milia peditum civium Romanorum et ducenti equites, et sociorum septem milia peditum cum trecentis
8 equitibus scribi iussa. Et Q. Fabio Labeoni cum exercitu quem habebat in Liguribus prorogatum in annum imperium est.

II. Ver procellosum eo anno fuit. Pridie Parilia,[2] medio ferme die, atrox cum vento tempestas coorta multis sacris profanisque locis stragem fecit, signa
2 aenea in Capitolio deiecit, forem ex aede Lunae quae in Aventino est raptam tulit et in posticis parietibus Cereris templi adfixit, signa alia in circo maximo cum
3 columnis quibus superstabant evertit, fastigia aliquot templorum a culminibus abrupta foede dissipavit. Itaque in prodigium versa ea tempestas, procurarique
4 haruspices iusserunt. Simul procuratum est quod tripedem mulum Reate natum nuntiatum erat, et a Formiis[3] aedem Apollinis Caietae de caelo tactam.

[1] octingenti ς : trecenti M.
[2] Parilia ed. Veneta 1498 : palilia ς.
[3] post Formiis lacunam susp. Drakenborch, quam neglexi.

[1] The festival of Pales, a shepherd-divinity, celebrated on April 21, the birthday of Rome.
[2] This temple was near the Circus Maximus.

thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy. These were to be the two consular armies. In addition, they were ordered to enlist seven thousand infantry and four hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy and to send them to Marcus Marcellus in Gaul, his imperium having been prolonged after his consulship. They were also directed to enroll troops which were to be conducted to the two Spains, four thousand infantry and two hundred cavalry of Roman citizens and of the allies seven thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry. Also the imperium of Quintus Fabius Labeo among the Ligurians, along with the army which he had, was extended for a year. B.C. 183

II. The spring was stormy that year. The day before the Parilia,[1] about noon, a heavy storm accompanied by wind came and caused damage to many places sacred and profane, overthrew bronze statues on the Capitoline, tore a door-post from the temple of Luna which is on the Aventine, carried it to the rear walls of the temple of Ceres [2] and fastened it there, blew down other statues in the Circus Maximus, together with the columns on which they rested, and violently tore loose from their tops the roofs of a number of temples and scattered them. Therefore this storm was turned into a prodigy, and the haruspices ordered atonement to be made. At the same time atonement was made because news had come from Reate that a mule with three feet had been born and from Formiae [3] that the temple of Apollo at Caieta had been struck by lightning. By [3] It seems unnecessary to assume a lacuna. The two towns were close together and the actual message may have come from Formiae, which was on the main highway.

A.U.C. 572

Ob ea prodigia viginti hostiis maioribus sacrificatum est [1] et diem unum supplicatio fuit.

5 Per eos dies ex litteris A. Terentii propraetoris cognitum P. Sempronium in ulteriore provincia, cum plus annum aeger fuisset, mortuum esse. Eo maturius in Hispaniam praetores iussi proficisci.

6 Legationes deinde transmarinae in senatum introductae sunt, primae [2] Eumenis et Pharnacis regum et 7 Rhodiorum querentium de Sinopensium clade. Philippi quoque legati et [3] Achaeorum et Lacedaemoniorum sub idem tempus venerunt. Iis prius Marcio audito, qui ad res Graeciae Macedoniaeque 8 visendas missus erat, responsa data sunt. Asiae regibus ac Rhodiis responsum est legatos ad eas res visendas senatum missurum.

III. De Philippo auxerat curam Marcius: nam ita fecisse eum [4] quae senatui placuissent fatebatur, ut facile appareret non diutius quam necesse esset 2 facturum. Neque obscurum erat rebellaturum, omniaque quae tunc ageret diceretque eo spectare. 3 Iam primum omnem fere multitudinem civium ex maritimis civitatibus cum familiis suis in Emathiam, quae nunc dicitur, quondam appellata Paeonia est,

[1] est ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. ς.
[2] primae Crévier: prima ς.
[3] et edd. vett.: om. ς.
[4] eum ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. ς.

---

[1] King of Pontus.

[2] Sinopê had been conquered by Pharnaces and her Rhodian allies had undertaken the embassy in her behalf. Sinopê had not previously been thought of as within the Roman sphere of interest in Asia.

[3] Cf. XXXIX. xlviii. 5.

[4] Polybius (XXIV. x (XXIII. ix)) says more explicitly "that he had indeed done all that was enjoined on him, but with reason of these prodigies a sacrifice of twenty full- B.C. 183 grown victims was offered and one day of prayer celebrated.

During this period it was learned from dispatches from Aulus Terentius the propraetor that Publius Sempronius had died in the farther province after an illness of more than a year. For this reason the praetors were directed to set out earlier for Spain.

Then embassies from overseas were introduced into the senate, first those of the kings, Eumenes and Pharnaces,[1] and of the Rhodians, who were complaining of the slaughter of the people of Sinopê.[2] Ambassadors from Philip also and from the Achaeans and Lacedaemonians arrived about the same time. After first hearing the report of Marcius, who had been sent to investigate conditions in Greece and Macedonia,[3] answers were given them. The kings of Asia and the Rhodians received the reply that the senate would send commissioners to look into these matters.

III. With regard to Philip, Marcius had increased the senate's concern: for he admitted that Philip had done what it had demanded, but in such a way that it was clearly evident that he would not continue to do so longer than was necessary.[4] Nor was it a secret that he would resort to arms, and that everything that he did and said had this in view. In the first place he moved almost the entire population of citizens, families and all, from the towns along the coast to what is now called Emathia and was formerly Paeonia, and the cities he gave as great reluctance; and that if he got an opportunity, he would go to all lengths against the Romans" (Shuckburgh's translation).

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

4 traduxit, Thracibusque et aliis barbaris urbes tradidit habitandas, fidiora haec genera hominum fore ratus 5 in Romano bello. Ingentem ea res fremitum Macedonia tota fecit, relinquentesque penates suos cum coniugibus ac liberis pauci tacitum dolorem continebant; execrationesque in agminibus proficiscentium 6 in regem vincente odio metum exaudiebantur. His ferox animus omnes homines omnia loca temporaque 7 suspecta habebat. Postremo negare propalam coepit satis tutum sibi quicquam esse, nisi liberos eorum quos interfecisset comprehensos in custodia haberet et tempore alium alio tolleret.

IV. Eam crudelitatem, foedam per se, foediorem 2 unius domus clades fecit. Herodicum principem Thessalorum multis ante annis occiderat; generos quoque eius postea interfecit. In viduitate relictae 3 filiae singulos filios parvos habentes. Theoxena et Archo nomina iis erant mulieribus. Theoxena multis 4 petentibus aspernata nuptias est: Archo Poridi cuidam, longe principi gentis Aenianum, nupsit et apud eum plures enixa partus, parvis admodum 5 relictis omnibus, decessit. Theoxena, ut in suis manibus liberi sororis educarentur, Poridi nupsit; et tamquam omnes ipsa enixa foret, suum [1] sororisque 6 filios [2] in eadem habebat cura. Postquam regis edictum de comprehendendis liberis eorum qui

[1] suum edd. vett.: om. ς.
[2] filios edd. vett.: om. ς.

[1] Polybius (XXIV. viii a (XXIII. x)) represents him as quoting a verse from the epic poet Stasinus: νήπιος ὃς πατέρα κτείνας υἱοὺς καταλείπει, "A fool is he who, having slain the homes to Thracians and other barbarians, thinking that these tribes would be more loyal in a Roman war. This act caused tremendous lamentation throughout all Macedonia, and few, as they left their ancestral homes with their wives and children, kept their grief concealed; and from the columns of migrants curses upon the king were heard, hatred getting the better of their fear. The king's temper, made fierce by these things, held all men, all places and occasions in suspicion. Finally he began to say publicly that he could not find any real security unless the children of those whom he had executed were arrested, kept under guard, and killed one by one, as occasion offered.[1] B.C. 182

IV. This cruelty, dreadful in itself, was made more dreadful by the destruction of one household. Herodicus, a leading man among the Thessalians, had been put to death many years before; his sons-in-law also had been killed later. His daughters were left in widowhood, each having one small son. Theoxena and Archo were the names of these women. Theoxena, though she had many suitors, disdained marriage: Archo married a certain Poris, by far the first citizen among the Aeneans,[2] and after bearing several children, all left quite small, she died in his house. Theoxena, in order that the children of her sister might be brought up in her hands, married Poris; and as if she were the mother of them all, she devoted the same care to her own child and her sister's children. After she received the king's proclamation about the father, leaves the sons behind." Both Polybius and Livy seem to conceive of the fall of Philip in dramatic form and to employ some of the technique of tragedy in their narratives.

[2] He probably came from Aenea, not Aenus.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

interfecti essent accepit, ludibrio futuros non regis modo sed custodum etiam libidini[1] rata ad rem 7 atrocem animum adiecit ausaque est dicere se sua manu potius omnes interfecturam quam in pote- 8 statem Philippi venirent. Poris abominatus mentionem tam foedi facinoris Athenas deportaturum eos ad fidos hospites dixit, comitemque ipsum fugae 9 futurum esse. Proficiscuntur ab Thessalonica Aeneam ad statum[2] sacrificium, quod Aeneae conditori cum magna caerimonia quotannis faciunt. 10 Ibi die per sollemnes epulas consumpto navem praeparatam a Poride sopitis omnibus de tertia vigilia conscendunt tamquam rediturī Thessalonicam;[3] sed 11 traicere in Euboeam erat propositum. Ceterum in adversum ventum nequiquam eos tendentes prope terram lux oppressit, et regii qui praeerant custodiae portus lembum armatum ad retrahendam[4] eam navem miserunt cum gravi edicto ne reverterentur 12 sine ea. Cum iam[5] appropinquabant, Poris quidem ad hortationem remigum nautarumque intentus erat; interdum manus ad caelum tendens deos ut ferrent 13 opem orabat. Ferox interim femina, ad multo ante praecogitatum revoluta facinus, venenum diluit ferrumque promit et posito in conspectu poculo strictisque gladiis " mors " inquit " una vindicta est. 14 Viae ad mortem hae sunt: qua quemque animus fert,

[1] libidini Sigonius: libidinis σ.
[2] statum ed. Frobeniana 1531: statutum aut statuam σ.
[3] Thessalonicam Gronovius: in thessalonicam σ.
[4] retrahendam Perizonius: pertrahendam $M\sigma$.
[5] cum iam Gelenius: quoniam dies aut cum dies σ.

arrest of the children of the men who had been put to death, thinking that they would be exposed not only to the mockery of the king but even to the lust of the guards, she turned her thoughts to a deed of horror, and dared to say that she would rather kill them all with her own hand than let them fall into the power of Philip. Poris, hating even the thought of so dreadful a deed, said that he would take them to faithful friends in Athens and would himself be their companion in exile. They set out from Thessalonica to Aenea to an appointed sacrifice which they make [1] every year to Aeneas, their founder, with elaborate ceremony. Having spent a day there in the ritual feasts, when all were asleep, about the third watch they went aboard a ship made ready in advance by Poris, as if to return to Thessalonica; their plan, however, was to cross to Euboea. But strain as they might in vain against an opposing wind, day caught them near the shore, and the king's troops who were in charge of the guarding of the harbour sent an armed brig to bring back that ship, with strict orders not to return without it. When they were now close to shore, Poris was engaged in urging on the rowers and sailors; sometimes stretching out his hands to heaven, he would pray that the gods would send help. Meanwhile the maddened woman, turning to the crime she had long been planning, mixed the poison and displayed the steel, and placing the cup in sight and drawing the swords, she said, "Death is the one way to freedom. These are the ways to death: by whichever your mind prefers, escape the tyranny of B.C. 182

[1] The present account may have been taken over from Polybius, but the festival may still have been celebrated in Livy's time.

A.U.C. 572

effugite superbiam regiam. Agite, iuvenes mei, primum, qui maiores estis, capite ferrum aut haurite poculum, si segnior mors iuvat." Et hostes aderant et auctor mortis instabat. Alii alio leto absumpti semianimes e nave praecipitantur. Ipsa deinde virum comitem mortis complexa in mare sese deiecit. Nave vacua dominis regii potiti sunt.

V. Huius atrocitas facinoris novam velut flammam regis invidiae adiecit, ut vulgo ipsum liberosque exe-crarentur; quae dirae brevi ab omnibus diis exaudi-tae, ut saeviret ipse in suum sanguinem effecerunt. 2 Perseus enim cum in dies magis cerneret favorem et dignitatem Demetrii fratris apud multitudinem Macedonum crescere et gratiam apud Romanos, sibi spem nullam regni superesse nisi in scelere ratus ad id 3 unum omnes cogitationes intendit. Ceterum cum se ne ad id quidem quod muliebri cogitabat animo satis per se validum crederet, singulos amicorum patris 4 temptare sermonibus perplexis institit. Et primo quidam ex his aspernantium tale quicquam prae-buerunt speciem, quia plus in Demetrio spei pone-5 bant; deinde crescente in dies Philippi odio in Romanos, cui Perseus indulgeret, Demetrius summa ope adversaretur, prospicientes animo exitum incauti a fraude fraterna iuvenis, adiuvandum quod futurum

[1] The episode is not found in Polybius. Livy treats it as almost the turning-point in the tragic action.

[2] The implication seems to be that Perseus was strong enough to plan a murder but not to commit it: if so, he acquired strength later.

the king. Come, my children, first you who are the elder, take the sword or drain the cup, if you like the slower death." From the one side the enemy was approaching, from the other the author of death was urging them. One carried off by one death, another by another, still half-living they were thrown into the sea. Then the woman herself, embracing her husband, the partner in her death, threw herself into the sea. The king's troops captured a ship empty of its masters.[1] B.C. 182

V. The horror of this act added, as it were, a new spark to the resentment against the king, so that people generally were cursing him and his sons; and these curses, heard by all the gods, presently brought it to pass that he himself took violent measures against his own kin. For when Perseus saw that the popularity and honour of his brother Demetrius were, among the Macedonian people, growing every day, as well as his influence with the Romans, thinking that no hope for the throne was left to him except through crime, he turned all his thoughts in that one direction. But since he believed that by himself he was not strong enough even for what he was planning in his effeminate[2] mind, he began to make trial of individuals among his father's friends with ambiguous remarks. And at first some of them gave the appearance of rejecting any such suggestion, since they placed more hope in Demetrius; then, as Philip's hatred for the Romans increased daily, and Perseus nursed it and Demetrius tried with all his might to oppose it, foreseeing the destruction of the young man, off his guard against his brother's trickery, and, thinking that what was bound to happen should be helped along and that the erat rati fovendamque spem potentioris, Perseo se

A.U.C. 572

6 adiungunt. Cetera in suum quaeque tempus agenda[1] differunt: in praesentia placet omni ope in Romanos accendi regem impellique ad consilia belli, ad quae
7 iam sua sponte animum inclinasset. Simul ut Demetrius in dies suspectior esset, ex composito sermones ad res[2] Romanorum trahebant. Ibi cum alii mores et instituta eorum, alii res gestas, alii speciem ipsius urbis nondum exornatae neque publicis neque privatis locis, alii singulos[3] principum
8 eluderent, iuvenis incautus et amore nominis Romani et certamine adversus fratrem omnia tuendo suspectum se patri et opportunum criminibus faciebat.
9 Itaque expertem eum pater omnium de rebus Romanis consiliorum habebat: totus in Persea versus cum eo cogitationes eius rei dies ac noctes agitabat.
10 Redierant[4] forte, quos miserat in Bastarnas ad arcessenda auxilia, adduxerantque inde nobiles iuvenes et regii quosdam generis, quorum unus sororem suam in matrimonium Philippi filio pollicebatur; erexeratque consociatio gentis eius animum regis.
11 Tum Perseus " quid ista prosunt? " inquit; " nequaquam tantum in externis auxiliis est praesidii, 12 quantum periculi in fraude[5] domestica. Proditorem

[1] agenda Gelenius: om. ς.
[2] res Novák: spem Mς, pro quo alius vir doctus aliud ex ingenio.
[3] singulos Gelenius: in singulos ς.
[4] redierant edd. vett.: redierunt ς.
[5] in fraude Gronovius: fraude ς.

aspirations of the stronger should be encouraged, B.C. 182 they allied themselves with Perseus. Everything else they put off until the proper time for action: for the present it was decided to enkindle the king in every way against the Romans and to turn him to thoughts of war, to which he had already spontaneously turned his mind. At the same time, that Demetrius might day by day become more an object of suspicion, they agreed that they would draw the conversation again and again to Roman topics. Then, when some would poke fun at their manners and customs, others at their achievements, others at the appearance of the city itself, which was not yet made beautiful in either its public or its private sections, others at individual leaders, the young man, being off his guard both because of his love for the Roman people [1] and because of his rivalry with his brother, by defending the Romans in everything made himself suspicious in his father's eyes and a fair target for attack. And so his father kept him excluded from all his deliberations about Roman affairs: turning entirely to Perseus he considered with him all the plans for the war by day and night. It happened that the agents had returned whom Philip had sent to the Bastarnae to summon aid [2] and had brought from there noble young men and some of royal birth, one of whom promised his sister in marriage to a son of Philip; alliance with this tribe had cheered the spirits of the king. Then Perseus said: "What good do such things do? There is by no means as much protection in auxiliaries outside as there is danger in treachery at home. I do not want

[1] Cf. XXXIX. xlvii–xlviii. 1 and the note.
[2] Cf. XXXIX. xxxv. 4.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 672

nolo dicere, certe speculatorem habemus in sinu, cuius [1] ex quo obses Romae fuit, corpus nobis reddi-13 derunt Romani, animum ipsi habent. Omnium paene Macedonum in eum ora conversa sunt, nec regem se alium habituros aiunt [2] quam quem Romani 14 dedissent." His per se aegra mens senis stimulabatur, et animo magis quam vultu ea crimina accipiebat.

VI. Forte lustrandi exercitus venit [3] tempus, cuius sollemne est tale: caput mediae canis praecisae et pars ad dexteram, cum extis posterior ad laevam viae
2 ponitur: inter hanc divisam hostiam copiae armatae traducuntur. Praeferuntur primo agmini arma insignia omnium ab ultima origine Macedoniae regum,
3 deinde rex ipse cum liberis sequitur, proxima est regia cohors custodesque corporis, postremum agmen
4 Macedonum cetera multitudo claudit. Latera regis duo filii iuvenes cingebant, Perseus iam tricesimum annum agens, Demetrius quinquennio minor, medio iuventae robore ille, hic flore, fortunati patris matura
5 suboles, si mens sana fuisset. Mos erat lustrationis sacro peracto decurrere exercitum, et divisas bifariam
6 duas acies concurrere ad simulacrum pugnae. Regii iuvenes duces ei ludicro certamini dati; ceterum non imago fuit pugnae, sed tamquam de regno dimi-

[1] speculatorem habemus in sinu, cuius Gelenius: speculatorem cuius ς.
[2] habituros aiunt Gelenius: rentur habituros esse ς.
[3] venit edd. vett.: aduenit ς.

to say a traitor, but we have in our bosom at least a spy, whose body, after he was a hostage at Rome, the Romans gave back to us but keep his soul themselves. The eyes of almost all the Macedonians are turned towards him, and they say that they will have no other king than the one whom the Romans shall have given them." Sick as the old man's mind already was, anyhow, it was by these means roused to passion, and he retained these insinuations in his heart rather than in his looks. B.C. 182

VI. It so happened that the time for purifying the army had come, for which there is a ritual of this sort: the fore part of a dog is cut off and placed on the right side of the road, the hind part, with the entrails, on the left; between the parts of the victim, thus divided, the troops are marched. At the head of the column are carried the arms and standards of all the kings from the earliest beginnings of Macedonia, then the present king, accompanied by his children, follows, next is the royal cohort and the bodyguard, and the rest, the rank and file of the Macedonians brings up the rear. The two youthful sons of the king were riding at his sides, Perseus being now in his thirtieth year, Demetrius five years younger, the former in the full strength of young manhood, the latter in its flower, the mature offspring of a father blessed by fortune, had a sound mind but been his. It was the custom when the ceremony of purification was finished to manoeuvre the army and dividing it into battle-lines to clash in a sham battle. The princes were assigned as commanders for this mock engagement: yet it was not the imitation of a battle, but they came together just as if it were a struggle for the throne, and many caretur, ita[1] concurrerunt, multaque vulnera rudibus[2] facta, nec praeter ferrum quicquam defuit ad iustam 7 belli speciem. Pars ea quae sub Demetrio erat longe superior fuit. Id aegre patiente Perseo laetari prudentes amici eius, eamque rem ipsam dicere praebituram causam criminandi iuvenis.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

VII. Convivium eo die sodalium qui simul decurrerant uterque habuit, cum vocatus ad cenam ab 2 Demetrio Perseus negasset. Festo die benigna invitatio et hilaritas iuvenalis utrosque in vinum 3 traxit. Commemoratio ibi certaminis ludicri et iocosa dicta in adversarios, ita ut ne ipsis quidem 4 ducibus abstineretur iactabantur. Ad has excipiendas voces speculator ex convivis Persei missus cum incautior obversaretur, exceptus a iuvenibus 5 forte triclinio egressis male mulcatur. Huius rei ignarus Demetrius " quin comisatum " inquit " ad fratrem imus et iram eius, si qua ex certamine residet, simplicitate et hilaritate nostra lenimus? " 6 Omnes ire se conclamarunt praeter eos qui speculatoris ab se pulsati praesentem ultionem metuebant. Cum eos quoque Demetrius traheret, ferrum veste abdiderunt, quo se tutari, si qua vis fieret, possent. 7 Nihil occulti esse in intestina discordia potest. Utraque domus speculatorum et proditorum plena erat. Praecucurrit index ad Persea, ferro succinctos

[1] ita ed. Aldina : *om. M*σ.
[2] rudibus Gronovius : sudibus *M*σ.

---

[1] They were used for drill and for exhibitions.

[2] Livy takes such pains throughout to depict Demetrius as a frank, ingenuous, and even simple youth that one wonders what sources of information he had and what kind of a person Demetrius really was. In Livy's story his sim-wounds were dealt by the pointless weapons,[1] nor B.C. 182 was anything but iron wanting to make it look like a regular battle. The division which was under Demetrius was far superior. When Perseus was angered at this, his shrewder friends rejoiced and said that this was just the thing that would give grounds for accusing the young man.

VII. Each of the two that day held a banquet for his companions who had taken part in the charge with him, after Perseus had refused when invited to dinner by Demetrius. On the holiday courteous invitations and youthful jollity encouraged both parties to drinking. There reminiscences of the sham battle and jokes at their opponents were bandied about, so that not even the leaders themselves were spared. When a spy, sent from the party of Perseus to catch remarks, was hovering incautiously too close, he was captured and roughly handled by some young men who happened to be leaving the dining room. Demetrius, knowing nothing of this occurrence, said, "Why don't we pursue our revels at my brother's, and by our openness and cheerfulness soothe his anger, if any is left from the battle?"[2] All shouted out to go, except those who feared immediate vengeance for the spy whom they had beaten. When Demetrius was for taking them also with him, they concealed under their cloaks weapons wherewith to defend themselves if an attack should be made. There can be no secrets in internal strife. Each house was full of spies and traitors. An informer went ahead to Perseus, bearing the news that four young men plicity and lack of perception make him an easy prey to Perseus.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573 nuntians cum Demetrio quattuor adulescentes venire. 8 Etsi causa apparebat—nam ab iis pulsatum convivam suum audierat—infamandae rei causa ianuam obserari iubet, et ex parte superiore aedium versisque in viam fenestris comisatores, tamquam ad caedem 9 suam venientes, aditu ianuae arcet. Demetrius per vinum quod excluderetur paulisper vociferatus in convivium redit, totius rei ignarus.

VIII. Postero die Perseus, cum [1] primum conveniendi potestas patris fuit, regiam ingressus perturbato vultu in conspectu partis tacitus procul constitit. 2 Cui cum pater "satin salve?" et quaenam ea maestitia esset interrogaret eum, "de lucro [2] tibi" inquit "vivere me scito. Iam non occultis a fratre petimur insidiis; nocte cum armatis domum ad interficiendum me venit, clausisque foribus parietum 3 praesidio me a furore eius sum tutatus." Cum pavorem mixtum admiratione patri iniecisset, "atqui si aures praebere potes" inquit, "manifestam rem 4 teneas faciam." Enimvero se Philippus dicere auditurum, vocarique extemplo Demetrium iussit; et seniores amicos duos, expertes [3] iuvenalium inter fratres certaminum, infrequentes iam in regia, Lysimachum et Onomastum arcessit quos in consilio 5 haberet. Dum veniunt amici, solus filio procul stante multa secum animo volutans inambulavit. 6 Postquam venisse eos nuntiatum est, secessit in [1] cum ed. Parisina 1513 : quam aut quod σ.

[2] lucro Sigonius : ludicro σ.
[3] expertes σ : expertos M.

armed with swords were coming with Demetrius. B.C. 183
Although their reason was obvious—for he had heard that his companion had been beaten by them—he ordered the door to be bolted in order to make the affair look serious, and from the upper part of the house and the windows that faced the street he kept the revellers, as if they were coming to murder him, from approaching the door. Demetrius, under the influence of wine, after shouting for a while because he was shut out, returned to his banquet, ignorant of the significance of the whole affair.

VIII. The next day Perseus, as soon as he had the opportunity to see his father, entered the palace with a troubled look and stood in sight of his father, but at a distance, without speaking. When his father said " Is it all right with you? " and asked what was the cause of his sadness, he replied, " You may count it as clear gain, I tell you, that I am alive. No longer are we being attacked by my brother with secret plots; he came last night with armed men to my house to kill me, and closing the doors I defended myself against his madness by the walls' protection." When he had inspired in his father fear mixed with wonder, he went on: " But if you can give this your attention, I shall cause you to grasp it clearly." Philip said that he would indeed listen, and immediately ordered Demetrius to be summoned; he also sent for two older men, his friends, who took no part in the youthful rivalries between the brothers and nowadays were rarely at the court, Lysimachus and Onomastus, to serve as his counsellors. While his friends were coming, he walked up and down alone, turning over many things in his mind, while his son stood apart. When it was announced that they had

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

partem interiorem cum duobus amicis et totidem custodibus corporis; filiis ut ternos inermes secum 7 introducerent permisit. Ibi cum consedisset, "sedeo" inquit "miserrimus pater iudex inter duos filios, accusatorem parricidii et reum, aut conficti aut admissi[1] criminis labem apud meos inventurus.
8 Iam pridem quidem hanc procellam imminentem timebam, cum vultus inter vos minime fraternos
9 cernerem, cum voces quasdam exaudirem. Sed interdum spes animum subibat deflagrare iras vestras, purgari suspiciones posse. Etiam hostes armis positis foedus icisse, et privatas multorum simultates 10 finitas; subituram vobis aliquando germanitatis memoriam, puerilis quondam simplicitatis consuetudinisque inter vos, meorum denique praeceptorum, quae vereor ne vana surdis auribus cecinerim.
11 Quotiens ego audientibus vobis detestatus exempla discordiarum fraternarum horrendos eventus eorum rettuli, qui se stirpemque suam domos regna funditus
12 evertissent. Meliora quoque exempla parte altera posui: sociabilem consortionem inter binos Lacedaemoniorum reges, salutarem per multa saecula ipsis 13 patriaeque; eandem civitatem, postquam mos sibi cuique rapiendi tyrannidem exortus sit, eversam.
14 Iam hos Eumenem Attalumque fratres, ab tam[2] exiguis rebus prope ut puderet regii nominis, mihi

[1] admissi σ : commissi M.
[2] ab tam Madvig : a quam σ.

[1] Polybius (XXIV. viii a (XXIII. xi)) quotes a speech of Philip to the general purport of what follows here.

come he retired into the interior part of the palace B.C. 182 with his two friends and as many bodyguards; he permitted his sons to bring in three unarmed men each. When he had taken his seat there, he spoke as follows: "Here I sit, a most wretched father, as judge between my two sons, accuser and accused on a charge of parricide, doomed as I am to discover in my own household the dishonour of either the invention or the commission of a crime. For a long time, indeed, I had been fearing this threatening storm, when I saw your looks at one another, looks in no wise brotherly, and when I heard certain words. But sometimes hope entered my mind that your passions might burn out, that your suspicions might be cleared away. I told myself that even hostile nations had laid down their arms and made treaties and that the private quarrels of many had been ended; I hoped that some day a recollection of your kinship would come to you, of your one-time boyish frankness and mutual intercourse, and finally of my teachings, which I fear that I have recited in vain to unhearing ears. How often [1] in your presence, hating the examples of discord between brothers, I have reviewed the dreadful fates of those men who had utterly destroyed themselves, their houses, their homes, their kingdoms! On the other side also I set better examples: the harmonious compact between the pairs of Lacedaemonian kings, beneficial for many ages to themselves and to the state; the destruction of the same city after the custom had grown up that each should seize the tyranny for himself. Again I pointed out that the brothers Attalus and Eumenes, from beginnings so small that one would almost be ashamed to use the name of

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572 Antiocho cuilibet regum huius aetatis, nulla re magis quam fraterna unanimitate, regnum aequasse. 15 Ne Romanis quidem exemplis abstinui, quae aut visa aut audita habebam, T. et L. Quinctiorum, qui bellum mecum gesserunt, P. et L. Scipionum, qui Antiochum devicerunt, patris patruique eorum, quorum perpetuam vitae concordiam mors quoque miscuit. 16 Neque vos illorum scelus similisque sceleri eventus deterrere a vecordi discordia potuit, neque horum bona mens, bona fortuna ad sanitatem flectere. 17 Vivo et spirante me hereditatem meam ambo et spe 18 et cupiditate improba crevistis.[1] Eo usque me vivere vultis, donec alterius vestrum superstes haud ambiguum regem alterum mea morte faciam. Nec fratrem nec patrem potestis pati. Nihil cari, nihil sancti est. In omnium vicem regni unius insatiabilis 19 amor successit. Agite, conscelerate aures paternas, decernite criminibus, mox ferro decreturi, dicite palam quicquid aut veri potestis aut libet com- 20 minisci: reseratae aures sunt, quae posthac secretis alterius ab altero criminibus claudentur." Haec furens ira cum dixisset, lacrimae omnibus obortae et diu maestum silentium tenuit.

IX. Tum Perseus: "Aperienda nimirum nocte ianua fuit et armati comisatores accipiendi praebendumque ferro iugulum, quando non creditur nisi

[1] crevistis Gelenius "ex exemp. Mog.": petitis ς.

---

[1] Cf. XXXIII. xxi. 2–3.

king,[1] have made their kingdom equal to me, to B.C. 182
Antiochus, to any king whatever of this age, and for no other reason than brotherly harmony. I did not avoid even Roman examples which I had either seen or heard of, that of Titus and Lucius Quinctius, who carried on the war against me, that of Publius and Lucius Scipio, who overthrew Antiochus, or of their father and uncle, whose enduring companionship in life death also cemented fast. Neither has the guilt of the former cases and the result, which was as horrible as the guilt, been able to deter you from your mad quarrelling nor the good feeling and good fortune which attended the latter to urge you to sanity. While I live and breathe, you, with wicked hopes and wicked desires as well, have both entered into my heritage. You wish me to live only until the time when, by surviving one of you, I shall by my death make the other an unquestioned king. You cannot brook either a brother or a father. Nothing dear, nothing sacred, exists for you. In place of everything else there has come an insatiable desire for one thing—the throne. Come, pollute your father's ears, reach by means of accusations the decision which you will presently reach with the sword, say openly whatever you can that is true or whatever you are pleased to invent: my ears are open which hereafter will be closed to secret charges made by the one against the other." When he had said this in a frenzy of rage, tears were shed by all, and for a long time a gloomy silence prevailed.

IX. Then Perseus spoke: "I should forsooth have opened my doors last night and admitted the armed revellers and offered my throat to their weapons, since a crime is not believed unless it has been committed,

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

perpetratum facinus, et eadem[1] petitus insidiis 2 audio quae latro atque insidiator. Non nequiquam isti unum Demetrium filium te habere, me subditum 3 et paelice genitum appellant. Nam si gradum, si caritatem filii apud te haberem, non in me querentem deprehensas insidias, sed in eum qui fecisset saevires, 4 nec adeo vilis tibi vita esset nostra ut nec praeterito periculo meo movereris neque futuro, si insidiantibus 5 sit[2] impune. Itaque si mori tacitum oportet, tace-amus, precati tantum deos ut a me coeptum scelus in me finem habeat, nec per meum latus tu petaris:
6 sin autem, quod circumventis in solitudine natura ipsa subicit, ut hominum quos numquam viderint fidem tamen implorent, mihi quoque ferrum in me strictum cernenti vocem mittere licet,[3] per te 7 patriumque nomen, quod utri nostrum sanctius sit iam pridem sentis, ita me audias precor, tamquam si voce et comploratione nocturna excitus mihi quiritanti intervenisses, Demetrium cum armatis nocte intempesta in vestibulo meo deprehendisses. Quod tum vociferarer in re praesenti pavidus, hoc nunc 8 postero die queror. Frater, non comisantium in vicem animis[4] iam diu vivimus inter nos. Regnare utique vis. Huic spei tuae obstat aetas mea, obstat gentium ius, obstat vetustus Macedoniae mos, obstat 9 vero etiam patris iudicium. Haec transcendere nisi

[1] et eadem ed. Frobeniana 1535 : eadem M : eiusdem ς.
[2] sit edd. vett. : om. ς.
[3] licet Gronovius : liceat ς.
[4] animis Madvig : om. ς.

[1] That is, the general practise that the eldest son should inherit the throne. Perseus says nothing at this point of his own illegitimacy.

and I, after being attacked from ambush, hear the B.C. 183 same reproaches as the brigand and the plotter. Not without reason do those people say that you have one son, Demetrius, and that I am illegitimate and born of a concubine. For if I had any standing with you, or any of the affection due a son, you would not be enraged at me for complaining of detected plots, but at him who had contrived them, nor would my life be so cheap in your sight that you would be moved neither by my past nor by my future danger if the plotters go unpunished. And so, if it is right that I should die in silence, let me be silent, praying only to the gods that the crime which began with me may have its end with me, and that the sword may not reach through my body to yours. But if, however, as nature herself suggests when men are set upon in a lonely place, that they shall nevertheless implore the aid of men whom they have never seen, so, if I too, when I see the sword drawn against me, am permitted to cry out, by your life and by the name of father (and you have long since seen by which of us that name is more respected), I beg that you will listen to me as if you, aroused during the night by my cries and laments, had yourself responded to my appeal, and had caught Demetrius and his armed band in the dead of night at my vestibule. My cry at that time, as I trembled at the presence of danger, is now, the next day, my complaint. My brother, we have long lived with one another in no spirit of boon companions. You wish of course to be king. In the way of this ambition of yours stand my age, the rule of nations,[1] the ancient custom of Macedonia, and indeed also the decision of our father. You cannot surmount these obstacles except by

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

per meum sanguinem non potes. Omnia moliris et temptas. Adhuc seu cura mea seu fortuna restitit 10 parricidio tuo. Hesterno[1] die in lustratione et decursu et simulacro ludicro pugnae funestum prope proelium fecisti, nec me aliud a morte vindicavit
11 quam quod me ac meos vinci passus sum. Ab hostili proelio, tamquam fraterno lusu,[2] pertrahere me ad cenam voluisti. Credis me, pater, inter inermes convivas cenaturum fuisse, ad quem armati comisatum venerunt? Credis nihil a gladiis nocte periculi mihi futurum fuisse,[3] quem rudibus[4] te inspectante 12 prope occiderunt? Quid hoc noctis, quid inimicus[5] ad iratum, quid cum ferro succinctis iuvenibus venis? Convivam me tibi committere ausus non sum: comisatorem te cum armatis venientem
13 recipiam? Si aperta ianua fuisset, funus meum parares hoc tempore, pater, quo querentem audis. Nihil ego, tamquam accusator, criminose nec dubia
14 argumentis colligendo ago. Quid enim? Negat venisse se cum multitudine ad ianuam meam, an ferro succinctos secum fuisse? Quos nominavero, arcesse. Possunt quidem omnia audere qui hoc ausi 15 sunt: non tamen audebunt negare. Si deprehensos intra limen meum cum ferro ad te deducerem, pro[6] manifesto haberes: fatentes pro deprehensis habe.

[1] hesterno Drakenborch: hesterna ς.
[2] lusu edd. vett.: iussu ς.
[3] periculum mihi futurum fuisse Madvig: periculum fuisse aut p. f. mihi ς.
[4] rudibus Gronovius: sudibus ς.
[5] inimicus ed. Frobeniana 1535: ut inimicus ς.
[6] pro ed. Frobeniana 1535: rem pro ς.

killing me. You try and attempt everything. Thus B.C. 182 far either my care or my good fortune has thwarted your murderous designs. Yesterday, in the purification and the manoeuvres and the holiday's sham battle, you almost made the fight fatal, nor did anything else save me from death except that I permitted myself and my force to be defeated. From this warlike combat, as though it had been a game between brothers, you tried to entice me to your dinner. Do you think, father, that I should have dined among unarmed guests, when armed men came to my house to conduct their revels? Do you think that I should not have been in danger from swords at night when in the day-time, before your eyes, they had well-nigh killed me with headless spears? Why, Demetrius, do you come late at night, why in hostile mood to an angry man, why accompanied by young men equipped with swords? I did not dare to entrust myself to you as a dinner-guest: should I receive you when you came as a reveller with armed attendants? If my door had been open, father, you would be preparing my funeral at this very moment when you are hearing my complaint. I am not, like a prosecutor, pleading by innuendo nor deducing uncertain consequences from evidence. What now? Does he deny that he came to my door with a crowd or that there were armed men with him? Summon those men whom I shall name. They can indeed dare anything who have dared this: yet they will not dare to deny it. If I should bring them before you, having arrested them with weapons within my threshold, you would consider the case as clear: pray consider them, since they admit their guilt, as men arrested.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

X. "Execrare nunc cupiditatem regni, et furias fraternas concita.[1] Sed ne sint caecae, pater, execrationes tuae, discerne, dispice insidiatorem et 2 petitum insidiis: noxium incesse[2] caput. Qui occisurus fratrem fuit, habeat etiam iratos paternos deos: qui periturus fraterno scelere fuit, perfugium 3 in patris misericordia et iustitia habeat. Quo enim alio confugiam, cui non sollemne lustrale exercitus tui, non decursus militum, non domus, non epulae, non nox ad quietem data naturae beneficio mortalibus 4 tuta est? Si iero ad fratrem invitatus, moriendum est; si recepero intra ianuam comisatum fratrem, 5 moriendum est: nec eundo nec manendo insidias evito. Quo me conferam? Nihil praeter deos, pater, et te colui. Non Romanos habeo ad quos confugiam: perisse expetunt, quia tuis iniuriis doleo, quia tibi ademptas tot urbes, tot gentes, modo Thraciae maritimam oram, indignor. Nec me nec 6 te incolumi Macedoniam suam futuram sperant. Si me scelus fratris, te senectus absumpserit, aut ne ea quidem expectata fuerit, regem regnumque Macedoniae sua futura sciunt. Si quid extra Macedoniam tibi Romani reliquissent, mihi quoque id relictum 7 crederem receptaculum. At in Macedonibus satis praesidii est. Vidisti hesterno die impetum militum in me. Quid illis defuit nisi ferrum? Quod illis defuit interdiu, convivae fratris noctu sumpserunt.

[1] concita Gelenius: cogita ς.
[2] incesse Ruben: huic esse ς.

X. "Curse now this lust for the throne, and awake B.C. 183
the furies that avenge a brother's death. But, father, lest your curses be blind, sort out and distinguish between the plotter and the intended victim of the plot: let your wrath fall upon the guilty head. Let him who planned to kill his brother find also his father's gods incensed; let him who was to perish by his brother's crime find refuge in the mercy and justice of his father. For whither else am I to flee, for whom the ritual purification of your army, the manoeuvres of the troops, my home, the feast, the night, which nature in her kindness gave as a time of rest for mortals, are not safe? If I go to my brother on his invitation, I must die; if I receive my brother on his revels within my gates, I must die: neither by going nor by staying do I avoid the ambush. Whither shall I turn? To nought have I done reverence, father, save to the gods and you. It is not the Romans to whom I can flee: they wish my death because I grieve at the wrongs which have been done to you, because I am angry that so many cities, so many tribes, and now the coast of Thrace, have been taken from you. While either I or you survive, they have no hope that Macedonia will be theirs. If a brother's crime shall carry me off and old age you, or if they do not even wait for that, they know that the king and kingdom of Macedonia will be theirs. If the Romans had left you anything outside of Macedonia, I should believe that what was left would be a safe hiding-place for me also. But, some one may say, there is sufficient protection in the Macedonians. You saw yesterday the attack of the soldiers upon me. What was lacking to them except steel? What was lacking to them by day my brother's guests

A.U.C. 672

8 Quid de magna parte principum loquar, qui in Romanis spem omnem dignitatis et fortunae posuerunt et in eo qui omnia apud Romanos potest? Neque hercule istum mihi tantum, fratri maiori, sed prope est ut tibi quoque ipsi, regi et patri, praeferant. 9 Iste enim est cuius beneficio poenam tibi senatus remisit, qui nunc te ab armis Romanis protegit, qui tuam senectutem obligatam et obnoxiam 10 adulescentiae suae esse aequum censet. Pro isto Romani stant, pro isto omnes urbes tuo imperio liberatae, pro isto Macedones qui pace Romana gaudent. Mihi praeter te, pater, quid usquam aut spei aut praesidii est?

XI. "Quo spectare illas litteras ad te nunc missas T. Quinctii credis, quibus et bene te consuluisse rebus tuis ait quod Demetrium Romam miseris, et hortatur ut iterum et cum pluribus legatis et primoribus eum 2 remittas Macedonum? T. Quinctius nunc est auctor omnium rerum isti et magister. Eum sibi te[1] abdicato patre in locum tuum substituit. Illic ante 3 omnia clandestina concocta sunt consilia. Quaeruntur adiutores consiliis, cum te plures et principes Macedonum cum isto mittere iubet. Qui hinc integri et sinceri Romam eunt, Philippum regem se

[1] te edd. vett.: om. ς.

---

[1] Demetrius.

[2] Cf. XXXIX. xlvii. 11.

[3] This letter has not been mentioned by Livy but is quoted by Polybius (XXIV. iii (XXIII. iii)), who adds that in private conversation Quinctius captivated the young man by suggesting that the Romans meant to place him on the throne.

took up at night. What shall I say about the great B.C. 183 proportion of our leading men, who have placed in the Romans all hopes of advancement and power, and in him [1] who is all-powerful with the Romans? Nor, by Hercules, is it merely that they prefer him to me, his elder brother, but it is not far from true that they prefer him even to you yourself, king and father though you are. For he it is through whose generosity the senate remitted the penalty to you,[2] who now safeguards you from Roman arms, who deems it right that your old age should be bound and beholden to his youth. For him stand the Romans, for him, all the cities liberated from your authority, for him the Macedonians who rejoice in the Roman peace. For me, father, what hope or support is there anywhere except in you?

XI. "What do you think is the purpose of that letter which has just been sent to you by Titus Quinctius,[3] in which he says first that you took good care of your interests when you sent Demetrius to Rome, and then urges that you send him again, accompanied by a longer train of ambassadors and chieftains of the Macedonians? Titus Quinctius is now his guide and teacher in all matters. You, his father, have been pushed aside, and he has chosen Quinctius to put in your place. There above all have secret plans been devised. It is assistants in carrying out these plans that they are seeking, since he bids you send with him more Macedonians and chiefs of the state. Those who go to Rome from here sound and untainted, believing that they have Philip for

[1] One can hardly suspect Flamininus of deliberate double dealing, but he certainly played into the hands of Perseus: cf. also xxiii. 7 below.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

habere credentes, imbuti illinc et infecti Romanis 4 delenimentis redeunt. Demetrius iis unus omnia est, eum iam regem vivo patre appellant. Haec si indignor, audiendum est statim non ab aliis solum sed 5 etiam a te, pater, cupiditatis regni crimen. Ego vero, si in medio ponitur, non agnosco. Quem enim suo loco moveo ut ipse in eius locum succedam?
Unus ante me pater est, et ut diu sit deos rogo.
6 Superstes—et ita sim, si merebor, ut ipse me esse velit[1]—hereditatem regni, si pater tradet, accipiam.
7 Cupit regnum, et quidem scelerate cupit, qui transcendere festinat ordinem aetatis naturae moris Macedonum iuris gentium. 'Obstat frater maior, ad quem iure voluntate etiam patris regnum pertinet.
8 Tollatur: non primus regnum fraterna caede petiero.[2]
Pater senex et filio solus orbatus de se magis timebit[3] quam ut filii necem ulciscatur.[4] Romani laetabuntur, 9 probabunt, defendent factum.' Hae spes incertae, 10 pater, sed non inanes sunt. Ita enim se res habet:
periculum vitae propellere a me potes puniendo eos qui ad me interficiendum ferrum sumpserunt; si facinori eorum successerit, mortem meam idem tu persequi non poteris."

XII. Postquam dicendi finem Perseus fecit, coniecti eorum qui aderant oculi in Demetrium sunt,
2 velut confestim responsurus esset. Deinde diu

[1] me esse uelit σ: me uult esse M.
[2] petiero Gelenius: potior σ.
[3] de—timebit Gelenius: et magis timebit ne irascatur σ.
[4] ulciscatur Gelenius: patiatur σ.

their king, return from there stained and corrupted B.C. 182
by Roman enchantments. Demetrius alone is everything to them, and even now, while his father is alive, they hail him as king. If I am indignant at these things, I must at once listen to the charge, not from others alone, but even from you, father, that I am coveting the throne! But for my part, if this charge is put forward openly, I do not admit its truth. For whom am I removing from his proper place, that I may step into his place? Only my father is before me, and I pray the gods that he may long be there. Should I survive—and may I so behave that he may himself wish me to survive, if I deserve it—I shall receive the inheritance of the kingship if my father will hand it on to me. He covets the throne and indeed covets it to the point of crime, since he hastens to leap over precedence in age, in nature, the usage of the Macedonians, the law of nations. 'My elder brother' says Demetrius, 'stands in my way, to whom the kingdom belongs by law and also by our father's wish. Let him be removed: I shall not have been the first to seek a kingdom by murdering a brother. Our father, an old man and lonely, bereaved of his son, will fear too much for himself to avenge the death of his son. The Romans will rejoice, will applaud, will defend my act.' Such hopes, father, are uncertain but not groundless. For such is the situation: you can avert the peril to my life by punishing those who have armed themselves against me; if success attends their crime, you yourself will be unable to avenge my death."

XII. When Perseus had finished speaking, the eyes of all who were present were turned on Demetrius, as if he would instantly reply. Then a long

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

fuit silentium, cum perfusum [1] fletu appareret omnibus loqui non posse. Tandem vicit dolorem ipsa necessitas, cum dicere iuberent, atque ita orsus 3 est. "Omnia quae reorum antea fuerant auxilia, pater, praeoccupavit accusator. Simulatis lacrimis in alterius perniciem veras meas lacrimas suspectas
4 tibi fecit. Cum ipse, ex quo ab Roma redii, per occulta cum suis colloquia [2] dies noctesque insidietur, ultro mihi non insidiatoris modo sed latronis manifesti
5 et percussoris speciem induit. Periculo suo te exterret, ut innoxio fratri per eundem te maturet perniciem. Perfugium sibi nusquam gentium esse ait, ut ego ne apud te quidem spei quicquam reliqui
6 habeam. Circumventum solum inopem invidia gratiae externae, quae obest potius quam prodest, onerat. Iam illud quam accusatorie, quod noctis huius crimen miscuit cum cetera insectatione vitae
7 meae, ut et hoc quod iam quale sit scies suspectum alio vitae nostrae tenore faceret, et illam vanam criminationem spei voluntatis consiliorum meorum nocturno hoc ficto et composito argumento fulciret!
8 Simul et illud quaesivit ut repentina et minime praeparata accusatio videretur, quippe ex noctis
9 huius metu et tumultu repentino exorta. Oportuit autem, Perseu, si proditor ego patris regnique eram,

[1] perfusum edd. vett.: perfuso et similia ζ.
[2] colloquia ed. Veneta 1495: colloquens ζ.

---

[1] Such lamentations were a standard and effective part of the defence-technique: for a striking case see Cicero De oratore I. 228.

silence followed, in which it was clear to all that, B.C. 182 choked with tears, he could not speak. At length his grief was overcome by his real necessity, when they commanded him to speak, and he thus began: "All those devices, father, which used to be of assistance to the accused, my accuser has been beforehand in seizing. With tears forced for the ruin of his opponent he has made my genuine tears suspicious in your sight.[1] Although he himself, ever since I returned from Rome, has been plotting day and night in secret conferences with his friends, he has taken the lead and put upon me the appearance, not merely of a conspirator, but of a professed bandit and murderer. He terrifies you with his own danger, in order that through your help he may hasten the ruin of his innocent brother. He claims that he has no place of refuge anywhere in the world, and so brings it to pass that I have no remnant of hope even in you. Me, encompassed with foes, abandoned, poor, he loads with the reproach of having influence abroad, which is a hindrance rather than a help. Again, see how like an accuser he was in mingling last night's offence with an indictment of my general mode of life, with the result that this incident, whose nature you will soon understand, he made suspicious by the conduct of my life in other respects, and that he bolstered up that mass of innuendo about my hopes, desires, plans, by this invented and fictitious dramatization of last night's affair. At the same time the object that he sought was that his accusation might seem sudden and entirely uncalculated, arising forsooth out of the fear and sudden tumult of last night. But, Perseus, if I was the betrayer of my father and the kingdom, if I had conspired with the si cum Romanis, si cum aliis inimicis patris inieram consilia, non expectatam fabulam esse noctis huius, 10 sed proditionis me ante [1] accusatum: si illa, separata hac,[2] vana accusatio erat invidiamque tuam adversus me magis quam crimen meum indicatura, hodie quoque eam aut praetermitti aut in aliud tempus

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

11 differri, ut per se quaereretur [3] utrum ego [4] tibi an tu mihi, novo quidem et singulari genere odii, insidias
12 fecisses. Ego tamen, quantum in hac subita perturbatione potero, separabo ea quae tu confudisti, et noctis huius insidias aut tuas aut meas detegam.
13 Occidendi sui consilium inisse me videri vult, ut scilicet maiore fratre sublato, cuius iure gentium more Macedonum, tuo etiam, ut ait, iudicio regnum est futurum, ego minor in eius quem occidissem
14 succederem locum. Quid ergo illa sibi vult pars altera orationis, qua Romanos a me cultos ait atque
15 eorum fiducia in spem regni me venisse? Nam si et in Romanis tantum momenti credebam esse ut quem vellent imponerent Macedoniae regem, et meae tantum apud eos gratiae confidebam, quid opus 16 parricidio fuit? An ut cruentum diadema fraterna caede gererem? Ut illis ipsis, apud quos aut vera aut certe simulata probitate partam gratiam habeo,

[1] me ante Madvig: meae ante me M: me ς.
[2] hac Weissenborn: ac $M\varsigma$.
[3] quaereretur Madvig, ex codd., alius aliud.
[4] ego ς: ego ipse M.

[1] The remarkable feature of Perseus' hatred for Demetrius appears to be its groundlessness, as Demetrius interprets the facts.

Romans and other enemies of my father, you should B.C. 182 not have waited for the drama of last night, but should long before have impeached me for treason: but if, when this recent episode was left out of account, that former accusation was baseless and was likely to prove your ill-will toward me rather than my guilt, you should either have omitted it to-day also or have postponed it to another occasion, so that the question might be investigated independently as to whether I had plotted against you or you against me, employing indeed a new and remarkable form of hatred.[1] I, nevertheless, so far as I shall be able in this unexpected confusion, shall take apart those things which you have made into one and shall reveal last night's plot, whether yours or mine. Perseus wishes it to appear that I had formed a conspiracy to kill him, with the apparent design that after removing my elder brother, to whom the throne was destined to come by the law of nations, by the custom of the Macedonians, and also (so he says) by your decision, I, the younger, might succeed to the place of him whom I had killed. What, then, does that second part of his speech mean, in which he asserts that I have paid court to the Romans and have formed hopes for the throne through reliance on them? For if I thought that the Romans possessed so much influence that they could make whomever they chose king of Macedonia, and if, moreover, I trusted that my influence with them was so strong, what need was there of murder? Was it in order that I might wear a crown besprinkled with a brother's blood? In order that to those very people among whom I have influence, if I have any, gained by an integrity which is either real or at least assumed, si quam forte habeo, execrabilis et invisus essem?

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

17 Nisi T. Quinctium credis, cuius nutu[1] et consiliis me[2] nunc arguis regi, cum et ipse tali pietate vivat cum fratre, mihi fraternae caedis fuisse auctorem.
18 Idem non Romanorum gratiam solum, sed Macedonum iudicia ac paene omnium deorum hominumque consensum collegit, per quae omnia se mihi
19 parem in certamine non futurum crediderit: idem, tamquam aliis[3] omnibus rebus inferior essem, ad sceleris ultimam spem confugisse me insimulat.[4]
20 Vis hanc formulam cognitionis esse ut, uter timuerit ne alter dignior videretur regno is consilium opprimendi fratris iudicetur cepisse?

XIII. "Exsequamur tamen quocumque modo conficti ordinem criminis. Pluribus modis se petitum criminatus est, et omnes insidiarum vias in unum
2 diem contulit. Volui interdiu eum post lustrationem, cum concurrimus, et quidem, si diis placet, lustrationum die occidere; volui, cum ad cenam invitavi, veneno scilicet tollere; volui, cum comisatum gladiis succincti[5] me secuti sunt, ferro inter-
3 ficere. Tempora quidem qualia sint ad parricidium electa vides: lusus, convivii, comisationis. Quid? Dies qualis? Quo lustratus exercitus, quo inter

[1] nutu Doering: virtute ς.
[2] me ed. Parisina 1513: mea ς.
[3] aliis Gronovius: in aliis ς.
[4] insimulat edd. vett.: insimulas ς.
[5] succincti Drakenborch: accincti M: cincti ς.

[1] Perseus, he says, argues inconsistently, first, that my case is so strong that the throne is practically assured to me; second, that my case is so weak that I can attain the throne

I might be the object of execration and hatred? B.C. 182
Unless you think that Titus Quinctius, by whose nod and advice you now accuse me of being ruled, although he himself lives on such terms of devotion with his brother, has counselled me to murder my brother. This same brother of mine has adduced, not only my influence with the Romans, but also the opinions of the Macedonians and the agreement, almost, of all gods and men, and by reason of all these things he believed that he would not be equal to me in a contest: at the same time, as if I were inferior in everything else, he charges that I have fled to the last refuge of crime.[1] Do you wish, Perseus, the rule to be applied to the investigation, that whichever of us fears that the other might seem more worthy of the kingship should be judged to have formed the plan of killing his brother?

XIII. "Let us, however, follow out the details of this charge, in whatever way it was concocted. His charge is that he was attacked in many ways, and he has brought together all these methods of attack into a single day. I wished to slay him by day, after the purification, when we clashed, and more than that (heaven help us!) on the day of purifications; I wished to kill him, I suppose by poison, when I invited him to dinner; I wished, when men armed with swords attended me on my revels, to kill him with the steel. You see, indeed, what sorts of occasions are selected for this murder: times of sport, of feasting, of revelry. Well, what sort of day was it? The day when the army was purified, when

[1] only by killing him. Demetrius is discussing the general charge of treason as distinguished from the specific charge based on the affair of the night before.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

divisam victimam, praelatis omnium, qui umquam fuere, Macedoniae regum armis regiis, duo soli tua tegentes latera,[1] pater, praevecti sumus, et secutum
4 est Macedonum agmen: hoc ego, etiam si quid antea admisissem piaculo dignum, lustratus et expiatus sacro, tum cum maxime in hostiam itineri nostro circumdatam intuens, parricidium venena gladios in comisationem praeparatos volutabam in animo, ut quibus aliis deinde sacris contaminatam
5 omni scelere mentem[2] expiarem? Sed caecus criminandi cupiditate animus, dum omnia suspecta
6 efficere vult, aliud alio confundit. Nam si veneno te inter cenam tollere volui, quid minus aptum fuit quam pertinaci certamine et concursu iratum te efficere, ut merito, sicut fecisti, invitatus ad cenam
7 abnueres? Cum autem iratus negasses, utrum ut placarem te danda opera fuit, ut aliam quaererem
8 occasionem, quoniam semel venenum paraveram, an ab illo consilio velut transiliendum ad aliud fuit, ut ferro te, et quidem eodem die,[3] per speciem comisa-9 tionis occiderem? Quo deinde modo, si te metu mortis credebam cenam vitasse meam, non ab eodem metu comisationem quoque vitaturum existimabam?

XIV. "Non est res qua erubescam, pater, si die
2 festo inter aequales largiore vino sum usus. Tu

[1] soli tua tegentes latera ed. Frobeniana 1535: solito more gentis latera ς.
[2] mentem ed. Vascosana: gentem ς.
[3] eodem die Madvig: eo die M: eo ς.

between the parts of the divided victim, with the B.C. 182 royal arms of all the kings who have ever ruled in Macedonia borne before us, we two alone, riding at your side, father, led the way and the host of the Macedonians followed: on this day, even if I had previously committed some act demanding atonement, was I, purified and with atonement made by the rite, at the very time when I could see the sacrificial victim lying on either side of our line of march, was I, I say, then revolving in my mind murder, poisons, swords made ready for the revels—that I might find in what other rites expiation for a conscience stained with every crime? But a mind blinded by the desire to find grounds for accusation, while it tries to make everything seem suspicious, confuses one thing with another. For, Perseus, if I wished to kill you with poison at the dinner, what was less suitable than by a stubborn contest and clash to make you angry, so that you would justly refuse, as you did, to come when I invited you to dinner? But when you had in your anger refused, which should I have done? Should I have tried every means to appease you, that I might find another opportunity, since I had the poison once made ready? Or should I leap, so to speak, from that plan straight to another, namely, to kill you with a sword, and on that very same day, under the pretence of a revel? Further, on what line of reasoning, if I believed that it was from fear of death that you avoided my dinner, could I think that after that you would not from the same fear avoid my revel also?

XIV. "There is no reason, father, why I should blush if, on a day of feasting with companions of my own age I indulged too lavishly in wine. Even you,

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

quoque velim inquiras qua laetitia, quo lusu apud me celebratum hesternum convivium sit, illo etiam—pravo forsitan—gaudio [1] provehente, quod in iuvenali armorum certamine pars nostra non inferior fuerat. 3 Miseria haec et metus crapulam facile excusserunt; quae si non intervenissent, insidiatores nos sopiti 4 iaceremus. Si domum tuam expugnaturus, capta domo dominum interfecturus eram, non temperassem vino in unum diem, non milites meos abstinuissem? 5 Et ne ego me solus nimia simplicitate tuear, ipse quoque minime malus ac suspicax frater 'nihil aliud scio,' inquit 'nihil [2] arguo, nisi quod cum ferro 6 comisatum venerunt.' Si quaeram unde id ipsum scias,[3] necesse erit te fateri [4] aut speculatorum tuorum plenam domum fuisse meam, aut illos ita aperte 7 sumpsisse ferrum ut omnes viderent. Et ne quid ipse aut prius inquisisse aut nunc criminose argumentari videretur, te quaerere ex iis quos nominasset iubebat an ferrum habuissent, ut, tamquam in re dubia, cum id quaesisses, quod ipsi fatentur, pro 8 convictis haberentur. Quin tu illud quaeri iubes, num tui occidendi causa ferrum sumpserint, num me auctore et sciente? Hoc enim videri vis, non illud quod fatentur et palam est. Et [5] sui se tuendi causa 9 sumpsisse dicunt. Recte an perperam fecerint,

[1] gaudio Gelenius: odio *M*ς.
[2] nihil ed. Frobeniana: neque ς.
[3] scias ς: sciam M.
[4] te fateri Gelenius: om. ς.
[5] ei Madvig: et ς.

[1] Demetrius has been perfectly frank in admitting his state the previous evening; Perseus, he says, has outdone even Demetrius in candour by reducing his charges to the quotation that follows, but the complete meaning of nimia simplicitate is obscured by the appropriateness of the phrase as a characterization of Demetrius.

brother, I should like to have you ask with what B.C. 182 rejoicing, with what merriment last night's banquet was conducted at my house, heightened, too, by our delight—base, perhaps—in the fact that in the youthful contest of arms our side had not been inferior. My present wretchedness and fear easily shook off my drunken stupor; had it not been for them, we 'plotters' would now be lying asleep. If I had intended to take your house by storm and having taken it to put its owner to death, should I not have refrained from wine for one day and caused my soldiers to abstain? And, that I may not be the only one to defend myself on the basis of too much simplicity,[1] even that brother of mine, utterly innocent and unsuspecting, no doubt, says, 'I know nothing else, I make no charge, except that they came to their revels armed.' If I should ask how you know even that, you must needs confess either that my house was full of your spies or that they took up their weapons so openly that all men saw them. And, father, lest he himself might appear either to have made some previous inquiry or now to be making calumnious charges, he bade you ask of those whom he should name whether they had had weapons, in order that, as if it were a case admitting doubt, when you had asked about a thing they admit, they might be held as convicted. Why do you not, Perseus, bid him to ask these questions also—whether they had armed themselves for the purpose of killing you, whether it was at my suggestion and with my knowledge? For you wish one thing to be supposed, while what they confess and what is manifest is another. They say that they armed themselves in self-defence. Whether they acted rightly or wrongly

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

ipsi sui facti rationem reddent: meam causam, quae nihil eo facto contingitur, ne miscueris. Aut explica utrum aperte an clam te aggressuri fuerimus. Si
10 aperte, cur non omnes ferrum habuimus? Cur nemo praeter eos qui tuum[1] speculatorem pulsa-
11 verunt? Si clam, quis ordo consilii fuit? Convivio soluto cum comisator ego discessissem, quattuor substitissent ut sopitum te adgrederentur? Quomodo fefellissent et alieni et mei et maxime suspecti, quia paulo ante in rixa fuerant? Quomodo autem trucidato te ipsi evasuri fuerunt?[2] Quattuor gladiis domus tua capi et expugnari potuit?

XV. "Quin tu omissa ista nocturna fabula ad id,
2 quod doles, quod invidia urit, reverteris? 'Cur usquam regni tui mentio fit, Demetri? Cur dignior patris fortunae successor quibusdam videris quam ego? Cur spem meam, quae, si tu non esses, certa erat,
3 dubiam et sollicitam facis?' Haec sentit Perseus, etsi non dicit; haec istum inimicum, haec accusatorem faciunt; haec domum, haec regnum tuum
4 criminibus et suspicionibus replent. Ego autem, pater, quem admodum nec nunc sperare regnum nec ambigere umquam de eo forsitan debeam, quia minor sum, quia tu me maiori cedere vis, sic illud nec debui facere nec debeo, ut indignus te patre indignus
5 omnibus videar. Id enim vitiis meis, non cedendi

[1] tuum : tum *M*ς.
[2] fuerunt Bauer : fuerint ς.

they will themselves give account of their own B.C. 182 actions: do not confuse their case with mine, which has nothing to do with that affair. Or tell us, Perseus, whether we purposed to attack you openly or secretly. If openly, why were not all of us armed? Why was no one armed except those who had beaten your spy? If secretly, what was the plan of campaign? When the banquet was over and I had departed on my revels, would the four have stayed behind to fall upon you in your sleep? How would they have passed unnoticed, being strangers and my friends, and under suspicion especially because a little while before they had been involved in the quarrel? How, again, had they planned to escape after killing you? Could your house have been taken and captured by four swords?

XV. "Why do you not, dropping that fairy-tale of last night, come back to that which irks you and causes you to burn with jealousy? 'Why in the world, Demetrius,' you ask, 'do people ever talk of your becoming king? Why do some regard you as a worthier successor to our father's fortune than I? Why do you cause my hopes, which would be sure if you were not here, to be uncertain and confused?' This is what Perseus thinks, even if he does not say it; these are the thoughts that make him my enemy and my accuser, and that fill your home and your kingdom with charges and suspicions. But I, father, as it may perhaps be my duty neither now to hope for the kingship nor ever to raise the question of it, since I am the younger, since you wish me to make way for the elder, so it neither was nor is my duty to seem unworthy of you my father, unworthy of all men. For this position I should attain by vices, not by cui ius fasque[1] est, modestia consequar. Romanos obicis mihi, et ea quae gloriae esse debent in crimen 6 vertis. Ego nec obses Romanis ut traderer nec ut legatus mitterer Romam[2] petii. A te[3] missus ire non recusavi. Utroque tempore ita me gessi ne tibi pudori, ne regno tuo, ne genti Macedonum essem.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

7 Itaque mihi cum Romanis, pater, amicitiae causa tu fuisti. Quoad tecum illis pax manebit, mecum quoque gratia erit: si bellum esse coeperit, qui obses, qui legatus pro patre non inutilis fui, idem hostis
8 illis acerrimus ero. Nec hodie ut prosit mihi gratia Romanorum postulo: ne obsit tantum deprecor. Nec in bello coepit nec ad bellum reservatur:[4] pacis pignus fui, ad pacem retinendam legatus missus sum:
9 neutra res mihi nec gloriae nec crimini sit. Ego si quid impie in te, pater, si quid scelerate in fratrem admisi, nullam deprecor poenam: si innocens sum, ne invidia conflagrem,[5] cum crimine non possim,
10 deprecor. Non hodie me primum frater accusat, sed hodie primum aperte, nullo meo[6] in se merito. Si mihi pater suscenseret, te maiorem fratrem pro minore deprecari oportebat, te adulescentiae, te errori veniam impetrare meo. Ubi praesidium esse 11 oportebat, ibi exitium est. E convivio et comisatione prope semisomnus raptus sum ad causam parricidii

[1] cui iusque fasque edd. vett.: cuius fasque ς.
[2] mitterer Romam Gelenius: romam mitterer ς.
[3] petii; a te Gelenius: a te petii ς.
[4] reservatur ed. Frobeniana: reseruetur *M*ς.
[5] conflagrem ς: conflarem M.
[6] meo Madvig: in eo ς.

[1] For the language, cf. XXXIX. vi. 4.

modesty in making way for one to whom it is right B.C. 182 and just that I should yield. You cast the Romans in my face, and things which should be a source of pride you turn into charges against me. I did not ask either that I be given as a hostage to the Romans or sent as an ambassador to Rome. When sent by you, father, I did not refuse to go. On both occasions I so conducted myself as to bring no shame to you, your kingdom, or the Macedonian people. And so, father, you were the cause of my friendship with the Romans. So long as the peace shall endure between you and them, so long will the friendship between me and them endure: if war shall break out, I, who have not been without usefulness as a hostage and an ambassador for my father, shall likewise be their bitterest foe. I do not ask that my friendship with the Romans shall help me to-day: I beg merely that it shall not hinder me. It did not begin in war and is not reserved for war: I was a pledge of peace, I was sent as an envoy to maintain the peace: let neither bring me either praise or blame. If I have done anything unfilial to you, father, or criminal to my brother, I object to no punishment: if I am innocent, I beg that jealousy may not consume me,[1] since guilt cannot. To-day is not the first time my brother has accused me, but to-day for the first time he accuses me openly, with no act of mine to justify him. If my father were angry at me, your duty, as my older brother, would be to intercede for the younger, to win forgiveness for my youth and my mistake. Where there should have been protection there is deadly peril. From the banquet and the revel, still half-asleep, I was hurried away to plead my defence on the charge of murder.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572 dicendam. Sine advocatis, sine patronis ipse pro 12 me dicere cogor. Si pro alio dicendum esset, tempus ad meditandum et componendam orationem sumpsissem, cum quid aliud quam ingenii fama periclitarer? Ignarus quid arcessitus essem, te iratum et iubentem dicere causam, fratrem accusantem audivi.
13 Ille diu ante praeparata ac meditata [1] in me oratione est usus: ego id tantum temporis, quo accusatus
14 sum, ad cognoscendum quid ageretur habui. Utrum momento illo horae accusatorem audirem an defensionem meditarer? Attonitus repentino atque inopinato malo, vix quid obiceretur intellegere potui, 15 nedum satis sciam quo modo me tuear. Quid mihi spei esset, nisi patrem iudicem haberem? Apud quem etiam si caritate a fratre maiore [2] vincor, 16 misericoridia certe reus vinci non debeo. Ego enim ut me mihi tibique serves precor; ille ut me in securitatem suam occidas, postulat. Quid eum, cum regnum ei tradideris, facturum credis in me esse, qui iam nunc sanguinem meum sibi indulgeri aequum censet?"

XVI. Dicenti haec lacrimae simul spiritum et vocem intercluserunt. Philippus summotis iis paul-
2 isper collocutus cum amicis pronuntiavit, non verbis

[1] ac Weissenborn: om. ς.
[2] caritate a fratre maiore Gelenius: a fratre maiore M: a fratre caritate ς.

---

[1] The series of speeches may have had some immediate basis in Polybius. More important, probably, in their influence on them are Livy's rhetorical interest and training, the characterizations previously given the speakers, and the function of the speeches in the dramatic action. The speech of Demetrius presents a peculiarly difficult rhetorical problem,

Without advisors, without counsel, I am compelled B.C. 182 to speak on my own behalf. If I had had to speak for another, I should have taken time to prepare and arrange my speech, and then what else would be at stake except my reputation for ability? While still in ignorance of the reason for my summons, I have listened to you in your anger ordering me to defend myself and my brother bringing charges against me. He employed against me a speech arranged and rehearsed long in advance: I had only the time during which I was accused to find out what was at issue. Should I in that brief space of time have listened to my accuser or planned my defence? Stricken by this sudden and unexpected calamity, I could scarce understand what charges were brought against me, to say nothing of knowing how to defend myself. What hope should I have were my father not the judge? If his love for me is less than for my elder brother, certainly his pity ought not to be less for me on my trial. For my prayer is that you will preserve me for myself and you; his demand is that you kill me for his security. What, father, do you think will become of me when you have turned the kingdom over to him, when even now he thinks it proper that he be gratified by my death?" [1]

XVI. As he spoke thus, tears at once stopped his breath and choked his utterance. Philip, sending them away, after conferring for some time with his since Livy had the task of composing a plausible speech for a young man just awakened from sleep and not too clever as an extemporaneous speaker under less trying circumstances. Its incoherent structure and desperate efforts to preserve a logical arrangement therefore add realism, if nothing else.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

se nec unius horae disceptatione causam eorum diiudicaturum, sed inquirendo in utriusque vitam ac
3 mores,[1] et dicta factaque in magnis parvisque rebus observando, ut omnibus appareret noctis proximae crimen facile revictum, suspectam nimiam[2] cum Romanis Demetrii gratiam esse. Haec maxime vivo Philippo velut semina iacta sunt Macedonici belli, quod cum Perseo gerendum erat.
4 Consules ambo in Ligures, quae tum una consularis provincia erat, proficiscuntur. Et quia prospere ibi res gesserunt, supplicatio in unum diem decreta est.
5 Ligurum duo milia fere ad extremum finem provinciae Galliae, ubi castra Marcellus habebat, venerunt uti reciperentur orantes. Marcellus opperiri eodem loco
6 Liguribus iussis senatum per litteras consuluit. Senatus rescribere M. Ogulnium praetorem Marcello iussit verius fuisse consules, quorum provincia esset, quam se quid e re publica esset decernere;[3] tum quoque non placere nisi[4] per deditionem Ligures recipi, et receptis arma adimi atque eos ad consules[5] mitti senatum aequum censere.
7 Praetores eodem tempore, P. Manlius in ulteriorem Hispaniam, quam et priore praetura provinciam obti-

[1] ac mores Duker: mores ς.
[2] nimiam edd. vett.: nimium ς.
[3] quid—decernere edd. vett.: om. ς.
[4] nisi Madvig: si ς.
[5] consules Glareanus: consulem ς.

---

[1] No reason for this action on the part of the Ligurians is known, nor is it clear what relation to the Romans or to Marcellus they desired to obtain. Marcellus was himself uncertain about both questions, and I have tried to be equally non-committal in the translation.

friends, gave judgment that he would not decide B.C. 182 their case on the basis of words nor the discussion of a single hour, but after inquiring into the life and manners of each and observing their words and actions in matters great and small, so that it was clear to all that the accusation regarding the preceding night had been easily refuted, but that Demetrius was suspected by reason of his excessive popularity with the Romans. Such, in general, were the seeds, so to speak, of the Macedonian war which were sown while Philip was still alive, but the war for the most part was to be waged with Perseus.

Both consuls departed for the Ligurians, this being at the time the only consular province. And because their campaigns were successful there, a thanksgiving for one day was voted. About two thousand Ligurians came to the most remote boundary of the province of Gaul, where Marcellus was encamped, and asked that they be received under his protection.[1] Marcellus, ordering the Ligurians to wait in the same place, consulted the senate by letter. The senate directed Marcus Ogulnius the praetor to reply to Marcellus that it was more correct for the consuls, whose province it was, than for them, to decide what was to the advantage of the state; on this occasion, also, that it was not their pleasure that the Ligurians should be received except in surrender, that the senate deemed it just that, if received, their arms should be taken from them, and that the Ligurians should be sent to the consuls.[2]

At the same time the praetors Publius Manlius and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus arrived in their provinces, the former in Farther Spain, which province he had

[2] Both syntax and meaning are uncertain.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

nuerat, Q. Fulvius Flaccus in citeriorem pervenit, exercitumque ab A.[1] Terentio accepit: nam ulterior 8 morte P. Sempronii proconsulis sine imperio fuerat. Fulvium Flaccum oppidum Hispanum Urbicnam nomine oppugnantem Celtiberi adorti sunt. Dura ibi proelia aliquot facta, multi Romani milites et vulnerati et interfecti sunt. Vicit perseverantia Fulvius, quod nulla vi abstrahi ab obsidione potuit:
9 Celtiberi fessi proeliis variis abscesserunt. Urbs amoto auxilio eorum intra paucos dies capta et direpta est: praedam militibus praetor concessit.
10 Fulvius hoc oppido capto, Manlius exercitu tantum in unum coacto qui dissipatus fuerat, nulla alia memorabili gesta re, exercitus [2] in hiberna deduxe-
11 runt. Haec ea aestate in Hispania gesta. Terentius qui ex ea provincia decesserat ovans urbem iniit. Translatum argenti pondo novem milia trecenta viginti, auri octoginta pondo et duo, coronae aureae sexaginta septem.

XVII. Eodem anno inter populum Carthaginiensem et regem Masinissam in re praesenti
2 disceptatores Romani de agro fuerunt. Ceperat eum ab Carthaginiensibus pater Masinissae Gala; Galam Syphax inde expulerat, postea in gratiam soceri
3 Hasdrubalis Carthaginiensibus dono dederat; Carthaginienses eo anno Masinissa expulerat. Haud

[1] ab A. Madvig: a ς.
[2] exercitus ς: exercitum M.

---

[1] According to XXXIII. xliii. 5, Manlius was in Nearer Spain as an assistant to the consul. This, however, gave him a sort of roving commission, and he operated in Farther Spain as well (XXXIV. xvii. 1 and the note).

held in his first praetorship also,[1] the latter in Nearer Spain, where he took over the army from Aulus Terentius: for the farther province had been without a governor since the death of Publius Sempronius the proconsul.[2] The Celtiberians attacked Fulvius Flaccus while he was besieging a Spanish town, Urbicna by name. A number of hard battles were fought there, and many Roman soldiers suffered wounds and death. Fulvius prevailed by stubbornness, since by no attack could he be drawn away from the siege: the Celtiberians, worn out by the repeated battles, withdrew. When their aid was lost, the city was within a few days captured and plundered; the praetor bestowed the booty upon the soldiers. Fulvius, after taking this town, retired into winter-quarters, and Manlius did the same, having merely collected into one place the army which had been scattered and having done nothing else worth mentioning. These were the events of this summer in Spain. Terentius, who had retired from that province, entered the City in ovation. In his procession he carried nine thousand three hundred and twenty pounds of silver, eighty-two pounds of gold and sixty-seven golden crowns. B.C. 183

XVII. In the same year Roman arbitrators who were on the ground took part in a dispute about land-ownership between the Carthaginian people and King Masinissa.[3] Gala, the father of Masinissa, had taken it from the Carthaginians; Syphax had driven Gala out of it and later, as a favour to his father-in-law Hasdrubal, had presented it as a gift to the Carthaginians; Masinissa had that year expelled the Carthaginians. The case was argued

[1] Cf. ii. 5 above. [2] Cf. XXXIV. lxii. 15.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572

minore certamine animorum quam cum ferro et acie
4 dimicarunt res acta apud Romanos. Carthaginienses, quod maiorum suorum fuisset, deinde ab Syphace ad se pervenisset, repetebant. Masinissa paterni regni agrum se et recepisse et habere gentium iure aiebat;
5 et causa et possessione superiorem esse; nihil aliud se in ea disceptatione metuere quam ne pudor Romanorum, dum vereantur ne quid socio atque amico regi adversus communes suos atque illius hostes indulsisse videantur, damno sit. Legati
6 possessionis ius non mutarunt, causam integram[1] Romam ad senatum reiecerunt.

In Liguribus nihil postea gestum. Recesserant primum in devios saltus, deinde dimisso exercitu 7 passim in vicos castellaque sua dilapsi sunt. Consules quoque dimittere exercitum voluerunt, ac de ea re patres consuluerunt. Alterum ex iis dimisso exercitu ad magistratus in annum creandos venire Romam iusserunt, alterum cum legionibus suis Pisis hiemare.
8 Fama erat Gallos Transalpinos iuventutem armare, nec in quam regionem Italiae effusura se multitudo esset sciebatur. Ita inter se consules compararunt ut Cn. Baebius ad comitia iret, quia M. Baebius frater eius consulatum petebat.

[1] integram ς : in integrum M.

---

[1] The claim of Masinissa must have seemed weak to the commission, which however did not wish to offend him. The ultimate solution to the problem is not known.

[2] The usefulness of a consul under such circumstances had been demonstrated by the Claudii (XXXIX. xxxii. 13).

before the Romans with no less ardour of temper B.C. 182 than when they fought with arms in the line of battle. The Carthaginians were reclaiming it because it had belonged to their forefathers and had then come again to them from Syphax. Masinissa maintained, first that he had recovered land belonging to his father's kingdom and second, that he was holding it under the law of nations; he said that he had the advantage both of a good case and of actual possession; he was afraid of nothing else in the dispute except that a sense of shame on the part of the Romans, as they might be reluctant to give the appearance of having favoured an allied and friendly king as against the common enemy of themselves and him, might do him injury. The commissioners did not change the right of possession, but referred the case without prejudice to the senate.[1]

Among the Ligurians nothing more happened. They had in the beginning retired into out-of-the-way defiles, then disbanded their army and scattered everywhere to their own villages and strongholds. The consuls also wished to discharge their armies and consulted the senate on the matter. The Fathers directed that one of them should disband his army and come to Rome to conduct the election of magistrates for the coming year, and that the other with his legions should winter at Pisa. It was reported that the Transalpine Gauls were arming their young men and it was unknown into what part of Italy the multitude would pour. So the consuls arranged between themselves that Gnaeus Baebius should go to the elections because his brother Marcus Baebius was a candidate for the consulship.[2]

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 572 XVIII. Comitia consulibus rogandis fuere: creati P. Cornelius Lentulus M. Baebius Tamphilus. 2 Praetores inde facti duo Q. Fabii, Maximus et Buteo, Ti.[1] Claudius Nero Q. Petilius Spurinus M. Pinarius Rusca[2] L. Duronius.

A.U.C. 573 3 His inito magistratu provinciae its sorte evenerunt: Ligures consulibus, praetoribus Q. Petilio urbana, Q. Fabio Maximo peregrina, Q. Fabio Buteoni Gallia, Ti.[1] Claudio Neroni Sicilia, M. Pinario 4 Sardinia, L. Duronio Apulia; et Histri adiecti, quod Tarentini Brundisinique nuntiabant maritimos agros infestos transmarinarum navium latrociniis esse. Eadem Massilienses de Ligurum navibus quere- 5 bantur. Exercitus inde decreti, quattuor legiones consulibus, quae[3] quina milia ducenos Romanos pedites, trecenos haberent equites, et quindecim milia socium ac Latini nominis, octingenti[4] equites. 6 In Hispaniis prorogatum veteribus praetoribus imperium est cum exercitibus quos haberent, et in supplementum decreta tria milia civium Romanorum, ducenti equites, et socium Latini nominis sex milia 7 peditum, trecenti equites. Nec rei navalis cura

[1] Ti. Sigonius: t. ς.
[2] Rusca Wex: pusca ς.
[3] quae Gelenius: om. ς.
[4] octingenti Drakenborch: octingentos ς.

[1] The Fasti give the cognomen as Cethegus.

[2] From xxvi. 2 below it appears that Buteo was in Histria, and from xlii. 1 below that Duronius was in Illyricum later. Livy may be mistaken, or this clause may be misplaced. Cf. Zippel, Die roemische Herrschaft in Illyrium bis auf Augustus (Leipzig, 1877), 81.

[3] As usual at the end of a war, the Romans had neglected the fleet after the defeat of Antiochus, and the ships had been docked. In the light of the information received, provision

XVIII. The election of consuls took place: the successful candidates were Publius Cornelius Lentulus[1] and Marcus Baebius Tamphilus. Next the praetors were chosen, two named Quintus Fabius, Maximus and Buteo, Tiberius Claudius Nero, Quintus Petilius Spurinus, Marcus Pinarius Rusca, Lucius Duronius. B.C. 182

When they had been inaugurated, the provinces were thus assigned in the drawing: the Ligurians to the consuls, to the praetors: the civil jurisdiction to Quintus Petilius, that between citizens and aliens to Quintus Fabius Maximus, Gaul to Quintus Fabius Buteo, Sicily to Tiberius Claudius Nero, Sardinia to Marcus Pinarius, Apulia to Lucius Duronius; the Histrians[2] were also added because the news had come from Tarentum and Brundisium that the lands along the coasts were endangered by piracy on the part of the ships from across the sea. The Massilians made the same complaint about the ships of the Ligurians. Then the armies were decreed—four legions for the consuls, each to consist of fifty-two hundred Roman infantry, and three hundred cavalry, and fifteen thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy. In the Spains the imperium of the old praetors was extended, with the armies which they had, and they decreed as reinforcements three thousand Roman citizens and two hundred cavalry and of the allies of the Latin confederacy six thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry. Nor was care for the fleet omitted.[3] B.C. 181 is now made for launching and manning them. While during the recent wars the fleets had been commanded by legati or by praetors, duumviri navales, magistrates chosen only for special occasions, are now named.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

omissa. Duumviros in eam rem consules creare iussi, per quos naves viginti deductae navalibus sociis civibus Romanis qui servitutem servissent complerentur, ingenui tantum ut iis praeessent. 8 Inter duumviros ita divisa tuenda denis navibus maritima ora, ut promunturium iis Minervae velut cardo in medio esset; alter inde[1] dextram partem usque ad Massiliam, laevam alter usque ad Barium tueretur.

XIX. Prodigia multa foeda et Romae eo anno visa 2 et nuntiata peregre. In area Vulcani et Concordiae sanguine pluvit; et pontifices hastas motas nuntiavere, et Lanuvini[2] simulacrum Iunonis Sospitae 3 lacrimasse. Pestilentia in agris forisque et conciliabulis et in urbe tanta erat ut Libitina funeribus[3] 4 vix sufficeret. His prodigiis cladibusque anxii patres decreverunt ut et consules quibus diis videretur hostiis maioribus sacrificarent, et decemviri libros 5 adirent. Eorum decreto supplicatio circa omnia pulvinaria Romae in diem unum indicta est. Isdem auctoribus et senatus censuit et consules edixerunt

[1] inde Weissenborn: in ς.
[2] Lanuvini Luterbacher: lanuuiis et similia ς.
[3] funeribus H. J. Mueller: om. ς.

---

[1] Roman citizens were not ordinarily assigned to duty at sea.
[2] Probably the cape of Sorrento, near Naples.
[3] Literally, the pivot or hinge (on which a door would swing), but, in surveying, a limiting boundary or reference point.
[4] The modern Bari, on the Adriatic.
[5] Cf. XXXIX. xlvi. 5; lvi. 6.

The consuls were directed to secure the election of a board of two for this purpose, by whom twenty ships, launched from the yards, would be manned by Roman citizens who had been slaves, serving as marines,[1] employing free-born citizens only as commanders. The defence of the coast was divided between the duumvirs, ten ships being assigned to each, in such a way that the promontory of Minerva[2] was, so to speak, the joint[3] between them; thence one should defend the right sector as far as Massilia, the other the left as far as Barium.[4] B.C. 181

XIX. Many dreadful prodigies were both observed in Rome that year and reported from elsewhere. In the precinct of Vulcan and Concord[5] there was a shower of blood; and the pontiffs announced that the spears[6] had been shaken, and the people of Lanuvium sent word that the image of Juno Sospita had shed tears. The pestilence was so severe in the country and in the villages and rural communities and in the City that Libitina[7] could scarce take care of so many funerals. Being disturbed by these prodigies and deaths, the Fathers decreed, both that the consuls should sacrifice full-grown victims to whatever gods it seemed proper, and that the decemvirs should consult the Books.[8] According to their decree one day of prayer was proclaimed at all the banquet-tables of the gods[9] in Rome. On their suggestion also there was both a decree of the senate and an edict of the consuls that for three days

[6] They were probably the hastae Martiae at Rome (Gellius IV. vi. 1–2). There were similar spears at Praeneste (XXIV. x. 10).

[7] The goddess of funerals.

[8] The Sibylline Books (XXXI. xii. 9 and the note).

[9] Cf. XXXI. viii. 2 and the note.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

ut per totam Italiam triduum supplicatio et feriae
6 essent. Pestilentiae tanta vis erat ut, cum propter defectionem Corsorum bellumque ab Iliensibus concitatum in Sardinia octo milia peditum ex sociis Latini nominis placuisset scribi et trecentos equites, quos M. Pinarius praetor secum in Sardiniam traic-
7 eret, tantum hominum demortuum esse, tantum ubique aegrorum consules renuntiaverint ut is numerus
8 effici militum non potuerit. Quod deerat militum, sumere a Cn. Baebio proconsule, qui Pisis hibernabat, iussus praetor atque inde in Sardiniam traicere.

9 L. Duronio praetori, cui provincia Apulia evenerat, adiecta de Bacchanalibus quaestio est, cuius residua quaedam velut semina ex prioribus malis iam priore 10 anno apparuerant; sed magis inchoatae apud L.[1] Pupium praetorem quaestiones erant quam ad exitum ullum [2] perductae. Id persecare novum praetorem, ne serperet iterum latius, patres iusserunt. Et 11 legem [3] de ambitu consules ex auctoritate senatus ad populum tulerunt.

XX. Legationes deinde in senatum introduxerunt, regum primas [4] Eumenis et Ariarathis Cappadocis et Pharnacis Pontici. Nec ultra quicquam eis responsum est quam missuros qui de controversiis eorum

[1] L. ed. Aldina : t. aut ti. σ.
[2] ullum ed. Frobeniana 1535 : ullae σ.
[3] legem σ : leges M.
[4] primas σ : prima M.

---

[1] Cf. XXXIX. xli. 6.

[2] The last law to control bribery had been passed in 358 B.C. (VII. xv. 12). No special reason for a new law at this time is known, unless it was the vigorous campaign reported in XXXIX. xxxii. It is not certain whether one law or two passed at this time, and the only clause recorded fixes as the throughout Italy there should be a supplication and festival. The violence of the plague was so great that when, on account of a rising of the Corsicans and a revolt begun by the Ilienses in Sardinia, it was decided to enlist eight thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry among the allies of the Latin confederacy, whom Lucius Pinarius the praetor should take with him to Sardinia, the consuls reported that so many deaths had occurred among the men and so great was the number of sick that this number of troops could not be raised. The shortage in the number of troops the praetor was directed to make up from the army of Gnaeus Baebius the proconsul, who was wintering at Pisa, and thence to cross to Sardinia. B.C. 181

To Lucius Duronius, the praetor to whom the province of Apulia had been allotted, has also been assigned an investigation to the Bacchanalia, from which some seeds, as it were, left over from the earlier troubles, had already begun to show themselves in the previous year; but the inquiries had been begun before the praetor Lucius Pupius rather than brought to any conclusion.[1] The Fathers ordered the new praetor to extirpate the trouble, to prevent it from again secretly spreading furthur. Also the consuls, with the authority of the senate, brought before the people a law on bribery.[2]

XX. Then they introduced the embassies into the senate, first those of the kings, Eumenes, and Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Pharnaces of Pontus. No further reply was given to them than that the senate would send men to investigate their differences and give penalty disqualification for holding office for a period of ten years (Scholia Bobiensia, p. 361).

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

2 cognoscerent statuerentque. Lacedaemoniorum deinde exulum et Achaeorum legati introducti sunt, et spes data exulibus est scripturum senatum Achaeis ut restituerentur. Achaei de Messene recepta compositisque ibi rebus cum adsensu patrum
3 exposuerunt. Et a Philippo rege Macedonum duo legati venerunt, Philocles et Apelles, nulla super re, quae petenda ab senatu esset, speculatum magis inquisitumque missi de iis, quorum Perseus Demetrium insimulasset sermonum cum Romanis, maxime cum T. Quinctio, adversus fratrem de regno habi-
4 torum. Hos tamquam medios nec in alterius favorem inclinatos miserat rex: erant autem et hi Persei fraudis in fratrem ministri et participes.
5 Demetrius omnium praeterquam fraterno scelere, quod nuper eruperat, ignarus primo neque magnam neque nullam spem habebat patrem sibi placari posse; minus deinde in dies patris animo fidebat,
6 cum obsideri aures a fratre cerneret. Itaque circumspiciens dicta factaque sua, ne cuius [1] suspiciones augeret, maxime ab omni mentione et contagione Romanorum abstinebat, ut neque scribi sibi vellet, quia hoc praecipue criminum genere exasperari patris animum sentiebat.

XXI. Philippus, simul ne otio miles deterior fieret, simul avertendae suspicionis causa quicquam a se

[1] ne cuius edd. vett.: nec (ne) huius ς.

---

[1] After the settlement effected in 183 B.C. (XXXIX. xlviii. 2–4) there had apparently been additional banishments of anti-Achaean elements in Lacedaemon.

[2] The apparent meaning is that Demetrius was unaware that his brother's intrigues had continued after their hearing before Philip.

judgment. Then the representatives of the Lace- B.C. 181 daemonian exiles and of the Achaeans were brought in, and hope was held out to the exiles that the senate would write to the Achaeans directing that they be restored.[1] The Achaeans explained to the satisfaction of the Fathers regarding the recovery of Messene and the solution of the problems there. Philip, king of the Macedonians, also sent two envoys, Philocles and Apelles, with no particular request to make of the senate, but rather to collect information and make inquiry about those conversations which Perseus had accused Demetrius of holding with the Romans and specifically with Titus Quinctius about the kingship which were prejudicial to the interests of his brother. These envoys the king had sent as neutral and not predisposed to favour either disputant: but as matters turned out they also were servants and helpers of Perseus in his treachery toward his brother.

Demetrius, at first ignorant of everything, except what had been revealed by his brother's wickedness, had no great hope but was not altogether without hope that his father could be appeased;[2] he trusted less every day to his father's intentions, since he perceived that his father's attention was engrossed by his brother. And so, reflecting carefully on everything he said or did, lest he increase the suspicions of anyone, he refrained particularly from all reference to or contact with the Romans, to such a degree that he did not even want them to write to him, because he knew that his father's mind was especially irritated by charges of this kind.

XXI. Philip, in order partly to prevent his troops from growing slack through idleness, partly to avert

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

agitari de Romano bello, Stobos Paeoniae exercitu
2 indicto in Maedicam [1] ducere pergit. Cupido eum ceperat in verticem [2] Haemi montis ascendendi, quia volgatae opinioni crediderat Ponticum simul et Hadriaticum mare et Histrum amnem et Alpes conspici posse: subiecta oculis ea haud parvi sibi momenti futura ad cogitationem Romani belli.
3 Percunctatus regionis peritos de ascensu Haemi, cum satis inter omnes constaret viam exercitui nullam
4 esse, paucis et expeditis per difficillimum aditum, ut sermone familiari minorem filium permulceret, quem statuerat non ducere secum, primum quaerit ab eo, cum tanta difficultas itineris proponatur, utrum
5 perseverandum sit in incepto an abstinendum. Si pergat tamen ire, non posse oblivisci se in talibus rebus Antigoni, qui saeva tempestate iactatus, cum [3] in eadem nave secum suos omnes habuisset, praecepisse liberis diceretur ut et ipsi meminissent et ita posteris proderent, ne quis cum tota gente simul in 6 rebus dubiis periclitari auderet. Memorem ergo se praecepti eius duos simul filios non commissurum in aleam eius qui proponeretur casus; et quoniam maiorem filium secum duceret, minorem ad subsidia [4] spei et custodiam regni remissurum in Macedoniam
7 esse. Non fallebat Demetrium ablegari se ne adesset

[1] Maedicam ed. Frobeniana 1531 : macedoniam ς.
[2] verticem ed. Parisina 1513 : uertice ς.
[3] cum edd. vett. : om. aut post naue coll. ς.
[4] subsidia ς : subsidium M.

[1] Perhaps the general of Alexander the Great; if so, a remote ancestor of Philip.

suspicion that he was thinking at all about a war with Rome, summoned his army to Stobi in Paeonia and began to lead it into Maedica. The desire had seized him of climbing to the top of the Haemus mountains, because he had accepted the common opinion that from there could be seen all at once the Pontic and Adriatic seas, the Hister river and the Alps. To have these spread out before his eyes would have, he thought, no small weight in determining his strategy in a war with Rome. Having questioned men who knew the country about the ascent of the Haemus, since it was generally agreed by all that there was no way for an army, but that with a few light troops it could be climbed by a very difficult road, wishing to console his younger son by an intimate talk (he had decided not to take him with him), he first asked him whether, since the difficulty of the journey was so great, he should persist in the plan or abandon it. If after all he should decide to go, he could not forget, in such a situation, Antigonus,[1] who, when tossed about by a dreadful storm, at a time when he had all his family in the same ship with him, was said to have given his children the warning, which they should both remember for themselves and pass on to their children, that no man should venture to endanger himself and his whole house at once in a doubtful situation. Therefore, he said, remembering that precept, he would not expose both his sons at once to the chance of disaster which confronted them; and since he was taking his older son with him, he intended to send the younger back to Macedonia to furnish some support to his hopes and for the future to guard the kingdom. Demetrius did not fail to B.C. 181

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

consilio, cum in conspectu locorum consultarent, quae proxime itinera ad mare Hadriaticum atque Italiam
8 ducerent, quaeque ratio belli esset futura. Sed non solum parendum patri [1] sed etiam adsentiendum erat,
9 ne invitum parere suspicionem faceret. Ut tamen iter ei tutum in Macedoniam esset, Didas ex praetoribus regiis [2] unus, qui Paeoniae praeerat, iussus
10 est prosequi eum cum modico praesidio. Hunc quoque Perseus, sicut plerosque patris amicorum, ex quo haud cuiquam dubium esse coeperat, ad quem regis animo ita inclinato hereditas regni pertineret, 11 inter coniuratos in fratris perniciem habuit. In praesentia dat ei mandata ut per omne obsequium insinuaret se in quam maxime familiarem usum, ut elicere omnia arcana specularique abditos eius sensus posset. Ita digreditur Demetrius cum infestioribus quam si solus iret praesidiis.

XXII. Philippus Maedicam primum, deinde solitudines interiacentes Maedicae atque Haemo transgressus septimis demum castris ad radices montis pervenit. Ibi unum moratus diem ad deligendos quos duceret secum, tertio die iter est ingressus.
2 Modicus primo labor in imis collibus fuit. Quantum in altitudinem egrediebantur, magis magisque silvestria et pleraque invia loca excipiebant: perve-
3 nere deinde in tam opacum iter ut prae densitate

[1] patri Weissenborn: patri tutum ς.
[2] regiis ed. Aldina: regis ς.

---

[1] The usual title used by Livy, though especially in military expressions, is praefectus. The term praetor is of course good Roman usage for a provincial governor.

[2] The day of arrival (the seventh of the march) and the day of rest are the first and second days.

perceive that he was being banished, in order that B.C. 181
he might not be present at the council when the decision would be reached, in sight of the theatre of operations, what routes would lead most directly to the Adriatic sea and to Italy, and what would be the general strategy of the war. But he had not merely to obey his father but to agree with him, lest he should beget suspicion that he was obeying unwillingly. Nevertheless, in order that he might have a safe journey into Macedonia, Didas, one of the king's generals,[1] who was in charge of Paeonia, was ordered to escort him with a moderately large guard. Didas too, like most of the friends of the king, from the time when it began to be clear to everyone to whom, since the king's mind inclined that way, the inheritance of the kingdom would fall, Perseus had associated with the conspiracy for his brother's ruin. For the present, he instructed Didas to make for himself, by every form of attention, a place among the intimates of Demetrius, that he might be able to get from him all his secrets and to spy upon his inmost thoughts. Thus Demetrius departed, accompanied by guards whose presence was more dangerous than if he had been travelling alone.

XXII. Philip, crossing Maedica first and then the waste lands lying between Maedica and the Haemus, on the seventh march at last came to the foot of the mountain. There he delayed for a day to choose the men whom he should take with him and on the third[2] day began his journey. At first there was moderate exertion in the foothills. The farther up they went, they found more and more ground that was wooded and often impassable: at last they came to a trail so shaded that by reason of the thickness

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

arborum immissorumque aliorum in alios ramorum
4 perspici caelum vix posset. Ut vero iugis appropinquabant, quod rarum in altis[1] locis est,[2] adeo omnia contecta nebula erant,[3] ut haud secus quam nocturno itinere impedirentur. Tertio demum die
5 ad verticem perventum. Nihil volgatae opinioni degressi inde detraxerunt, magis credo, ne vanitas itineris ludibrio esset, quam quod diversa inter se maria montesque et amnes ex uno loco conspici
6 potuerint. Vexati omnes, et ante alios rex ipse, quo
7 gravior aetate erat, difficultate viae est. Duabus aris ibi Iovi et Soli sacratis cum immolasset, qua triduo ascenderat, biduo est degressus, frigora nocturna maxime metuens, quae caniculae ortu similia brumalibus
8 erant. Multis per eos dies difficultatibus conflictatus nihilo laetiora in castris invenit, ubi summa penuria erat, ut in regione quam ab omni parte solitudines
9 clauderent. Itaque unum tantum moratus diem quietis eorum causa quos habuerat secum, itinere
10 inde simili fugae in Dentheletos transcurrit. Socii erant, sed propter inopiam haud secus quam hostium 11 fines Macedones populati sunt: rapiendo enim

[1] altis Madvig: aliis ς.
[2] est Madvig: esset ς.
[3] erant Weissenborn: om. ς.

---

[1] The exact situation of this summit (now part of the Great Balkan) cannot be determined, but since it was in Western Thrace or Eastern Macedonia the idea that the Adriatic could be seen from there is absurd. Mela (II. ii. 17), however, says that both seas are visible, and Strabo (VII. v. 1) quotes Polybius to the same effect, but adds that he was mistaken, since the distance was great and there were many intervening objects to obstruct the view.

[2] This star rose about mid-July (Pliny H. N. II. 123).

of the trees and the branches interlaced with one another it was barely possible to see the sky. But when they drew near the crest everything was so covered with fog, which is rare in high places, that they were retarded just as if they were marching by night. At last on the third day they came to the summit.[1] When they descended they did nothing to detract from the common opinion, rather, I suppose, to prevent the futility of the journey from becoming a subject of jest than because the different seas and mountains and rivers could be seen from one place. All were in distress and most of all the king himself, because he was more heavily burdened by age, as a result of the difficulty of the way. When he had sacrificed at the two altars dedicated there to Jupiter and the Sun, he made in two days the descent which had required three for the ascent, fearing most the nightly colds, which, at the time of the rising of the dog-star,[2] were like those of winter.[3] After struggling with many hardships during those days, he found things no easier in camp, where the need was very great, as was to be expected in a country surrounded by deserts on all sides. And so, delaying only one day, in order to rest the men whom he had taken with him, he hurried, in a march that resembled a flight, into the country of the Dentheleti. They were allies, but on account of their need the Macedonians pillaged them just as if theirs were hostile territory: in their plundering B.C. 181

[3] Conceiving of the career of Philip in tragic form again, one may regard this episode as the climax of Philip's folly thus far, or perhaps as a comic interlude to relieve the tragedy. It should be noted that it begins and ends with intimations of the approaching doom of Demetrius.

A.U.C. 573

passim villas [1] primum, dein quosdam etiam vicos evastarunt, non sine magno pudore regis, cum sociorum voces nequiquam deos sociales nomenque 12 suum implorantes audiret. Frumento inde sublato in Maedicam regressus, urbem quam Petram appel-
13 lant oppugnare est adortus. Ipse a campestri aditu castra posuit, Perseum filium cum modica manu circummisit, ut a superioribus locis urbem aggre-
14 deretur. Oppidani, cum terror undique instaret, obsidibus datis in praesentia dediderunt sese: iidem, postquam exercitus recessit, obliti obsidum relicta urbe in loca munita et montes refugerunt.
15 Philippus omni genere laboris sine ullo effectu fatigatis militibus et fraude Didae praetoris auctis in filium suspicionibus in Macedoniam rediit.

XXIII. Missus hic comes, ut ante dictum est, cum simplicitatem iuvenis incauti et suis haud immerito suscensentis assentando indignandoque et ipse vicem eius captaret, in omnia ultro suam offerens operam,
2 fide data arcana eius elicuit. Fugam ad Romanos Demetrius meditabatur; cui consilio adiutor deum beneficio oblatus videbatur Paeoniae praetor, per cuius provinciam spem ceperat elabi tuto posse.
3 Hoc consilium extemplo et fratri proditur et auctore
4 eo indicatur patri. Litterae primum ad obsidentem

[1] uillas σ : per uillas M.

[1] Paeonia extended as far west as Illyricum.

they first laid waste the farm-houses far and wide, B.C. 181 then even certain villages, not without great shame on the king's part, when he heard the voices of his allies calling in vain upon the gods who protect alliances and upon his own name. Carrying off the grain from there and returning to Maedica, he began to attack a city which they call Petra. He himself encamped on the approach from the plain and sent his son Perseus around with a force of moderate size to attack the city from the higher ground. The citizens, since danger threatened them from every quarter, gave hostages and surrendered for the time being: but none the less, after the army retired, forgetting the hostages they abandoned the city and fled to the fortified places and the mountains.

Philip, having wearied his troops with every sort of toil without having attained any result, and with his suspicions of his son increased because of the deceit of Didas, the general, returned to Macedonia.

XXIII. Didas, as has been said before, had been sent as escort to Demetrius, and when he had entrapped the ingenuous young man, who was off his guard and not unjustly angry at his relatives, by flattering him and expressing indignation at his lot, volunteering his assistance in every respect, under pledge of loyalty Didas extracted all his secrets. Demetrius was planning flight to the Romans; and it looked as if, by the grace of the gods, an assistant in this plan had been provided in the person of the governor of Paeonia, through whose province he had come to hope that he could safely escape.[1] This plan was at once both revealed to his brother and reported to his father on his brother's authority. At first a letter was brought to

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

Petram adlatae sunt. Inde Herodorus—princeps hic amicorum Demetrii erat—in custodiam est coniectus et Demetrius dissimulanter adservari 5 iussus. Haec super cetera tristem adventum in Macedoniam regi fecerunt. Movebant eum et praesentia crimina: expectandos tamen, quos ad 6 exploranda omnia Romam miserat censebat. His anxius curis cum aliquot menses egisset, tandem legati, iam ante praemeditati in Macedonia quae ab 7 Roma renuntiarent, venerunt; qui super cetera scelera falsas etiam litteras, signo adulterino T. 8 Quinctii signatas, reddiderunt regi. Deprecatio in litteris erat si quid adulescens cupiditate regni prolapsus secum egisset: nihil eum adversus suorum quemquam facturum neque eum se esse[1] qui ullius 9 impii consilii auctor futurus videri possit. Hae litterae fidem Persei criminibus fecerunt. Itaque Herodorus extemplo diu excruciatus sine indicio rei ullius in tormentis moritur.

XXIV. Demetrium iterum ad patrem accusavit Perseus.[2] Fuga per Paeoniam praeparata argue-

[1] se esse Madvig: sese σ.
[2] Perseus Gelenius: om. σ.

---

[1] Cf. xi. 1 above and the note.

[2] The interpretation is not entirely certain, and the text, although in general it has the support of the MSS., may not be sound: the pronouns especially are curiously employed. The letter purports to be from Quinctius to Philip, and its deprecatio is designed quite as much to acquit Quinctius of any share in any plot as to warn Philip that a plot exists; the conditional clause si . . . egisset is a virtual admission that Demetrius had consulted with Quinctius about the matter. Yet one would expect that the conspirators would treat it as a letter from Quinctius to Demetrius which they had inter-him while he was besieging Petra. As a result B.C. 181

Herodorus—he was the foremost of the friends of Demetrius—was placed under arrest and orders were issued that Demetrius was to be unobtrusively watched. These things, added to everything else, saddened the king's return to Macedonia. He was indeed moved by these new charges; yet he thought that he ought to wait for the envoys whom he had sent to Rome to find out everything. When he had passed some months in this anxiety and trouble, at length the ambassadors, who had long before, while still in Macedonia, planned what report they would bring back from Rome, arrived; they, in addition to making other serious charges, delivered to the king a forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit signet of Titus Quinctius.[1] There was in the letter a warning against wrong inferences in case the young man, carried away by his desire for the throne, should have held any conversation with himself: Demetrius would do nothing to injure any of his relatives, nor was Quinctius himself one who could seem to sponsor any unfilial scheme.[2] This letter furnished confirmation to the charges of Perseus. As a result Herodorus was at once tortured for a long time without betraying anything and died on the rack.

XXIV. Demetrius was again accused by Perseus before his father. The intended flight through Paeonia was one charge, and the bribery of certain cepted: the use of the pronouns seems to make this impossible, and the content of the letter is inconsistent with that interpretation. If this were true, one could conclude only that Demetrius had discussed the situation with Quinctius and that the latter had urged the former against taking active measures to secure the throne and especially against involving Quinctius in the plot.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

batur [1] et corrupti quidam ut comites itineris essent;
2 maxime falsae litterae T. Quinctii urgebant. Nihil tamen palam gravius pronuntiatum de eo est, ut dolo potius interficeretur, nec id cura ipsius, sed ne
3 poena eius consilia adversus Romanos nudaret. Ab Thessalonice Demetriadem ipsi cum iter esset, Astraeum Paeoniae Demetrium mittit cum eodem comite Dida, Perseum Amphipolin ad obsides
4 Thracum accipiendos. Digredienti ab se Didae
5 mandata dedisse dicitur de filio occidendo. Sacrificium ab Dida seu institutum seu simulatum est, ad quod celebrandum invitatus Demetrius ab Astraeo Heracleam venit. In ea cena dicitur
6 venenum datum. Poculo epoto extemplo sensit, et mox coortis doloribus, relicto convivio cum in cubiculum recepisset sese, crudelitatem patris conquerens, parricidium fratris ac Didae scelus incusans
7 torquebatur. Intromissi deinde Thyrsis quidam Stuberraeus et Beroeaeus [2] Alexander iniectis tape-
8 tibus in caput faucesque spiritum intercluserunt. Ita innoxius adulescens, cum in eo ne simplici quidem genere mortis contenti inimici fuissent, interficitur.

XXV. Dum haec in Macedonia geruntur, L. Aemilius Paulus,[3] prorogato ex consulatu imperio, principio veris in Ligures Ingaunos exercitum [4] introduxit.

[1] arguebatur Gelenius: arguebant ς.
[2] Beroeaeus Sigonius: bereus et similia ς.
[3] Paulus edd. vett.: om. ς.
[4] exercitum edd. vett.: om. ς.

[1] A sacrifice was usually accompanied by a feast.

persons to be his companions on the journey; the B.C. 181 forged letter of Titus Quinctius weighed especially heavily against him. Nevertheless no severe sentence was openly pronounced upon him, in order that he might rather be killed through guile, and this not out of any consideration for him personally, but in order that his punishment might not expose the plans against the Romans. When Philip himself had a journey to make from Thessalonica to Demetrias, he sent Demetrius, accompanied by the same Didas, to Astraeum in Paeonia and Perseus to Amphipolis to receive the Thracian hostages. Instructions regarding the murder of his son are said to have been given by him to Didas as they separated. Didas either held or pretended to hold a sacrifice, and being invited to its celebration Demetrius came from Astraeum to Heraclea, and it was during this dinner that it is said that the poison was administered.[1] Having drained the cup he immediately perceived it, and presently, when his sufferings began and he had retired to his bedroom from the dining-room, complaining of the cruelty of his father and inveighing against the murderous designs of his brother and the crime of Didas, he was being tortured by his agony. Then a certain Thyrsis from Stuberra and Alexander from Beroea were admitted, and putting coverlets over his head and mouth they smothered him. Thus the innocent youth perished, his enemies being not even contented with a single kind of death for him.

XXV. While this was going on in Macedonia, Lucius Aemilius Paulus, whose imperium had been prolonged after his consulship, in the beginning of spring led the army against the Ligurian Ingauni.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

2 Ubi primum in hostium finibus castra posuit, legati ad eum per speciem pacis petendae speculatum venerunt. 3 Neganti Paulo nisi cum deditis pacisci se pacem, non tam id recusabant quam tempore aiebant opus esse, 4 ut generi agresti hominum persuaderetur. Ad hoc decem dierum indutiae cum darentur,[1] petierunt deinde ne trans montes proximos castris pabulatum lignatumque milites irent: culta ea loca suorum 5 finium esse. Id ubi impetravere, post eos ipsos montes unde averterant hostem, exercitu omni coacto, repente multitudine ingenti castra Romanorum oppugnare simul omnibus portis aggressi sunt. 6 Summa vi totum diem oppugnarunt, ita ut ne efferendi quidem signa Romanis spatium nec ad explicandam 7 aciem locus esset. Conferti in portis obstando magis quam pugnando castra tutabantur. Sub occasum solis cum recessissent hostes, duos equites ad Cn.[2] Baebium proconsulem[3] cum litteris Pisas mittit, ut obsesso per indutias sibi quam primum subsidio 8 veniret. Baebius exercitum M. Pinario praetori eunti in Sardiniam tradiderat: ceterum et senatum litteris certiorem fecit[4] obsideri a Liguribus L. 9 Aemilium, et M. Claudio Marcello, cuius proxima inde provincia erat, scripsit ut si videretur ei exercitum e Gallia traduceret in Ligures et L. Aemilium

[1] dec. di. ind. cum darentur σ : quum darentur induciae M.
[2] Cn. Glareanus : m. σ.
[3] proconsulem Sigonius : consulem σ.
[4] fecit σ : facit M.

As soon as he had encamped in the enemy's country, B.C. 181 ambassadors came to him to spy, although under the guise of seeking peace. When Paulus said that he did not negotiate for peace except with people who had surrendered, they did not so much refuse to negotiate as say that they needed time to persuade a rude agricultural tribe. When a truce for ten days was granted for this purpose, they then asked that the soldiers should not cross the mountains nearest the camp in quest of forage and wood: these, they said, were the cultivated parts of their territory. When they obtained this, they massed their whole army under cover of those very mountains from which they had kept the enemy, and suddenly with a vast host advanced to attack the Roman camp at all the gates at once. They continued the attack all day with the greatest violence, so that the Romans did not even have the opportunity to carry forth their standards nor any room to develop their line of battle. Having been packed in the gates, they defended the camp more by blocking the entrances than by fighting. When the enemy had retired at sunset, the consul sent two troopers to Gnaeus Baebius the proconsul at Pisa, with dispatches to the effect that he had been besieged during a truce and that Baebius should come to his aid as soon as possible. Baebius had turned his army over to Marcus Pinarius the praetor, who was going to Sardinia: but he informed the senate by letter that Lucius Aemilius was besieged by the Ligurians, and he wrote to Marcus Claudius Marcellus, whose province was nearest to them, that if it seemed wise to him he should march his army from Gaul against the Ligurians and rescue Lucius Aemilius from siege. All these relief

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

10 liberaret obsidione. Haec sera futura auxilia erant. Ligures ad castra postero die redeunt. Aemilius cum et venturos scisset et educere in aciem potuisset, intra vallum suos tenuit, ut extraheret rem in id tempus, quo Baebius cum exercitu venire a Pisis posset.

XXVI. Romae magnam trepidationem litterae
2 Baebii fecerunt, eo maiorem quod paucos post dies Marcellus, tradito exercitu Fabio Romam cum venisset, spem ademit eum qui in Gallia esset exercitum in Ligures posse traduci, quia bellum cum Histris esset prohibentibus coloniam Aquileiam
3 deduci: eo profectum Fabium, neque inde regredi
4 bello inchoato posse. Una, et ea ipsa tardior quam tempus postulabat, subsidii spes erat, si consules maturassent in provinciam ire. Id ut facerent, pro
5 se quisque patrum vociferari. Consules nisi confecto dilectu negare se ituros,[1] nec suam segnitiem sed vim morbi in causa esse quo serius perficeretur.
6 Non tamen potuerunt sustinere consensum senatus, quin paludati exirent et militibus quos conscriptos haberent, diem edicerent quo Pisas convenirent. Permissum ut qua irent protinus subitarios milites
7 scriberent ducerentque secum. Et praetoribus Q. Petilio et Q. Fabio imperatum est ut Petilius duas legiones civium Romanorum tumultuarias scriberet

[1] se ituros ed. Frobeniana 1535: esse ituros M: ituros se σ.

---

[1] Cf. XXXI. xiv. 1 and the note.

[2] Fabius Maximus, the praetor peregrinus; the Fabius of sect. 2 above is Fabius Buteo.

[3] These legions resemble the usual urbanae, reserve legions (XXXV. ii. 3 and the note), and are so called in xxviii. 9 below.

measures were destined to be late. The Ligurians B.C. 181 returned the next day to the camp. Although Aemilius had known that they would come and could have drawn his forces out into battle-line, he held his men within the rampart, so as to drag things out until Baebius and his army could arrive from Pisa.

XXVI. At Rome the letter of Baebius caused great consternation, the greater because a few days later, when Marcellus reached Rome after turning his army over to Fabius, he took away the hope that the army which was in Gaul could be marched against the Ligurians, because the war was on with the Histrians, who were interfering with the establishment of the colony at Aquileia: Fabius, he said, had already set out for Histria and could not return now that the war had begun. There was only one hope of assistance, and that requiring more time than the critical situation permitted—the possibility that the consuls should make haste to go to their province. Each of the Fathers on his own account cried out that they should do so. The consuls refused to go unless the levy were complete, saying that it was due not to their sloth but to the violence of the epidemic that the levy was slow in being finished. Nevertheless they could not resist the general sentiment of the senate, and therefore set out in uniform[1] and proclaimed to the soldiers whom they now had levied the day on which they were to muster at Pisa. Authority was granted them to enlist at once and take with them emergency troops wherever they went. Orders were also issued to the praetors Quintus Petilius and Quintus Fabius[2] that Petilius should enroll two emergency[3] legions of Roman citizens et omnes minores quinquaginta annis sacramento rogaret, Fabio, ut sociis Latini nominis quindecim milia peditum, octingentos equites imperaret. 8 Duumviri navales creati C. Matienus et C. Lucretius, navesque iis ornatae sunt, Matienoque, cuius [1] ad Gallicum sinum provincia erat, imperatum est ut classem primo quoque tempore duceret in Ligurum oram, si quo usui esse L. Aemilio atque exercitui eius posset.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

XXVII. Aemilius, postquam nihil usquam auxilii ostendebatur, interceptos credens equites, non ultra 2 differendum ratus quin per se fortunam temptaret, priusquam hostes venirent, qui segnius socordiusque oppugnabant, ad quattuor portas exercitum instruxit ut signo dato simul ex omnibus partibus eruptionem 3 facerent. Quattuor extraordinariis cohortibus duas adiunxit praeposito M. Valerio legato, erumpere 4 praetoria porta [2] iussit. Ad dexteram principalem hastatos legionis primae instruxit; principes ex eadem legione in subsidiis posuit: M. Servilius et 5 L. Sulpicius [3] tribuni militum his praepositi.[4] Tertia legio adversus sinistram principalem portam instructa 6 est. Id tantum mutatum: principes primi et hastati

[1] Matienoque cuius Gelenius: cuiusque ς.
[2] praetoria porta Klenze: extraordinarios (-iis) a porta ς.
[3] M. Servilius et L. Sulpicius ed. Frobeniana 1535: m. seruilium et l. sulpicium ς.
[4] praepositi ed. Frobeniana 1535: praepositis ς.

---

[1] Additional cohorts, not forming part of the legionary organization: cf. XXXIV. xlvii, 3 and the note.
[2] They probably belonged to the sinistra ala: cf. sect. 7 below and the note and XXXI. xxi. 7 and the note.
[3] The rectangular camp was divided into four approximately equal sections by streets parallel to the sides and terminand should administer the oath to all under the age of fifty years, and to Fabius to call upon the allies of the Latin confederacy for fifteen thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry. They elected as duumviri navales Gaius Matienus and Gaius Lucretius and ships were equipped for them, and Matienus, whose district was along the Gallic gulf, was directed to conduct his fleet at the earliest possible moment to the coast of the Ligurians, to see if he could assist Lucius Aemilius and his army in any way. B.C. 181

XXVII. Aemilius, when no sign of relief was in sight anywhere, assuming that his troopers had been captured, decided that he should not wait longer before making trial of fortune for himself, and before the arrival of the enemy, who were conducting the siege rather slowly and half-heartedly, he formed his army at the four gates, so that when the signal was given they might sally forth in all directions at once. To the four attached[1] cohorts he added two[2] under the command of Marcus Valerius the lieutenant, and ordered them to attack from the porta praetoria.[3] At the dextra principalis he placed the hastati[4] of the first legion; the principes of the same legion he posted in reserve. Marcus Servilius and Lucius Sulpicius, tribunes of the soldiers, were in command. The third legion was similarly disposed at the sinistra principalis. This one change was made: the principes were placed in the front line and the hastati in re-ating in gates. The gate facing the enemy was the praetoria, the one opposite it the quaestoria or decumana, on the remaining sides were the dextra and sinistra principalis, right and left from the standpoint of a person facing the enemy.

[4] The hastati, principes and triarii were respectively the first, second and third lines of a legion in battle-formation.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573 in subsidiis locati; Sex. Iulius Caesar et L. Aurelius[1] Cotta tribuni militum huic legioni praepositi sunt. 7 Q. Fulvius Flaccus legatus cum dextera ala ad quaestoriam portam positus; duae cohortes et triarii duarum legionum in praesidio castrorum manere 8 iussi. Omnes portas contionabundus ipse imperator circumiit, et quibuscumque irritamentis poterat iras 9 militum acuebat, nunc fraudem hostium incusans, qui pace petita, indutiis datis, per ipsum indutiarum tempus contra ius gentium ad castra oppugnanda ve- 10 nissent: nunc quantus pudor esset edocens ab Liguribus, latronibus verius quam hostibus iustis, Roma- 11 num exercitum obsideri. "Quo ore quisquam vestrum, si hinc alieno praesidio, non vestra virtute evaseritis, occurret, non dico eis militibus, qui Hannibalem, qui Philippum, qui Antiochum, maxi- 12 mos aetatis nostrae reges ducesque, vicerunt, sed iis qui hos ipsos Ligures aliquotiens pecorum modo fugientes per saltus invios consectati ceciderunt? 13 Quod[2] Hispani, quod[2] Galli, quod[2] Macedones Poenive non audeant, Ligustinus hostis vallum Romanum subit, obsidet ultro et oppugnat, quem scrutantes ante devios saltus abditum et latentem 14 vix inveniebamus." Ad haec consentiens reddebatur militum clamor, nullam militum culpam esse, quibus 15 nemo ad erumpendum signum dedisset, daret

[1] Aurelius ed. Frobeniana 1531 : ualerius ς.
[2] quod (ter) edd. vett. : quid (ter) ς.

[1] This Flaccus was probably the cousin of the Flaccus who was in Spain (i. 2 above). He was praetor in 187 B.C. (XXXVIII. xlii. 4) and replaced his step-father as consul in 180 B.C. (XXXVII. 6 below).

serve; Sextus Julius Caesar and Lucius Aurelius B.C. 181
Cotta, tribunes of the soldiers, commanded this legion. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus[1] his lieutenant was posted with the right squadron at the porta quaestoria; two cohorts[2] and the triarii of the two legions were ordered to guard the camp. The commander in person made the round of the gates to harangue the troops, and with whatever taunts he could find he worked the soldiers up to fighting pitch, now blaming the deceit of the enemy who, after seeking peace and being granted a truce, had come to besiege the camp while the truce was actually in effect, contrary to the law of nations, now showing how shameful it was for a Roman army to be besieged by Ligurians, brigands rather than regular soldiers. "With what face will any of you," he went on, "if you escape from here under the protection of anyone else and not by your own valour, meet, I shall not say those soldiers who conquered Hannibal, Philip, Antiochus, the greatest kings and commanders of our time, but those by whom these same Ligurians have so often, as they fled like sheep through pathless glades, been pursued and slaughtered? A thing that Spaniards, Gauls, Macedonians or Carthaginians did not dare to do a Ligurian enemy now does—advances against a Roman rampart, of their own accord besets and besieges it: an enemy whom, before this, we could scarcely discover, as they lurked and skulked, while we searched hidden defiles." The answer to this was a general shout from the troops, that the soldiers were not to blame since no one had given them the order to sally forth: let him

[2] They must also have belonged to the sinistra ala, but six of its cohorts are not accounted for here.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

signum: intellecturum eosdem qui antea fuerint et Romanis et Ligures esse.

XXVIII. Bina cis montes castra Ligurum erant. 2 Ex iis primis diebus sole orto pariter omnes compositi et instructi procedebant; tum nisi exsatiati cibo vinoque arma non capiebant, dispersi inordinati exibant, ut quibus prope [1] certum esset hostes extra 3 vallum non elaturos signa. Adversus ita incompositos eos venientes clamore pariter omnium qui in castris erant, calonum quoque et lixarum sublato 4 simul omnibus portis Romani eruperunt. Liguribus adeo improvisa res fuit ut perinde ac si insidiis circum- 5 venti forent trepidarent. Exiguum temporis aliqua forma pugnae fuit: fuga deinde effusa et fugientium [2] passim caedes erat, equitibus dato signo ut conscenderent equos nec effugere quemquam sinerent. In castra omnes trepida fuga compulsi sunt, deinde 6 ipsis exuti castris. Supra quindecim milia Ligurum eo die occisa, capti duo milia et trecenti.[3] Triduo post Ligurum Ingaunorum nomen omne obsidibus 7 datis in dicionem venit. Gubernatores nautaeque conquisiti, qui in praedatoriis [4] fuissent navibus, atque omnes in custodiam coniecti. Et a C. Matieno duumviro naves eius generis in Ligustina ora triginta duae 8 captae sunt. Haec qui nuntiarent litterasque ad senatum ferrent, L. Aurelius Cotta C. Sulpicius Gallus

[1] prope Muretus: pro se ζ.
[2] et fugientium edd. vett.: effugientium ζ.
[3] trecenti Madvig: trecenti tres M: quingenti ζ.
[4] in praedatoriis Crévier: praedatores ζ.

give the signal and he would soon learn that both Romans and Ligurians were the same as they had been before. B.C. 181

XXVIII. The Ligurians had two camps on this side of the mountains. Formerly, all alike used to come forth from them at sunrise, formed and arrayed for battle; but later on they did not take up arms until they had their fill of food and wine, and then they went out scattered and disorganized, like men who were practically certain that the enemy would not bring out their standards before the rampart. Against an enemy advancing in such disorder, a shout being raised at one time by all who were in the camp, attendants and sutlers alike, the Roman soldiers burst from all the gates at once. The attack was so complete a surprise to the Ligurians that they were as frightened as if they had fallen into an ambush. For a brief period there was something resembling a battle: then there was headlong flight and the slaughter of fugitives all around, the signal having been given to the cavalry that they should mount their horses and permit no one to escape. All were driven in terrified rout into the camps and then stripped of their camps as well. More than fifteen thousand of the Ligurians were killed that day and two thousand three hundred captured. Three days later the whole people of the Ligurian Ingauni gave hostages and surrendered. The pilots and sailors who had been on their pirate ships were sought out and all put in confinement. And Gaius Matienus the duumvir captured thirty-two ships of this kind on the Ligurian coast. To take this news and carry dispatches to the senate, Lucius Aurelius Cotta and Gaius Sulpicius Gallus were sent to Rome, a.u.c. 573 Romam missi, simulque peterent ut L. Aemilio confecta provincia decedere et deducere secum milites liceret atque dimittere. Utrumque permissum ab senatu et supplicatio ad omnia pulvinaria per triduum decreta, iussique praetores Petilius urbanas dimittere legiones, Fabius sociis atque nomini Latino remittere dilectum; et ut praetor urbanus consulibus scriberet senatum aequum censere subitarios milites, tumultus causa conscriptos, primo quoque tempore dimitti.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

XXIX. Colonia Graviscae [1] eo anno deducta est in agrum Etruscum, de Tarquiniensibus quondam captum. Quina iugera agri data; tresviri deduxerunt C. Calpurnius Piso P. Claudius Pulcher C. Terentius Istra. Siccitate et inopia frugum insignis annus fuit. Sex menses numquam pluvisse memoriae [2] proditum.

Eodem anno in agro L. Petilii scribae sub Ianiculo, dum cultores agri altius moliuntur terram, duae lapideae arcae, octonos ferme pedes longae, quaternos latae, inventae sunt, operculis plumbo devinctis. Litteris Latinis Graecisque utraque arca inscripta [3] erat, in altera Numam Pompilium Pomponis filium, regem Romanorum, sepultum esse, in altera libros Numae Pompilii inesse. Eas arcas cum ex amicorum sententia dominus aperuisset, quae titulum sepulti

[1] Graviscae ed. Parisina 1510: crauis aut grauis ς.
[2] memoriae ed. Frobeniana 1535: memoria ς.
[3] inscripta edd. vett.: scripta ς.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. l. 3. Paulus is beginning a campaign for a triumph.

with instructions also to ask that Lucius Aemilius, B.C. 181 having accomplished the task assigned him as his province, should be permitted to leave it and to bring his soldiers back with him and discharge them.[1] Both requests were granted by the senate, and a three-day period of thanksgiving was decreed at all the banquet-tables of the gods, and the praetor Petilius was instructed to discharge the reserve legions, the praetor Fabius to discontinue the levy among the allies of the Latin confederacy; and it was ordered that the praetor urbanus should write to the consuls that the senate deemed it proper that they should discharge the temporary troops, which had been drafted because of the emergency, at the earliest possible moment.

XXIX. A colony at Gravisca was founded this year in Etruscan territory, which had once been taken from the people of Tarquinii. Five iugera of land were given each colonist; the board of three who founded it consisted of Gaius Calpurnius Piso, Publius Claudius Pulcher, Gaius Terentius Istra. Drought and crop failures made the year remarkable. For six months, as the story goes, it did not rain at all.

The same year, on the land of Lucius Petilius, a public clerk, at the foot of the Janiculan, while husbandmen were digging up the ground to a greater depth than usual, two stone chests were found, each about eight feet long and four broad, with the lids fastened with lead. Each chest had an inscription, in Latin and Greek letters: one to the effect that Numa Pompilius, the son of Pompo, king of the Romans, was buried there, the other, that the books of Numa Pompilius were inside. When, on the advice of his friends, the owner had opened the chests, the regis habuerat, inanis inventa, sine vestigio ullo corporis humani aut ullius rei, per tabem tot annorum 6 omnibus absumptis. In altera duo fasces candelis involuti septenos habuere libros, non integros modo 7 sed recentissima specie. Septem Latini de iure pontificum erant, septem Graeci de disciplina sapi- 8 entiae quae illius aetatis esse potuit. Adicit Antias Valerius Pythagoricos fuisse, volgatae opinioni, qua creditur Pythagorae auditorem fuisse Numam, 9 mendacio probabili accommodata fide.[1] primo ab amicis qui in re praesenti fuerunt libri lecti; mox pluribus legentibus cum volgarentur, Q. Petilius praetor urbanus studiosus legendi libros eos a L. Pe- 10 tilio sumpsit: et erat familiaris usus, quod scribam 11 quaestor Q. Petilius in decuriam legerat. Lectis rerum summis cum animadvertisset pleraque dissol-

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

[1] accommodata fide Gelenius: accommodat fidem ς.

[1] Numa was regarded as the source of the pontificial law.

[2] The obvious meaning is that the system expounded was simple and practical rather than theoretical and academic; but see the next sentence.

[3] Livy himself did not believe this (I. xviii. 4).

[4] Several other accounts of this episode have been preserved indirectly and incompletely: those of Cassius Hemina, Piso and Antias in Pliny (H. N. XIII. 84–87), and of Varro in Augustine (De civitate dei VII. xxxiv). It is reported also by Valerius Maximus (I. i. 12), whose account is based on Livy, and by Plutarch (Numa 22), who quotes Antias as his source. These accounts differ as to the number of books found: Piso says seven, Antias twelve, while Hemina (the numeral III sometimes given is a conjecture, rejected by Jan-Mayhoff and by Peter) and Varro do not mention the number. This offers a faint suggestion that Livy followed Piso here, although he agrees rather with Antias as to the contents of the book. Unfortunately Pliny does not relate the whole episode, so that a thorough-going comparison of Livy with the older writers is impossible.

one which carried the inscription about the buried king was found empty, with no trace of a human body or anything else, everything having been destroyed by the wasting action of so many years. In the other were two bundles, tied with waxed rope, containing seven books each, not merely whole, but looking absolutely fresh. The seven Latin books dealt with pontifical law,[1] the seven Greek with a system of philosophy which might have been current at that time.[2] Valerius Antias adds that they were Pythagorean, confirmation of the common belief, which says that Numa was a pupil of Pythagoras,[3] being arranged by a plausible invention.[4] The books were at first read by the friends who were present; soon, after others had read them and they were becoming generally known, Quintus Petilius, the praetor urbanus, desiring to read the books, borrowed them from Lucius Petilius; and there was an acquaintance between them because Quintus Petilius when quaestor had chosen the other as a clerk on his staff.[5] When, on reading the important contents, he had observed that much of it was subversive of religion,[6] B.C. 181

[5] The scribae publici comprised a distinct class of more or less permanent civil servants who did the clerical work in the administrative offices. This sentence may mean rather that Q. Petilius had secured for L. Petilius his appointment as a scriba publicus and therewith his assignment to a decuria, which was the unit of organization of the scribae as a class.

[6] This characterization seems to be inconsistent with the accepted and the rejected accounts of them in sects. 7–8 above. The Bacchanalian affair had made the Romans unusually sensitive about the preservation of the native religion the hold of which on the people was manifestly weakening. Curiously, however, the pontiffs were not consulted, and only a lay opinion as to the nature of these books was sought.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

vendarum religionum esse, L. Petilio dixit sese libros eos in ignem coniecturum esse; priusquam id faceret, se ei permittere uti si quod seu ius seu auxilium se habere ad eos libros repetendos existimaret, exper-12 iretur: id [1] integra sua gratia eum facturum. Scriba tribunos plebis adit, ab tribunis ad senatum res est reiecta. Praetor se [2] iusiurandum dare paratum esse aiebat, libros eos legi servarique non oportere.
13 Senatus censuit satis habendum quod praetor iusiurandum polliceretur; libros primo quoque tempore in comitio cremandos esse; pretium pro libris quantum Q. Petilio praetori maiorique parti tribunorum plebis videretur, domino solvendum esse. Id scriba non 14 accepit. Libri in comitio igne a victimariis facto [3] in conspectu populi cremati sunt.

XXX. Magnum bellum ea aestate coortum in Hispania citeriore. Ad quinque et triginta milia hominum, quantum numquam ferme antea, Celtiberi
2 comparaverant. Q. Fulvius Flaccus eam obtinebat provinciam. Is quia armare iuventutem Celtiberos audierat, et ipse quanta poterat a sociis auxilia contraxerat, sed nequaquam numero militum hostem
3 aequabat. Principio veris exercitum in Carpetaniam

[1] id edd. vett.: om. ς.
[2] se ed. Frobeniana 1535: ei aut eis aut eius ς.
[3] igne a victimariis facto Gelenius: ignea uictima his facta ς.

---

[1] In other words, the praetor would countenance an appeal for the auxilium of the tribunes if the scribe considered that he was suffering the confiscation of legally-held property.

[2] Valerius Maximus says that the Latin books were spared. Livy and all the other authorities seem to think that both Latin and Greek books were burned.

he told Lucius Petilius that he intended to throw B.C. 181 those books into the fire; before he did this he gave the scribe permission to try to see if he thought that he had any legal right or possibility of assistance,[1] if he preferred, to recover those books: he himself would take no offence at such action. The scribe went to the tribunes of the people and by them the case was referred to the senate. The praetor said that he was prepared to give his oath that the books ought not to be read or preserved. The senate voted that it seemed sufficient that the praetor promised the oath; that the books should be burned as soon as possible in the comitium; that compensation for the books, whatever seemed proper to Quintus Petilius the praetor and the majority of the tribunes of the people, should be paid to their owner. This the scribe did not accept. The books[2] were burned in the comitium in sight of the people, the fire having been supplied by the victimarii.[3]

XXX. A great war broke out that summer in Nearer Spain.[4] The Celtiberians had mobilized about thirty-five thousand men, a greater number, almost, than ever before. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus was governor of this province. Because he had heard that the Celtiberians were arming their young men, he too had brought in from the allies as many auxiliaries as possible, but by no means equalled the enemy in number of men. In the beginning of spring he led

[3] In later times the victimarii assisted priests and magistrates at sacrifices; it is not known whether they functioned thus in the time under discussion. Their participation here, whatever their official status was, makes the destruction of the books appear as a formal act of sacrifice.

[4] The narrative broken off at xvi. 11 above is resumed.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

duxit et castra locavit ad oppidum Aeburam, modico praesidio in urbe posito. Paucis post diebus Celtiberi 4 milia duo fere inde sub colle posuerunt castra. Quos ubi adesse praetor Romanus sensit, M. Fulvium fratrem cum duabus turmis sociorum equitum ad castra hostium speculatum misit, quam proxime succedere ad vallum iussum[1] ut viseret quanta essent;
5 pugna abstineret reciperetque sese, si hostium equitatum exeuntem vidisset. Ita ut praeceptum erat fecit. Per dies aliquot nihil ultra motum quam ut hae duae turmae ostenderentur, deinde subducerentur, ubi equitatus hostium castris procucurrisset.
6 Postremo Celtiberi, simul omnibus copiis peditum equitumque castris egressi, acie derecta medio fere
7 spatio inter bina castra constiterunt. Campus erat planus omnis et aptus pugnae. Ibi stetere Hispani hostes expectantes. Romanus suos intra vallum continuit. Per quadriduum continuum et illi eodem
8 loco aciem instructam tenuerunt et ab[2] Romanis nihil motum. Inde quievere in castris Celtiberi, quia pugnae copia non fiebat: equites tantum in stationem egrediebantur, ut parati essent si quid ab hoste
9 moveretur. Pone castra utrique pabulatum et lignatum ibant, neutri alteros impedientes.

XXXI. Praetor Romanus ubi satis tot dierum quiete credidit spem factam hosti nihil se priorem

[1] quam . . . iussum ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. ς.
[2] et ab Madvig: ab ς.

the army into Carpetania and fixed his camp near the B.C. 181 town of Aebura, leaving a small garrison in the town. A few days later the Celtiberians encamped about two miles away, at the foot of a hill. When the Roman praetor became aware of their arrival, he sent his brother Marcus Fulvius with two troops of allied cavalry to reconnoitre toward the camp of the enemy, with orders to approach as closely as possible to the rampart so as to ascertain how large the camp was; he was to avoid a battle and to withdraw if he saw the hostile cavalry coming out. He acted just as he was ordered. For several days there was no movement beyond the fact that these two troops showed themselves and were then withdrawn when the enemy's cavalry had rushed out of the camp. Finally the Celtiberians, leaving the camp with their entire force of infantry and cavalry, took their position in a straight line about half-way across the plain which was between the two camps. The plain was entirely flat and suitable for fighting. There the Spaniards stood waiting for the enemy. The Roman kept his men within the rampart. For four days in succession they on their side held their line in formation on the same ground; the Romans, on their side, made no move. Then the Celtiberians rested in camp, because they had no opportunity to fight: only the cavalry rode out to the outguards, so as to be ready if any move should be made by the enemy. Both armies went to the rear of their camps for forage and wood, neither interfering with the other.

XXXI. The Roman praetor, when he was well assured that the inaction of so many days had created in the enemy the expectation that the Romans

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

moturum, L. Acilium cum ala sinistra et sex milibus provincialium auxiliorum circumire montem iubet
2 qui ab tergo hostibus erat; inde ubi clamorem audisset, decurrere ad castra eorum. Nocte profecti
3 sunt ne possent conspici. Flaccus luce prima C. Scribonium praefectum socium ad vallum hostium cum equitibus extraordinariis sinistrae alae mittit;
4 quos ubi et propius accedere et plures quam soliti erant, Celtiberi conspexerunt, omnis equitatus effunditur castris, simul et peditibus signum ad exeundum
5 datur. Scribonius, uti praeceptum erat, ubi primum fremitum equestrem [1] audivit, avertit equos et castra
6 repetit. Eo effusius sequi hostes. Primo equites, mox et peditum acies aderat, haud dubia spe castra eo die se expugnaturos.[2] Quingentos passus non plus
7 a vallo aberant. Itaque Flaccus ubi satis abstractos [3] eos a praesidio castrorum suorum ratus est, intra vallum exercitu instructo tribus partibus simul erumpit, clamore non tantum ad ardorem pugnae excitandum [4] sublato, sed etiam ut qui in montibus
8 erant exaudirent. Nec morati sunt quin decurrerent, sicut imperatum erat, ad castra; ubi quinque milium armatorum non amplius relictum erat prae-
9 sidium. Quos cum et paucitas sua et multitudo hostium et improvisa res terruisset, prope sine certamine capiuntur castra. Captis,[5] quae pars

[1] equestrem Gronovius: equestrium ς.
[2] expugnaturos Gronovius: oppugnaturos ς.
[3] abstractos edd. vett.: om. ς.
[4] pugnae excitandum ed. Frobeniana 1535: excitandum pugnae ς.
[5] captis Madvig: castris ς.

would not take the initiative, ordered Lucius Acilius B.C. 181 with the left squadron and six thousand auxiliaries from the province to march around the hill which was in the rear of the enemy; thence, when he should have heard the shout, he was to rush down on the camp. They set out at night that they might not be seen. At daybreak Flaccus sent Gaius Scribonius, a commander of allies, with the attached cavalry of the left squadron, up to the rampart of the enemy; when the Celtiberians saw both that they came nearer and that they were more numerous than usual, all their cavalry poured out of the camp, and at the same time the signal was given to the infantry also to march out. Scribonius, as he had been ordered, as soon as he heard the first din of the cavalry, turned his horses and retired to the camp. The more headlong was the pursuit of the enemy. At first the cavalry and soon after the line of the infantry was at hand, possessed by the assured hope that they would capture the camp that day. They were not more than five hundred paces from the rampart. And so Flaccus, when he saw that they had been drawn far enough away from the protection of their camp, having formed his army inside the rampart, sallied out in three columns at once, raising a shout not only to increase their own ardour for fighting, but also that the detachment which was in the mountains might hear it. Nor did they delay to rush down upon the camp as they had been ordered; not more than five thousand men had been left there as a guard. Since their own small number and the great number of the enemy and the unexpectedness of the attack had thrown them into a panic, the camp was taken almost without a struggle. When it was captured,

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573 maxime a[1] pugnantibus conspici poterat, iniecit Acilius ignem.

XXXII. Postremi Celtiberorum qui in acie erant, primi flammam conspexere, deinde per totam aciem vulgatum est castra amissa esse et tum cum maxime ardere.[2] Unde illis terror, inde Romanis animus 2 crevit. Iam clamor suorum vincentium accidebat,[3] 3 iam ardentia hostium castra apparebant. Celtiberi parumper incertis animis fluctuati sunt: ceterum postquam receptus pulsis nullus erat nec usquam nisi in certamine spes, pertinacius de integro capes- 4 sunt pugnam. Acie media urgebantur acriter a quinta legione: adversus laevum cornu, in quo sui generis provincialia auxilia instruxisse Romanos cernebant, cum maiore fiducia intulerunt signa. 5 Iam prope erat ut sinistrum cornu pelleretur Romanis, ni septima legio successisset. Simul ab oppido Aebura qui in praesidio relicti erant, in medio ardore 6 pugnae advenerunt, et Acilius ab tergo erat. Diu in medio caesi Celtiberi: qui supererant in omnes passim partes capessunt fugam. Equites bipartito in eos emissi magnam caedem edidere. Ad viginti tria milia hostium eo die[4] occisa, capta quattuor milia septingenti[5] cum equis plus[6] quingentis et 7 signa militaria octoginta octo. Magna victoria non tamen incruenta fuit: Romani milites de duabus legionibus paulo plus ducenti, socium Latini nominis

[1] a edd. vett.: om. ς.
[2] ardere Gelenius: arderent ς.
[3] accidebat Gelenius: accendebat ς.
[4] eo die ς: om. M.
[5] septingenti ς: ducenti M.
[6] equis plus ς: equitibus M.

Acilius ordered fire to be set to it in the place which could be best seen by the fighters. B.C. 181

XXXII. The rear ranks of the Celtiberians who were in the line of battle were the first to see the flames, and then the word spread through the whole line that the camp was lost and was at that very moment in flames. What inspired terror in them increased the courage of the Romans. Now the shouts of their victorious comrades were falling upon their ears, now the blazing camp of the enemy was in sight. The Celtiberians for a while wavered in uncertainty of mind: but since there was no retreat if they were defeated nor any hope anywhere except in battle, they renewed the contest with greater stubbornness. In the centre of the line they were hard pressed by the fifth legion; against the left flank, on which they saw that the Romans had posted the provincial auxiliaries of their own race, they advanced with greater confidence. And now the Roman left was almost being driven back, and would have been had not the seventh legion come to its assistance. At the same time those who had been left on guard in the town of Aebura came up in the very heat of the fight, and Acilius from the rear was drawing near. For a long time the Celtiberians were cut down between them; those who survived sought flight in every direction. The cavalry, sent out in two columns to pursue them, caused great slaughter. About twenty-three thousand of the enemy were killed that day, four thousand seven hundred captured, with more than five hundred horses and eighty-eight military standards. The victory was great but yet not bloodless: of Roman soldiers of the two legions, a little more than two hundred,

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

octingenti triginta, externorum auxiliarium ferme duo 8 milia et quadringenti ceciderunt. Praetor in castra victorem exercitum reduxit, Acilius manere in captis ab se castris iussus. Postero die spolia de hostibus lecta, et pro contione donati quorum virtus insignis fuerat.

XXXIII. Sauciis deinde in oppidum Aeburam devectis per Carpetaniam ad Contrebiam ductae
2 legiones. Ea urbs circumsessa cum a Celtiberis auxilia arcessisset, morantibus iis, non quia ipsi cunctati sunt, sed quia profectos domo inexplicabiles continuis imbribus viae et inflati amnes tenebant, desperato auxilio suorum in deditionem venit.
3 Flaccus quoque tempestatibus foedis coactus exer-
4 citum omnem in urbem introduxit. Celtiberi, qui profecti erant a domo deditionis ignari, cum tandem superatis, ubi primum imbres remiserunt, amnibus Contrebiam venissent, postquam nulla castra extra moenia viderunt, aut in alteram partem translata rati aut recessisse hostes, per neglegentiam effusi ad
5 oppidum accesserunt. In eos duabus portis Romani eruptionem fecerunt et incompositos adorti fuderunt.
6 Quae res ad resistendum eos et ad capessendam pugnam impediit, quod non uno agmine nec ad signa frequentes veniebant, eadem magnae parti ad fugam 7 saluti fuit : sparsi enim toto passim campo se diffuof the allies of the Latin confederacy, eight hundred B.C. 181 and thirty, of the auxiliaries from the province, about twenty-four hundred fell. The praetor led the victorious army back into camp, ordering Acilius to remain in the camp of the enemy. On the following day the spoils of the enemy were collected and before an assembly those whose valour had been conspicuous were rewarded.

XXXIII. Having transported the wounded to the town of Aebura, he led the legions through Carpetania toward Contrebia. When this town, on being besieged, had asked aid from the Celtiberians and they were slow in coming, not because they dawdled, but because after they had left home they were held up by roads made impassable by continuous rains and by swollen rivers, despairing of assistance from its friends, it surrendered. Flaccus, too, having been driven to do so by dire storms, led his whole army into the city. The Celtiberians, who had set out from home in ignorance of the surrender, when they had at last arrived at Contrebia after crossing the rivers as soon as the rains ceased, seeing no camp outside the walls and concluding that the enemy had either gone around to the other side or retired, carelessly approached the town in scattered bodies. The Romans made a sally against them from two gates and attacking them while they were in disorder put them to flight. The circumstance which hampered their resisting and standing up to the fight, namely, that they were not advancing in one column or with large numbers grouped in formation around the standards, was itself the cause of safety for the majority in the flight: for scattered as they were anyhow over the whole plain, they broke up into groups

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

derunt, nec usquam [1] confertos eos hostis circumvenit. Tamen ad duodecim milia sunt caesa, capta plus quinque milia hominum, equi quadringenti, signa militaria 8 sexaginta duo. Qui palati [2] e fuga domum se recipiebant, alterum agmen venientium Celtiberorum deditionem Contrebiae et suam cladem narrando averterunt. Extemplo in vicos castellaque sua
9 omnes dilapsi. Flaccus a Contrebia profectus per Celtiberiam populabundus ducit legiones multa castella expugnando, donec maxima pars Celtiberorum in deditionem venit.

XXXIV. Haec in citeriore Hispania eo anno gesta. In ulteriore Manlius [3] praetor secunda aliquot proelia cum Lusitanis fecit.
2 Aquileia colonia Latina eodem anno in agrum [4] Gallorum est deducta. Tria milia peditum quinquagena iugera, centuriones [5] centena, centena
3 quadragena equites acceperunt. Tresviri deduxerunt P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica C. Flaminius L. Manlius
4 Acidinus. Aedes duae eo anno dedicatae sunt, una Veneris Erycinae ad portam Collinam: dedicavit L. Porcius L. F. Licinus duumvir, vota erat a consule L. Porcio Ligustino bello, altera in foro holitorio

[1] usquam ς: unquam M.
[2] qui palati ed. Frobeniana 1535: quidam latini qui ς.
[3] manlius ς: m. manlius M. [4] agrum Doering: agro ς.
[5] centuriones Gelenius: centurionibus ς.

[1] Usually centurions are not considered separately, and the ratio of the allotments differs: cf. XXXV. ix. 8 etc. The colony is populous and the allotments large because of its strategic position and the danger from Gauls and Histrians.
[2] For their appointment see XXXIX. lv. 6.
[3] Cf. XXX. xxxviii. 10. The vow has not been mentioned, but the senior Porcius was in Liguria in 184 B.C. (XXXIX. xxxviii. 1).

and fled, and nowhere did the enemy surround a compact mass. Nevertheless about twelve thousand were killed, more than five thousand men captured, with four hundred horses and sixty-two military standards. Those who came straggling home after their rout, by describing the surrender of Contrebia and their own disaster, prevented the departure of another force of Celtiberians who were coming. All immediately dispersed to their villages and strongholds. Flaccus, setting out from Contrebia on a raid, led the legions through Celtiberia, capturing many forts, until the greatest part of the Celtiberians had surrendered. B.C. 181

XXXIV. These were the events of this year in Nearer Spain. In the farther province the praetor Manlius won several victories over the Lusitanians.

The Latin colony of Aquileia was founded the same year in the territory of the Gauls. Three thousand infantry received fifty iugera each, centurions one hundred, cavalry one hundred and forty.[1] The commissioners who founded the colony were Publius Cornelius Scipio Nasica, Gaius Flaminius, Lucius Manlius Acidinus.[2] Two temples were dedicated that year, the first to Venus Erycina,[3] near the Porta Collina; Lucius Porcius Licinus, the son of Lucius, as duumvir dedicated it, and it had been vowed by Lucius Porcius the consul in the Ligurian war; the second to Pietas[4] in the Forum Olitorium. This [4] Livy does not mention the romantic story told by Festus (p. 209), that the temple occupied the site of the house of a woman quae patrem suum (i.e., of the Glabrio who vowed the temple) inclusum carcere mammis suis clam aluerit; Valerius Maximus (V. iv. 7) and Pliny (H. N. VII. 121) differ slightly.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

5 Pietatis. Eam aedem dedicavit M'. Acilius Glabrio duumvir; statuamque auratam, quae prima omnium in Italia statua aurata est, patris Glabrionis posuit. 6 Is erat qui ipse eam aedem [1] voverat, quo die cum rege Antiocho ad Thermopylas depugnasset, locaveratque idem ex senatus consulto.

7 Per eosdem dies quibus aedes hae dedicatae sunt, L. Aemilius Paulus proconsul ex Liguribus Ingaunis 8 triumphavit. Transtulit coronas aureas quinque [2] et viginti, nec praeterea quicquam auri argentique in eo triumpho latum. Captivi multi principes Ligurum ante currum ducti. Aeris trecenos militibus divisit. 9 Auxerunt eius triumphi famam legati Ligurum pacem perpetuam orantes: ita in animum induxisse Ligurum gentem, nulla umquam arma nisi imperata 10 a populo Romano sumere. Responsum a Q. Fabio praetore est Liguribus iussu senatus orationem eam non novam Liguribus esse: mens vero ut nova et orationi conveniens esset, ipsorum id plurimum 11 referre. Ad consules irent, et quae ab iis imperata essent facerent. Nulli alii quam consulibus senatum crediturum esse sincera fide in pace Ligures esse. 12 Pax in Liguribus fuit. In Corsica pugnatum cum Corsis: ad duo milia eorum M. Pinarius praetor in acie occidit. Qua clade compulsi obsides dederunt

[1] aedem σ: om. M. [2] quinque σ: mille M.

---

[1] Valerius Maximus (II. v. 1) says that it was an equestrian statue.

[2] Neither vow nor contract has been mentioned before.

temple was dedicated by Manius Acilius Glabrio B.C. 181
as duumvir: a gilded statue, which was the first of all gilded statues in Italy, he set up there to his father Glabrio.[1] It was the latter who had vowed this temple on the day he had fought decisively with King Antiochus at Thermopylae, and he had also let the contract under the authority of the senate.[2]

About the same time that these temples were dedicated, Lucius Aemilius Paulus the proconsul triumphed over the Ligurian Ingauni. He carried in his triumph twenty-five golden crowns, but no other gold or silver was displayed. Many chiefs of the Ligurians as prisoners walked before his car. His donatives to his troops amounted to three hundred asses each.[3] The glamour of the triumph was increased by the arrival of envoys from the Ligurians who asked for perpetual peace; the Ligurian people, they said, had made up their minds never to take up arms except at the command of the Roman people. Quintus Fabius the praetor, by order of the senate, answered the Ligurians to the effect that this declaration on the part of the Ligurians was nothing new; but it was of the greatest importance to themselves that they should acquire a new disposition, consistent with their words. They should go to the consuls and do whatever was ordered by them. The senate, he said, would believe a statement from no one except the consuls that the Ligurians were at peace in genuine good faith. There was peace among the Ligurians. In Corsica there was a battle with the Corsicans: the praetor Marcus Pinarius killed about two thousand of them in pitched battle. Under the compulsion of this disaster, they

[3] The money apparently came out of the treasury.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 573

13 et cerae centum milia pondo. Inde in Sardiniam exercitus ductus, et cum Iliensibus, gente ne nunc quidem omni parte pacata, secunda proelia facta. 14 Carthaginiensibus eodem anno centum obsides redditi, pacemque iis [1] populus Romanus non ab se tantum sed ab rege etiam Masinissa praestitit, qui cum praesidio armato agrum qui in controversia erat obtinebat.

XXXV. Otiosam provinciam consules habuerunt. M. Baebius comitiorum causa Romam revocatus consules creavit A. Postumium Albinum Luscum et C. 2 Calpurnium Pisonem. Praetores exinde facti Ti. Sempronius Gracchus L. Postumius Albinus P. Cornelius Mammula,[2] Ti.[3] Minucius Molliculus A. Hostilius Mancinus C. Maenius. Ii omnes magistratum idibus Martiis inierunt.

A.U.C. 574

3 Principio eius anni quo A. Postumius Albinus et C. Calpurnius Piso consules fuerunt, ab A. Postumio consule in senatum introducti, qui ex Hispania citeriore venerant a Q. Fulvio [4] Flacco, L. Minucius legatus et duo tribuni militum, T. Maenius et L. 4 Terentius Massiliota. Hi cum duo secunda proelia, deditionem [5] Celtiberiae, confectam provinciam nuntiassent, nec stipendio quod mitti soleret nec frumento

[1] iis Gronovius: cum iis ς.
[2] Mammula Pighius: mamercus ς.
[3] Ti. Sigonius "ex vet. lib.": t ς.
[4] Fulvio ed. Mediolanensis 1480: om. ς.
[5] deditionem ς: in deditionem M.

---

[1] Cf. XLII. vii. 2. Diodorus (V. xiii. 4) speaks of wax as an important part of the wealth of the island.

[2] Diodorus (V. xv. 6) says that they retained their freedom μέχρι τῶν καθ' ἡμᾶς χρόνων, "up to our own times."

[3] According to XXX. xxxvii. 6 they gave only one hundred hostages and in XXXII. ii. 3 the return of that number is recorded.

gave hostages and a hundred thousand pounds of B.C. 181
wax.[1] Thence Pinarius crossed to Sardinia and fought successfully with the Ilienses, a tribe not even to-day entirely pacified.[2] One hundred hostages the same year were returned to the Carthaginians,[3] and the Roman people kept the peace for them with regard to not only to themselves but also to King Masinissa, who was holding with an armed guard the land which was in dispute.[4]

XXXV. The consuls had a quiet province. Marcus Baebius, who had been recalled to Rome to hold the elections, announced the choice as consuls of Aulus Postumius Albinus Luscus and Gaius Calpurnius Piso. Next the praetors were elected, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, Lucius Postumius Albinus, Publius Cornelius Mammula, Tiberius Minucius Molliculus, Aulus Hostilius Mancinus, Gaius Maenius. All these magistrates were inaugurated on the Ides of March.

In the beginning of this year, the consular year of B.C. 180
Aulus Postumius Albinus and Gaius Calpurnius Piso, the consul Aulus Postumius presented to the senate Lucius Minucius, a lieutenant, and two tribunes of the soldiers, Titus Maenius and Lucius Terentius Massiliota, who had come from Quintus Fulvius Flaccus in Nearer Spain. When they had reported the two victories, the submission of Celtiberia, and the accomplishment of the task assigned as his province,[5] and had added that there was no

[4] Cf. xvii. 6 above.

[5] With each occurrence of the phrase in this connection, we approach more closely the point where we must translate simply "the subjugation of the province" in the territorial sense: cf. sect. 13 below.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

portato ad exercitum in eum annum opus esse, petierunt ab senatu primum, ut ob res prospere gestas diis immortalibus honos haberetur, deinde ut Q.[1] Fulvio decedenti de provincia deportare inde exercitum, cuius forti opera et ipse et multi ante eum praetores usi essent, liceret. Quod fieri, praeterquam quod ita deberet, etiam prope necessarium esse:[2] ita enim obstinatos esse milites ut non ultra retineri posse in provincia viderentur, iniussuque abituri inde essent si non dimitterentur, aut in perniciosam, si quis impense retineret, seditionem exarsuri. Consulibus ambobus provinciam Ligures esse senatus iussit. Praetores inde sortiti sunt: A. Hostilio urbana, Ti. Minucio peregrina obvenit, P. Cornelio Sicilia, C. Maenio Sardinia. Hispanias sortiti L. Postumius ulteriorem, Ti. Sempronius citeriorem. Is quia successurus Q. Fulvio erat, ne vetere exercitu provincia spoliaretur, "quaero" inquit "de te, L. Minuci, cum confectam provinciam nunties, existimesne Celtiberos perpetuo in fide mansuros, ita ut sine exercitu ea provincia obtineri possit. Si neque de fide barbarorum quicquam recipere aut firmare nobis potes et habendum illic utique[3] exercitum censes, utrum tandem auctor senatui sis supplementum in Hispaniam mittendi, ut ii modo quibus emerita stipendia sint milites di-

[1] Q. edd. vett.: c. σ.
[2] esse Gronovius: esset σ.
[3] utique ed. Frobeniana 1531: ut illum σ.

need of the pay which was customarily sent or of the B.C. 180 transportation of grain for the army for that year, they asked the senate, first, that honour should be paid to the immortal gods by reason of these successes and, second, that Quintus Fulvius, on his retirement from the province, should be authorized to bring away the army whose valiant services both he and many praetors before him had enjoyed. In addition to the fact that this was right, it was, they said, even almost necessary that this be done: for the soldiers were so set upon it that it seemed impossible to keep them in the province any longer, and it was probable that they would leave there without orders, if they were not discharged, or, if anyone tried to retain them too strictly, that they would flare up in a dangerous mutiny. The senate decreed to both consuls the Ligurians as their province. Then the praetors cast lots: Aulus Hostilius received the civil jurisdiction, Tiberius Minucius that between citizens and aliens, Publius Cornelius Sicily, Gaius Maenius Sardinia. Lucius Postumius drew the lot for Farther Spain and Tiberius Sempronius for Nearer Spain. Since he was to succeed Quintus Fulvius, in order that his province might not be deprived of the veteran army, " I ask of you, Lucius Minucius," he said, " since you report that the province is subjugated, whether you think that the Celtiberians will keep forever their pledge of loyalty, so that this province can be held without an army. If you can neither undertake nor assert anything to us about the loyalty of the barbarians, and think that under any conditions we must keep an army there, I ask whether you urge the senate to send replacements to Spain, so that only those troops who have completed their terms of service may be

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

12 mittantur, veteribus militibus tirones immisceantur, an deductis de provincia veteribus legionibus novas conscribendi et mittendi, cum contemptum tirocinium etiam mitiores barbaros excitare ad rebellandum 13 possit? Dictu quam re facilius est[1] provinciam ingenio ferocem, rebellatricem confecisse. Paucae civitates, ut quidem ego audio, quas vicina maxime hiberna premebant, in ius dicionemque venerunt; 14 ulteriores in armis sunt. Quae cum ita sint, ego iam hinc praedico, patres conscripti, me exercitu eo qui nunc est rem publicam administraturum: si deducat secum Flaccus legiones, loca pacata me ad hibernacula lecturum neque novum militem ferocissimo hosti obiecturum."

XXXVI. Legatus ad ea quae interrogatus erat respondit neque se neque quemquam alium divinare posse quid in animo Celtiberi haberent aut porro 2 habituri essent. Itaque negare non posse quin rectius sit etiam ad pacatos barbaros, nondum satis 3 adsuetos imperio, exercitum mitti. Novo autem an vetere exercitu opus sit, eius esse dicere qui scire possit[2] qua fide Celtiberi in pace mansuri sint, simul et qui illud[3] exploratum habeat quieturos milites, si 4 diutius in provincia retineantur. Si ex eo quod aut inter se loquantur aut succlamationibus apud contionantem imperatorem significent, quid sentiant, coniectandum sit, palam vociferatos esse aut impera-

[1] est Madvig: sit σ.
[2] qui scire possit Gelenius: quo possit σ.
[3] illud Gelenius: illis σ.

discharged and the recruits mingled with the veteran soldiers, or to withdraw the veteran legions from the province and enroll and send over new legions, although an army of recruits, being looked down upon by the enemy, can rouse to rebellion barbarians even more fully tamed than these? It is easier to talk about than to accomplish—this subjugation of a province fierce by nature and rebellious. A few cities, as at least I hear, which the neighbourhood of the winter-quarters kept most completely under control, have come under our rule and sway; the more remote are in arms. Since this is so, conscript Fathers, I declare to you here and now that I shall administer my office with the army that is now there; if Flaccus brings back with him his legions, I shall lead the troops into winter-quarters in pacified districts and shall expose no raw troops to a most warlike enemy." B.C. 180

XXXVI. To the question that had been put to him the lieutenant replied that neither he nor anyone else could predict what the Celtiberians had or would have in mind. Therefore he could not deny that it was entirely proper that an army should be sent to barbarians who, even though pacified, were not yet well accustomed to authority. But whether it was necessary to employ a new or an old army was for him to say who could know how loyally the Celtiberians would abide by the peace and who at the same time could assure himself that the soldiers would remain quiet if they were held longer in the province. If inferences could be drawn as to their views either from what they said to one another or from their exclamations while the commander was addressing them, he said that they had openly proclaimed that they would either keep the com-

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

torem in provincia retenturos aut cum eo in Italiam
5 venturos esse. Disceptationem inter praetorem legatumque consulum relatio interrupit, qui suas ornari provincias priusquam de praetoris exercitu
6 ageretur aequum censebant. Novus omnis exercitus consulibus est decretus, binae legiones Romanae cum suo equitatu, et socium Latini nominis quantus semper numerus, quindecim milia peditum, octin-
7 genti equites. Cum hoc exercitu Apuanis Liguribus ut bellum inferrent, mandatum est. P. Cornelio et M. Baebio prorogatum imperium iussique provincias obtinere donec consules venissent; tum imperatum ut dimisso quem haberent exercitu reverterentur
8 Romam. De Ti. Sempronii deinde exercitu actum est. Novam legionem ei quinque milium et ducentorum peditum cum equitibus quadringentis consules scribere iussi, et mille praeterea peditum Roman-9 orum, quinquaginta equites, et sociis nominis Latini imperare septem milia peditum, trecentos equites.
10 Cum hoc exercitu placuit ire in Hispaniam citeriorem Ti. Sempronium.[1] Q. Fulvio permissum ut, qui milites ante Sp. Postumium Q. Marcium consules cives Romani sociive in Hispaniam transportati essent, et praeterea supplemento adducto, quo amplius in[2] duabus legionibus quam decem milia et quadringenti pedites, sescenti equites essent, et so-

[1] Ti. Sempronium hic coll. ed. Frobeniana 1535, post exercitu ς.
[2] in Pighius: om. ς.

---

[1] The technical term for the equipment and supply of a military force.
[2] This number of Latins was normally provided for each consul.

mander in the province or go to Italy with him. B.C. 180
This colloquy between the praetor and the lieutenant was interrupted by a motion by the consuls, who judged it proper that their provinces should be provided for[1] before the question of an army for a praetor was raised. An entire new army was decreed to the consuls, two Roman legions for each, with the appropriate cavalry, and of the allies of the Latin confederacy, as great a number as always, fifteen thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry.[2] With this army they were directed to make war upon the Ligurian Apuani. The imperium of Publius Cornelius and Marcus Baebius was prolonged, and they were ordered to hold the province until the arrival of the consuls; then it was directed that they discharge the armies which they had and return to Rome. Then the question of an army for Tiberius Sempronius was taken up. The consuls were directed to enlist for him a new legion of fifty-two hundred infantry and four hundred[3] cavalry and in addition a thousand Roman infantry and fifty cavalry, and to levy upon the allies of the Latin confederacy for seven thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry. With this army it was the senate's pleasure that Tiberius Sempronius should go to Nearer Spain. Permission was granted to Quintus Fulvius that those, whether Roman citizens or allies, who had been taken to Spain before the consulship of Spurius Postumius and Quintus Marcius,[4] and, moreover, when the new drafts were added, in consequence of which addition there were in the two legions more than ten thousand four hundred infantry and six hundred cavalry and of the allies

[3] The cavalry contingent is unusually large.
[4] They were consuls in 186 B.C. (XXXIX. viii. 1).

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

11 cium Latini nominis duodecim milia, sescenti[1] equites quorum forti opera duobus adversus Celtiberos proeliis usus Q. Fulvius esset, eos si videretur secum
12 deportaret. Et supplicationes decretae quod is prospere rem publicam gessisset. Et ceteri praetores 13 in provincias missi. Q. Fabio Buteoni prorogatum in Gallia[2] imperium est. Octo legiones praeter exercitum veterem qui in Liguribus in spe propinqua missionis erat eo anno esse placuit. Et is ipse 14 exercitus aegre explebatur propter pestilentiam quae tertium iam annum urbem Romanam atque Italiam vastabat.

XXXVII. Praetor Ti. Minucius et haud ita multo post consul C. Calpurnius moritur, multique alii omnium ordinum illustres viri. Postremo prodigii
2 loco ea clades haberi coepta est. C. Servilius pontifex maximus piacula irae deum conquirere iussus decemviri libros inspicere, consul Apollini Aesculapio Saluti dona vovere et dare signa inaurata; quae
3 vovit deditque. Decemviri supplicationem in biduum valetudinis causa in urbe et per omnia fora conciliabulaque edixerunt;[3] maiores duodecim annis omnes

[1] sescenti ς : mille centum M.
[2] Gallia edd. vett. : galliam ς.
[3] hic desinunt ς edd. vett.: vid. quaeso Praefationem. Hinc inde sigillis Mog. (editio Moguntina); Frob. 31, 35 (editiones Frobenianae 1531, 1535) utar.

---

[1] The sentence is awkward but the general purport is clear. When the old army and the new had been merged, and troops that had been in Spain at least since 187 B.C. had been segregated, any surplus beyond the figures given for the several contingents might be discharged also, priority being given to those who had been decorated or cited in the campaign.

The mutiny here threatened was avoided (xl. 14 below). One may suspect that to win popularity with his troops of the Latin confederacy more than twelve thou- B.C. 180 sand infantry and six hundred cavalry, and specifically those whose valiant services Quintus Fulvius had enjoyed in the two battles with the Celtiberians, that all these,[1] if he saw fit, he should bring back with him. Thanksgivings were also decreed because he had conducted the business of the state successfully. The other praetors too were sent to their provinces. The imperium of Quintus Fabius Buteo in Gaul was prolonged. It was decided that there should be only eight legions that year in addition to the veteran army which was among the Ligurians in the hope of an early discharge. And even this army was with difficulty raised on account of the pestilence which was now for the third year devastating the city of Rome and Italy.[2]

XXXVII. The praetor Tiberius Minucius died and not much later the consul Gaius Calpurnius, and many other distinguished men of all ranks. Finally the disaster came to be regarded as a portent. Gaius Servilius the pontifex maximus was directed to inquire into the manner of averting the wrath of the gods and the decemvirs to look into the Books; the consul was ordered to vow gifts and to give gilded statues to Apollo, Aesculapius and Salus;[3] these he vowed and gave. The decemvirs proclaimed a two-day period of prayer for health, not only in the City but in all the rural settlements and communities; all people above the age of twelve, wearing garlands Flaccus had encouraged the threats of his troops and had tried to bluff the senate with the prospect of a mutiny.

[2] Cf. xix. 3 above.

[3] The combination of Salus with two Greek gods indicates that the Roman Salus is not meant but the Greek Hygieia; the order then probably came from the Sibylline Books.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

coronati et lauream in manu tenentes supplicaverunt. 4 Fraudis quoque humanae insinuaverat suspicio animis; et veneficii quaestio ex senatus consulto, quod in urbe propiusve urbem decem milibus passuum esset commissum, C. Claudio praetori, qui in locum Ti. Minucii erat suffectus, ultra decimum lapidem per fora conciliabulaque C. Maenio, priusquam in Sardiniam provinciam traiceret, decreta. Suspecta consulis 5 erat mors maxime. Necatus a Quarta Hostilia 6 uxore dicebatur. Ut quidem filius eius Q. Fulvius Flaccus in locum vitrici consul est declaratus, aliquanto magis infamis mors Pisonis coepit esse; et testes existebant qui post declaratos consules Albinum et Pisonem, quibus comitiis Flaccus tulerat repulsam, et exprobratum ei a matre[1] dicerent quod iam ei tertium negatus consulatus petenti esset, et adiecisse,[2] pararet se ad petendum: intra duos menses effec- 7 turam ut consul fieret. Inter multa alia testimonia ad causam pertinentia haec quoque vox, nimis vero eventu comprobata, valuit cur Hostilia damnaretur. 8 Veris principio huius, dum consules novos dilectus Romae tenet, mors deinde alterius et creandi comitia 9 consulis in locum eius omnia tardiora fecerunt, interim P. Cornelius et M. Baebius, qui in consulatu nihil memorabile gesserant, in Apuanos Ligures exercitum induxerunt.

[1] exprobatum ei a matre Frob. 31: exprobatam etiam hac re Mog.

[2] adiecisse Frob. 31: adiecisset Mog.

---

[1] The Flaccus of xxvii. 7 above, not his cousin, who was still in Spain.

[2] The dates of the defeats are not recorded, but he was praetor in 187 B.C. Hostilia (or Livy) does not say how she proposed to insure his success the next time.

and carrying laurel branches in their hands, made B.C. 180 the supplication. Moreover, the suspicion that human guilt was to blame had entered men's minds; and the investigation of the poisonings which had taken place in the City or nearer to it than ten miles was, by decree of the senate, entrusted to the praetor Gaius Claudius, who had been chosen to succeed Tiberius Minuicius, and beyond the tenth milestone throughout the rural settlements and communities, to Gaius Maenius before he departed for Sardinia. The death of the consul was especially suspicious. He was said to have been killed by his wife Quarta Hostilia. When indeed her son Quintus Fulvius Flaccus [1] was proclaimed consul in place of his step-father, the death of Piso began to cause many more ugly rumours; and witnesses came forth who said that after Albinus and Piso had been declared consuls at an election in which Flaccus had suffered defeat, Flaccus had been upbraided by his mother because this was now the third time [2] that his candidacy for the consulship had been refused; let him, she had added, prepare to apply again: within two months she would bring it to pass that he should become consul. Among much other testimony bearing on the case, this one speech, being all too well confirmed by the actual result, availed to bring about the conviction of Hostilia.

In the beginning of this spring, while the levy was detaining the new consuls in Rome and then the death of one and the election to choose a new consul in his place had caused delay in all business of state, in the interval Publius Cornelius and Marcus Baebius, who had in their consulship done nothing worth recording, led the army against the Ligurian Apuani.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

XXXVIII. Ligures, qui ante adventum in provinciam consulum non expectassent bellum, improviso oppressi [1] ad duodecim milia hominum dedidernt se. Eos consulto per litteras prius senatu deducere ex montibus in agros campestres procul ab domo, ne reditus spes esset, Cornelius et Baebius statuerunt, nullum alium [2] ante finem rati fore Ligustini belli. Ager publicus populi Romani erat in Samnitibus, qui Taurasinorum fuerat. Eo cum [3] traducere Ligures Apuanos vellent, edixerunt, Ligures Apuani de montibus descenderent [4] cum liberis coniugibusque, sua omnia secum portarent. Ligures saepe per legatos deprecati, ne penates, sedem in qua geniti essent, sepulcra maiorum cogerentur relinquere arma obsides pollicebantur. Postquam nihil impetrabant neque vires ad bellandum erant, edicto paruerunt. Traducti sunt publico sumptu ad quadraginta milia liberorum capitum cum feminis puerisque. Argenti data centum et quinquaginta milia, unde in novas sedes [5] comparent quae opus essent. Agro dividendo dandoque iidem qui traduxerant, Cornelius et Baebius praepositi. Postulantibus tamen ipsis quinqueviri ab senatu dati, quorum ex consilio agerent. Transacta

[1] oppressi Frob. 35 : oppressi sunt Mog.
[2] alium add. Madvig.
[3] fuerat. eo cum Weissenborn : om. Mog.
[4] Apuani de montibus descenderent Muretus : ab Anido montibus descendere Mog.
[5] sedes Crévier : aedes Mog.

---

[1] The denomination (sesterces and not asses) is inferred mainly from argenti.

XXXVIII. The Ligurians, who had not anticipated B.C. 180 a war before the arrival of the consuls in the province, were taken off their guard and surrendered, to the number of about twelve thousand men. First consulting the senate by letter, Cornelius and Baebius determined to move them down from the mountains to lands on the plains, far from home, that there might be no hope of return, thinking that there would be no end to the Ligurian war until this was done. There was public land belonging to the Roman people among the Samnites, which had belonged to the Taurasini. Since they wished to transfer the Ligurian Apuani there, they issued an edict that the Ligurian Apuani should come down from the mountains, bringing their wives and children, and should transport all their property with them. The Ligurians made frequent entreaties through ambassadors that they might not be compelled to leave their household gods, the land in which they had been born, the tombs of their ancestors, and also promised arms and hostages. When they met with no success and lacked the strength to fight, they obeyed the edict. There were transferred at public expense about forty thousand freemen with their women and children. One hundred and fifty thousand sesterces[1] of silver were appropriated, with which they could buy what was necessary for their new homes. For the apportionment of the land and the division of the money, the same Cornelius and Baebius who had made the transfer were appointed.[2] Nevertheless, at their request, a commission of five was named, on whose advice they might act. When, after completing

[1] Pliny (H.N. III. 105) says that these Ligurians were called Corneliani et Baebiani.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

re cum veterem exercitum Romam deduxissent, 9 triumphus ab senatu est decretus. Hi omnium primi nullo bello gesto triumpharunt. Tantum hostiae ductae [1] ante currum, quia nec quod [2] ferretur neque quod duceretur captum neque quod militibus daretur quicquam in triumphis eorum fuerat.

XXXIX. Eodem anno in Hispania Fulvius Flaccus proconsul, quia successor in provinciam tardius veniebat, educto exercitu ex hibernis ulteriorem Celtiberiae agrum, unde ad deditionem non venerant,
2 institit vastare. Qua re irritavit magis quam conterruit animos barbarorum; et clam comparatis copiis saltum Manlianum, per quem transiturum exercitum
3 Romanum satis sciebant, obsederunt. In Hispaniam ulteriorem eunti L. Postumio Albino collegae Gracchus mandaverat ut Q. Fulvium certiorem faceret
4 Tarraconem exercitum adduceret: ibi dimittere [3] veteranos supplementaque distribuere et ordinare omnem exercitum sese velle. Dies quoque, et ea propinqua, edita Flacco est qua successor esset
5 venturus. Haec nova adlata res, omissis [4] quae agere instituerat, Flaccum raptim deducere exercitum ex Celtiberia cum coegisset, barbari causae ignari, suam defectionem et clam comparata arma sensisse eum et pertimuisse rati, eo ferocius saltum insederunt.
6 Ubi eum saltum prima luce agmen Romanum intravit, repente ex duabus partibus simul exorti hostes

[1] hostiae ductae Madvig: hostes ducti Mog.
[2] quod (ter) Pighius: quid (ter) Mog.
[3] dimittere Gronovius: dimitti Mog.
[4] omissis Frob. 31: omissisque Mog.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVII. lx. 6; XXXVIII. xlvii. 5 and the notes.
[2] That is, no booty, prisoners, animals, or money.

this task, they had brought back the veteran army, B.C. 180 a triumph was voted by the senate. They were the first of all to triumph without waging a war.[1] Only the victims were led before the car, since there had been nothing in their triumphs which could be carried, could be led, or could be given to the soldiers.[2]

XXXIX. The same year, in Spain, Fulvius Flaccus the proconsul,[3] because his successor was slow in arriving in the province, led the army out of winter-quarters and began to devastate the remoter regions of Celtiberia whence the inhabitants had not come to surrender. By this act he stirred up rather than terrified the spirits of the barbarians; and secretly massing their forces they blocked the Manlian[4] pass, through which they well knew that the Roman army would march. Gracchus had entrusted to his colleague Lucius Postumius Albinus, who was going to Farther Spain, a message for Quintus Fulvius, instructing him to conduct the army to Tarraco; there he planned to discharge the veterans and assign the replacements and organize the entire army. Also the day, and that quite near, was announced to Flaccus, on which his successor would arrive. The arrival of this news compelled Flaccus, abandoning the plan which he had begun to follow, hastily to lead the army out of Celtiberia, and the barbarians, ignorant of the reason and thinking that he had heard of their revolt and their secret mobilization and was frightened away, on that account occupied the pass more eagerly. When the Roman column at daybreak entered the pass the enemy, suddenly showing

[3] Not the consul of the year; the proper title would be propraetor.

[4] Neither its position nor the reason for its name is known.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

7 Romanos invaserunt. Quod ubi vidit Flaccus, primos tumultus in agmine per centuriones stare omnes, suo
8 quemque loco, et arma expedire iubendo sedavit, et sarcinis iumentisque in unum locum coactis copias omnes partim ipse partim per legatos tribunosque militum, ut tempus, ut locus postulabat, sine ulla 9 trepidatione instruxit, cum bis deditis rem esse [1] admonens, scelus et perfidiam illis, non virtutem nec animum accessisse, reditum ignobilem [2] in patriam clarum ac memorabilem eos sibi fecisse: cruentos ex recenti caede hostium gladios et manantia sanguine spolia Romam ad triumphum delaturos. Plura dici tempus non patiebatur: invehebant se hostes, et in 10 partibus extremis iam pugnabatur. Deinde acies concurrerunt.

XL. Atrox ubique proelium, sed varia fortuna erat. Egregie legiones, nec segnius duae alae pugnabant; externa auxilia ab simili armatura, meliore aliquantum militum genere urgebantur, nec locum
2 tueri poterant. Celtiberi ubi ordinata acie et signis collatis se non esse pares legionibus senserunt, cuneo
3 impressionem fecerunt, quo tantum valent genere pugnae, ut quamcumque partem [3] perculere impetu suo, sustineri nequeant. Tunc quoque turbatae
4 legiones sunt, prope interrupta acies. Quam trepi-

[1] bis deditis rem esse Frob. 35 : vim deditis remisisse Mog.
[2] ignobilem Frob. 31 : nobilem Mog.
[3] quamcumque partem H. J. Mueller : quacumque parte Mog.

---

[1] If the text is right it must mean that the soldiers had one final chance to distinguish themselves. It will be noted that Fulvius still speaks of the army's return to Rome, although he knew something of the plan of Gracchus.

[2] That is, the Latin allies : cf. XXXI. xxi. 7 and the note.

themselves on two sides, attacked the Romans. B.C. 180
When Flaccus saw this he quelled the first excitement in the column by issuing through the centurions orders that all should halt, each in his own place, and should make ready their arms, and having collected the trains and the pack-animals in one place, partly by himself, partly through the lieutenants and tribunes of the soldiers, he formed all the forces in line of battle as the time and the place demanded, without any confusion, reminding them that they had to deal with men who had twice surrendered, that an access of villainy and treachery, not of courage and stoutness of heart, had come to them, and that they furnished the Romans an opportunity to make an ignoble [1] return home glorious and memorable: for they would carry to Rome for the triumph swords bloody with fresh slaughter of the enemy and spoils dripping with gore. The time did not permit him to say more: the enemy was charging and on the extreme flanks the battle was already in progress. Then the battle-lines clashed.

XL. There was a fierce fight on every side, but the results varied. The legions fought nobly and not less effectively the two squadrons; [2] the auxiliaries from the province were hard pressed by men armed in the same way but consisting of a much better class of soldiers, and could not hold their ground. When the Celtiberians saw that with battle-lines arrayed and in pitched battle they were not a match for the legions, they made a thrust with the wedge, in which manner of fighting they are so powerful that against whatever troops they drive their charge they cannot be checked. Then even the legions were thrown into disorder and the line was almost broken. When dationem ubi Flaccus conspexit, equo advehitur ad legionarios equites, et " ni quid [1] auxilii in vobis est, actum iam de hoc exercitu erit." Cum undique acclamassent quin ederet quid fieri vellet: [2] non 5 segniter imperium exsecuturos, " duplicate turmas " inquit, " duarum legionum equites, et permittite equos in cuneum hostium, quo nostros urgent. Id cum maiore vi [3] facietis, si effrenatos in eos equos

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

6 immittitis; quod saepe Romanos equites cum magna
7 laude fecisse sua memoriae proditum est." Dicto paruerunt detractisque frenis bis ultro citroque cum magna strage hostium, infractis omnibus hastis,
8 transcurrerunt. Dissipato cuneo, in quo omnis spes fuerat, Celtiberi trepidare et prope omissa pugna
9 locum fugae circumspicere. Et alarii equites postquam Romanorum equitum tam memorabile facinus videre, et ipsi virtute eorum accensi sine ullius imperio in perturbatos iam hostes equos immittunt.
10 Tunc vero Celtiberi omnes in fugam effunduntur et imperator Romanus aversos hostes contemplatus aedem Fortunae Equestri Iovique optimo maximo
11 ludos vovit. Caeduntur Celtiberi per totum saltum dissipati fuga. Decem et septem milia hostium caesa eo die traduntur, vivi capti plus tria milia

[1] ni quid Perizonius: ecquid Mog.
[2] vellet Madvig: velit Mog.
[3] vi Faber: vi equorum Mog.

---

[1] The phrase duplicate turmas seems not to occur elsewhere and one can only guess at the precise meaning. Its intention was to increase the striking force of the cavalry charge by making the formation more compact, perhaps by diminishing the intervals between files. The strength of the units could not be increased.

Flaccus saw this disorganization, he rode on his horse B.C. 180 to the legionary cavalry and shouted, "Unless there is some hope of aid in you, now all will be over with this army." When from all sides a shout was raised asking him why he did not say what he wanted done, and they would execute his orders without delay, "double the squadrons," [1] he said, "you cavalry of the two legions, and turn your horses loose against the wedge of the enemy, with which they are forcing back our men. You will do this with the greater weight if you will give your horses loose rein against them; and this the records say that Roman cavalry have often done and won great glory for themselves." [2] They obeyed his order and, dropping their reins, twice, from this side and from that, drove through, causing great slaughter to the enemy and breaking every one of their spears. The wedge having been scattered, in which all their hope had rested, the Celtiberians were in panic, and almost giving up the fight were looking for a place for flight. And when the cavalry of the allies saw that the Roman cavalry had performed so memorable an exploit, they too, inspired by the valour of the others, without waiting for an order let their horses loose upon the broken enemy. Then indeed all the Celtiberians were turned to flight, and the Roman commander, seeing the backs of the enemy, vowed a temple to Fortuna Equestris [3] and games to Jupiter Optimus Maximus. The Celtiberians were slaughtered as they scattered in flight through the whole defile. Seventeen thousand of the enemy are reported to have been killed that day, more than [2] There seems to be no support for this assertion.

[3] Cf. xliv. 9 below and the note.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

septingenti,[1] cum signis militaribus septuaginta 12 septem,[2] equis prope sescentis. In suis[3] castris eo die victor exercitus mansit. Victoria non sine
13 iactura militum fuit: quadringenti septuaginta duo milites Romani, socium ac Latini nominis mille decem et novem, cum[4] his tria milia militum auxiliariorum perierunt. Ita victor exercitus renovata
14 priore gloria Tarraconem est perductus. Venienti Fulvio Ti. Sempronius praetor, qui biduo ante venerat, obviam processit gratulatusque est quod rem publicam egregie gessisset. Cum summa concordia quos dimitterent quosque retinerent milites 15 composuerunt. Inde Fulvius exauctoratis[5] militibus in naves impositis Romam est profectus, Sempronius in Celtiberiam legiones duxit.

XLI. Consules ambo in Ligures exercitus induxer-
2 unt diversis partibus. Postumius prima et[6] tertia legione Ballistam Letumque[7] montes obsedit, et premendo praesidiis angustos saltus eorum commeatus interclusit, inopiaque omnium rerum eos
3 perdomuit. Fulvius secunda et[8] quarta legione adortus a Pisis Apuanos Ligures, qui eorum circa Macram fluvium incolebant, in deditionem acceptos, ad septem milia hominum, in naves impositos[9] praeter oram Etrusci maris Neapolim transmisit.
4 Inde in Samnium traducti, agerque iis inter populares

[1] septingenti Heraeus: mille ducenti Mog.
[2] c. sig. m. sep. sep. Madvig: sep. sep. c. sig. m. Mog.
[3] sescentis. in suis Heraeus: mille centum. in illis Mog.
[4] cum Frob. 31: in Mog.
[5] exauctoratis Frob. 31: ex authoritate Mog.
[6] prima et Frob. 31: primo Mog.
[7] Ballistam Letumque Zingerle: vallis verum tum tanquam Mog.
[8] secunda et Frob. 31: secundo Mog.

three thousand seven hundred taken alive, and there B.C. 180 were captured seventy-seven military standards and about six hundred horses. The victorious army remained that day in its own camp. The victory was not without loss of soldiers: four hundred and seventy-two Roman soldiers fell, of the allies of the Latin confederacy one thousand and nineteen, and in addition three thousand of the auxiliary troops. So the victorious army, having won once more its former glory, was conducted to Tarraco. Tiberius Sempronius the praetor, who had arrived two days earlier, went out to meet Fulvius on his arrival and congratulated him on his conspicuous success in defence of the state. In perfect harmony they arranged which soldiers they should discharge and which they should hold in service. Then Fulvius embarked the discharged troops on ships and set out for Rome and Sempronius led the legions into Celtiberia.

XLI. The two consuls led their armies against the Ligurians from different directions. Postumius, with the first and third legions, attacked the mountains of Ballista and Letum, and by blocking with guards their narrow passes cut the enemy off from supplies and subdued them because of their complete lack of everything. Fulvius, with the second and fourth legions, attacking from the side of Pisa the Ligurian Apuani (those of that people who lived along the Macra river), after receiving the surrender of about seven thousand men, loaded them on boats and sent them along the shore of the Tuscan sea to Naples. Thence they were transferred to Samnium and given [9] impositos Frob. 35 : imposita Mog.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

5 datus est. Montanorum Ligurum ab A. Postumio vineae caesae frumentaque deusta, donec cladibus omnibus belli coacti in deditionem venerunt armaque
6 tradiderunt. Navibus inde Postumius ad visendam oram Ingaunorum Intemeliorumque Ligurum pro-
7 cessit. Priusquam hi consules venirent ad exercitum
8 qui Pisas indictus [1] erat, praeerat [2] A. Postumius. Frater Q. Fulvii M. Fulvius Nobilior—secundae legionis Fulvius tribunus militum is erat—mensibus suis dimisit legionem, iureiurando adactis centurionibus aes in aerarium ad quaestores esse delaturos.

[1] indictus Sigonius: ductus Mog.
[2] praeerat Madvig: praeerant Mog.

---

[1] The text and the meaning are alike uncertain. By hi consules one would infer that A. Postumius and Q. Fulvius were meant, but just below A. Postumius is named as the commander of troops at Pisa which belonged to the army of Q. Fulvius. Possibly hi consules venirent should have been singular, referring to Fulvius, and the meaning is that Postumius preceded Fulvius to the province and assumed command temporarily of both consular armies. It is also possible that the name A. Postumius in this sentence is an error, or that another man of the name is meant, whom Livy fails to distinguish from the consul. If it is the consul, he took emergency action, notified the proper commander (Fulvius) of the troops concerned, and then proposed the exile of Nobilior.

[2] The brother of either Q. Fulvius Flaccus—the consul of 180 B.C. or the consul of 179 B.C., who was at this time still in Spain or on the way back—should have had the cognomen Flaccus, unless he had been adopted by some Fulvius Nobilior, and of such an adoption there is no record. There is moreover no Q. Fulvius Nobilior known to have lived at this time. One naturally assumes from Livy's language here that Q. Fulvii refers to the consul of 180 B.C., but no brother Marcus is mentioned elsewhere. The consul of 179 B.C. had a brother Marcus (xxx. 4 above), but it is not likely that after serving in some unspecified capacity under his brother in Spain in land among their countrymen. Aulus Postumius B.C. 180

destroyed the vineyards and burned the crops of the Ligurians of the mountains until, compelled by the disasters of war, they submitted and gave up their weapons. Then Postumius proceeded by boat to explore the coast of the Ligurian Ingauni and Intemelii. Before these consuls [1] came to the army which was mobilized at Pisa, Aulus Postumius was in command. The brother of Quintus Fulvius, Marcus Fulvius Nobilior [2]—this Fulvius was tribune of the soldiers of the second legion—during his months [3] dismissed the legion, binding the centurions by an oath that they would turn the money in to the quaestors for the treasury.[4] When this was announced 181 B.C. he should have served as military tribune under his cousin in 180 B.C. in Italy. The consul of 179 B.C., during his censorship in 174 B.C., expelled from the senate his own brother, and Valerius Maximus (II. vii. 5, repeated by Frontinus, Strat. IV. i. 31) asserts that the degradation was due to the discharge of a legion of which he was military tribune. The brother is called simply Fulvius, with no praenomen. Livy (XLI. xxvii. 2) and Velleius (I. x. 6) likewise refer to the expulsion, the former calling the brother L. Fulvius and the latter Cn. Fulvius; neither gives any explanation of the censor's action. The evidence therefore is so contradictory as to produce hopeless confusion. All one can say is that at this time Livy apparently thought that the tribune was the brother of the consul under whom he served. In this connection, I believe that it has not been pointed out that the other censor of 174 B.C. was the other consul of 180 B.C., who, in sect. 10 below, procured the banishment of Nobilior. Perhaps he was actually more responsible than his colleague for the degradation. The cognomen Nobilior remains unexplained on any hypothesis.

[3] The six tribunes in each legion rotated in the command of the entire legion.

[4] This must be the portion of the pay which had not yet been distributed to the troops: cf. sect. 11 below.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

9 Hoc ubi Placentiam—nam eo forte erat profectus—Aulo[1] nuntiatum est, cum equitibus expeditis secutus dimissos, quos eorum potuit adsequi, reduxit[2] castigatos Pisas; de ceteris consulem certiorem fecit. 10 Eo referente senatus consultum factum est ut M.[3] Fulvius in Hispaniam relegaretur ultra Novam Carthaginem; litteraeque ei datae sunt a consule ad P. Manlium in Hispaniam ulteriorem deferendae; 11 milites iussi ad signa redire. Ignominiae causa[4] uti semestre stipendium in eum annum esset ei legioni decretum: qui miles ad exercitum non redisset eum ipsum bonaque eius vendere consul iussus.

XLII. Eodem anno L. Duronius, qui praetor anno superiore fuerat,[5] ex Illyrico cum decem navibus Brundisium rediit. Inde in portu relictis navibus cum venisset Romam, inter exponendas res quas ibi gessisset, haud dubie in regem Illyriorum Gentium 2 latrocinii omnis maritimi causam avertit: ex regno eius omnes naves esse, quae superi maris oram depopulatae essent; de his rebus se[6] legatos misisse, 3 nec conveniendi regis potestatem factam. Venerant Romam legati a Gentio, qui, quo tempore Romani conveniendi regis causa venissent, aegrum forte eum

[1] Aulo Sigonius: Fulvio Mog.
[2] reduxit Gronovius: deduxit Mog.
[3] senatus consultum factum est ut M. Frob. 31: factum est ut cos. Mog.
[4] ignominiae causa Madvig: causa ignominiae Mog.
[5] fuerat Madvig: om. Mog.
[6] se Frob. 35. om. Mog.

---

[1] This is one of the earliest examples of relegatio.
[2] The punishment of the soldiers seems relatively too severe, since in general they followed the instructions of presumably to Aulus at Placentia—for he had happened to go there—following with the light cavalry the men who had been released, he punished and brought back to Pisa those of them whom he could overtake; as to the rest, he notified the consul. On his motion the senate passed a decree that Marcus Fulvius should be banished to Spain beyond New Carthage;[1] and a letter was given to him by the consul for delivery to Publius Manlius in Farther Spain; the soldiers were ordered to return to the standards. As a mark of disgrace it was voted that the legion should receive only six months' pay for that year: the consul was directed to sell the person and property of any soldier who had not returned to the army.[2] B.C. 180

XLII. The same year Lucius Duronius, who had been praetor the year before, returned from Illyricum to Brundisium with ten ships. Thence, leaving the ships in port, he went to Rome, and in the course of his narrative of what he had done there he pointed in no uncertain manner at Gentius, king of the Illyrians,[3] as the cause of all the brigandage by sea: from his kingdom, he said, came all the ships which had ravaged the coast of the upper sea; he had sent ambassadors about these matters, but there had been no opportunity to meet the king. Envoys had come to Rome from Gentius, who said that at the time the Romans had come to interview the king he had competent authority. The action of Nobilior, so far as one can judge, was entirely irregular, even if it was not technically illegal: probably no one had ever considered such an offence as possible and had prescribed no penalty. But the text of the entire chapter is so uncertain that one cannot feel sure that the episode is clearly and correctly interpreted.

[3] Polybius (XXXII. xviii) calls him more exactly king of the Dalmatians.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

4 in ultimis partibus fussie regni dicerent: petere Gentium ab senatu ne crederent confictis criminibus in se quae inimici detulissent. Ad ea Duronius adiecit multis civibus Romanis [1] et sociis Latini nominis iniurias factas in regno eius, et cives Romanos 5 dici Corcyrae retineri. Eos omnes Romam adduci placuit,[2] C. Claudium praetorem cognoscere, neque ante Gentio regi legatisve eius responsum reddi.

6 Inter multos alios quos pestilentia eius anni absumpsit, sacerdotes quoque aliquot mortui sunt. L. Valerius Flaccus pontifex mortuus est: in eius 7 locum suffectus est Q. Fabius Labeo. P.[3] Manlius, qui nuper ex ulteriore Hispania redierat, triumvir epulo: Q. Fulvius M. F. in locum eius triumvir 8 cooptatus, tum praetextatus erat. De rege sacrificulo [4] sufficiendo in locum Cn. Cornelii Dolabellae contentio inter C. Servilium pontificem maximum fuit et L. Cornelium Dolabellam duumvirum navalem, quem ut inauguraret pontifex magistratu sese 9 abdicare iubebat. Recusantique id facere ob eam rem multa duumviro dicta a pontifice, deque ea cum

[1] quae inimici detulissent. ad ea Duronius adiecit multis civibus Romanis Frob. 35: quintius ad ea dedisset Duronius multis civibus adiecit Romanis Mog.
[2] placuit Frob. 35: placere Mog.
[3] P. ed. Aldina: C. Mog.
[4] sacrificulo Drakenborch: sacrifico Mog.

---

[1] The Illyrian city of Corcyra (Κόρκυρα) seems to be meant, not the island (Κέρκυρα).
[2] This college had charge of sacrificial feasts.

happened to be ill in the farthest part of the kingdom: B.C. 180
Gentius asked the senate not to believe the spurious charges which his enemies had made against him. Duronius added to this a statement that many Roman citizens and allies of the Latin confederacy had suffered injury in his kingdom, and that Roman citizens were said to be detained at Corcyra.[1] It was decided that all these should be brought to Rome, that the praetor Gaius Claudius should investigate, and that until this was done a reply should not be given to King Gentius or his ambassadors.

Among many others whom the pestilence of that year carried off a number of priests also died. Lucius Valerius Flaccus the pontiff died: also Quintus Fabius Labeo was chosen in his place. Publius Manlius, who had only recently returned from Farther Spain, the triumvir epulo,[2] died, and in his stead Quintus Fulvius the son of Marcus, who still wore the dress of boyhood,[3] was coöpted triumvir. In the matter of choosing a rex sacrificulus [4] to replace Gnaeus Cornelius Dolabella, there was a dispute between Gaius Servilius the pontifex maximus and Lucius Cornelius Dolabella[5] the duumvir navalis, whom the pontifex ordered to resign his office that he might install him in the priesthood.[6] When he refused to do this, the pontifex assessed a fine against the duumvir and about this act there was [3] This Fulvius, who was not old enough to assume the dress of manhood (toga virilis), may have been the son of the M. Fulvius of XXX. 4 above.

[4] The title indicates that he performed some of the religious duties originally belonging to the king.

[5] Dolabella was not one of the duumvirs named in XXVI. 8 above, and a later election Livy may have omitted to mention.

[6] This priesthood was incompatible with public office and with military duties.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

10 provocasset certatum ad populum. Cum plures iam tribus intro vocatae dicto esse audientem pontifici duumvirum iuberent, multamque remitti, si magistratu se abdicasset, vitium[1] de caelo quod comitia turbaret, intervenit. Religio inde fuit pontificibus
11 inaugurandi Dolabellae. P. Cloelium Siculum inaugurarunt, qui secundo loco nominatus[2] erat. Exitu anni et C. Servilius Geminus pontifex maximus decessit: idem decemvir sacrorum fuit. Pontifex in locum eius a collegio cooptatus est Q. Fulvius 12 Flaccus: creatus[3] inde[4] pontifex maximus M.[5] Aemilius Lepidus, cum multi clari viri petissent; et decemvir sacrorum Q. Marcius Philippus in eiusdem 13 locum est cooptatus. Et augur Sp. Postumius Albinus decessit: in locum eius P. Scipionem, filium Africani, augures cooptarunt.

Cumanis eo anno petentibus permissum ut publice Latine loquerentur et praeconibus Latine vendendi ius esset.

XLIII. Pisanis agrum pollicentibus quo Latina colonia deduceretur, gratiae ab senatu actae;

[1] vitium Sigonius: ultimum Mog.
[2] nominatus Rubino: inauguratus Mog.
[3] creatus Madvig: om. Mog.
[4] inde Weissenborn: in M: ante Mog.
[5] M. Madvig: om. M Mog.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVII. li. 1–6 and the notes.

[2] An unfavourable omen—usually thunder or lightning—always caused the adjournment of an assembly. This assembly had met as a final court of appeal.

[3] The colleges of pontiffs conducted a sort of preferential ballot. The pontifex maximus then selected the nominee, normally the one who had the largest number of votes. If he proved ineligible, as in this instance, the second was chosen, and so on.

a contest before the assembly after he had appealed.[1] B.C. 180
When several tribes had already been called in to vote, were now ordering the duumvir to be obedient to the pontifex and the fine to be remitted if he should have resigned his magistracy, an unfavourable sign[2] from heaven intervened and adjourned the assembly. Therefore the priests felt a scruple against inaugurating Dolabella. They installed as priest Publius Cloelius Siculus, who had been second on the list of nominees for the office.[3] At the end of the year the pontifex maximus Gaius Servilius Geminus also died; he had also been a decemvir in charge of sacrifices. As a pontiff in his place the college coöpted Quintus Fulvius Flaccus;[4] then Marcus Aemilius Lepidus was elected pontifex maximus, although many distinguished men were candidates;[5] and as decemvir in charge of sacrifices, in place of the same Servilius, Quintus Marcius Philippus was coöpted. Also the augur Spurius Postumius Albinus died; to replace him the augurs coöpted Publius Scipio the son of Africanus.

The Cumaeans that year asked and were granted the privilege of using the Latin language officially, and the auctioneers that of conducting their sales in Latin.[6]

XLIII. When the people of Pisa offered land to which a Latin colony should be led, they received the thanks of the senate; for this purpose Quintus

[4] Probably, though not certainly, the Flaccus who had just returned from Spain.

[5] Only members of the college of pontiffs were eligible to election as pontifex maximus.

[6] The Cumaeans were cives sine suffragio, and such communities were, it seems, allowed to use Latin officially only by special action. Their native language had become Oscan.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

triumviri creati ad eam rem Q. Fabius Buteo M. et P. Popilii[1] Laenates. A C. Maenio praetore, cui provincia Sardinia cum evenisset, additum erat ut quaereret de veneficiis longius ab urbe decem milibus passuum, litterae adlatae, se iam tria milia hominum damnasse, et crescere sibi quaestionem indiciis: aut eam sibi esse deserendam[2] aut provinciam dimittendam.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus ex Hispania rediit Romam cum magna fama gestarum rerum; qui cum extra urbem triumphi causa esset, consul est creatus cum L. Manlio Acidino, et post paucos dies cum militibus quos secum deduxerat triumphans urbem est invectus. Tulit in triumpho coronas aureas centum viginti quattuor: praeterea auri pondo triginta unum, argenti infecti . . .[3] et signati Oscensis nummum centum septuaginta tria milia ducentos. Militibus de praeda quinquagenos denarios dedit, duplex centurionibus, triplex equiti, tantundem sociis Latini nominis, et stipendium omnibus duplex.

XLIV. Eo anno rogatio primum lata est ab L. Villio[4] tribuno plebis, quot annos nati quemque

[1] Popilii Frob. 31 : Porcii Mog.
[2] deserendam Sigonius : defendendam Mog.
[3] argenti infecti * * Madvig : om. Mog.
[4] Villio Sigonius : Iulio Mog.

[1] Fulvius and Manlius were brothers (Fasti; Velleius II. viii. 2). This election, followed by that of M. Fulvius Nobilior as censor (xlv. 6 below), marks the elimax of the political ascendancy of the Fulvii.

[2] It is not difficult to supply argenti infecti, but the insertion of an indication of quantity would be purely a guess.

Fabius Buteo and Marcus and Publius Popilius Laenas were elected members of a board of three. From the praetor Gaius Maenius, to whom, although the province of Sardinia had fallen to his lot, had been assigned the additional task of investigating cases of poisoning beyond ten miles from the City, a letter was received which said that he had already condemned three thousand persons, and that the investigation was assuming larger proportions by reason of the evidence received: he said that he would be compelled either to discontinue the investigation or give up his province. B.C. 180

Quintus Fulvius Flaccus returned from Spain to Rome, having earned great acclaim by his exploits; while he was waiting outside the City for the sake of a triumph, he was elected consul with Lucius Manlius Acidinus,[1] and a few days later rode into the City in triumph, accompanied by the soldiers whom he had brought back with him. He displayed in his triumph one hundred and twenty-four golden crowns and in addition thirty-one pounds of gold, of unwrought silver . . .[2] of minted coins of Osca[3] one hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred. To each of the infantry he gave out of the booty fifty denarii, twice that sum to the centurions and thrice to each of the cavalry, and the same amounts to the allies of the Latin confederacy,[4] and to all double pay.

XLIV. In that year for the first time a motion was proposed by Lucius Villius, tribune of the people, fixing the ages at which each magistracy might be

[3] Cf. XXXIV. x. 4 and the note.

[4] One might infer that the Latins did not usually receive the bonus.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 574

magistratum peterent caperentque. Inde cognomen
2 familiae inditum ut Annales appellarentur. Praetores quattuor post multos annos lege Baebia creati, quae [1] alternis quaternos iubebat creari. Hi facti
3 Cn. Cornelius Scipio C. Valerius Laevinus Q. et P. Mucii Q.[2] F. Scaevolae.

A.U.C. 575

Q. Fulvio et L. Manlio consulibus eadem provincia quae superioribus, pari numero copiae peditum
4 equitum, civium sociorum decretae. In Hispaniis duabus Ti. Sempronio et L. Postumio cum iisdem
5 exercitibus quos haberent prorogatum imperium est; et in supplementum consules scribere iussi ad tria milia peditum Romanorum, trecentos equites, quinque milia sociorum Latini nominis et quadrin-
6 gentos equites. P. Mucius Scaevola urbanam sortitus provinciam est et ut idem quaereret de veneficiis in urbe et propius urbem decem milia passuum, Cn.
7 Cornelius Scipio peregrinam, Q. Mucius Scaevola Siciliam, C. Valerius Laevinus Sardiniam.
8 Q. Fulvius consul priusquam ullam rem publicam ageret, liberare et se et rem publicam religione votis

[1] quae ed. Vascosana: qui M Mog.
[2] Q. Sigonius: om. Mog.

[1] Livy's account of this important legislation is disappointingly brief. It seems that custom had in the past established a sequence of offices and had regulated the intervals which should separate them. Yet such important questions as re-elections and tenure of two offices simultaneously had required legislative enactment in the past. Such principles as that the people should have the privilege of electing its favourites regardless of technicalities (XXXII. vii. 8–11; XXXIX. xxxix and the notes) had caused great confusion. The lex Villia established minimum ages for the several magistracies, thus fixing a definite sequence of offices (which developed gradually into the cursus honorum), and provided that two-year intervals should separate successive offices.

sought and held.[1] From this fact a cognomen was given B.C. 180 to his family, so that its members were called Annales.
After many years[2] four praetors were chosen under the Baebian law, which provided that four should be chosen in alternate years.[3] The praetors so elected were Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio, Gaius Valerius Laevinus and Quintus and Publius Mucius Scaevola, the sons of Quintus.

To Quintus Fulvius and Lucius Manlius the consuls B.C. 179 the same province which their predecessors had held was decreed, with the same numbers of troops, infantry and cavalry, citizens and allies. In the two Spains the imperium of Tiberius Sempronius and Lucius Postumius was prolonged, and they were to keep the same armies which they had; and as replacements the consuls were ordered to enroll three thousand Roman infantry, three hundred cavalry, five thousand infantry and four hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy. Publius Mucius Scaevola received by lot the civil jurisdiction and also the duty of enquiring into cases of poisoning in the city and within a distance of ten miles from the city, Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio that between citizens and aliens, Quintus Mucius Scaevola Sicily, Gaius Valerius Laevinus Sardinia.

Quintus Fulvius the consul said that before he brought up any matter of public business he wished to free himself and the state of an obligation to the [2] In XXXII. xxvii. 6 Livy reports the election of six praetors for 197 B.C., and that this was the first instance of the election of six.

[3] The date and actual content of the Baebian law are unknown. It was not strictly observed and may have been soon repealed.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 575

9 solvendis dixit velle. Vovisse, quo die postremum cum Celtiberis pugnasset, ludos Iovi optimo maximo et aedem Equestri Fortunae sese facturum: in eam
10 rem sibi pecuniam collatam esse ab Hispanis. Ludi decreti et ut duumviri ad aedem locandam crearentur. De pecunia finitur ne maior ludorum causa [1] consumeretur quam quanta Fulvio Nobiliori post Aetoli-
11 cum bellum ludos facienti [2] decreta esset; neve quid ad eos ludos arcesseret cogeret acciperet faceret adversus id senatus consultum quod L. Aemilio Cn.
12 Baebio consulibus de ludis factum esset. Decreverat id senatus propter effus- sumptus factos in ludos Ti. Sempronii aedilis, qui graves non modo Italiae ac sociis Latini nominis, sed etiam provinciis externis fuerant.

XLV. Hiems eo anno nive saeva et [3] omni tempestatum genere fuit: arbores quae obnoxiae frigoribus sunt, deusserat cunctas; et eadem ali-
2 quanto quam alias longior fuit. Itaque Latinas nox [4] subito coorta et intolerabilis tempestas in monte turbavit, instauratae que sunt ex decreto pontificum.
3 Eadem tempestas et in Capitolio aliquot signa prostravit [5] fulminibusque complura loca deformavit, aedem Iovis Tarracinae, aedem Albam [6] Capuae

[1] ludorum causa Madvig: causa ludorum Mog.
[2] facienti Frob. 35: faciendi Mog.
[3] nive saeva et Frob. 35: nive et saeva Mog.
[4] nox Crévier: mox Mog.
[5] prostravit nescio quis apud Drakenborch: constravit Mog.
[6] Albam Frob. 31: alue Mog.

---

[1] The contribution has not been mentioned; for the vow cf. xl. 10 above. The temple was in the neighbourhood of the circus Flaminius (Vitruvius III. iii. 2; Obsequens 16 (75)).

gods by fulfilling his vows. He had vowed, he said, on B.C. 179 the day when he had last fought with the Celtiberians, to give games to Jupiter Optimus Maximus and a temple to Fortuna Equestris: for this purpose money had been collected for him by the Spaniards.[1] It was decreed that the games should be held and that two commissioners should be chosen to contract for the temple. As to the cost, the limit was set that a greater sum might not be spent for the games than the amount that had been decreed to Fulvius Nobilior[2] when he gave his games after the Aetolian war, and it was voted too that he should not invite, compel or accept contributions for these or do anything contrary to that decree of the senate which had been passed regarding games in the consulship of Lucius Aemilius and Gnaeus Baebius.[3] The senate had passed this decree because of the lavish expenditures made on games by Tiberius Sempronius the aedile, which had been a burden, not only on Italy and the allies of the Latin confederacy, but on outside provinces as well.[4]

XLV. The winter that year was cruel on account of snow and every kind of storm: it had completely blasted the trees which are affected by cold; and it lasted much longer than in other years. And so a darkness which came on suddenly and a violent tempest broke up the Latin festival on the mountain,[5] and the festival was repeated by decree of the pontiffs. The same storm also overthrew a number of statues on the Capitoline and disfigured many places with strokes of lightning—the temple of Jupiter at Tarracina, the

[1] Cf. XXXIX. v. 7–10 and the notes.
[2] The decree has not been mentioned.
[3] Livy has not referred to these games before.
[4] The Alban mountain: XXXII. i. 9 and the note.

A.U.C. 575

portamque Romanam; muri pinnae aliquot loci
4 decussae erant. Haec inter prodigia nuntiatum et ab
5 Reate tripedem natum mulum. Ob ea decemviri iussi adire libros edidere, quibus diis et quot hostiis sacrificaretur, et ut[1] supplicatio diem unum esset.
6 Ludi deinde votivi Q. Fulvii consulis per dies decem magno apparatu facti.

Censorum inde comitia habita: creati M. Aemilius Lepidus pontifex maximus et M. Fulvius Nobilior, 7 qui ex Aetolis triumphaverat. Inter hos viros nobiles inimicitiae erant, saepe multis et in senatu et ad po-
8 pulum atrocibus celebratae certaminibus. Comitiis confectis, ut traditum[2] antiquitus est, censores in Campo ad aram Martis sellis curulibus consederunt; quo repente principes senatorum cum agmine venerunt civitatis, inter quos Q. Caecilius Metellus verba fecit:

XLVI. "Non obliti sumus, censores, vos paulo ante ab universo populo Romano moribus nostris praepositos esse, et nos a vobis et admoneri et regi, non 2 vos a nobis debere. Indicandum tamen est quid omnes bonos in vobis aut offendat aut certe mutatum
3 malint.[3] Singulos cum intuemur, M. Aemili, M. Fulvi, neminem hodie in civitate habemus quem, si

[1] et ut Madvig: et fulminibus complura loca deformata aedem Iovis ut Mog.

[2] confectis ut traditum Frob. 31: confecti sunt traditus Mog.

[3] malint Frob. 31: malit Mog.

---

[1] Cf. XXXII. ix. 2.

[2] The same portent was reported from Reate in ii. 4 above; the present passage may be a doublet.

[3] Probably the consul of 206 B.C., and so a man of great age and dignity.

"White Temple"[1] and the Porta Romana at Capua, B.C. 179 where the parapets of the wall were thrown down in many places. Along with the other prodigies it was reported from Reate that a mule with three feet had been born.[2] On account of them the decemvirs, when ordered to consult the Books, issued a proclamation stating to which gods and with how many victims sacrifice should be offered, and directing that supplication should be offered for one day. Then the games which had been vowed by the consul Quintus Fulvius were held through ten days with great splendour.

Next the election of censors was held: the successful candidates were Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, the pontifex maximus, and Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, who had triumphed over the Aetolians. Between these distinguished men there was a feud, exhibited on many occasions, both in the senate and before the assembly, by numerous bitter quarrels. When the election was over the censors, as the custom was from olden times, took their seats on curule chairs by the altar of Mars in the Campus; thither suddenly came the chiefs of the senators, accompanied by a throng of citizens, and one of them, Quintus Caecilius Metellus,[3] spoke thus:

XLVI. "We have not forgotten, censors, that a little while ago you were placed, by the entire Roman people, in control of our manners, and that we should be both admonished and governed by you, not you by us. Nevertheless, it should be pointed out what it is in you two that offends all good men or at least what they would prefer to see modified. When we look at you singly, Marcus Aemilius and Marcus Fulvius, we find no one in the state to-day whom,

A.U.C. 575

revocemur in suffragium, velimus vobis praelatum 4 esse. Ambo cum simul aspicimus, non possumus non[1] vereri, ne male comparati sitis, nec tantum rei publicae prosit, quod omnibus nobis egregie placetis, 5 quam quod alter alteri displicetis, noceat. Inimi-citias per annos multos vobis ipsis graves et atroces geritis, quae periculum est ne ex hac die nobis et 6 rei publicae quam vobis graviores fiant. De quibus causis hoc timeamus, multa succurrunt, quae dicerentur,[2] nisi forte implacabiles furores[3] implicaverint 7 animos vestros. Has ut hodie, ut in isto templo finiatis simultates, quaesumus vos universi, et quos coniunxit suffragiis suis populus Romanus, hos etiam reconciliatione gratiae coniungi a nobis sinatis; 8 uno animo uno consilio legatis[4] senatum, equites recenseatis, agatis censum, lustrum condatis; quod in omnibus fere precationibus nuncupabitis[5] 9 " verbis ' ut ea res mihi collegaeque meo bene et feliciter eveniat,' id ita ut vere, ut ex animo velitis evenire, efficiatisque ut quod deos precati eritis, 10 id vos velle etiam homines credamus. T. Tatius et Romulus, in cuius urbis medio foro acie hostes con-11 currerant, ibi concordes regnarunt. Non modo simultates sed bella quoque finiuntur: ex infestis hostibus plerumque socii fideles, interdum etiam cives fiunt.

[1] non Frob. 31 : om. Mog.
[2] post dicerentur lacunam susp. Heraeus.
[3] furores Madvig : fueritis Mog.
[4] legatis Frob. 35 : eligatis Mog.
[5] nuncupabitis Frob. 35 : nuncupatis his Mog.

---

[1] I have tried to give a meaning to this passage, although corruption no doubt still remains. If there is a lacuna after if we should be recalled to vote, we should wish to B.C. 179 have preferred to you. When we look at both of you together, we cannot but fear that you may prove to have been badly mated and that less good may come to the state because you are so eminently pleasing to all of us than harm because each of you displeases the other. For many years you have been keeping alive a feud, a serious and dreadful thing for you yourselves, and there is danger that from this day it may become more harmful to us and to the state than to you. As to the reasons why we fear this, many occur to me which might be mentioned were it not that passions perhaps not to be appeased beset your minds.[1] We one and all beg you to-day that in this consecrated spot you will end this quarrel, and that you will permit those men whom the Roman people by their votes has associated together, to be associated by us in this restoration of good feeling also; that with one mind and one policy you may choose the senate, review the equites, hold the census and close the lustrum; that what you will say in almost every prayer you make, 'that this may turn out well and successfully for me and for my colleague in office,' you will truly and with all your hearts desire to be fulfilled, and that you will so act that we men may believe that you also desire that for which you have prayed to the gods. Titus Tatius and Romulus, in whose city they had clashed as enemies in battle in the middle of the Forum, reigned there in harmony. Not merely feuds but even wars draw to an end; many times from bitter foes men become faithful allies, sometimes even fellow dicerentur, an additional clause like "and which you would yourselves recognize" should be inserted at that point.

A.U.C. 575

Albani diruta Alba Romam traducti sunt, Latini
12 Sabini in civitatem accepti. Volgatum illud, quia verum erat, in proverbium venit, amicitias immortales, 13 mortales [1] inimicitias debere esse." Fremitus ortus cum assensu, deinde universorum voces idem petentium confusae in unum orationem interpellarunt.
14 Inde Aemilius questus cum alia, tum bis [2] a M. Fulvio se certo consulatu deiectum: Fulvius contra queri se ab eo semper lacessitum et in probrum suum sponsionem factam. Tamen ambo significare, si alter vellet, se in potestate tot principum civitatis
15 futuros. Omnibus instantibus [3] qui aderant dexteras [4] fidemque dedere remittere vere ac finire odium. Deinde collaudantibus cunctis deducti sunt in Capitolium. Et cura [5] super tali re principum et facilitas censorum egregie comprobata ab senatu et 16 laudata est. Censoribus deinde postulantibus ut pecuniae summa sibi, qua in opera publica uterentur attribueretur,[6] vectigal annuum decretum est.

XLVII. Eodem anno in Hispania L. Postumius et

[1] mortales Drakenborch: om. Mog.
[2] alia tum bis Frob. 31: allatum vis Mog.
[3] instantibus Frob. 31: stantibus Mog.
[4] dexteras Frob. 31: dederant dexteras Mog.
[5] cura ed. Basiliensis 1555: cum Mog.
[6] attribueretur Frob. 31: om. Mog.

---

[1] The sponsio was a sort of wager at law, each of the parties agreeing that the loser in the contest should pay a stated sum to the winner. The incident here referred to has not been mentioned before, unless it was part of the episode narrated in XXXIX. iv.

[2] Livy has not mentioned a corresponding sum before. The censors of 169 B.C. received the revenue for half a year (XLIV. xvi. 9). There is no translation of the expression citizens. The Albans when Alba was destroyed were B.C. 179 transferred to Rome, the Latins and the Sabines were received into citizenship. There was a common saying which had passed into a proverb because it was true, that our friendships should be immortal, but mortal our enmities." A roar of applause burst out, and then the speech was broken off by the voices of the whole crowd, demanding the same thing and merging into one sound. Then Aemilius complained both of other things and particularly because he had twice been kept by Marcus Fulvius from the consulship which was assured him; Fulvius on his side complained that he had always been harassed by Aemilius and that the sponsio had been proposed to his shame.[1] Nevertheless each stated that if the other was willing he was ready to put himself in the hands of all the leading men of the state. At the instance of all who were present, they sincerely exchanged hand-clasps and pledges, forgave one another, and ended their feud. After that, followed by the applause of all, they were escorted to the Capitoline. Both the interest of the leaders in such a situation and the readiness of the censors to yield were notably approved and lauded by the senate. Then, on the demand of the censors that the sum of money which they were to use on public works be assigned them, one year's revenue was decreed to them.[2]

XLVII. The same year the propraetors in Spain, into definite figures until 62 B.C. (Plutarch, Pompey, 45), when one year's revenue amounted to 50,000,000 denarii. Frank (Economic Survey of Ancient Rome, Baltimore, 1933, I. 152–153) estimates the revenue in 179 B.C. as perhaps one-tenth of that sum. He further calculates that the Basilica Aemilia (li. 5 below) would have cost 12,000 denarii, so that a good deal could be done with 5,000,000 denarii.

A.U.C. 575

Ti. Sempronius propraetores comparaverunt ita inter se, ut in Vaccaeos per Lusitaniam iret Albinus, in Celtiberiam inde reverteretur; Gracchus, si maius ibi [1] bellum esset, in ultima Celtiberiae penetra-
2 ret. . . .[2] Mundam urbem primum vi cepit, nocte ex improviso aggressus. Acceptis deinde [3] obsidibus praesidioque imposito castella oppugnare, agros [4] urere, donec ad praevalidam aliam urbem—Certimam
3 appellant Celtiberi—pervenit. Ubi cum iam opera admoveret, veniunt legati ex oppido, quorum sermo antiquae simplicitatis fuit, non dissimulantium bella-
4 turos, si vires essent. Petierunt enim, ut sibi in castra Celtiberorum ire liceret ad auxilia accienda: [5] si non impetrassent, tum separatim ab [6] illis se consulturos. Permittente Graccho ierunt et post paucis diebus alios decem legatos secum adduxerunt.
5 Meridianum tempus erat. Nihil prius petierunt a praetore quam ut bibere sibi iuberet dari. Epotis primis poculis iterum poposcerunt, magno risu circumstantium in tam rudibus et moris omnis
6 ignaris ingeniis. Tum maximus natu ex iis " missi sumus " inquit " a gente nostra qui sciscitaremur
7 qua tandem re fretus arma nobis inferres." Ad hanc percunctationem Gracchus exercitu se egregio fidentem venisse respondit; quem si ipsi visere velint, quo certiora ad suos referant, potestatem se eis

[1] Gracchus si maius ibi Gronovius: si Gracchus maius sibi Mog.

[2] lacunam indicavit Madvig.

[3] verba urbem . . . deinde, perverso ordine in Mog. scripta transp. Frob. 35.

[4] agros Frob. 35: deinde agros Mog.

[5] accienda Faber: accipienda Mog.

[6] ab Madvig: eos ab Mog.

[1] It is not certain that a lacuna exists.

Lucius Postumius and Tiberius Sempronius, arranged B.C. 179 between them that Albinus should proceed through Lusitania against the Vaccaei and then return to Celtiberia; that Gracchus, if there were a greater war there, should make his way into the furthermost part of Celtiberia. . . .[1] He first took by storm the city of Munda, attacking it unexpectedly by night. Then, accepting hostages and leaving a garrison, he captured fortresses and burned the countryside until he came to another very powerful town which the Celtiberians call Certima. There, just as he was moving up his siege-engines, ambassadors came from the town, whose speech had the ring of old-fashioned frankness, and they did not disguise the fact that they would fight to the end if they had the strength. For they asked that they might be permitted to go to the camp of the Celtiberians to summon aid; if they did not obtain it then they would consult by themselves and apart from the Celtiberians. When Gracchus granted this they departed and a few days later brought with them ten other ambassadors. It was the hour of noon. They asked nothing from the praetor at first, except that he should order that they be given something to drink. Having quaffed the first cups they asked for a second drink, to the accompaniment of great laughter on the part of the bystanders at such uncultured natures, ignorant of all etiquette. Then the eldest of them said: "We have been sent by our people to ascertain on what in the world it is that you rely in attacking us." To this question Gracchus replied that he came relying on an excellent army; if they wished to see it, in order to make a more trustworthy report to their people, he would give them the opportunity. He ordered the tribunes of

A.U.C. 575

8 facturum esse. Tribunisque militum imperat ut ornari omnes copias peditum equitumque et decurrere iubeant[1] armatas. Ab hoc spectaculo legati dimissi[2] deterruerunt suos ab auxilio circumsessae
9 urbi ferendo. Oppidani cum ignes nocte e[3] turribus nequiquam, quod signum convenerat, sustulissent, destituti ab unica spe auxilii in deditionem venerunt.
10 Nummum quater et viciens ab iis est exactum, quadraginta nobilissimi equites, nec obsidum nomine—nam militare iussi sunt—, et tamen re ipsa ut pignus fidei essent.

XLVIII. Inde iam duxit ad Alcen urbem ubi castra Celtiberorum erant, a quibus venerant nuper legati.
2 Eos cum per aliquot dies, armaturam levem immittendo[4] in stationes, lacessisset parvis proeliis, in dies maiora certamina serebat, ut omnes extra munitiones
3 eliceret. Ubi quod petebat satis[5] sensit effectum, auxiliorum praefectis imperat ut contracto certamine, tamquam multitudine superarentur, repente tergis datis ad castra effuse fugerent; ipse intra vallum ad
4 omnes portas instruxit copias. Haud multum temporis intercessit, cum ex composito refugientium suorum agmen, post effuse sequentes barbaros
5 conspexit. Instructam ad hoc ipsum intra vallum habebat aciem. Itaque tantum moratus ut suos refugere in castra libero introitu sineret, clamore

[1] tribunisque . . . iubeant Frob. 35: tribunoque . . . iubeat Mog.
[2] dimissi Duker: missi Mog.
[3] nocte e Duker: nocte Mog.
[4] immittendo Frob. 35: mittendo Mog.
[5] satis Novák: is Mog.

the soldiers to command all the forces of infantry and cavalry to equip themselves and to march in review under arms. After this spectacle the ambassadors were sent away and discouraged their people from sending aid to the besieged city. The townspeople, after vainly building fires on their towers at night, which had been the signal agreed upon, finding themselves destitute of their one hope of assistance, surrendered. Twenty-four thousand nummi were demanded of them, and forty of their noblest knights, not expressly as hostages—for they were ordered to do military duty[1]—yet in the very nature of the situation as a guarantee of loyalty. B.C. 179

XLVIII. From there he next led his troops to the town of Alce, where the camp of the Celtiberians lay from which the ambassadors had recently come. When he had harried them with skirmishes for some time, sending his light troops against their outposts, he was daily engaging in battle on a larger scale, that he might draw them all outside their defences. When he saw that what he was seeking had been sufficiently achieved, he ordered the commanders of the auxiliaries that, letting the conflict flag as if they were overcome by superior numbers, they should suddenly turn their backs and flee headlong to the camp; he himself formed his troops inside the rampart at all the gates. No long time passed when, as agreed, he saw the column of his own fugitives and behind them, pursuing in loose order, the barbarians. He had formed his line within the rampart for just this purpose. And so, waiting only long enough to allow his troops to escape into the camp through an

[1] The money was not tribute, since the forty equites were not hostages, and the status of the city is peculiar.

A.U.C. 575

sublato simul omnibus portis erupit. Non sustinuere
6 impetum necopinatum hostes. Qui ad castra oppugnanda venerant, ne sua quidem tueri potuerunt: nam extemplo fusi fugati, mox intra vallum paventes
7 compulsi, postremo exuuntur castris. Eo die novem milia hostium caesa; capti vivi trecenti viginti, equi centum duodecim, signa militaria triginta septem. De exercitu Romano centum novem ceciderunt.

XLIX. Ab hoc proelio Gracchus duxit ad depopulandam[1] Celtiberiam legiones. Et cum ferret passim cuncta atque ageret, populique alii voluntate alii metu iugum acciperent, centum tria oppida intra paucos dies in deditionem accepit, praeda potitus
2 ingenti est. Convertit inde agmen retro unde venerat ad Alcen, atque eam urbem oppugnare
3 institit. Oppidani primum impetum hostium sustinuerunt; deinde cum iam non armis modo sed etiam operibus oppugnarentur, diffisi praesidio urbis
4 in arcem universi concesserunt: postremo et inde praemissis oratoribus in dicionem[2] se suaque omnia Romanis permiserunt. Magna inde praeda facta est. Multi captivi nobiles in potestatem venerunt,
5 inter quos et Thurri filii duo et filia. Regulus hic earum gentium erat, longe potentissimus omnium Hispanorum. Audita suorum clade, missis qui fidem venienti in castra ad Gracchum peterent,
6 venit. Et primum quaesivit ab eo liceretne sibi[3]

[1] depopulandam Gronovius: depopulandum Mog.
[2] dicionem Frob. 35: deditionem Mog.
[3] liceretne sibi Glareanus: ne sibi liceret Mog.

[1] Polybius (XXVI. iv) puts the number at 300, causing Posidonius (in Strabo, III. iv. 14) to remark mockingly τοὺς πύργους καλοῦντα πόλεις.

open entrance, raising a shout he burst out from all the gates at once. The enemy did not withstand the unexpected attack. Those who had come to capture the camp could not even defend their own: for at once they were repulsed and routed, presently driven in terror within the rampart, and finally stripped of their camp. That day nine thousand of the enemy were killed; three hundred and twenty were taken alive, and a hundred and twelve horses and thirty-seven military standards were captured. Of the Roman army one hundred and nine fell. B.C. 179

XLIX. After this battle Gracchus led the legions to ravage Celtiberia. And while he was carrying and driving off everything everywhere and the tribes were submitting to the yoke, some voluntarily and others in fear, he received the surrender of a hundred and three[1] towns within a few days and gained an immense amount of booty. Then he turned the column back toward Alce whence he had come, and began to invest that town. The citizens sustained the first assault of the enemy; then, when they were now being attacked, not by arms alone, but also by siege-works, despairing of protecting the town they all retired to the citadel; finally even from there they sent ambassadors out to plead for them and entrusted themselves and all their possessions to the dominion of the Romans. Much booty was taken there. Many noble prisoners came into Roman hands, among them two sons and a daughter of Thurrus. He was the chieftain of these tribes and by far the most powerful man of all the Spaniards. After he had heard of the loss of his people he sent to ask for a safeguard if he came to the camp to see Gracchus, and then came. And first he asked whether it was permitted to him

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 575

ac suis vivere. Cum praetor victurum respondisset, quaesivit iterum si cum Romanis militare liceret. 7 Id quoque Graccho permittente, "sequar" inquit "vos adversus veteres socios meos, quoniam illos arma pro me piguit suscipere."[1] Secutus est inde Romanos, fortique ac fideli opera multis locis rem Romanam adiuvit.

L. Ergavica inde, nobilis et potens civitas, aliorum circa populorum cladibus territa portas aperuit Ro- 2 manis. Eam deditionem oppidorum haud cum fide factam quidam auctores sunt: e qua regione abduxisset legiones, extemplo inde rebellatum, magnoque eum[2] postea proelio ad montem Chaunum cum Celtiberis a prima luce ad sextam horam diei signis 3 collatis pugnasse, multos utrimque cecidisse; nec aliud magnopere cur vicisse crederes fecisse[3] Romanos, nisi quod[4] postero die lacessierint[5] proelio 4 manentes intra vallum, spolia[6] per totum diem legisse;[7] tertio die proelio maiore iterum pugnatum et tum demum haud dubie victos Celtiberos castraque 5 eorum capta et direpta esse. Viginti duo milia hostium eo die esse caesa, plus trecentos captos, parem fere equorum numerum, et signa militaria septuaginta duo. Inde debellatum[8] veramque pacem, non fluxa ut ante fide Celtiberos fecisse.[9]

[1] arma pro me piguit suscipere Heraeus: ad me propiunt suspicere Mog.

[2] eum Frob. 35: om. Mog.

[3] cur vicisse crederes fecisse Madvig: berbice crederes fuisse Mog.

[4] quod Gronovius: qui Mog.

[5] lacessierint Gronovius: arcessierint Mog.

[6] spolia, ante intra in Mog. positum, transp. Gronovius.

[7] legisse Frob. 31: legisset Mog.

[8] debellatum Frob. 31: bellatum Mog.

and his children to live. When the praetor had replied that he should live, he next asked whether it was permitted to serve with the Romans. When Gracchus granted this too, "I shall follow you, then," he said, "against my old allies, since they have disdained to take up arms for me." Thenceforth he followed the Romans, and with courageous and constant help aided the Roman cause in many places. B.C. 179

L. Ergavica next, a renowned and powerful city, having been terrified by the fall of other peoples around them, opened its gates to the Romans. Some writers say that these surrenders of towns were not made in good faith: that there was immediate rebellion in every region from which Gracchus had withdrawn his legions, and that later, in a great battle in the Chaunus mountains, he fought with the Celtiberians from daybreak to the sixth hour of the day in pitched battle with heavy losses on both sides; that the Romans gave no conspicuous indication which would lead one to believe that they were victorious except that the next day they harried the enemy, who remained within the rampart; that all through that day they collected spoils; that on the third day another and greater battle was fought and this time at length the Celtiberians were undoubtedly beaten and their camp taken and plundered. Twenty-two thousand of the enemy, these writers report, were killed that day and more than three hundred captured, together with an equal number of horses and seventy-two military standards. From that time, they say, the war was over and the Celtiberians kept true peace, not with wavering loyalty

[9] fecisse Sigonius: fuisse Mog.

A.U.C. 575

6 Eadem aestate et L. Postumium in Hispania ulteriore bis cum Vaccaeis egregie pugnasse scribunt: ad triginta et quinque milia hostium occidisse et castra
7 expugnasse.[1] Propius vero est serius in provinciam pervenisse quam ut ea aestate potuerit res gerere.

LI. Censores fideli concordia senatum legerunt.[2] Princeps lectus est ipse censor M. Aemilius Lepidus pontifex maximus: tres eiecti de senatu; retinuit
2 quosdam Lepidus a collega praeteritos. Opera ex pecunia attributa divisaque inter se haec fecerunt.[3] Lepidus molem ad Tarracinam, ingratum opus, quod praedia habebat ibi privatamque publicae rei impen-
3 sam inseruerat;[4] theatrum et proscaenium ad Apollinis, aedem Iovis in Capitolio, columnasque circa poliendas albo locavit; et ab his columnis, quae incommode opposita videbantur, signa amovit clipeaque de columnis et signa militaria adfixa omnis
4 generis dempsit. M. Fulvius plura et maioris

[1] expugnasse Gronovius: oppugnasse Mog.
[2] legerunt Frob. 31: elegerunt Mog.
[3] fecerunt Madvig: confecerunt Mog.
[4] inseruerat Doujat: insuerat Mog.

---

[1] Livy says nothing on his own authority about the campaigns of Postumius, and gives no reasons for his doubt of the accuracy of the accounts which he has just quoted. In his zeal to refute them he overlooks the fact that this was the second summer of Postumius in Spain, and that even in the first summer he had arrived there earlier than Gracchus (xxxix. 3 above).

[2] His predecessor Lucius Valerius Flaccus, who had died the preceding year (xlii. 6 above), had also been censor.

[3] i.e., the colleague had been in favour of rejecting these men also, as indicated by his not having included them in the "approved" list. The agreement of the censors was necessary for expulsion.

as before. They write that in the same summer B.C. 179
Lucius Postumius also, in Farther Spain, twice fought successfully with the Vaccaei; that he had slain about thirty-five thousand of the enemy and taken their camp. It is nearer the truth to say that he came to the province too late to have been able to accomplish anything that summer.[1]

LI. The censors chose the senate faithfully and harmoniously. The princeps senatus selected was Marcus Aemilius Lepidus himself, a censor and the pontifix maximus;[2] three were expelled from the senate; Lepidus retained some who had been passed over by his colleague.[3] Public works, out of the money assigned and divided between them, they carried out as follows. Lepidus built a mole at Tarracina, a work which brought him censure because he owned property there and had included with expenditures chargeable to the state some private expenses; he contracted for a theatre and proscenium-building[4] at the temple of Apollo, and for the cleaning and whitening of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline and of the columns around it; and from these columns he removed the statues which seemed to be so placed as to obstruct the view, and he took down the shields from the columns and the military standards of every sort which were affixed to them. Marcus Fulvius contracted for [4] By theatrum Livy means the auditorium (cavea), a common meaning of the Greek θέατρον. Perhaps the theatre was used only for the Apollo cult; if it was an actual theatre, it was the earliest of permanent character in Rome, although that distinction is usually given to the theatre of Pompey, erected more than a century later. This theatre may have been torn down by later censors, but the fact is not recorded.

A.U.C. 575

locavit usus: portum et pilas pontis in Tiberi, quibus pilis fornices post aliquot annos P. Scipio Africanus et L. Mummius censores locaverunt imponendos; 5 basilicam post argentarias novas et forum piscatorium circumdatis tabernis quas vendidit in privatum; 6 et [1] porticum extra portam Trigeminam, et aliam post navalia et ad fanum Herculis et post Spei ad 7 Tiberim et ad [2] aedem Apollinis Medici. Habuere et in promiscuo praeterea [3] pecuniam: ex ea communiter locarunt aquam adducendam fornicesque faciendos. Impedimento operi fuit M. Licinius Crassus, qui per fundum suum duci non est passus. 8 Portoria quoque et vectigalia iidem multa instituerunt. Complura sacella publicaque loca,[4] occupata a privatis, publica sacraque ut essent paterentque [5] 9 populo curarunt. Mutarunt suffragia regionatimque generibus hominum causisque et quaestibus tribus discripserunt.[6]

[1] et Ussing: et forum et Mog.
[2] et ad Dreller: om. Mog.
[3] praeterea Sigonius: praetores Mog.
[4] loca Madvig: sua Mog.
[5] essent paterentque Pighius: paterent essentque Mog.
[6] discripserunt Buecheler: descripserunt Mog.

[1] It was probably near the bridge.

[2] The bridge is the pons Aemilius, finished by Scipio Aemilianus and Mummius in their censorship in 142 B.C. The single arch still standing in the river may belong to it.

[3] On the north side of the Forum. Originally called basilica Fulvia or Aemilia et Fulvia, its restorations by later Aemilii have caused it to be known as basilica Aemilia. For the earlier basilica Porcia cf. XXXIX. xliv. 7 and the note.

[4] It lay to the north of the basilica and was probably identical with the macellum of XXVII. xi. 16.

[5] If et forum should be read before et porticum, it may refer to the forum Pistorum below the Aventine, but information as to this is scanty.

additional works and of greater utility: a harbour[1] B.C. 179 and the piles for a bridge over the Tiber, the piles on which many years later Publius Scipio Africanus and Lucius Mummius in their censorship contracted for the construction of arches,[2] a basilica behind the new shops of the silver-smiths[3] and a fish-market[4] with shops about it which he sold for private use; also a portico[5] outside the Porta Trigemina, and another behind the dock-yards, and near the shrine of Hercules, and behind the temple of Spes on the Tiber, and near the shrine of Apollo Medicus.[6] They had, besides, money in common: from this they let contracts in the names of both for the construction of an aqueduct and the erection of arches. This undertaking was blocked by Marcus Licinius Crassus, who would not permit the aqueduct to run across his property.[7] The same censors established many port-dues and taxes.[8] Many shrines and public places, occupied by private persons, they caused to be public and sacred and open to the people. They changed the method of voting and constituted the tribes according to districts and to the classes and situations and occupations of the members.[9]

[6] The temples of Spes and Apollo were probably in the region of the forum Olitorium, that of Hercules in the forum Boarium. The portico system then seems to connect the two districts where Fulvius was most active, that near the upper end of the island and that below the Aventine.

[7] Condemnation of private property for such purposes was not authorized. Nothing more seems to be known about this project, and it may have fallen through by reason of the opposition of Crassus.

[8] Particularly on public lands which were in private hands.

[9] Unfortunately, Livy is not explicit as to this reorganization, and we cannot go beyond speculation.

A.U.C. 575

LII. Et alter ex censoribus M. Aemilius petiit ab senatu ut sibi dedicationis causa [1] templorum reginae Iunonis et Dianae, quae bello Ligustino ante annis 2 octo vovisset, pecunia ad ludos decerneretur. Viginti 3 milia aeris decreverunt. Dedicavit eas aedes, utramque in circo Flaminio, ludosque scaenicos triduum post dedicationem templi Iunonis, biduum post Dianae, 4 et singulos dies fecit in circo. Idem dedicavit aedem Larum [2] permarinum in Campo. Voverat eam annis undecim [3] ante L. Aemilius Regillus navali 5 proelio adversus praefectos regis Antiochi. Supra valvas templi tabula cum titulo hoc fixa est: " Duello magno dirimendo, regibus subigendis,[4] patrandae pacis causa [5] haec pugna exeunti L. Aemilio M. Aemilii filio. . . .[6] Auspicio imperio felicitate ductu- 6 que eius inter Ephesum Samum Chiumque, inspectante eopse [7] Antiocho, exercitu omni, equitatu elephantisque, classis regis Antiochi antehac invicta [8] fusa contusa fugataque est, ibique eo die naves longae cum omnibus sociis captae quadraginta [9] duae. Ea pugna pugnata rex Antiochus regnumque.

[1] causa Madvig: om. Mog.
[2] Larum Heraeus: larium Mog.
[3] undecim Sigonius: quadraginta Mog.
[4] dirimendo regibus subigendis Caesius Bassus, De re metr. 8 (VI. 265 K): regibus dirimendo caput subigendis Mog.
[5] causa H. J. Mueller: om. Mog.
[6] lacunam indicavit Madvig: vid. quae Anglice scripsi.
[7] eopse Ritschl: cos. ipso Mog.
[8] invicta Weissenborn: sic victa Mog.
[9] quadraginta Glareanus: sexaginta Mog.

---

[1] Cf. XXXIX. ii. 8; 11 and the note.
[2] They had been more generous to Fulvius in 187 B.C. (XXXIX. v. 10).

LII. Moreover, one of the censors, Marcus B.C 179 Aemilius, asked the senate that money should be assigned to him for the games in connection with the dedication of the temples which he had vowed to Queen Juno and Diana eight years before in the Ligurian war.[1] They voted twenty thousand asses.[2] He dedicated these temples, both in the circus Flaminius, and gave scenic games for three days after the dedication of the temple to Juno, two days in the case of Diana, and games in the circus for one day for each. He also dedicated a temple to the Lares of the Sea in the Campus.[3] Lucius Aemilius Regillus had vowed this eleven years before during the naval battle against the prefects of King Antiochus.[4] Above the doors of the temple a tablet was fixed bearing this inscription: "For finishing a great war, for subduing kings, this battle, fought for the purpose of winning peace, (gave victory) to Lucius Aemilius, the son of Marcus Aemilius, as he left the field.[5] Under his auspices and command, with his good fortune and generalship, in the area bounded by Ephesus, Samos and Chios, under the eyes of Antiochus himself, of all his army, his cavalry and his elephants, the fleet of King Antiochus, hitherto undefeated, was routed, shattered and put to flight, and there on that day forty-two ships[6] were taken with all their crews. As a result of the finishing of this battle King Antiochus was defeated and his naval empire (over-

[3] These divinities extended to mariners the protection offered to home-dwellers by the Lares of the household.

[4] The vow was not mentioned in XXXVII. xxix–xxx.

[5] I have tried merely to give a possible meaning to a defective sentence.

[6] Cf. XXXVII. xxx. 7 and the note.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 575

. . . [1] Eius rei ergo aedem Laribus permarinis 7 vovit." Eodem exemplo tabula in aede Iovis in Capitolio supra valvas fixa est.

LIII. Biduo, quo senatum legerunt censores, Q. Fulvius consul profectus in Ligures, per invios montes Ballistae [2] saltus cum exercitu transgressus, 2 signis collatis cum hoste pugnavit: neque tantum acie vicit sed castra quoque eodem die cepit. Tria milia ducenti hostium omnisque ea regio Ligurum in 3 deditionem venit. Consul deditos in campestres agros deduxit, praesidiaque montibus imposuit. Celeriter et ex provincia litterae Romam venerunt: supplicationes ob eas res gestas in triduum decretae
4 sunt; praetores quadraginta hostiis maioribus per supplicationes rem divinam fecerunt. Ab altero consule L. Manlio nihil memoria dignum in Liguribus
5 est gestum. Galli Transalpini, tria milia hominum, in [3] Italiam transgressi, neminem bello lacessentes agrum a consulibus et senatu petebant ut pacati sub 6 imperio populi Romani essent. Eos senatus excedere Italia iussit et consulem Q. Fulvium quaerere et animadvertere in eos qui principes et auctores transcendendi Alpes fuissent.

LIV. Eodem anno Philippus rex Macedonum, senio et maerore consumptus post mortem filii,
2 decessit. Demetriade hibernabat, cum desiderio

[1] lacunam indicavit Madvig.
[2] Ballistae Heraeus: vallesque Mog.
[3] in Frob. 31: om. Mog.

[1] Again I have tried merely to give a plausible conclusion to an incomplete sentence.

[2] The form fixa est in sect. 5 leaves it uncertain whether Livy himself saw this inscription, especially since it recurs in sect. 7, and it is not likely that the Capitoline copy survived the fires.

thrown).[1] By reason of this victory he vowed a B.C. 179 temple to the Lares of the Sea."[2] A tablet to the same effect was set up in the temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline above the doors.

LIII. Two days after the censors chose the senate, Quintus Fulvius the consul set out against the Ligurians, making his way with his army across the pathless mountains and crossing the pass of Ballista, and fought a pitched battle with the enemy; he not only conquered them on the field but captured their camp the same day. Three thousand two hundred of the enemy and all this region of the Ligurians surrendered. The consul transferred the surrendered to lands in the plains[3] and set garrisons over the mountains. Quickly, too, dispatches from the province came to Rome; a thanksgiving for three days was decreed because of these successes, and the praetors sacrificed forty full-grown victims in the course of the thanksgiving. The other consul, Lucius Manlius, did nothing worth recording among the Ligurians. The transalpine Gauls, three thousand in number, crossing into Italy and harrying no one in war, asked land from the consuls and the senate, that they might live in peace under the rule of the Roman people. The senate ordered them to leave Italy, and instructed the consul Quintus Fulvius to search out and punish the leaders and proposers of the plan to cross the Alps.

LIV. The same year[4] Philip, king of the Macedonians, died, broken down by age and grief at the death of his son. He was wintering at Demetrias,

[3] That is, in their own territory.

[4] The narrative of affairs in the east is resumed after having been broken off at xxiv. 8 above.

A.U.C. 575

anxius filii, tum paenitentia crudelitatis suae. 3 Stimulabat[1] animum et alter filius haud dubie et sua et aliorum opinione rex, conversique in eum omnium oculi, et destituta senectus aliis exspectantibus suam 4 mortem, aliis ne exspectantibus quidem. Quo magis angebatur, et[2] cum eo Antigonus Echecratis filius, nomen patrui Antigoni ferens, qui tutor Philippi fuerat, regiae vir maiestatis, nobili etiam pugna adversus Cleomenem Lacedaemonium clarus. 5 Tutorem eum Graeci, ut cognomine a ceteris regibus 6 distinguerent, appellarunt. Huius fratris filius Antigonus ex honoratis Philippi amicis unus incorruptus permanserat, eique ea fides nequaquam amicum 7 Persea inimicissimum fecerat. Is prospiciens animo quanto cum periculo suo hereditas regni ventura[3] esset ad Persea, ut primum labare animum regis 8 et ingemiscere interdum filii desiderio sensit, nunc praebendo aures, nunc lacessendo etiam mentionem rei temere actae, saepe querenti querens et ipse aderat. Et cum multa, ut[4] adsolet, veritas praeberet[5] vestigia sui, omni ope adiuvabat, quo maturius 9 omnia emanarent. Suspecti ut[6] ministri facinoris Apelles maxime et Philocles erant, qui Romam legati

[1] stimulabat Florebellus: quae stimulabat Mog.
[2] et Frob. 35: om. Mog.
[3] regni ventura Frob. 35: ventura regni Mog.
[4] ut Weissenborn: om. Mog.
[5] praeberet Weissenborn: praebere Mog.
[6] ut Bekker: et Mog.

[1] Diodorus (XXIX. xxv) says of him: τῇ δὲ λύπῃ ἀδιορθώτως κατέστρεψε τὸν βίον.

[2] Cf. XXXIV. xxviii. 1.

[3] Livy's Tutor does not really correspond to the Greek Δώσων; "always promising," which according to Plutarch Coriolanus 11 was given in mockery. (One is tempted to read distressed both by longing for his son and by repentance[1] of his own cruelty. His mind was further disturbed, firstly by his other son, who was already and beyond doubt the king, both in his own opinion and that of others, the eyes of all being turned upon him, secondly, by the loneliness of his own old age, since some were waiting for his death and others not even waiting for it. All this caused him the more distress, as it did to Antigonus the son of Echecrates, who bore the name of his uncle Antigonus, the guardian of Philip, a man of regal dignity, and renowned also for the famous battle against Cleomenes the Lacedaemonian.[2] The surname "the guardian"[3] was given him by the Greeks to distinguish him from the other of that name. The younger Antigonus, the son of his brother Echecrates, of all the friends whom Philip had honoured, alone remained uncorrupted, and this loyalty to Philip had made Perseus, under no circumstances a friend, a most deadly foe. Foreseeing in his mind with how great danger to himself the inheritance of the kingdom would fall to Perseus, as soon as he saw that the mind of the king was wavering and that he sometimes grieved at the loss of his son Demetrius, now by listening to him, now by even provoking him to talk of that rash act, with laments of his own he echoed the laments of Philip. And while the truth, as usually happens, was offering many foretokens of itself, he aided with all his might in bringing everything to light with greater speed. Suspicion had fallen particularly upon Apelles and Philocles as the instigators of the crime, since they had been the ambassadors to Rome and had brought B.C. 179

Daturum, which would correspond, for Tutorem—E. H. Warmington.)

A.U.C. 575

fuerant litterasque exitiales Demetrio sub nomine Flaminini attulerant.

LV. Falsas esse et a scriba vitiatas signumque adulterinum vulgo in regia fremebant. Ceterum cum suspecta magis quam manifesta esset res, forte Xychus obvius fit Antigono, comprehensusque ab eo in regiam est perductus. Relicto eo custodibus Antigonus ad Philippum processit. "Multis" inquit "sermonibus intellexisse videor magno te aestimaturum, si scire vera omnia possis de filiis tuis, uter ab utro petitus fraude et insidiis esset. Homo unus omnium, qui nodum huius erroris exsolvere possit, in potestate tua est Xychus. Forte oblatum [1] perductumque in regiam vocari iube." Regi adductus primo ita negare inconstanter ut parvo metu admoto [2] paratum indicem esse appareret. Conspectum tortoris verberumque non sustinuit, ordinemque omnem facinoris legatorum ministeriique sui exposuit. Extemplo missi qui legatos comprehenderent, Philoclem qui praesens erat oppresserunt: Apelles missus ad Chaeream quendam persequendum [3] indicio Xychi audito in Italiam traiecit. De Philocle nihil certi vulgatum est: alii primo audaciter negantem,[4] postquam in conspectum adductus sit Xychus, non ultra tetendisse, alii tormenta etiam infitiantem pessum affirmant.[5] Philippo redintegratus est

[1] oblatum Faber: vocatum Mog.
[2] admoto Frob. 31: amoto Mog.
[3] quendam persequendum Frob. 31: persequendum quendam Mog.
[4] negantem Frob. 31: negant Mog.
[5] affirmant Frob. 31: affirmabant Mog.

[1] Livy speaks as if the name of Xychus were familiar although he has not mentioned him before. He probably follows Polybius closely but omits a cross-reference.

the letter, fatal to Demetrius, which bore the name of Flamininus. B.C. 179

LV. That the letter was a forgery, the falsification of a scribe, and the seal a counterfeit, was the muttering of all the palace. But while the facts were suspected rather than established by proof, Xychus [1] by chance encountered Antigonus and was arrested by him and taken to the palace. Leaving him in the care of guards, Antigonus went to Philip and addressed him thus: "I seem to have understood from many conversations that you will value it highly if you can learn the whole truth about your sons, which of the two was attacked by the other with treachery and ambush. There is one man in all the world who can untie the knot of this uncertainty, and this man, Xychus, is in your hands. Since he happened to come in my way and has been by me brought to the palace, order him to be summoned." When Xychus was brought before the king, he at first denied everything so irresolutely that it was clear that he would be a ready witness under the stimulus of a little terror. He did not endure even the sight of the torturer and the lash, but set forth the whole sequence of events in the crime of the ambassadors and his own service in connection with it. At once men were sent out to arrest the ambassadors, and Philocles, who was at hand, was seized: Apelles, who had been sent in pursuit of a certain Chaereas, hearing of the testimony of Xychus, crossed to Italy. With regard to Philocles there is no certain information: some say that after boldly denying his guilt at first, when he was confronted with Xychus he did not hold out longer, others assert that he even suffered torture while still making denial. Philip's grief was luctus geminatusque; et infelicitatem suam in liberis graviorem quod alter superesset[1] censebat.

A.U.C. 575

LVI. Perseus certior factus omnia[2] detecta esse, potentior quidem erat quam ut fugam necessariam 2 duceret: tantum ut procul abesset curabat, interim velut ab incendio flagrantis irae, dum Philippus viveret, se defensurus. Is[3] spe potiundi ad poenam corporis eius amissa, quod reliquum erat, id studere ne super impunitatem etiam praemio sceleris frueretur. 3 Antigonum[4] igitur appellat, cui et palam facti parricidii gratia obnoxius erat, et nequaquam[5] pudendum aut paenitendum eum regem Macedonibus propter recentem patrui Antigoni gloriam fore 4 censebat. "Quando in eam fortunam veni," inquit[5] "Antigone, ut orbitas mihi, quam alii detestantur parentes, optabilis esse debeat, regnum, quod a patruo tuo forti non solum fideli tutela eius custoditum et auctum etiam accepi, id tibi tradere in 5 animo est. Te unum habeo quem dignum regno iudicem. Se neminem haberem, perire et exstingui id mallem quam Perseo scelestae fraudis praemium esse. 6 Demetrium excitatum ab inferis restitutumque credam mihi, si te, qui morti innocentis, qui meo infelici errori unus illacrimasti, in locum eius 7 substitutum relinquam." Ab hoc sermone omni

[1] superesset Sigonius: perisset Mog.
[2] Perseus certior factus omnia Frob. 35: o. P. c. f. Mog.
[3] is Weissenborn: om. Mog.
[4] Antigonum Frob. 31: Antiochus eum Mog.
[5] nequaquam Weissenborn: neque Mog.

renewed and doubled; and he believed that his unhappiness in his children was the greater because the second remained. B.C. 179

LVI. When Perseus was informed that everything had been discovered he was indeed too strong to consider that flight was necessary: he arranged only to remain far away, being prepared to defend himself against the flames of burning anger while Philip lived. Philip, although disappointed in the hope of seizing his person for punishment, turned his attention to the course which was still open to him—of seeing to it that Perseus might not, in addition to impunity, also enjoy the profit of his crime. He therefore summoned Antigonus, to whom he was indebted in return for his having exposed the murder, and who, he believed, would be a king about whom the Macedonians need by no means be ashamed or abashed, on account of the recent fame of his uncle Antigonus. "Since I have come to such a state, Antigonus," he said, "that the bereavement which other parents try to avert cannot but seem to be a blessing, the kingdom which I received from your uncle, held in safe-keeping and even made still greater by his courageous and not merely loyal guardianship, it is in my mind to bequeath to you. I have you alone whom I judge to be worthy of the throne. If I had no one, I should prefer to have it perish and be destroyed to seeing it become for Perseus the reward of his criminal treachery. I shall believe that Demetrius is raised from the dead and restored to me if I shall leave you, who alone have wept at the death of an innocent man and for my unfortunate mistake, as a substitute for him." After saying this he did not cease to distinguish him

A.U.C 575 genere honoris producere eum non destitit. Cum in Thracia Perseus abesset, circumire Macedoniae urbes principibusque Antigonum commendare; et si vita longior suppetisset, haud dubium fuit quin eum in 8 possessione regni relicturus fuerit. Ab Demetriade profectus Thessalonicae plurimum temporis moratus fuerat. Inde cum Amphipolim venisset gravi morbo 9 est implicitus. Sed animo tamen aegrum magis fuisse quam corpore constat; curisque et vigiliis, cum identidem species et umbrae insontis interempti filii agitarent, extinctum esse cum diris execration-
10 ibus [1] alterius. Tamen admoveri potuisset Antigonus si aut adfuisset aut [2] statim palam facta esset mors 11 regis. Medicus Calligenes qui curationi praeerat, non expectata morte regis, a primis desperationis notis nuntios per dispositos equos,[3] ita ut convenerat misit ad Perseum, et mortem regis in adventum eius omnes qui extra regiam erant, celavit.

LVII. Oppressit igitur necopinantes ignarosque omnes Perseus et regnum scelere partum invasit.
2 Peropportuna mors Philippi fuit ad dilationem et ad vires bello subtrahendas.[4] Nam post paucis diebus gens Bastarnarum, diu sollicitata, ab suis sedibus

[1] agitarent extinctum esse cum diris execrationibus Gronovius: c. d. a. ext. es. exe. Mog.
[2] adfuisset aut Perizonius: haud Mog.
[3] equos Sigonius: om. Mog.
[4] subtrahendas Madvig: contrahendas Mog.

[1] Livy is probably thinking of such episodes in tragedy as the curse of Oedipus (Aeschylus, Septem, etc.).

[2] The meaning is uncertain. One naturally expects this to mean the war with Rome, since Livy has been so insistent that Philip would himself have begun the war had he lived a little longer, and no one would infer from Livy's narrative that the war did not actually break out until 171 B.C. The with every mark of honour. While Perseus was absent in Thrace, Philip canvassed the cities of Macedonia and recommended Antigonus to the chiefs; and if longer life had been his lot there is no question that he would have left Antigonus in possession of the throne. Setting out from Demetrias, he had been delayed for a very long time at Thessalonica. When he had come from there to Amphipolis he was seized with a severe illness. But it is evident that his sickness was one of the mind rather than of the body; and that anxiety and loss of sleep, while again and again the shade and ghost of the innocent son whom he had killed pursued him, brought about his death while calling down dreadful curses upon his other son.[1] Nevertheless Antigonus could possibly have been advanced to the throne if he had been present or even if the death of the king had been made public at once. The physician Calligenes, who was in charge of his treatment, not anticipating the death of the king, at the first signs that the case was hopeless sent messengers to Perseus, as he had arranged to do, on relays of horses, and until his arrival concealed the death of the king from all who were outside the palace. B.C. 179

LVII. Thus Perseus caught everyone unprepared and ignorant, and grasped the sceptre which he had won by crime.

The death of Philip came at a fortunate time for delaying and for diverting strength from the war.[2] For a few days later the tribe of the Bastarnae,[3] after long solicitation, left their homes and with a great episode of the Bastarnae (note particularly the introductory nam) which follows seems an insufficient cause for so long a delay, and one is tempted to think that Livy was so conscious of the tragic quality of the action that he, like the tragic poet, could ignore the passage of time.

[3] Cf. v. 10 above.

A.U.C. 575

magna peditum equitumque manu Histrum traiecit.
3 Inde praegressi qui nuntiarent regi, Antigonus et Cotto: Cotto [1] nobilis erat Bastarna, Antigonus [2] e regiis unus, saepe [3] cum ipso Cottone legatus ad concitandos Bastarnas missus. Haud procul Amphipoli fama inde [4] certi nuntii occurrerunt mortuum esse regem. Quae res omnem ordinem consilii turbavit.
4 Compositum autem sic fuerat transitum per Thraciam tutum et commeatus Bastarnis ut Philippus praestaret.[5] Id ut facere posset regionum principes donis coluerat, fide sua obligata pacato agmine transituros
5 Bastarnas. Dardanorum gentem delere propositum erat inque eorum agro sedes dare [6] Bastarnis.
6 Duplex inde erat commodum futurum, si et Dardani, gens semper infestissima Macedoniae temporibusque iniquis regum imminens, tolleretur, et Bastarnae relictis in Dardania coniugibus liberisque ad populan-
7 dam Italiam possent mitti. Per Scordiscos iter esse ad mare Hadriaticum Italiamque; alia via traduci exercitum non posse. Facile Bastarnis Scordiscos iter

[1] Cotto Weissenborn: om. Mog.
[2] Antigonus Madvig: ea res Antigonus Mog.
[3] saepe Heraeus: saepe Iunius Mog.
[4] inde certi Drakenborch: incerti Mog.
[5] praestaret Frob. 35: daret Mog.
[6] sedes dare Frob. 31: se fundare Mog.

---

[1] Not the Antigonus whom Philip had planned to make his heir.

[2] It is perhaps easiest to visualize the geographical background by the use of modern place-names, so far as possible. The Bastarnae lived in what is now Bessarabia, on the Euxine north of the Danube delta. Philip planned to march them through northern Bulgaria, thence perhaps by the Morava valley to the Danube and west by the Danube and Save number of infantry and cavalry crossed the Hister. B.C. 179 Thence Antigonus[1] and Cotto came on in advance to bring the word to the king: Cotto was a nobleman among the Bastarnae, Antigonus one of Philip's courtiers who had often been sent with Cotto himself to stir up the Bastarnae. When they were not far from Amphipolis, first the rumour and then the authenticated tidings of the death of the king reached them. This event wholly upset the ordered plan of Philip. But it had been so arranged that Philip was to guarantee to the Bastarnae a safe passage through Thrace and also supplies. In order that he might be able to accomplish this, he had cultivated the chiefs of these districts with gifts, pledging his word that the Bastarnae would cross their territories peaceably. It had been his intention to destroy the race of the Dardanians and to give the Bastarnae homes on their lands. From this policy there was a double advantage if, in the first place, the Dardanians, a people always most hostile to Macedonia and watchful for occasions unfavourable to the kings, should be destroyed, and, secondly, if the Bastarnae, leaving their wives and children in Dardania, could be sent to plunder Italy. There was a road, he knew, through the country of the Scordisci to the Adriatic sea and Italy; an army could not be led by any other way.[2] The Scordisci valleys to the country of the Scordisci, west of Belgrade. From there the Save valley with its continuations leads to Fiume, near the head of the Adriatic. The Dardani, among whom homes for them were to be found, lived in or to the east of the Morava valley. From the standpoint of the Bastarnae, a route following the Danube and Save would have been shorter, but then they would have had no contact with Philip. Some sound geographical knowledge, then, underlies Philip's grandiose plan.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 575

daturos: nec enim aut lingua aut moribus [1] abhorrere; et ipsos adiuncturos se, cum ad praedam opulentissimae gentis ire vidissent. Inde in omnem
8 eventum consilia accommodabantur: [2] sive caesi ab Romanis forent Bastarnae, Dardanos tamen sublatos praedamque ex reliquiis Bastarnarum et possessionem
9 liberam Dardaniae solacio fore; sive prospere rem [3] gessissent, Romanis aversis [4] in Bastanarum bellum recuperaturum se in Graecia quae amisisset. Haec Philippi consilia fuerant.

LVIII. Primum ingressi sunt pacato agmine. Digressu [5] deinde Cottonis et Antigoni et haud multo post fama mortis Philippi neque Thraces commercio faciles erant, neque [6] Bastarnae empto contenti [7] esse poterant aut in agmine contineri ne decederent
2 via. Inde iniuriae ultro citroque fieri, quarum in dies incremento bellum exarsit. Postremo Thraces cum vim ac multitudinem sustinere hostium non possent, relictis campestribus vicis in montem ingentis altitudinis—Donucam vocant—concesserunt. Quo cum
3 subire [8] Bastarnae vellent, quali tempestate Gallos spoliantes Delphos fama est peremptos esse, talis tum Bastarnas nequiquam ad iuga montium appropin-

[1] moribus Duker: moribus aequales Mog.
[2] accommodabantur Sigonius: commodabantur Mog.
[3] rem Gronovius: om. Mog.
[4] aversis Frob. 31: reversis Mog.
[5] primum ingressi sunt pacato agmine. digressu Madvig: digressi sunt pacato agro Mog.
[6] neque Frob. 31: om. Mog.
[7] empto contenti Frob. 31: evito contentio Mog.
[8] cum subire Weissenborn: ubi ire Mog.

[1] The Bastarnae were Germanic, the Scordisci Gallic, but either Philip or Livy may have been misinformed on that point.

would readily give a passage to the Bastarnae: for B.C. 179 they were not very different in either language or manners;[1] and they themselves would join forces with them when they saw the Bastarnae going to plunder a most wealthy people. From that point his plans were adapted to any issue: if the Bastarnae were cut to pieces by the Romans, yet the removal of the Dardani and the booty from the remnants of the Bastarnae and the unhindered occupancy of Dardania would be his consolation; if on the other hand success attended their venture, while the attention of the Romans was distracted to the war with the Bastarnae Philip would recover his lost possessions in Greece.[2] This was the plan of Philip.

LVIII. At first the Bastarnae marched with their column peacefully inclined. Then, after the departure of Cotto and Antigonus and, not much later, after the receipt of the news of the death of Philip, neither were the Thracians easy to negotiate with nor could the Bastarnae be satisfied with what they could buy nor could they be kept in column without leaving the line of march. In consequence injuries were inflicted on both sides, and as these increased day by day war flared up. Finally, when the Thracians were unable to withstand the strength and numbers of the enemy, leaving the villages in the plains they fell back to a mountain of great height—they call it Donuca. When the Bastarnae tried to climb it, they were caught, as they attempted in vain to scale the heights of the mountains, by such a storm as that which, as the story goes, destroyed the Gauls as [2] Philip then stood to gain heavily in any case, with nothing but the trifling investment necessary to purchase the right of way through Thrace.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 575

4 quantes oppressit. Neque enim imbre tantum effuso, dein creberrima grandine obruti sunt cum ingenti fragore caeli tonitribusque et fulguribus praestrin-
5 gentibus aciem oculorum, sed fulmina etiam sic undique micabant ut peti viderentur corpora, nec solum milites sed etiam principes icti caderent.
6 Itaque cum praecipiti fuga per rupes praealtas improvidi sternerentur ruerentque, instabant quidem perculsis Thraces, sed ipsi deos auctores fugae esse
7 caelumque in se ruere aiebant. Dissipati procella cum [1] tamquam ex naufragio plerique [2] semermes in castra, unde profecti erant, redissent, consultari quid agerent coeptum. Inde orta dissensio, aliis redeundum aliis penetrandum in Dardaniam censen-
8 tibus; triginta ferme milia hominum Clondico duce quo [3] profecti erant pervenerunt, cetera multitudo retro qua venerat Apolloniam Mesembriamque [4] repetit. Perseus potitus regno interfici Antigonum iussit; et dum firmaret res, legatos Romam ad amicitiam paternam renovandam petendumque ut rex ab senatu appellaretur misit. Haec eo anno in Macedonia gesta.

LIX. Alter consulum Q. Fulvius ex Liguribus triumphavit; quem triumphum magis gratiae quam rerum gestarum magnitudini datum constabat.
2 Armorum hostilium magnam vim transtulit, nullam

[1] procella cum Frob. 31 : procellarum Mog.
[2] plerique Frob. 31 : proeliique se Mog.
[3] quo Madvig : om. Mog.
[4] Mesembriamque Heraeus : meridianam Mog.

[1] Cf. Justin XXIV. viii. 9–10.
[2] Cf. Arrian, Anab. I. iv. 8; ἔφασαν (οἱ Κέλτοι) δεδιέναι μήποτε ὁ οὐρανὸς αὐτοῖς ἐμπέσοι.
[3] These cities were on the Thracian coast of the Euxine.
[4] The Antigonus whom Philip had chosen as his successor.

they pillaged Delphi.[1] For not merely were they B.C. 179 assailed with a deluge of rain and then masses of hail, along with tremendous crashes in the sky and thunders and lightning-flashes blinding their eyes, but also the bolts flashed all about them so that they seemed to be aiming at human beings, and not only the common soldiers but even the chieftains fell stricken on the ground. So when in headlong flight in their blindness they were rushing about and falling over lofty cliffs, the Thracians too came upon them in their panic, but they themselves said that the gods were the causes of their flight and that the skies were falling upon them.[2] Scattered by the tempest, as if after a shipwreck, when many of them, half-armed, had returned to the camp whence they had set out, they began to consider what they should do. Then a disagreement arose, some thinking that they should return home, others that they should make their way into Dardania; about thirty thousand men, under the command of Clondicus, arrived at the place for which they had set out, the rest of the population returned to Apollonia and Mesembria[3] by the way they had come. Perseus, having gained the throne, ordered Antigonus[4] to be put to death; and until he could strengthen his position he sent ambassadors to Rome to renew his father's friendship and to ask that he be called king by the senate. Such were the events of the year in Macedonia.

LIX. One of the consuls, Quintus Fulvius, triumphed over the Ligurians; this triumph was clearly due to influence rather than to the greatness of his achievements.[5] He carried in the triumph a great quantity of arms taken from the enemy,

[5] Cf. the note to xliii. 4 above.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 575

pecuniam admodum. Divisit tamen in singulos milites trecenos aeris, duplex centurionibus, triplex
3 equiti. Nihil in eo triumpho magis insigne fuit quam quod forte evenit, ut eodem die triumpharet
4 quo priore anno ex praetura triumphaverat. Secundum triumphum comitia edixit, quibus creati consules
5 sunt M. Iunius Brutus A. Manlius[1] Volso. Praetorum inde tribus creatis comitia tempestas diremit. Postero die reliqui tres facti, ante diem quartum idus Martias, M. Titinius Curvus[2] Ti. Claudius Nero
6 T. Fonteius Capito. Ludi Romani instaurati ab aedilibus curulibus Cn. Servilio Caepione Ap. Claudio
7 Centone propter prodigia, quae evenerant. Terra movit; in fanis[3] publicis, ubi lectisternium erat, deorum capita quae in lectis erant averterunt se, 8 lanxque[4] cum integumentis quae Iovi apposita[5] fuit, decidit de mensa. Oleas quoque praegustasse mures in prodigium versum est. Ad ea expianda nihil ultra quam ut ludi instaurarentur actum est.

[1] A. Manlius Frob. 31 : A. Attilius Mog.
[2] Curvus Frob. 35 : om. Mog.
[3] fanis Duker : foris Mog.
[4] lanxque Cuper : lanaque Mog.
[5] apposita Sigonius : opposita Mog.

but practically no money. Still he distributed to the B.C. 179 soldiers three hundred asses each to the infantry, twice that sum to the centurions and thrice to the cavalry. Nothing in the triumph was more noteworthy than that it happened to occur on the same day on which, in the previous year, he had triumphed after his praetorship. After the triumph he announced the elections, at which Marcus Junius Brutus and Aulus Manlius Volso were chosen consuls. The election of praetors, after three had been chosen, was broken up by a storm.[1] The following day, this being the fourth day before the Ides of March, the other three were elected, Marcus Titinius Curvus, Tiberius Claudius Nero, Titus Fonteius Capito. The ludi Romani were repeated by the curule aediles, Gnaeus Servilius Caepio and Appius Claudius Cento, by reason of the prodigies which had occurred. The earth shook; in the shrines of the gods, when the lectisternium was being held, the heads of the gods who were on the couches turned away, and the platter with its lids which had been set before Jupiter fell from the table. It was also interpreted as a portent that the mice tasted the olives.[2] To make atonement for them, nothing else was done than to repeat the Games.

[1] Livy omits to mention the first three praetors (under the lex Baebia this was the year for six praetors). The names of T. Aebutius and another M. Titinius can be recovered from XLI. vi. 5 and ix. 3 respectively. The sixth may have been P. Aelius Ligur.

[2] Cf. XXVII. xxiii. 2.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

LIBRI XL PERIOCHA

Cum Philippus liberos eorum quos in vinculis habebat nobilium hominum conquiri ad mortem iussisset, Theoxena, verita pro liberis suis admodum pueris regis libidinem, prolatis in medium gladiis et poculo in quo venenum erat, suasit his ut imminens ludibrium morte effugerent, et cum persuasisset et ipsa se interemit. Certamina inter filios Philippi, Macedoniae regis, Persen et Demetrium, referuntur; et ut fraude fratris sui Demetrius fictis criminibus, inter quae [1] accusatione parricidii et affectati regni,[2] primum petitus, ad ultimum, quoniam populi R. amicus erat, veneno necatus est, regnumque Macedoniae mortuo Philippo ad Persen venit. Item res in Liguribus et Hispania contra Celtiberos feliciter gestas continet. Colonia Aquileia deducta est. Libri Numae Pompili in agro L. Petili scribae sub Ianiculo a [3] cultoribus agri arca lapidea clusi inventi sunt et Graeci et Latini. In quibus cum pleraque [4] dissolvendarum religionum praetor ad quem delati erant legisset, iuravit senatui contra rem p. esse ut legerentur servarenturque. Ex S.C. in comitio exusti sunt. Philippus aegritudine animi confectus, quod Demetrium filium falsis [5] Persei, alterius filii, in eum delationibus impulsus veneno sustulisset, et de poena Persei cogitavit voluitque Antigonum potius amicum suum successorem regni sui relinquere, sed in hac cogitatione morte raptus est. Perseus regnum excepit.

[1] inter que P^2 : inter quem P : inter * quem N : interiit qui N^2.
[2] affectati regni Frobenius : affectatione NP.
[3] a edd. : om. NP.
[4] pleraque Jahn : plura quae codd.
[5] falsis edd. : falsi codd.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XL

WHEN Philip ordered that the children of the noblemen whom he had in prison should be sought out to be put to death, Theoxena, fearing for her children, who were still young, the lust of the king, placing before them swords and a cup which contained poison, advised them to escape by death the outrage which now threatened them, and when she had persuaded them she also slew herself. The rivalries between Perseus and Demetrius, the sons of Philip, king of Macedonia, are related; and how, by the treachery of his brother and on false charges, among them a charge of parricide and of an attempt to seize the throne, Demetrius was first accused and finally, since he was friendly to the Roman people, put to death by poison, and the kingdom of Macedonia, on the death of Philip, went to Perseus. The book also contains the events among the Ligurians and the victories over the Celtiberians in Spain. The colony of Aquileia was founded. The books of Numa Pompilius, locked up in a stone chest, written in both Greek and Latin, were found by the husbandmen on the property of Lucius Petilius, a public clerk, at the foot of the Janiculan. Since in them there were many things subversive of religion, the praetor to whom they had been turned over, after reading them, gave his oath to the senate that it was against the public interest that they should be read and preserved. Under a decree of the senate they were burned in the comitium. Philip, overcome by grief of mind, because he had killed by poison his son Demetrius, in consequence of false information laid against him by his other son Perseus, both planned for the punishment of Perseus and wished to leave his friend Antigonus preferably as the successor to the throne, but in the midst of this planning was carried off by death. Perseus received the kingdom.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

BOOK XLI

BOOK XLI

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

LIBER XLI

A.U.C. 576

I. . . .[1] a patre in pace habitam armasse eoque iuventuti praedandi cupidae pergratus esse dicebatur. Consilium de Histrico bello cum haberet consul, alii gerendum extemplo, antequam contrahere copias hostes possent, alii consulendum prius senatum censebant. Vicit sententia quae diem non profere-
2 bat. Profectus ab Aquileia consul castra ad lacum Timavi posuit; imminet mari is lacus. Eodem decem navibus C. Furius duumvir navalis venit.
3 Adversus Illyriorum classem creati duumviri navales erant, qui tuendae[2] viginti navibus maris superi

[1] initium codicis deest.
[2] tuendae Muretus: tuendam Fr.

---

[1] The loss of the first two quaternions of V, the only manuscript containing these books (the second, which contained the text from i. 1 to edic. in ix. 10 was lost between 1531 and 1669, see the Preface), has deprived us of the beginning of Book XLI. Comparison with the Periocha shows that a relatively large number of topics was treated in the lost chapters. The details which I add in the translation have been derived from Florus I. xxvi. (II. x.); I have added only enough to give the sentence a possible grammatical construction.

[2] For earlier dealings with the Histrians, cf. XXXIX. lv. 4; XL. xxvi. 3.

BOOK XLI

I. . . . Aepulo[1] was said to have armed a people which had been kept in peace by his father and thus to have won great favour with the youth, who were desirous of plundering. When a council regarding a war with the Histrians[2] was held by the consul,[3] some argued that it should be begun at once, before the enemy should be able to draw his forces together, others that the senate should first be consulted.[4] That opinion prevailed which proposed no delay. The consul, setting out from Aquileia, encamped near the lake of Timavus; this lake lies close to the sea. Gaius Furius,[5] the duumvir navalis, came to the same place with a fleet of ten ships. To oppose the fleet of the Illyrians duumviri navales had been elected, who, with twenty ships to protect the coast of the upper[6] B.C. 178

[3] A. Manlius Volso (XL. lix. 4); his appointment to Gaul has not been mentioned, but was probably reported in a lost chapter.

[4] There is no record of a declaration of war against the Histrians, except as one may be implied in XL. xxvi. 3. Florus (l.c.) says that they had earlier assisted the Aetolians. Technically Manlius should have consulted the senate before proceeding against them, since their territory lay outside his province: cf. vii. 7 below.

[5] His choice in this capacity has not been mentioned before.

[6] The Adriatic.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 576

orae[1] Anconam velut cardinem haberent; inde L. Cornelius dextra litora usque ad Tarentum, C. 4 Furius laeva usque ad Aquileiam tueretur. Eae naves ad proximum portum in Histriae fines cum onerariis et magno commeatu missae, secutusque cum legionibus consul quinque ferme milia a mari 5 posuit castra. In portu emporium brevi perfrequens factum omniaque hinc in castra supportabantur. Et, quo id tutius fieret, stationes ab 6 omnibus castrorum partibus circumdatae sunt: in Histriam versum[2] praesidium stativum, repentina cohors Placentina opposita; inter mare et castra et ut idem aquatoribus ad fluvium esset praesidium, M. Aebutius tribunus militum secundae legionis 7 duos manipulos militum ducere[3] iussus est; T. et C. Aelii tribuni militum legionem tertiam, quae pabulatores et lignatores tueretur, via quae Aquile- 8 iam fert duxerant. Ab eadem regione mille ferme passuum castra erant Gallorum: Catmelus regulus praeerat[4] tribus haud amplius milibus armatorum.

II. Histri, ut primum ad lacum Timavi castra Romana sunt[5] mota, ipsi post collem occulto loco 2 consederunt, et inde obliquis itineribus agmen sequebantur, in omnem occasionem intenti; nec quicquam eos quae terra marique agerentur fallebat.

[1] superi orae Muretus: superiore Fr.
[2] Histriam (Istriam) versum J. F. Gronovius: Histriamque suum Fr.
[3] ducere Weissenborn: adiicere Fr.
[4] regulus praeerat Madvig: pro regulo erat Fr.
[5] Romana sunt Novák: sunt romana Fr.

---

[1] Cf. XL. xvii. 8 and the note.
[2] Cf. XL. xlii. 8.

sea, were to make Ancona the hinge or pivot,[1] so B.C. 178 to speak; thence Lucius Cornelius[2] was to defend the coast to the right as far as Tarentum, Gaius Furius the coast to the left as far as Aquileia. These ships were sent to the nearest harbour in Histrian territory with transports and a large quantity of supplies, and the consul, following with the legions, encamped about five miles from the sea. In a short time a market, visited by throngs, was established at the harbor, and from there everything was transported to the camp. And in order that this might be done in greater safety, outposts were established on all sides of the camp: facing Histria there was a permanent post, and an emergency cohort from Placentia stationed there; to a position between the sea and the camp, with the additional mission of protecting water-carriers at the river, Marcus Aebutius, military tribune of the second legion, was ordered to bring two maniples of his troops; Titus and Gaius Aelius, tribunes of the soldiers, had led the third legion, which was to guard the parties searching for forage and wood, on the road which leads to Aquileia. In the same area, about a mile distant, was the camp of the Gauls:[3] their chief, Catmelus, was in command of not more than three thousand armed men.

II. The Histrians, as soon as the Romans had moved their camp to the lake of Timavus, themselves took up a hidden position in a spot behind a hill, and thence over byways followed the line of march, prepared for any opportunity; nor did anything that took place on land or sea escape their observation.

[3] Gallic auxiliaries of the Romans: cf. v. 9 below.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 576

3 Postquam stationes invalidas esse pro castris, forum[1] turba inermi[2] frequens inter castra et mare mercantium sine ullo terrestri aut maritimo munimento viderunt, duo simul praesidia, Placentinae cohortis et manipulorum secundae legionis, aggrediuntur. 4 Nebula matutina texerat inceptum; qua dilabente ad primum teporem solis, perlucens iam aliquid, incerta tamen ut solet lux speciem omnium multiplicem intuenti reddens, tum quoque frustrata Romanos, multo maiorem iis quam erat hostium 5 aciem ostendit. Qua territi utriusque stationis milites ingenti tumultu cum in castra confugissent, haud paulo ibi plus quam quod secum ipsi attulerant, 6 terroris fecerunt. Nam neque dicere quid fugissent nec percunctantibus reddere responsum poterant; et clamor in portis, ut ubi nulla esset statio quae sustineret impetum, audiebatur; et concursatio in obscuro incidentium aliorum in alios incertum 7 fecerat an hostis intra vallum esset. Una vox audiebatur ad mare vocantium; id forte temere ab uno exclamatum totis passim personabat castris. 8 Itaque primo, velut iussi id facere, pauci, armati alii,[3] maior pars inermes, ad mare decurrunt, dein plures, postremo prope omnes, et ipse consul, cum frustra revocare fugientes conatus nec imperio nec auctoritate nec precibus ad extremum valuisset.

[1] forum Scaliger: eorum Fr.
[2] inermi J. F. Gronovius: inermis Fr.
[3] alii add. Weissenborn.

When they saw that the outposts in front of the camp were weak, and that the market, filled with an unarmed throng trafficking between the camp and the sea, was provided with no protection on land or on water, they at the same time attacked the two outguards, the cohort from Placentia and the maniples of the second legion. A morning fog had concealed their enterprise; and as this cleared away before the first warmth of the sun, the light now penetrating it to some extent, but as yet, as is usual, not clear and furnishing the beholder a magnified impression of everything, at this time also deceived the Romans and revealed to them a battle-line of the enemy far stronger than it really was. When the soldiers from both outposts, terrified by this sight, had fled to the camp with mighty uproar they caused far more panic there than they had brought with them. For they could neither explain from what they had fled nor answer any persons who questioned them; and some shouting at the gates was heard, showing that no guards were there to withstand an assault; and the rushing about in the dark, as one man collided with another, had made it uncertain whether or not the enemy was inside the rampart. One voice was heard, that of men calling them to the sea; this cry, perhaps raised without design by a single man, rang everywhere through the whole camp. And so a few at first, as if they had been ordered to do this, some armed, the majority unarmed, rushed down to the sea, then larger numbers, finally almost all of them, and even the consul, when, trying in vain to recall the fugitives, he had failed at the end to accomplish anything by orders or authority or entreaties. One man alone remained, Marcus B.C. 178

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 576

9 Unus remansit M. Licinius Strabo, tribunus militum tertiae legionis, cum tribus signis ab legione sua relictus. Hunc in vacua castra impetu facto Histri, cum alius armatus iis nemo obviam isset, in praetorio instruentem atque adhortantem suos oppresserunt. 10 Proelium atrocius quam pro paucitate resistentium fuit, nec ante finitum est quam tribunus militum quique circa eum constiterant interfecti sunt. 11 Praetorio deiecto direptisque,[1] quae ibi fuerunt, ad quaestorium, forum quintanamque hostes pervenerunt. 12 Ibi cum omnium rerum paratam expositamque copiam et stratos lectos in quaestorio invenissent, 13 regulus accubans epulari coepit. Mox idem ceteri omnes, armorum hostiumque obliti, faciunt; et ut quibus insuetus liberalior victus esset avidius vino ciboque corpora onerant.

III. Nequaquam eadem est tum rei forma apud Romanos; terra mari trepidatur; nautici tabernacula detendunt commeatumque in litore expositum in 2 naves rapiunt; milites in scaphas et mare territi ruunt; nautae metu ne compleantur navigia, alii turbae obsistunt, alii ab litore naves in altum expel- 3 lunt. Inde certamen, mox etiam pugna cum vulneribus et caede in vicem militum nautarumque oritur, donec iussu consulis procul a terra classis

[1] direptisque Drakenborch: direptis Fr.

---

[1] This street lay in the south-west quadrant of the camp. Along it were booths for the sale of stores.

[2] I.e., for a banquet. Discipline in the camp was not very strict.

Licinius Strabo, military tribune of the third legion, B.C. 178 having along with three companies been left behind by his legion. The Histrians, bursting into the empty camp, when no other armed man had met them, bore down upon him at the headquarters as he was forming his men and encouraging them. A battle began, fiercer than one would expect considering the small number of defenders, and did not stop until the tribune of the soldiers and the men who had made a stand with him had fallen. The enemy, tearing down the general's tent and plundering whatever was there, moved on to the quaestor's quarters, the market, and the via quintana.[1] When they had found there abundance of everything ready and laid out, and in the quaestor's quarters couches spread,[2] the chief reclined and began to dine. Presently all the others, forgetting their arms and the enemy, did the same; and since the rather rich fare was strange to them, they greedily loaded their bodies with wine and food.

III. The state of affairs among the Romans was not at all the same at this moment; on land, on sea there was confusion; the sailors were striking their tents and were hurrying off to the ships the provisions set out on the shore; the terrified soldiers were rushing to the small boats and into the sea; some of the sailors, in the fear that the ships would be overcrowded, were blocking the onrush of the crowd while others were pushing out the ships from the shore into deep water. Then there was a struggle and soon even a battle, marked by the wounding and slaying of soldiers and sailors in turn, until the fleet was removed far from the land by order of the consul, who next began to segregate the armed

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 576

4 submota est. Secernere inde inermes ab armatis coepit. Vix mille ducenti ex tanta multitudine qui arma haberent, perpauci equites, qui equos secum eduxissent, inventi sunt; cetera deformis turba velut lixarum calonumque, praeda vere futura, si 5 belli hostes meminissent. Tunc demum nuntius missus [1] ad tertiam legionem revocandam et Gallorum praesidium; et simul ex omnibus locis ad castra recipienda demendamque ignominiam rediri coeptum 6 est. Tribuni militum tertiae legionis pabulum lignaque proicere iubent, centurionibus imperant ut graviores aetate milites binos in ea iumenta ex quibus onera deiecta erant imponant; equites ut singulos e iuvenibus pedites secum in equos tollant: 7 egregiam gloriam legionis fore si castra metu secundanorum amissa sua virtute recipiant. Et recipi facile esse si in praeda occupati barbari subito 8 opprimantur; sicut ceperint, posse capi. Summa militum alacritate adhortatio audita est. Ferunt citati signa, nec signiferos armati morantur. Priores tamen consul copiaeque quae a mari reducebantur 9 ad vallum accesserunt. L. Atius, tribunus primus 10 secundae legionis, non hortabatur modo milites sed docebat etiam, si victores Histri, quibus armis cepissent castra, iisdem capta retinere in animō

[1] missus add. Weissenborn.

[1] Cf. supra ch. i. 7, the pabulatores and lignatores.

men from the unarmed. There were barely B.C. 178 twelve hundred out of so great a crowd who had their weapons, and a very few cavalry were found who had brought their horses away with them; the rest were a motley crowd like servants and sutlers, surely destined to be booty if the enemy had bethought himself of the war. Then finally a messenger was sent to recall the third legion and the Gallic contingent, and at the same time from all sides there began the movement back to recover the camp and to wipe out the disgrace. The military tribunes of the third legion ordered foraging parties [1] to abandon the forage and wood they had collected, directed the centurions to mount two of the older soldiers on each pack-animal whose load had been removed, and the cavalry to take one each of the younger infantrymen with them on their horses: they told them that the legion would win a fair report if by their valour they should recover the camp which had been lost through the panic of the men of the second legion. The recovery of the camp would be easy, they said, if the barbarians could be suddenly surprised while engaged with the booty; just as they had taken it, so it could be taken from them. This exhortation was listened to with great enthusiasm on the part of the soldiers. They advanced the standards at full speed, nor did the troops lag behind the standard-bearers. Nevertheless the consul and the troops who were being brought back from the sea reached the rampart ahead of them. Lucius Atius, the senior tribune of the second legion, not only urged on the men but also showed them that if the victorious Histrians intended to hold the captured camp with the same arms haberent, primum exutum castris hostem ad mare persecuturos fuisse, deinde stationes certe pro vallo habituros: vino somnoque veri simile esse mersos iacere.

A.U.C. 576

IV. Sub haec A. Baeculonium, signiferum suum, notae fortitudinis virum, inferre signum iussit. 2 Ille, si se [1] sequerentur quo celerius fieret facturum dixit; conisusque cum trans vallum signum traie- 3 cisset, primus omnium portam intravit. Et parte alia T. et C. Aelii, tribuni militum tertiae legionis, cum equitatu adveniunt. Confestim et quos binos oneraria in iumenta imposuerant secuti, et consul 4 cum toto agmine. At Histrorum pauci qui modice vino usi erant,[2] memores fuerant fugae, aliis somno mors continuata est; integraque sua omnia Romani, praeterquam quod vini cibique absumptum erat, 5 receperunt. Aegri quoque milites, qui in castris relicti fuerant, postquam intra vallum suos senserunt, 6 armis arreptis caedem ingentem fecerunt. Ante omnes insignis opera fuit C. Popili equitis; Sabello cognomen erat. Is pede saucio relictus longe 7 plurimos hostium occidit. Ad octo milia Histrorum

[1] se Novák: unum se Fr.
[2] vino usi erant Heerwagen: uinosi erant Fr.

[1] If suum is correct, it would imply that either the legion had a standard, as well as each of its maniples, or that the commander had a personal flag; neither of these is known to have been true in the second century, and Livy may have been thinking of the later legion, which did have its own standard.

with which they had captured it, they would first B.C. 178 have pursued to the sea the enemy, driven from his camp, and then at least have posted guards in front of the rampart; it was very probable that they were lying sunk in wine and sleep.

IV. Thereupon he directed his guidon-bearer,[1] Aulus Baeculonius, a man of tried courage, to carry forward the standard. He replied that if they would follow him he would cause it to happen the more quickly; and when with a great effort he had hurled the standard over the rampart, he was the first of all to enter the gate.[2] And on another side Titus and Gaius Aelius, military tribunes of the third legion, were coming up with the cavalry. Straightway also came the soldiers whom they had mounted in pairs on the pack-animals, and the consul with the main body. But a few of the Histrians, who had indulged only moderately in the wine, bethought them of flight, for the rest, death was a prolongation of sleep; and the Romans recovered their possessions in their entirety, except for the wine and food that had been consumed. Even the sick troops, who had been left inside the camp, when they learned that their comrades were within the rampart, seized their arms and wrought great slaughter. Conspicuous beyond the rest was the performance of a trooper, Gaius Popilius; his cognomen was Sabellus. He, though wounded in the foot and left behind, killed by far the largest number of the enemy. About eight thousand of the Histrians were slain, none

[2] This picturesque feat, only resorted to in extreme emergencies (e.g. XXXIV. xlvi. 12) seems unnecessary if the Histrians were not defending the rampart (iii. 10 above). Livy has perhaps confused or misunderstood sources.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

A.U.C. 576

sunt caesa, captus nemo, quia ira et indignatio immemores praedae fecit. Rex tamen Histrorum temulentus ex convivio, raptim a suis in equum 8 impositus, fugit. Ex victoribus ducenti triginta septem milites perierunt, plures in matutina fuga quam in recipiendis castris.

V. Forte ita evenit ut Cn. et L. Gavillii Novelli, Aquileienses, cum commeatu venientes, ignari 2 prope in capta castra ab Histris inciderent. Ii cum Aquileiam relictis impedimentis refugissent, omnia terrore ac tumultu non Aquileiae modo, sed Romae quoque post paucos dies impleverunt; 3 quo non capta tantum castra ab hostibus nec fuga, quae vera erant,[1] sed perditas res deletumque 4 exercitum omnem allatum est. Itaque, quod in tumultu fieri solet, dilectus extra ordinem non in urbe tantum, sed tota Italia indicti. Duae legiones civium Romanorum conscriptae, et decem milia peditum cum equitibus quingentis sociis nominis 5 Latini imperata. M. Iunius consul transire in Galliam et ab civitatibus provinciae eius quantum quaeque 6 posset militum exigere iussus. Simul decretum ut Ti.[2] Claudius praetor militibus legionis quartae et socium Latini nominis quinque milibus, equitibus[3] ducentis quinquaginta, Pisas ut convenirent ediceret, eamque provinciam dum consul inde abesset tutare-

[1] erant J. F. Gronovius: erat Fr.
[2] Ti. Sigonius: T. Fr.
[3] equitibus J. F. Gronovius: equitum Fr.

[1] praetor peregrinus (XL. lix. 5, cf. XL. xxvi. 7).

captured, for rage and passion made the Romans B.C. 178 heedless of booty. Nevertheless the chieftain of the Histrians, drunk as he was from the banquet, was hastily placed on a horse by his companions and escaped. Of the victors two hundred and thirty-seven fell, more in the flight in the morning than in the retaking of the camp.

V. It so happened by chance that Gnaeus and Lucius Gavillius Novellus, from Aquileia, coming with provisions and not knowing what had happened, almost stumbled upon the camp which had been taken by the Histrians. When they, leaving their belongings, had fled to Aquileia, they filled everything with consternation and confusion, not only at Aquileia, but also, a few days later, at Rome; where the report was brought not merely that the camp had been captured by the enemy and that the Romans had fled (as was the case), but also that all was lost and the whole army destroyed. And so, as is usually done in times of panic, extraordinary levies were proclaimed not in the City alone but throughout Italy. Two legions of Roman citizens were enlisted and ten thousand infantry with five hundred cavalry were levied upon the allies of the Latin confederacy. Marcus Junius the consul was directed to cross into Gaul and to demand from the states of that province as many soldiers as each could furnish. At the same time it was decreed that Tiberius Claudius the praetor[1] should issue an edict to the soldiers of the fourth legion and to five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse of the allies of the Latin confederacy that they should assemble at Pisa, and that Claudius should defend that province during the consul's absence; and also

A.U.C. 576

7 tur; M. Titinius praetor legionem primam, parem numerum sociorum peditum equitumque, Ariminum
8 convenire iuberet. Nero paludatus Pisas in provinciam est profectus; Titinius C. Cassio tribuno militum Ariminum qui praeesset legioni misso
9 dilectum Romae habuit. M. Iunius consul ex Liguribus in provinciam Galliam transgressus, auxiliis protinus per civitates Galliae militibusque
10 coloniis [1] imperatis, Aquileiam pervenit. Ibi certior factus exercitum incolumem esse, scriptis litteris Romam, ne tumultuarentur, ipse remissis auxiliis quae Gallis imperaverat, ad collegam est profectus.
11 Romae magna ex necopinato laetitia fuit: dilectus omissus est, exauctorati, qui sacramento dixerant, et exercitus qui Arimini pestilentia adfectus erat
12 domum dimissus. Histri magnis copiis cum castra haud procul consulis castris haberent, postquam alterum consulem cum exercitu novo advenisse audierunt, passim in civitates dilapsi sunt. Consules Aquileiam in hiberna legiones reduxerunt.

VI. Sedato tandem Histrico tumultu senatus consultum factum est ut consules inter se comparent uter eorum ad comitia habenda Romam rediret.
2 Cum absentem Manlium tribuni plebis A.[2] Licinius Nerva et C. Papirius Turdus in contionibus lacerarent rogationemque promulgarent, ne Manlius post idus Martias—prorogatae namque consulibus iam

[1] coloniis Doujat: colonis Fr.
[2] A. add. Sigonius.

---

[1] praetor urbanus (supra vi. 4).
[2] The first and fourth legions would normally have been in Liguria with the other consul. Livy may however mean the first of the two legions just authorized.

that Marcus Titinius the praetor[1] should order the B.C. 178 first legion[2] and an equal number of infantry and cavalry of the allies to assemble at Rimini. Nero in uniform set out for his province at Pisa; Titinius first sent Gaius Cassius, a tribune of the soldiers, to Rimini as commander of the legion and then conducted the levy at Rome. Marcus Junius the consul, having gone over from the Ligurians into the province of Gaul, and having immediately levied upon the Gallic states for auxiliaries and upon the colonies for regular troops, arrived at Aquileia. There he was informed that the army was safe, and sending despatches to Rome in order to allay their fears, he himself sent home the auxiliaries which he had levied on the Gauls and set out to join his colleague. At Rome there was great and unexpected joy; the levy was stopped, the soldiers who had taken the military oath were discharged, and the army, which had been suffering from a plague at Rimini, was sent home. Although the Histrians had a strong force in camp not far from the consul's camp, when they learned that the other consul with a new army had arrived they dispersed to their various states. The consuls led the legions into winter-quarters at Aquileia.

VI. The alarm in Histria having finally subsided, the senate passed a decree that the consuls should arrange between themselves which should come to Rome to hold the elections. When the tribunes of the people, Aulus Licinius Nerva and Gaius Papirius Turdus, were tearing the absent consul Manlius to pieces in their assemblies and proposing a bill that Manlius should not hold his command after the Ides of March—for the provincial commands of the in annum provinciae erant—imperium retineret, 3 uti causam extemplo dicere, cum abisset magistratu, posset, huic rogationi Q. Aelius collega intercessit magnisque contentionibus obtinuit ne perferretur. 4 Per eos dies Ti. Sempronius Gracchus et L. Postumius Albinus ex Hispania Romam cum revertissent, senatus iis a M. Titinio praetore datus in aede Bellonae ad disserendas res quas gessissent postulandosque honores meritos et[1] ut diis immortalibus haberetur honos. 5 Eodem tempore et in Sardinia magnum tumultum esse litteris T. Aebuti praetoris cognitum est, quas 6 filius eius ad senatum attulerat. Ilienses adiunctis Balarorum auxiliis pacatam provinciam invaserant, nec eis invalido exercitu et magna parte pestilentia 7 absumpto resisti poterat. Eadem et Sardorum legati nuntiabant orantes, ut urbibus saltem—iam enim agros deploratos esse—opem senatus ferret. Haec legatio totumque quod ad Sardiniam pertinebat ad novos magistratus reiectum est. 8 Aeque miserabilis legatio Lyciorum, qui crudelita-

A.U.C. 576

[1] et add. J. F. Gronovius.

---

[1] The charge against Manlius (vii. 7 below) was that he had left his province of Gaul without permission to undertake the Histrian campaign (cf. i. 1 above). The prorogation of the imperium before the elections was irregular and apparently designed to thwart the tribunes' plan of prosecuting Manlius.

[2] For their appointment to the Spanish province cf. XL. xlvii. 1.

[3] Cf. XL. xxxiv. 13 and the note.

[4] A mountain tribe of Sardinia.

[5] Concerning this embassy cf. Polybius XXV. iv. L.C.L. Vol. V, pp. 475 f., especially the finding of the Roman consuls had already been prolonged for a year— B.C. 178 that he might be able to plead his cause immediately upon his retirement from office, this measure was vetoed by their colleague Quintus Aelius, who after violent arguments prevailed to prevent its passing.[1]

At about this time, when Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Lucius Postumius Albinus[2] had returned to Rome from Spain, an audience before the senate was granted to them by the praetor Marcus Titinius, to be held in the temple of Bellona so that they might present an account of their achievements, claim the distinctions they deserved and ask that honour should be paid to the immortal gods.

At the same time there was great confusion in Sardinia also, as was learned from dispatches from Titus Aebutius the praetor which had been brought to the senate by his son. The Ilienses,[3] reinforced by auxiliaries of the Balari,[4] had attacked the province while it was at peace, and could not be resisted since the army was weak and had lost a large number of its members as a result of a pestilence. Ambassadors of the Sardinians also brought the same news and begged that the senate should send aid to the towns at least—for the fields had already been abandoned in despair. This embassy and the whole question about what was to be done concerning Sardinia was postponed to the new administration.

An equally pitiful embassy from the Lycians arrived,[5] who complained of the cruelty of the commissioners, sec. 5 : " they found that the Lycians had not been handed over to Rhodes as a gift, but rather to be treated like friends and allies."

A.U.C. 576

tem Rhodiorum, quibus ab L. Cornelio Scipione attri-9 buti erant, querebantur: fuisse se[1] sub dicione Antiochi; eam regiam servitutem collatam cum praesenti statu praeclaram libertatem visam. Non publice[2] tantum se premi imperio, sed singulos
10 iustum pati servitium. Coniuges[3] liberosque vexari; in corpus in tergum saeviri; famam, quod indignum sit, maculari dehonestarique; et palam res odiosas fieri iuris etiam usurpandi causa, ne pro dubio habeant, nihil inter se et argento parata mancipia
11 interesse. Motus his senatus litteras Lyciis ad Rhodios dedit, nec Lycios Rhodiis nec ullos alii cuiquam[4] qui nati liberi sint in servitutem dari 12 placere; Lycios ita sub Rhodiorum simul imperio et tutela esse ut in dicione populi Romani civitates sociae sint.

VII. Triumphi deinde ex Hispania duo continui
2 acti. Prior Sempronius Gracchus de Celtiberis sociisque eorum, postero die L. Postumius de Lusitanis aliisque eiusdem regionis Hispanis triumphavit. Quadraginta milia pondo argenti Gracchus[5] trans-

[1] se add. Drakenborch.
[2] publice Duker: publico Fr.
[3] coniuges Hartel: iustos coniuges Fr.
[4] alii cuiquam Heraldus: alicuiquam Fr.
[5] Gracchus Madvig: Ti. Gracchus Fr.

---

[1] The assignment of the Lycians to Rhodes was not the work of Scipio but of the commission, acting under orders from the senate, which concluded the treaty with Antiochus only after Scipio had left the province (XXXVII. lv.; XXXVIII. xxxix. 13).

[2] With argento parata cf. Euripides' Alcestis 675: Λυδὸν ἢ Φρύγα . . ἀργυρώνητον σέθεν. Polybius (XXVI. vii) gives a similar but less emotional account of the treatment of the Lycians.

Rhodians, under whose control they had been placed by Lucius Cornelius Scipio.[1] They said that they had been under the dominion of Antiochus; this slavery to the King, when compared with their present situation, seemed glorious liberty. They were not merely as a state oppressed by their government, but private citizens were suffering downright bondage. Their wives and children, they said, were abused; cruelty was wreaked upon their bodies and their backs; their reputations—a shameful procedure—were stained and dishonoured; and openly hateful acts were done merely for the sake of displaying an abuse of power, in order to leave no doubt that there was no distinction between themselves and slaves bought with money.[2] The senate, moved by this appeal, entrusted the Lycians with a letter for the Rhodians, stating that it was not their pleasure that the Lycians should be enslaved by the Rhodians nor any people who had been born in freedom by any other people; the Lycians had been placed under the administrative control and at the same time the protection of the Rhodians on the same conditions as the allied states enjoyed under the guardianship of the Roman people. B.C. 178

VII. Then two triumphs over Spain were celebrated in succession. The first was that of Sempronius Gracchus, who triumphed over the Celtiberians and their allies, and the next day Lucius Postumius triumphed over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards in the same district.[3] Gracchus carried in procession forty thousand pounds of silver,

[3] For the campaigns of Gracchus and Albinus, cf. XL. xlvii ff. There was, according to the Periocha, a further account in the lost portion of this Book.

A.U.C. 576

3 tulit, viginti milia Albinus. Militibus denarios quinos vicenos, duplex centurioni, triplex equiti ambo diviserunt; sociis tantumdem quantum Romanis.

4 Per eosdem forte dies M. Iunius consul ex Histria
5 comitiorum causa Romam venit. Eum cum in senatu fatigassent interrogationibus tribuni plebis Papirius et Licinius de iis quae in Histria essent acta in 6 contionem quoque produxerunt. Ad quae cum consul se dies non plus undecim in ea provincia fuisse responderet, quae se absente acta essent, se
7 quoque, ut illos, fama comperta habere, exsequebantur deinde quaerentes, quid ita non potius A. Manlius Romam venisset, ut rationem redderet populo Romano, cur ex Gallia provincia quam
8 sortitus esset in Histriam transisset? Quando id bellum senatus decrevisset, quando id bellum populus Romanus iussisset? At hercule privato quidem consilio bellum susceptum esse, sed gestum prudenter
9 fortiterque. Immo, utrum susceptum sit nequius an inconsultius gestum dici non posse. Stationes duas necopinantes ab Histris oppressas, castra Romana capta, quod peditum, quod equitum in castris fuerit 10 caesum;[1] ceteros inermes fusosque, ante omnes consulem ipsum, ad mare ac naves fugisse. Privatum rationem redditurum earum rerum esse quoniam consul noluisset.

[1] caesum add. Crévier.

---

[1] Cf. XL. xliii. 7 and the note.

[2] The criticism of Manlius is similar to that directed against his brother after the Galatian campaign of 189 B.C. (especially XXXVIII. xlv.–xlvi).

Albinus twenty thousand. Both distributed as donatives twenty-five denarii each to the infantry, twice that sum to centurions, and thrice to the cavalry; the allies shared on the same terms with the Romans.[1] B.C. 178

About this time it chanced that the consul Marcus Junius came from Histria to Rome in order to hold the elections. When the tribunes of the people, Papirius and Licinius, had worn him out in the senate with questions as to what had happened in Histria, they finally haled him before an assembly. When the consul said in reply that he had spent not more than eleven days in that province, and that what had happened in his absence he, like the tribunes, knew only from report, they continued to pursue the matter, inquiring why in the world Aulus Manlius rather than himself had not come to Rome, in order to render an account to the Roman people of the reason why he had gone from the province of Gaul, which he had obtained from the lot, over into Histria? When, they asked, had the senate decreed that war? When had the Roman people ordered that war? But, by Hercules, he will say that although the war was undertaken on his own initiative, it was conducted wisely and courageously.[2] On the contrary, they said, it was impossible to say whether it was undertaken more improperly or prosecuted more imprudently. Two outposts were surprised by the Histrians, a Roman camp captured, and all the infantry and cavalry in the camp slaughtered, the rest, unarmed and routed, the consul himself leading the way, had fled to the sea and the ships! As a private citizen Manlius would give account of his actions, since he had refused to do this as a consul.

A.U.C. 576

VIII. Comitia deinde habita. Consules creati C. Claudius Pulcher Ti. Sempronius Gracchus. Et postero die praetores facti P. Aelius Tubero iterum C. Quinctius Flamininus C. Numisius L. Mummius
2 Cn. Cornelius Scipio C. Valerius Laevinus. Tuberoni urbana iurisdictio, Quinctio peregrina evenit, Numisio Sicilia, Mummio Sardinia; sed ea propter belli
3 magnitudinem provincia consularis facta.[1] Scipio et Laevinus Galliam in duas divisam provincias sortiti sunt.

A.U.C. 577

4 Idibus Martiis, quo die Sempronius Claudiusque consulatum inierunt, mentio tantum de provinciis Sardinia Histriaque et utriusque hostibus fuit qui in 5 his provinciis bellum concivissent. Postero die legati Sardorum, qui ad novos magistratus dilati erant, et[2] L. Minucius Thermus, qui legatus Manli consulis in Histria fuerat, in senatum venit. Ab his edoctus est senatus quantum belli eae provinciae haberent.
6 Moverunt senatum et legationes socium nominis Latini, quae et censores et priores consules fati-
7 gaverant,[3] tandem in senatum introductae. Summa querellarum erat, cives suos Romae censos plerosque Romam commigrasse; quod si permittatur, perpaucis lustris futurum, ut deserta oppida, deserti

[1] post facta, Gracchus eam sortitur, Histriam Claudius exhibet Fr.; quae uerba secl. Drakenborch; cf. ix. 8.
[2] et add. Clericus.
[3] fatigaverant J. F. Gronovius: fatigauerunt Fr.

---

[1] There was a praetor of this name in 201 B.C. (XXX. xl. 5).
[2] The separate mention of the Samnites and the Paelignians in sect. 8 below indicates that this refers only to the allies in Latium, not in Italy as a whole; cf. ex Latio in XXXIX. iii. 4.
[3] For an attempt in 189 B.C. to correct the same situation, cf. XXXIX. iii. 4–6.

VIII. The consular elections were then held. B.C. 178
The consuls chosen were Gaius Claudius Pulcher and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus. The next day the praetors were elected, Publius Aelius Tubero (for the second time),[1] Gaius Quinctius Flamininus, Gaius Numisius, Lucius Mummius, Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio, Gaius Valerius Laevinus. The jurisdiction between citizens fell to Tubero, that between citizens and aliens to Quinctius, Sicily to Numisius, Sardinia to Mummius; but this, by reason of the seriousness of the war, was made a consular province. Scipio and Laevinus received from the lot Gaul, divided into two provinces.

On the Ides of March, when Sempronius and B.C. 177
Claudius were inaugurated consuls, a mere mention was made of the provinces of Sardinia and Histria and the enemies in both who had stirred up war in those provinces. On the next day the ambassadors of the Sardinians, whose hearing had been postponed to the administration of the new consuls, were heard, and Lucius Minucius Thermus, who had been a lieutenant of the consul Manlius in Histria, came into the senate. By them the senate was informed to what extent these provinces were engaged in war.

The senate was greatly impressed also by the embassies from the allies of the Latin confederacy,[2] who had wearied both censors and former consuls, and were at length given audience before the senate. The substance of their complaints was that large numbers of their citizens had been rated at Rome and had moved to Rome;[3] but if this were allowed it would come to pass in a very few decades that there would be deserted towns and deserted farms

A.U.C. 577

